A wide range of individual freedoms is provided for by the 1917 Constitution and honored in practice. Some important exceptions, however, continue to be noted. The exceptions include abuse by police and judicial authorities of detainees and prisoners; political and extrajudicial killings, mostly the result of confrontations between peasants and landowners, their agents, and local police over disputed land; and recurring credible charges by opposition parties, civic groups, and outside observers of election fraud. While these and other human rights abuses persist, the Government has taken several steps to improve the situation, notable among them a large-scale amnesty program for persons accused of crimes of a "political or social nature," various attempts at a national debate on electoral reform, and the establishment of a Director General for Human Rights under the Secretary of Government.

MEXICO

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

In Mexico's rural states disputes over land are often violent and sometimes result in extrajudicial killings. While the Federal Government continues its efforts to curb such violence, violations continue nonetheless.

Paramilitary bands and local police controlled by political bosses and landowners are often accused of oppressing and even murdering peasant activists. Such charges have been made not only by independent peasant organizations, but also by the PRI-affiliated National Confederation of Peasants (CNC). The independent groups attribute the killings to persons employed by local strongmen (caciques), as well as to members of the CNC and to the local police. As an example, 11 persons died in mid-February in Pijijiapan, Chiapas State, in an apparent dispute between the Independent Central of Agricultural Workers and Campesinos (CIOAC) and CNC-affiliated claimants to the same parcel of land; the CIOAC had been a Mexican Socialist Party affiliate, while the CNC represents the PRI's peasant arm. Press reports cite police involvement in the incident, though no police have been charged with any crime. State governor Patrocinio Gonzalez Garrido, as well as CNC officials in Mexico City, decried the Pijijiapan violence.

A CIOAC activist, Sebastian Perez Nunez, was shot to death, apparently by a local Chiapas rancher, on December 29, 1988, in apparent retaliation for a CIOAC-led takeover of land. Two Mexican Socialist Party (PMS) activists, Santos Cabrera Rosas and Elpidio Dominguez Castro, were also murdered early in 1989, and four peasant sympathizers of presidential candidate Cuauhtemoc Cardenas were killed in a confrontation on January 22 with state rural police in Xoxocotla, Morelos State, following municipal elections. The Federal Government continued its ongoing efforts to control this violence, and attorneys general from various states met frequently during the year with national law enforcement and Secretariat of Government officials to pursue this goal.

A number of apparent assassinations of political activists and militants also occurred within the last year. Political motives cannot, as yet, be ascribed with certainty to any of the killings, though opposition groups assert such was the case. In each instance, state judicial officials have promised thoroughgoing investigations.

In otherwise peaceful elections on July 12 for mayors and local legislators in the northern state of Durango, the candidate of the local Committee for Popular Defense (CDP) for mayor of the small town of Simon Bolivar was shot in a purported robbery and left clinically dead in what may actually have been a politically motivated crime. PRI special delegate Cesar Martinez Bonilla was killed September 21 in Nochistlan, Oaxaca, reportedly by an Authentic Party of the Mexican Revolution (PARM) militant.

Meanwhile, several of 1988's most prominent cases of alleged political killings have no apparent solution in sight, including those of Cardenas' personal aides Francisco Ovando Gil and Roman Gil Heraldez. A suspect has been formally accused in the August 1988 murders of four young Revolutionary Workers Party (PRT) activists, but the party itself believes that the crime was politically motivated, and that the actual murderer is still at large.

On February 17, a Mexican Federal judge found four defendants guilty of abuse of authority and injuries in connection with the August 1986 detention and torture of U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agent Victor Cortez in Guadalajara. Subsequently, the four defendants, all Jalisco state judicial police officers, were sentenced to 5 years in prison and fined the equivalent of $140. Two additional suspects remain at large. In related developments, Rafael Caro Quintero, Ernesto Fonseca Carrillo, and others accused of involvement in the kidnaping and murder of U.S. drug enforcement administration (DEA) agent Enrique Camarena were convicted and sentenced in Mexico City on drug trafficking charges, with Caro receiving a sentence of 116 years and Fonseca 140 years. Though lengthy, the trial has followed normal Mexican judicial procedures.

On December 23, 1988, prisoners at the Venustiano Carranza Center for Social Readaptation in Tepic, Nayarit, rioted. Special tactical police teams flown in from Mexico City to quell the rebellion responded with excessive force, killing 21. Among those left dead in the melee were the prison warden and the police team commander. Of the 21 fatalities, 13 had been filmed by an NBC television camera crew surrendering to prison authorities; each of the 13 was later found dead with a bullet wound in the head. The press in Guadalajara reported extensively on the deaths of two Mexican citizens while in detention.

On December 21, 1988, Antonio Gomez Reyes died as an apparent consequence of beatings received after his arrest. He was never charged and the circumstances surrounding his arrest remained unclear. Jorge Perez Gonzalez died in detention on February 8, after allegedly being forced to sign a confession of growing marijuana. The Mexican press reported that a prisoner drowned in July at the hands of the Nuevo Leon State Police. In December the press reported the death of 19-year-old Fernando Jordan de la Torba in La Paz, Baja California Sur. The victim, son of a prominent family, died of peritonitis, allegedly after being severely tortured and beaten while under detention by the Federal Judicial Police. By year's end there was no official investigation in progress, and a Federal Deputy for the state charged that high government officials were inhibiting legitimate investigations into this and other cases.

According to the Committee in Defense of Prisoners, the Persecuted, Disappeared Persons, and Political Exiles of Mexico, a prominent human rights organization, there are 552 disappeared persons in Mexico, an increase of 5 over the previous year. The majority of disappearances are cases which occurred during the earlier presidential administrations of Luis Echeverria Alvarez and Jose Lopez Portillo. The Committee believes that a total of 26 persons disappeared during the Miguel de la Madrid administration, which ended on December 1, 1988.

One of the five recent disappearances included PRT militant Jose Ramon Garcia Gomez, who was purportedly removed from his home in Cuautla, Morelos State, on December 16, 1988, by state judicial police agents. There were no traces, at year's end, of his whereabouts, and both federal and state investigators have been unsuccessful in their respective searches. The Committee has also classified Francisco Sahagun Baca as disappeared. Sahagun was formerly head of the Federal Government's Division of Investigations for the Prevention of Delinquency (DIPD) and a purported member of the "White Brigades," a group charged with acts of torture, disappearance, and assassination during the Government's campaign in the 1970's against insurgent guerrillas. Reportedly arrested on July 10, 1989, on drug-related charges, he has not been heard from since.

Many human rights activists and opposition politicians were very concerned when Miguel Nazar Haro was appointed head of the Intelligence Directorate of the Federal District's Secretariat of Public Security. In the 1970's, Nazar had been head of the Federal Directorate of Security and another purported member of the "White Brigades." Like Sahagun, he has been charged with direct participation in acts of illegal detention, torture, and disappearance. Nazar Haro subsequently resigned his DDF position, apparently under public pressure.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

Although torture is prohibited by the Constitution, human rights organizations continue to charge that law enforcement officials employ psychological and physical abuse, most often in the period immediately following arrest and especially during interrogation. The Government has stated that the use of torture to extract confessions is an illegal and unacceptable substitute for investigative work. Accordingly, the Administration continued its efforts to recruit new personnel into the various police forces and emphasizes education and training in legitimate investigative skills. The Attorney General's Office has contracted with human rights organizations to provide courses designed to sensitize law enforcement personnel to the need to respect human rights.

United States consulates continued to report problems concerning the arrest of U.S. citizens. In many instances, those detained alleged they were abused and tortured by military and law enforcement authorities, most often for purposes of obtaining admissions of guilt. They claimed to have been subjected to beatings, electric shocks applied with cattle prods and stun guns, sexual assaults, attempts at suffocation, and death threats. Some declined to discuss their cases with consular officials for fear of reprisal.

As an example, six U.S. citizens were arrested in Baja California Sur in May 1989 by elements of the Federal Judicial Police for alleged possession of cocaine. All six, including one woman, were strip-searched. One was blindfolded and had a plastic bag tied around his head to the point of suffocation; a gun was later discharged at his head and a knife held to his throat. Overall, there have been 74 complaints by U.S. citizens throughout Mexico (through the month of September 1989), an increase of 6 over the previous year. Unfortunately, formal diplomatic protests sent to the Secretariat of Foreign Relations have not always produced satisfactory responses.

In late October, the Bar Association of the state of Sonora issued an open letter to protest the "constant violation" of fundamental constitutional rights and abuse of prisoners, including torture and murder, by the police authorities at all levels in the state. Some members of the church and the media supported the Association's allegations.

There were some signs of improvement, however. The U.S. consulate in Nuevo Laredo noted a marked drop in abuse cases after the transfer of Federal police commander Hugo Tinoco Causor and his subsequent indictment on charges of torture and illegal deprivation of liberty. The consulate general in Guadalajara reported an end to complaints of mistreatment by military authorities in the Puerto Vallarta area. It also noted that Jalisco's relatively new governor, Guillermo Cosío Vidaurri, has made a significant effort to improve police recruitment, training, and compensation. About 150 corrupt state police and judicial officials were dismissed, and more were expected to follow.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under provisions of the Constitution, an arrested suspect can be held in police custody for up to 48 hours before he must be brought before a judge to make a preliminary statement of guilt or innocence. The judge has an additional 24 hours to determine whether detention should continue or not. Both standards, however, have frequently been violated, with charges of abuse, torture, and the extortion of forced confessions from accused persons during this initial period.

Mexican citizens are guaranteed the right to seek restraining orders and to make appeals ("amparo"), a constitutional protection provided against "coercive and abusive acts of authority." In a recent reform of the restraining order/appeal system, certain categories of persons are automatically granted such petitions. Incidents of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment occur most frequently in criminal cases and, notably, in land tenure disputes.

Exile and extradition of Mexican citizens are not normally practiced in Mexico.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is divided into Federal and state court systems, with the Federal courts having jurisdiction over most civil cases and those involving major felonies. Under the Constitution, trial and sentencing must be completed within 12 months of arrest for crimes that would carry at least a 2-year sentence. Despite efforts at reform, this standard is often not met because of delays caused by cumbersome court procedures, case backlogs, and defense motions. Trial is by judge, not jury, in nearly all criminal cases. Defendants have a right to counsel, and public defenders are available. Other rights include defense against self-incrimination, the right to confront one's accusers, and the right to a public trial.

The political opposition alleges that the judiciary, with judges placed in office by renewable appointments, is dependent on the executive branch. The Government denies that political beliefs have any bearing on the impartial administration of justice. Factors such as low pay for judges and law enforcement officials and high caseloads contribute to corruption in the judicial system

The National Front against Repression (FNCR) states there are currently 33 political prisoners in the country. It acknowledges the release by the Government during the past year of four political prisoners, including PRT activist and 23rd of September League militant Heladio Torres Flores, and Manuel Alba Vera, also imprisoned for crimes committed during the "armed struggle" of the 1970's. The majority of political prisoners, as defined by the FCNR, are peasants and peasant activists arrested in disputes over land. The Government has disputed the appellation "political prisoner" in these cases, charging that most of those listed by the FNCR are actually guilty of common crimes such as terrorism, criminal association, and damage to property. The Government has consistently denied that it holds political prisoners.

President Salinas de Gortari initiated a sweeping amnesty program in February in which a total of 1,176 prisoners accused of committing crimes of a "political or social nature" were released from jail. Human rights activists, including the prestigious Mexican Academy of Human Rights, allege that the amnesty program distracts public attention from the problems of political prisoners and the disappeared and is really aimed at alleviating problems of overcrowding in Mexican prisons, particularly as the Government activates its new campaign against drug trafficking.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Article 16 of the Constitution provides for the privacy of individuals. Although the Government generally does not intrude on this right, and search warrants are required by law, peasants and urban squatters involved in conflicts over land titles have charged that local landowners, accompanied by police, have entered their homes without appropriate judicial orders and sometimes have resorted to violence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and of the press are provided for by the Constitution. The current administration has tolerated much direct public criticism, particularly in the print media. Mexico's press is also a primary source for reporting allegations of human rights violations. However, the State's role as sole supplier of newsprint in Mexico has long given rise to charges that the Government uses this control to pressure editors into quashing unfavorable reports, with some journalists avoiding confrontation by self-censorship. President Salinas acknowledged the problem and, on October 9, announced his intention to privatize the supply of newsprint.

Opposition political parties have often charged that Mexico's two principal television networks, one government owned and the other privately owned but allegedly partial to the Government, accord PRI candidates unfair advantage in coverage of their campaigns. Article 52 of the revised Federal Electoral Code does provide opposition parties with 15 minutes per month of television time and additional time during an electoral campaign. However, the opposition asserts that PRI's advantage derives from its status as Mexico's "official" party, with party activities (including campaign events) covered as if they constituted national news.

In sharp contrast with 1988, no Mexican journalists are known to have died violently or under suspicious circumstances in 1989. However, press reports indicate that a reporter for El Sol Veracruzano was abducted in Mexico City in early January, and as many as nine press photographers were assaulted over the course of the year.

In a major development, the murder of Excelsior journalist Manuel Buendia Tellezgiron was purportedly solved after a 5-year investigation, with sometime police agent Juan Rafael Moro Avila accused of the crime. Moro, in turn, blamed former policeman Jose Luis Ochoa Alonso for the murder, averring that he only arrived at the scene after Buendia was hit; Ochoa himself was later murdered. Moro further alleged that Jose Antonio Zorilla Perez, a former chief of the now defunct Federal Security Directorate (Secretariat of Government), was the "intellectual author" of the crime. In addition, several cases pending from 1988 have apparently been solved, including the murders of Tijuana investigative reporter Felix Miranda and Mazatlan journalist Manuel Burgueno. No suspects have as yet been identified in the shooting of Ciudad Juarez television personality Linda Bejarano.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution grants the right of peaceful assembly for any lawful purpose. A government permit is generally required for major demonstrations, and the Government, with few exceptions, permits demonstrations by a broad range of political groups. Within the Federal District, opposition political groups as well as peasant and indigenous organizations are allowed frequent access to both main boulevards and the city's large central square for demonstrations. In rare instances, unauthorized marches, sit-ins, and other forms of protest are broken up forcibly by police and security forces, especially outside the capital.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution permits individuals to practice the religion of their choice. However, no religious body is granted legal standing, and the clergy is barred from participating in politics, voting, owning real estate, or wearing religious garb in public. Some of these prohibitions are not strictly enforced, nor is a constitutional restriction against preuniversity religious schools, many of which exist. Mexico is predominantly Roman Catholic, though Protestant, Mormon, Jewish, and other religious communities also exist and enjoy freedom of worship. Protestant Evangelists and Mormons, principally foreign-supported groups, are active and especially successful in certain rural, largely indigenous communities. Some critics have stated that the Government finds these foreign groups threatening and, therefore, selectively enforces anticlerical laws in favor of the predominant Roman Catholic Church. Other critics assert the opposite; that the laws are not enforced against the Evangelists in order to reduce the influence of the Catholic Church.

MEXICO

A rapprochement of sorts between church and state began under the previous presidential administration of Miguel de la Madrid. Incoming President Salinas de Gortari has taken the rapprochement several steps further, inviting leading clerics (including the Apostolic Delegate) to his December 1, 1988, inauguration and holding public meetings with them (including briefings by Cabinet members on the status of foreign debt negotiations).

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within and outside the country is unrestricted. Mexico has traditionally followed a liberal asylum policy concerning Central American refugees and asylum seekers from other countries--even though the Constitution does not provide for their recognition, nor do laws exist which govern their entry into and residence in Mexico. The Government has usually admitted persons whom the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) recognizes as refugees. Over 41,000 Guatemalan refugees reside in camps and resettlement centers in southern Mexico. According to the UNHCR, an additional 150,000 Guatemalans reside illegally in Mexico, mostly in the state of Chiapas, though large numbers also reside in Mexico City and other urban areas. Undocumented Guatemalans lead a precarious existence because they are subject to deportation if caught, and they also can be subjected to exploitation by private Mexicans as a source of cheap labor.

Until quite recently, Guatemalan refugees in the southern border states have been restricted in their movements and in opportunities for legal work in order to avoid friction with local residents and to discourage permanent resettlement in the area. Under this same policy, refugee children born in Mexico were not recorded or issued birth certificates, and could not claim Mexican citizenship. These restrictions have since been relaxed, according to UNHCR and government officials, with refugees now able to seek some work outside of the camps and children now being registered. Government policy has been to encourage the voluntary repatriation of individuals and groups of refugees, with assurances that their personal safety and security would be respected.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

Since 1929, Mexico's Government has been controlled by the PRI, which has won every presidential race since then and every gubernatorial race, save for the 1989 Baja California Norte contest. To secure its continuance in power, the PRI has over the years relied on extensive public patronage, massive government and party organizational resources and, according to opposition parties as well as independent outside observers, extensive electoral fraud.

Following Federal elections in 1988, a total of six parties gained representation in the Chamber of Deputies and two in the Senate--the latter a first in Mexican political history. The President and senators are elected for 6-year terms; deputies for 3-year terms. The combined opposition won an unprecedented 237 seats out of total of 500 in the lower house of Congress and 4 of 64 in the upper. Though in a minority, the opposition made its weight felt on at least one occasion during the year, compelling the Government to revise its foreign investment law by regulation instead of by legislation.

Charges of electoral fraud were heard frequently and vociferously throughout the last presidential contest and in several follow-on state elections, notably elections in July 1989 for the state legislature of Michoacan. Most observers acknowledge that fraud occurs in Mexican elections, particularly in outlying, rural areas, and less so in urban areas, where a more politically active and perceptive electorate exists; they also recognize, however, that most recent elections have been somewhat more honest than those of the past. The Government has consistently defended the ruling party's victories and has specifically denied allegations of fraud, while admitting that the electoral system is an imperfect one which could and should be improved.

The PRI has, during 1989, pursued efforts to improve its method of choosing candidates for public office. A number of PRI state committees have experimented with limited nominating primaries or conventions.

In municipal elections held through December 1989, the Government recognized several opposition victories by both leftist and conservative parties. In the state of Michoacan, for example, the center-left Party of Democratic Revolution won almost half of the state's municipalities, including the state's capital and most populous city, Morelia. In other regions, the Federal Government also recognized many opposition victories, but, in at least one case in the state of Sinaloa, only after occasionally violent protest activity by political activists from both sides. On the whole, the Government's ability to insure fair electoral practices at the local level remained flawed but improving.

The Government has sponsored, largely at opposition behest, a series of debates in the Chamber of Deputies and the Federal Electoral Commission on reform of the Constitution and the Federal Electoral Code. During the week of October 16, the Chamber of Deputies approved amendments providing for newly initiated electoral bodies to review election results, the opening of all sessions of electoral bodies to the public, and the establishment of a minimum 35 percent of the vote for any one party to claim a majority of seats in the Chamber of Deputies. Although the leftist opposition criticized the changes as "cosmetic," the conservative opposition viewed the amendments as steps, albeit small ones, toward a more evenhanded political system.

The Government permits both domestic and international human rights groups to operate in Mexico without restrictions or harassment, and has pledged its full cooperation with efforts by Amnesty International (AI) to monitor human rights violations in Mexico. Various ranking Mexican officials (including the Secretariat of Government's new Director General for Human Rights and Refugee Affairs, appointed in December 1988) met with AI representatives, domestic human rights activists, and UNHRC officials to discuss human rights problems. The Director General serves as an ombudsman to both domestic and foreign human rights and refugee groups, as well as to Mexico's state governors and judicial system officials. He has no independent authority, save for that which derives from the political power of the Secretary of Government.

There are three well-known human rights organizations in Mexico. The first of these, the Mexican Academy of Human Rights, is composed of leading political and academic figures; it serves primarily as an information clearinghouse on human rights abuses in Mexico, although some limited guidance is, on occasion, provided to individuals. The National Front Against Repression (FNCR) and the Committee in Defense of Prisoners, the Persecuted, Disappeared, and Political Exiles of Mexico both take highly public stances on individual human rights cases, as well as the larger issues of political prisoners and the disappeared.

In its report covering events in 1988, AI again expressed concern about reports of political killings, arbitrary arrest of political opponents, the use in evidence of confessions obtained under duress, continuing rural violence, and torture. AI also voiced concern about disappearances in previous years which have never been satisfactorily clarified by the Government; 52 disappearances occurring between 1972 and 1983 are reportedly being investigated by AI.

Mexico takes pride in its Spanish and Indian origins and in the success the country has achieved in fostering a climate of racial harmony. Indigenous groups, many of which do not speak Spanish, are encouraged to participate in political life and the Government is respectful of the desire of these groups to retain elements of their traditional lifestyle. These groups, however, remain largely outside the country's political and economic mainstream, a result not of restrictive governmental policy but rather of longstanding patterns of economic and social development.

Religious discrimination is generally nonexistent except for sanctions contained in the constitution denying any religious institution legal standing, and barring clergy of any denomination from participating in politics, voting, owning real estate, or wearing religious garb in public.

Historically, women in Mexico have played a subordinate role, economically, politically, and socially. However, women are becoming increasingly active both in the economy and politically. Legally, women are equal to men. They have the right to file for separation and divorce and to own property in their own name. The Constitution provides for equal pay for equal work and for maternity leave. Violence against women, including wife beating, is not infrequent, but there are no reliable statistics on the extent to which it occurs. Domestic assault is a crime, but in practice, due to social tradition, women are often reluctant to file reports of abuse or to press charges, and police are reluctant to intervene in what is often considered a domestic affair. Violence against women was not widely discussed as an issue of public policy during 1989 though the number of women's action groups is increasing, and they have begun to offer expanded counseling and legal services for victims of sexual crimes.

MEXICO

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Article 123 of the Constitution provides workers and employers the right to form unions and professional associations of their own choosing. Registration requirements are not onerous, and unions must register with the Labor Secretariat. These rights are widely exercised in Mexico where a fairly diverse trade union movement exists. Close to 35 percent of the Mexican work force--now estimated at 26 million--is organized into trade union confederations and independent unions. There are no limitations on union organizing among civil servants, a sector that is highly unionized in Mexico.

The Government does not formally control Mexican trade unions, but the vast majority, some 85 to 90 percent, are affiliated with the PRI. The remainder are independent or support opposition parties, including those of a leftist or Marxist orientation. In 1989 the Government went outside of the judicial process on at least two occasions to take action that affected the integrity of union structures. In May, after an illegal strike by bus drivers in Mexico City, the Government withdrew recognition of the union, fired the workers, and announced plans to restructure the bus company. The Government subsequently reinstated the workers and imposed terms for their continued employment. In August the Government declared the state-owned copper mine, CANANEA, bankrupt, effectively breaking the union at that plant.

Mexican law grants workers the right to strike. Strikes are relatively infrequent, however, usually occurring when collective bargaining impasses arise or when plant closures or layoffs are threatened. Wildcat strikes also occur. The Federal Labor Law of 1931, as amended in 1971, sets forth lengthy and somewhat cumbersome procedures for calling a legal strike. Notice of intent to strike must be filed 6 to 10 days in advance, and efforts at conciliation, mediation, and arbitration between the parties in dispute are required. Local, state, and Federal tripartite conciliation and arbitration boards--composed of labor, employer, and government representatives--conduct these negotiations. The labor law also stipulates that strikes are a measure of "last resort." Article 123 grants public sector workers the right to strike under specific conditions set by the labor law.

Several highly publicized illegal strikes occurred in 1989. As noted above, Mexico city bus workers walked out briefly in May. Earlier, dissident members of the 1.2 million member teachers union SNTE went on strike from April 17 to May 12, effectively shutting elementary and secondary schools in the Federal District and several states, especially in the south. The teachers' principal demands included the ouster of longtime union chieftain (and "moral guide for life") Carlos Jongitud Barrios, a 100-percent wage increase, and internal union democratization. The strike ended after Jongitud resigned (on orders from President Salinas) and the Government conceded a 25-percent wage increase. Additional work stoppages have followed, mostly over democratization issues. In August dissident workers at the parastatal SICARTSA steel mill in Lazaro Cardenas, Michoacan initiated a wildcat strike in demand of a 60-percent wage increase; the strike remained in effect at year's end.

Only one legal strike of any significance took place in 1989.

MEXICO

A strike in August closed 15 export processing zone factories in Reynosa, Tamaulipas state. Local rivalries between the dominant labor confederation and an independent union prompted the walkout, which lasted 3 weeks. Following state government intervention, the rivals reached an agreement permitting independent unions to continue to operate if they paid dues to the confederation.

Mexican unions may freely form federations or associations and belong to international organizations. The largest of these federations, the 5-million strong Confederation of Mexican Workers (CTM), is also the most powerful. The second largest is the Federation of Government Employees (FSTSE), with slightly less than 2 million members. There are also other, smaller PRI-affiliated confederations. Nearly 8 out of 9 million organized workers are affiliated with PRI-affiliated labor organizations. All PRI-affiliated trade union confederations, and a number of independent unions (totaling 33 in all) are members of the Congress of Labor (CT), which provides overall coordination to the movement. Occasionally, both the CTM and CT take issue with the Government over official wage and economic policies, but open dissent is rare. Though diminished somewhat of late (with several notable union leaders failing at the polls), the practice of placing a significant contingent of union officers in high-ranking government positions, such as that of Federal senator or deputy for the PRI, continues. This symbiotic relationship tends to limit their freedom of action.

The CTM is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the latter's Inter-American Regional Organization. One of the smaller independent unions belongs to the Latin American Confederation of Workers. The Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions has one minor Mexican affiliate.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts repeated its observation that several provisions of the 1963 Federal Act on State Employees do not conform with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, including the prohibition of two or more unions in the same state body, the prohibition against employees in the service of the State from leaving the union, the prohibition of public sector unions joining union organizations of workers or peasants, and the extension of restrictions applicable to trade unions to public sector unions. The Committee asked that the Government make appropriate changes in the legislation.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Both the right to organize and to bargain collectively are provided for by labor law, and are generally respected in practice. There appear to be few, if any, restraints on union organizing. Collective bargaining is widespread, particularly in industry and commerce. The aforementioned tripartite boards of conciliation and arbitration promote voluntary worker-employer negotiations. The boards have additional, statutory responsibilities, such as registering collective bargaining agreements reached between labor and management.

Workers are protected against antiunion discrimination. Labor laws encourage unionization though there are no legal requirements for unionization in any industry or branch of commerce. Although government workers are almost fully unionized, collective bargaining in the government sector is much less common since bargaining does not cover wages, but is limited to certain working conditions. The right to organize and bargain collectively is respected in the in-bond or maquila zones, although workers in some 80 to 90 percent of the firms do not belong to unions. One reason, perhaps, is that in general the nonunion maquila firms provide benefits and working conditions that match or exceed those covered by union contracts.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Mexico is a signatory to ILO conventions regarding the prohibition of forced labor. Such practices are also prohibited by Mexican law. There have been no reports for many years of forced labor in Mexico.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law sets the minimum age for employment at 14 years. Children over 14 years but under 16 years may work a maximum of 6 hours per day and are provided additional legal protection. They cannot be employed in certain hazardous jobs. Child labor laws are observed fairly strictly in large and medium-sized manufacturing and commercial establishments. This is less true in small shops and factories, and many street vendors are children. Enforcement of child labor laws is the responsibility of the Labor Secretariat and local, state, and Federal boards of conciliation and arbitration.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Constitution provides for a minimum wage for workers, with variations for geographic zones and professional specializations. The National Minimum Wage Commission --another tripartite body--sets the minimum rate of pay, approving periodic increases. Since late 1987, successive tripartite economic pacts have restricted the frequency of wage increases. In June 1989, the Government announced a 6-percent increase, bringing the minimum daily wage in Mexico City (the highest of the three geographic zones) to approximately $3.50. The next adjustment is expected in January 1990.

Inflation and frequent devaluations have significantly eroded the peso's purchasing power, with the average worker suffering a 50-percent decline in real wages since 1982. Although inflation in 1989 appeared to be under control, the current minimum wage provides for a barely acceptable standard of living for the substantial number of workers who receive it. With additional contract benefits, organized workers enjoy a somewhat better standard of living than the unorganized.

The maximum legal workweek is 48 hours. In recent years, the average workweek has declined considerably, to a level of 42 to 43 hours. The CTM and other Mexican unions are currently campaigning for legislation to reduce the legal maximum from 48 to 40 hours. Current tripartite negotiations have featured this issue. In practice, however, many Mexicans work at more than one job and easily exceed the average 42 to 43 hours per week. The Constitution provides for required rest periods, stipulating that no worker may work more than 3 hours of overtime per day nor work overtime more than 3 consecutive days, with overtime pay calculated accordingly. Anecdotal evidence suggests that workers frequently exceed these norms.

With respect to occupational health and safety, legislation is relatively advanced and provides substantial protection. Health and safety standards are better observed in large firms. There appears to be a higher incidence of industrial accidents in smaller firms and on construction sites. This does not reflect inadequate legislation, but rather a lack of sufficient inspection personnel to adequately monitor health and safety regulations. Mexican labor law requires the formation of mixed commissions of government, labor, and workers to oversee security and hygiene; it also sets conditions for compensation due to work related illness or injury.

NICARAGUA

The Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), a one-party Communist dictatorship, has ruled Nicaragua since a broad opposition coalition toppled the Somoza dictatorship in 1979. The FSLN has ignored its 1979 commitment to the Organization of American States (OAS) to install and foster a genuinely democratic system of government. In 1987 a new Constitution institutionalized Sandinista control over the country's national security apparatus (army and state security) and over the national economy. Both an internal civic opposition and an armed resistance movement (RN) have long challenged the legitimacy of FSLN rule in Nicaragua.

The Sandinista Popular Army (EPS) and the Ministry of Interior (MINT), in addition to their normal military and police structures, maintain an extensive and repressive internal security apparatus. Using Warsaw Pact and Cuban instructors, they have developed a tight internal control system which engages in surveillance and infiltration of the legal political opposition, and which includes the "Committees for the Defense of the Revolution," a system of neighborhood informers based on the Cuban model to monitor and control the population. The EPS and the MINT are under the direct control of the Sandinista party.

Although the economy is technically "mixed", the Sandinista leadership has made it clear that the State and the economy are unalterably Socialist. The Government exercises regulatory authority over much of the economy, is openly hostile to private initiative, and has expropriated private property for political as well as economic reasons. Dissident political expression is often punished by the withholding of food ration cards and other economic punishments.

Under pressure, at a series of Central American summits and in meetings with the internal opposition, the FSLN in 1989 committed itself to take actions which could have an important impact on the human rights situation: to move up national elections from February 1991 to February 1990; to allow political parties and the media to operate with greater freedom; to grant amnesty to political prisoners; to suspend the military draft during the electoral period; to repeal or amend certain draconian laws of public order; and to refrain from confiscation of private property for political purposes. However, there is serious doubt about Sandinista intentions to conduct a free and fair election and to relinquish power if they lose. The political opposition and independent media operated somewhat more freely than in 1988.

Because of serious continuing abuses, the general human rights situation in Nicaragua remained poor in 1989. Political and extrajudicial killings are still being reported, the political opposition still suffers considerable harassment and intimidation, the Government continues to hold political prisoners, and the writ of the security forces still runs deep and wide. While the Sandinistas have allowed the political opposition and independent media to operate with more formal freedoms as elections approach, Nicaragua remains a one-party State. Whether this new "political space" was simply a tactical move by the Sandinistas and will not last beyond the internationally monitored February 1990 election was a major human rights concern at year's end.

NICARAGUA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were reliable reports of political and extrajudicial killings throughout 1989. The human rights organization Americas Watch (AW) reported a "pattern of summary executions by government forces." Amnesty International (AI), in an October 6, 1989, update on the human rights situation in Nicaragua, reported that it "has continued to receive reports of cases of apparent summary execution of noncombatants in war zones during 1989 from both domestic and international human rights organizations." AI stated that, while it had not yet had the opportunity to verify such cases independently or interview surviving family members, it nevertheless "noted that several cases have been documented independently by more than one source." The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IAHCR), in a 1989 report, also reported "complaints" of extrajudicial killings "chargeable" to government forces.

Precise numbers of those summarily killed by government forces remain elusive. AW reported 51 killings attributable to the Sandinistas between March 1988 and June 1989. AI reported 56 killings in its October 1989 update, but some of these predate 1988 and 1989. Another reliable human rights organization reported government forces summarily executed 9 RN members and 13 peasants in 1989. On December 10 in the rural town of Masatepe a United Opposition Union (UNO) political rally was attacked by Sandinista thugs. The ensuing melee resulted in one person being stabbed to death with a machete, while numerous other persons were injured.

It is clear that government security forces continued to carry out extrajudicial killings of Nicaraguan citizens. While specific cases are more readily available for 1988 and earlier, reliable observers reported the continuation of this pattern of abuse in 1989. For example, AI reported that Sandinista soldiers from the Los Millones army base killed five children and one adult who were celebrating a birthday party in Comarca los Pases, Chontales, on January 28, 1989. In another case, the EPS killed a Roman Catholic lay preacher from Matiguas, Matagalpa, on January 27, 1989. Carmelo Mairena Rosales, a farmer from the area of Rio Blanco, Matagalpa, was taken from his home on December 24, 1988, and removed to a state security facility in nearby Matiguas. His dismembered body was found on December 27. No one has been charged with this murder. RN members reported that the EPS captured an RN commander, "Toro," and seven of his men on October 3, 1989, and executed them the next day. The bodies were not recovered.

Most extrajudicial killings attributable to the Government take place in the isolated and rugged areas of central Nicaragua, long areas of sympathy and support for the armed resistance. The killings seem designed to cow the local population; residents in these areas have long reported a climate of fear and intimidation, based on the apparent willingness of local Army and MINT forces to kill suspected resistance sympathizers.

In response to charges of such abuse, the Government took action against 13 EPS soldiers for the murders of 7 civilians. Nine of these soldiers were convicted, and reportedly are serving prison terms of from 6 to 30 years. Two soldiers were in the trial process, and two others were being sought by authorities at year's end. Both AI and AW claim that the Government has not been consistent in investigating cases and prosecuting suspects.

The RN has also been accused of engaging in summary executions, usually of suspected informers or Sandinista spies. Between March 1988 and April 1989 the organization Witness for Peace charged that the RN carried out 20 killings of noncombatants in Nicaragua. Although RN leaders denied most of these allegations, they accepted some as valid and prosecuted many of those involved. RN commander Isaac Blacker Hurtado, alias "Israelita," was found guilty of the premeditated murder of an alleged Sandinista agent in August 1969. Blacker was tried by an RN tribunal created to judge cases involving RN members in serious crimes. Five other RN members were given lengthy sentences for carrying out a torture-murder.

Reports of disappearances generally involve persons initially detained by the EPS or state security forces on charges of draft evasion or collaborating with the RN. EPS military recruitment practices include late evening roundups of young males at schools, movie theaters and other public sites, and at military check points where "recruiters" halt vehicles and remove draft-age men. Those so detained are usually not given an opportunity to notify their families, and relatives must search in military installations throughout the country to determine if the missing person has been conscripted or has in fact disappeared. Some who resist conscription have disappeared permanently.

The Government and private human rights monitoring organizations have charged the RN with kidnaping peasants for conscription and taking them into Honduras. An independent human rights organization reported 18 cases of kidnappings by the RN from January to August 1989. The RN says that many of these persons claimed as missing have in fact volunteered for service with the Resistance. The RN released 104 Sandinista military and Nicaraguan civilians from its holding areas in Honduras on December 29, 1988. Forty-four of the released prisoners returned to Nicaragua, while 60 decided to remain in Honduras as refugees.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Nicaragua's three types of prisons include State Security (DGSE) facilities, national penitentiary prisons, and open farms. The majority of Nicaragua's prisoners are held in the first two systems, and most human rights abuses occur there. Interrogation of detainees is usually conducted in DGSE detention facilities. During interrogation detainees have been subjected to various forms of physical and psychological torture, including food and water deprivation, mock executions, and beatings. The nongovernmental Permanent Human Rights Commission (CPDH) reports that physical torture is more commonly used against peasants, while psychological methods are utilized against members of civic, political, and labor organizations. Death threats against prisoners and their families are also common. The systematic use of these interrogation techniques by the DGSE reflects a deliberate policy which targets political prisoners in DGSE prisons or its secret jails.

AI representatives visited the Las Tejas DGSE detention center in Matagalpa in March 1989. The center was temporarily empty, but the visitors noticed several closet-like cells, which the MINT claimed were no longer in use. Subsequent interviews with prisoners in the national penitentiary system prison in Juigalpa, however, revealed that such cells were still being used to force prisoners to cooperate with their captors. The cells are less than a square meter in size; the prisoner cannot move his arms and legs. AI added that "the cells have no openings for light or air and are pitch-dark." Bringing the use of these cells to the attention of the MINT, AI reminded the MINT that it had previously claimed it no longer used such cells or such interrogation methods. In June 1989 AI reported that it had received a communication from the MINT claiming that the MINT had converted the cells into closet spaces.

AI further reported that prisoners who participated in a hunger strike in February 1989 at the Modelo jail in Tipitapa were taken to the El Chipote interrogation center and were systematically physically abused--held handcuffed and naked, deprived of water, and several were beaten. This treatment went on for a number of days. AI stated that 13 of the hunger strikers were reported to have been severely beaten, and that one of them, Rosenda Rugama Guadamuz, was beaten into unconsciousness and removed to the prison infirmary.

Three prisoners, former National Guardsmen Silvio Mayorga, Miguel Cordero, and Guadalupe Pineda, have allegedly been so severely mistreated during their 10 years of imprisonment that a judge in Managua's Fourth Criminal Court ordered them released. The release order was ignored by the director of the national penitentiary system, and the same judge who ordered the release subsequently annulled it. Silvio Mayorga's condition worsened to the point where he was finally placed in a civilian hospital in September 1989.

Several of the almost 1,900 former National Guardsmen who were freed after a 10-year imprisonment on March 17 reported brutal treatment during their incarceration, including sexual torture, beatings, poor sanitary conditions, denial of medical care, and rations of spoiled food. Other former National Guardsmen still in prison (39 remain jailed) also report systematic mistreatment which they claim has continued through 1989.

As reported in the Sandinista media, some of the 44 former prisoners of the RN who returned to Nicaragua in early 1989 alleged they were tortured and generally abused while in resistance prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that a detainee must be brought before a competent legal authority within 72 hours of arrest; this provision is often ignored, and suspects have been held for months without charges or access to counsel. Short-term arrest and interrogation appear to be an integral part of the Government's counterinsurgency tactic of harassing and intimidating suspected RN supporters, especially in isolated areas of the countryside. Such suspects are generally picked up at night by the DGSE and normally held until they agree to confess or implicate others in counterrevolutionary activities. Persons suspected of views critical of the Government are often detained and charged with common crimes. The CPDH has reported that in some areas peasants have been charged with "counterrevolutionary activities" if they refuse to join Sandinista mass organizations.

The Government arbitrarily detained hundreds of peasants in 1989 during large-scale roundups of suspected RN supporters in the departments of Chontales, Matagalpa, and Jinotega. Entire families were detained for days in primitive jail facilities for allegedly giving food and assistance to RN forces. Former National Guardsmen residing in Nicaragua have reported widespread abuse and arbitrary arrest. The leaders of this group have been picked up by DGSE agents and threatened with rearrest or even death if they did not cease their organizing work in the ex-prisoners association or if they did not become DGSE informers. Members of the private sector Cattleman's Association, most of whom are reportedly in favor of the political opposition, claim they were arrested on fabricated charges of aiding the RN.

The Government in past years used the Law for Maintenance of Order and Public Security, a vague instrument which criminalized a wide range of antigovernment activities, to charge and sentence many Nicaraguans for political and "counterrevolutionary" activities. As part of an agreement reached with the political opposition on August 4, 1989, concerning electoral conditions, the Government repealed this law in October.

Also as part of the August 4 agreement, the Sandinista Government reformed certain aspects of the Law of Juridical Functions of the Sandinista Police on October 10, 1989. The reform of this law technically eliminates the authority of the Sandinista Police to imprison persons, restoring this authority to the judicial branch of government. The reformed law also requires that a written warrant be used for arrest, except in cases of flagrant crimes. The reformed law nevertheless continues to allow police detention for up to 9 days (essentially the same as the previous law), but the police must now take into account any evidence provided by a defense attorney. The new version, however, apparently eliminates the previous broad discretionary right of the police to imprison persons, on their own authority, for up to 2 years. The reformed law still contains articles that could permit abuses. For example, it authorizes police arrests based on "written orders from other organisms", probably a reference to the MINT's State Security branch (DGSE) and, in some cases, military authorities. By year's end, it was not yet clear if the reformed law will, in practice, substantially reduce arbitrary detentions.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Anti-Somocista Popular Tribunals, basically nonprofessional political courts, were abolished in January 1988. Nevertheless, many of the untrained judges of these Tribunals have been moved into the regular court system. The influx of these often poorly-prepared jurists has politicized the regular court system to a greater extent than previously was the case. Three Supreme Court Justices resigned in December 1987, charging that the Executive Branch showed no respect for the court and its decisions.

NICARAGUA

The majority of Nicaragua's political prisoners were tried and convicted by the Anti-Somocista Popular Tribunals. Despite the abolition of these Tribunals, their cases have not been reviewed. Nevertheless, the Government pardoned 1,783 former National Guardsmen and 72 other prisoners in March 1989. Thirty-nine Guardsmen were not pardoned because the Government claimed they were too dangerous to release and were guilty of especially vicious crimes; the 39 responded that they were still being held because of their refusal to submit to "reeducation." A number of human rights organizations charged that the decision not to release the 39 was politically motivated. In addition, there was criticism that, in choosing which of the Guardsmen it would release, the Government had not followed the criteria for release set forth in an IACHR report on the prisoners. This report resulted from the 1988 Sapoa negotiations between the Nicaraguan Government and the RN, in which it was agreed that there would be a release of former National Guardsmen on the basis of an IACHR investigation and recommendation. The IACHR report, however, has never been made public, reportedly at the insistence of the Sandinista Government. In its annual report, the IACHR said, "by denying a pardon to the 39 persons, the Government of Nicaragua continues to be in violation of the provisions of the American Convention on Human Rights."

In a few instances, the judicial system or National Assembly has released or pardoned criminals apart from a more general amnesty. In April an appellate court freed three Nicaraguans who were convicted in June 1988 for passing "secret" economic data to the U.S. Embassy; the court ruled that the government documents were not secret and that there was no law against the distribution of government economic information. In a separate case, the National Assembly pardoned three prisoners who had been serving long-term sentences for espionage, treason, or other activities against the State.

The August 1989 International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) semiannual census of political prisoners showed 1,268 "counterrevolutionaries" and the 39 former Guardsmen. The ICRC count did not include, however, persons held in state security interrogation and detention facilities. Since August 1988, the Sandinistas have released, according to their statistics, some 1,358 peasants accused of counter revolutionary activities. However, the charges against these persons have not been dropped, nor their sentences pardoned; they could be returned to custody at any time. Under Nicaraguan law, the only institution that can grant provisional liberty is the judicial branch, while the National Assembly is the only institution that can legally pardon prisoners. The Government in any case did not publish a list of the peasants given provisional freedom nor make available information on where they had previously been detained. Consequently, it was extremely difficult for human rights monitors to determine whether the prisoners released were convicted "counterrevolutionaries" or detainees who had been held without charge or trial.

The question of how many political prisoners the Government is holding is a contentious one. The Government admits to holding some 1,300 political prisoners. Some local human rights organizations, such as the CPDH or the U.S.-funded Nicaraguan Association for Human Rights (ANPDH), believe the number may be three or four times greater. AI and AW accept as more likely a total figure closer to that provided by the Government. The Government has stated that it would publish a master list of all prisoners it is holding for all crimes. This would allow the Government's list to be crosschecked with those of various human rights groups. The Government has yet to publish its list, however, and until it does the total number of prisoners held, political and common, will remain unknown. The Government at year's end stated that it would not release the remaining political prisoners until "concrete" steps are taken to begin the process of demobilizing the RN.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

According to Article 26 of the Constitution, the Government cannot violate the home, correspondence, or communication of Nicaragua's citizens. By law, a private home may only be searched with a warrant from a competent judge or another expressly authorized official to prevent a crime from being committed or to avoid injury to persons or goods. Despite these restrictions, homes of civic opposition leaders have been searched without a warrant. Unauthorized searches of homes to locate draft-age men have been common. In rural areas, military and DGSE troops routinely search homes without a warrant.

The Government also routinely monitors the telephones of political, business, and labor leaders; it intercepts and examines correspondence mailed both within the country and from abroad. A wide network of DGSE informants monitors the activities of persons suspected of anti-Sandinista attitudes or behavior. In sum, putative national security needs have largely overridden the Constitution on the inviolability of the home and private communications.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Prior to the formal suspension of offensive operations in March 1988, civilian casualties due to indiscriminate artillery fire were common. As noted in the case of RN commander "Toro" (see Section 1.a.), the rights of prisoners were not always respected. Both sides in the armed conflict have been accused of killing prisoners. The Government suspended its declared cease-fire on November 1, 1989. By year's end, it was not yet clear if this action would seriously impede the activities of humanitarian organizations in conflictive areas. The RN, in several cases, suspended officers who were tried and convicted of human rights violations in the conduct of their field operations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While the state of emergency--which permitted broad restrictions on freedom of speech and press--was lifted in January 1988, the Provisional Law on Communications Media remained in effect. This law grants the Media Directorate of the MINT significant power over the press, including the power to order suspensions. In May 1989, the Independent Journalists Association filed a lawsuit against the Government for its continued use of the Provisional Law on Communications Media. The Sandinista-dominated Supreme Court decided in favor of the Government, and the Independent Journalists Association denounced the action before the IACHR.

NICARAGUA

During the August 4 meeting with the internal opposition, the Government agreed to reform the more onerous aspects of the media law, especially those parts dealing with MINT control over the media. The law was reformed in September 1989, but the changes appeared to be minimal. The Supreme Electoral Council (SEC), during the electoral period, will be "charged with applying the media law and appropriate regulations in all areas pertaining to the electoral law." This leaves the vast majority of media affairs under the control of the MINT. Regarding the new media law, the IACHR said in its annual report that the law, "grants excessive and counterproductive powers to the Ministry of the Interior," which it characterized as a "political agency." The IACHR also criticized the new law for maintaining a "government monopoly on television."

Nicaragua's only daily opposition newspaper, La Prensa, and independent radio stations have been outspoken throughout the year in their criticism of the Government. Nevertheless, they operate under continuing government pressure designed to intimidate and restrict their freedom of expression. For example, the Government continued its prohibition against any government entity placing notices or advertisements in La Prensa, which the Government accuses of being a spokesman for the RN and the United States Government. In November 1989, the independent Radio Catolica was the subject of a complaint filed by a Sandinista radio station, charging Radio Catolica with violating the electoral law by broadcasting partisan political ads. The SEC warned the radio station not to do so again; Radio Catolica rejoined by noting it is forced to carry Sandinista propaganda and electoral activities whenever the Government deems them "news" and forces all the media to carry the items on nationwide networks.

While the situation of the media improved, compared to 1988, the Government continued to engage in a pattern of censorship and harassment. The MINT warned the director of the independent radio station Radio Corporacion to modify the tone of his commentaries. Three employees of Radio Corporacion were threatened by State Security agents because of their employment at a station opposed to the Government. The Government also warned La Prensa in writing that its editorials should show more respect for the leaders of the revolution. Officials of Radio Catolica's news program were also warned by the Government to be more cautious in presenting information and to "project less violence" in the station's news broadcasts. Other sources of intimidation of the media include government control of supplies of newsprint, a particular problem for La Prensa, and the arbitrary delay in releasing equipment and spare parts for opposition media from customs control, a problem encountered by Radio Corporacion.

Radio Catolica's news broadcasts resumed on March 20 after being curtailed on July 11, 1988, following its coverage of the Sandinista breakup of an opposition rally in Nandaime, but the independent radio news broadcast "Cinco en Punto" (Five O'clock Sharp) was suspended in January following its transmittal of news on cuts in the Nicaraguan defense budget. A foreign journalist from Freedom House was expelled in July after being accused of spying. Sandinista authorities seized 500 copies of an exile newspaper, Nicaragua Hoy, at the Managua airport in November, refusing to allow them into the country.

NICARAGUA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the rights of association, assembly, and peaceful demonstrations. However, opposition political rallies during the year often continued to be marred by the presence of Sandinista-controlled mobs--the so-called turbas. The turbas generally attempt to provoke violence, and they often succeed. Opposition rallies throughout the country in October and November 1989 witnessed rock-throwing incidents and beatings. The Sandinista toughs usually attacked stragglers arriving late to the rally or stoned those on the fringes of it. The opposition has begun to register complaints about these activities with the SEC and with international observers, but the Sandinistas generally deflect criticism of the actions of the turbas by claiming that they are simply a spontaneous manifestation of the people's enthusiasm. In two instances, turba attacks against opposition rallies resulted in large-scale violence and death. The press and observer organizations wrote extensively about these incidents in Cofradia on December 3 and Masatepe on December 10..

Citizens in the more isolated parts of the country have reported being directly threatened with physical harm if they attend opposition rallies. Workers have been threatened with losing their jobs if they attend opposition events. Such an incident happened in the town of Mandaime prior to a rally on November 19. Several U.S. Congressmen were shown threatening letters left at the doorsteps of the citizens of Muelle de los Bueyes, Chontales, the night before a November 12 opposition rally. The departments of Matagalpa, Jinotega, and Chontales have witnessed significant Sandinista harassment of those wishing to attend opposition events. In general, the more isolated the area, the more direct have been the threats. A UNO rally in Masatepe on December 10 was disrupted by Sandinista thugs; one UNO supporter was mortally wounded in an assault attributed to the thugs by electoral observers of the bipartisan, U.S.-based Center for Democracy.

For much of 1989 legal assembly was impeded by the Government's requirement that all outdoor demonstrations receive prior approval from police authorities. Many rallies were effectively crippled by the withholding of government permission until the last moment. Publicity for the rallies was prohibited until such permission was obtained. Commencing in September 1989, however, prior permission was no longer needed for political rallies that form part of the electoral campaign. The opposition was able to plan and carry out outdoor rallies without such prior permission.

The Government sent a circular note to all diplomatic missions in Managua in June stating, in part, that foreign diplomats were not permitted to observe political rallies or meetings. Members of Managua's diplomatic community were privately informed by the Government that the ban applied only to U.S. diplomats. On July 31, four U.S. Congressmen were ordered by MINT officials to leave the city of Diriamba, where they had been invited by an opposition party to attend an outdoor rally. The Congressional delegation was escorted out of town by MINT officials, who told the Congressmen that their safety could not be guaranteed.

A number of private and professional organizations exist in Nicaragua. Their members are able to meet and to maintain contact with their foreign counterparts. Several of these private organizations, however, have been the focus of verbal attacks by FSLN officials and by the Sandinista press. The Superior Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP), for example, has been described by the Government as an agent acting against Nicaragua. The private civic organization, Via Civica, which has been active in encouraging voter registration and education in connection with the February elections and which receives funding from the U.S. National Endowment for Democracy, was the subject of harsh attacks in the pro-Sandinista daily El Nuevo Diario.

The Government continued its policy of confiscating the property of its private sector critics. In June 1989, the farms of three leading coffee growers, who were also COSEP or coffee growers' association leaders, were confiscated following their criticism given during a meeting of the coffee association in the town of Matagalpa of Government economic policies. The three were charged with "discouraging production" and fomenting anarchy and social chaos during a period of economic crisis.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to organized labor, see Section 6.a.

The Constitution provides for the free exercise of religion. Nicaragua is 85 percent Roman Catholic; the rest of the population belongs to a variety of Protestant denominations or professes no faith. There are no direct restrictions on religious activity or association, but the regime has a generally hostile attitude toward the Catholic Church, which it views as a rival to its control over Nicaraguan society.

The Government's relations with the leader of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua, Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo, continued to be hostile during 1989. Sandinista-controlled women's groups conducted weekly protests for much of the year demanding that the Cardinal intercede on behalf of relatives allegedly held prisoner by the RN, and the Sandinista-controlled press printed occasional articles clearly designed to undermine the position of the Church and its leaders. On the other hand, the Government permitted the former leader of the Church's social action program, COPROSA, to return to Nicaragua in order to resurrect the program, and President Ortega announced in March that 10 foreign priests expelled in 1984 could return to Nicaragua. The Government did not return to the Church COPROSA's vehicles and equipment, which it confiscated when it shut the program down in 1985.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government imposes restrictions on foreign travel through the use of exit visa requirements. The Government limits some opposition figures to single-exit visas; it also often denies exit visas to young men of draft age or to professionals with skills needed by the State. Exiles returning to Nicaragua are required to sign a document upon arrival declaring that they renounce any ties with the RN. There were no reports of refugees being forcibly expelled from Nicaragua in 1989. Several prominent figures who have in the past been associated with the RN voluntarily returned from self-proclaimed exile; they reportedly encountered no special harassment.

NICARAGUASection 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution states that "political pluralism assures the existence of participation of all political organizations in the economic, political, and social affairs of the country, without ideological restrictions except for those which seek a return to the past or advocate the establishment of a similar political system." While a wide variety of political parties, ranging from Communist to conservative, have legal status, the right of citizens to peacefully change their government has not yet been tested in Nicaragua.

The Marxist-Leninist Sandinista Party, more than the formal institutions of government, is the de facto ruler of Nicaragua. Its nine-man Directorate makes all the essential decisions of state, which are subsequently endorsed by the various ministries and the 103-member National Assembly. The powerful EPS and MINT are for all practical purposes instruments of the Sandinista Party and are used to ensure its monopoly of power. This symbiotic relationship between the party and the State throws into serious question the right of citizens to change their Government. "Bourgeois" formalisms, such as free elections, are not central to the Sandinista political philosophy. Thus, while recognizing that the Sandinista Government has in fact taken many steps to establish the formal mechanisms for free elections, their commitment to holding free and fair elections in 1990, with the possibility of a real turnover of power to an elected opposition, continued to be viewed with skepticism by many observers.

The October voter registration process for the elections was, for the most part, orderly, but opposition figures complained that registration was sometimes obstructed by the Government in rural areas, where the opposition anticipate support, and said their observers did not always receive their credentials promptly.

The Government states that it welcomes international scrutiny of its human rights record, but has shown itself to be sensitive to attempts to probe too deeply into its human rights practices. It continued during 1989 to attack independent Nicaraguan human rights groups. The Government-sanctioned human rights group focused virtually all of its attention during the year on alleged human rights abuses by the RN.

International human rights groups made visits during 1989. AI and AW both conducted prison inspections, but AI's visits were to State Security detention centers that had been emptied of prisoners. The ICRC visited political prisoners held in the regular national penitentiary system, and was continuing negotiations with the Government over visits to detention centers. The IACHR also visited Nicaragua, but its full report on political prisoners was not published, reportedly at the insistence of the Government. The IACHR 1989 annual general report did include sections on Nicaragua, which concluded that the trials of ex-National Guardsmen lacked validity under international human rights law.

NICARAGUA

The CPDH was founded to document abuses during the rule of the deposed dictator Anastasio Somoza, and its work has continued during the Sandinista regime. The CPDH has been the target of many Sandinista attempts to discredit it, the latest occurring in September 1989 when the Government attempted to malign the organization's reporting on political prisoners. CPDH members report frequent harassment and threats. The CPDH is routinely denied access to government prisons and is not allowed to seek information from MINT personnel. In July 1989 CPDH investigators were denied entry to the town of La Libertad in Chontales, where they wished to investigate numerous charges of human rights abuses. CPDH Executive Secretary Lino Hernandez was told by MINT officials that the MINT had issued orders to keep him out of town. Prisoners and their families are warned by Government officials not to report abuses to the CPDH.

Other Nicaraguan organizations that investigate and record allegations of human rights violations include the Office of Legal Assistance for Ethnic Minorities of the Atlantic Coast, the Office of Legal Assistance of the Evangelical Committee for Development Aid, and the Legal Aid Office of the Central American University. The ANPDH, based in San Jose, Costa Rica, is a U.S. Government-funded group independent of the RN but clearly opposed strongly to the Sandinista regime. It trains RN combatants in respect for human rights, and investigates reports of RN abuses. The ANPDH opened an office in Managua in 1989.

Nicaragua's minorities, numbering some 80,000 Indians and 26,000 English-speaking blacks, live primarily on the Atlantic coast. Sandinista efforts after 1979 to integrate the Atlantic coast more closely with the rest of Nicaragua alienated much of the coast population and generated many human rights abuses, including forced relocation, destruction of villages, mass imprisonments, killings, and disappearances. These conditions led to mass flights of Indians to Honduras. An autonomy statute was promulgated in September 1987 which purports to establish a democratic and responsive program for meeting the special needs of the Atlantic coast minorities. However, it fails to address major issues of fundamental concern to the area's indigenous groups, such as allocation of income from regional resources. In June 1989 Indian leaders Brooklyn Rivera and Steadman Fagoth announced they would return to Nicaragua to reintegrate into their communities and to participate in Atlantic coast political life. They and other Indian leaders returned in August and September.

The Government also continued to facilitate the return of Miskito refugees from Honduras. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) office in Managua reported that 2,557 Nicaraguans had returned through UNHCR programs through the end of September, including 884 Miskito Indians who returned from Honduras, and four who returned from Costa Rica.

Violence against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, exists in Nicaragua. However, a lack of reliable statistical data makes it very difficult to determine the true extent of this problem. Victims of such abuse frequently are reluctant to report it or to press charges, leading to the likelihood that it is significantly underreported.

The Government does not tolerate such violence. In particular, the Sandinista mass organization, the Luisa Amanda Espinoza Association of Nicaraguan Women (AMNLAE), assists in protecting the rights of women and bringing cases of violence against individual women to the Government's attention. AMNLAE also urges government sanctions against publications that may contribute to violence against women by publishing articles that feature women as sex objects. Women are not subject to any special restrictive measures by the Government, and they participate in most levels of the economy and society.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Article 87 of the Constitution provides workers the right to associate in organizations of their own choosing and to elect their own representatives. In practice, however, the Government often uses coercion, economic pressure, or force to impede workers' rights to organize and elect their representatives. For example, in October 1989 the leadership of the government-controlled Sandinista Workers' Central (CST) used economic coercion to expel the leadership of an independent construction union, SCAAS. The CST was able to capitalize on government control of the country's battered construction industry to coerce workers to renounce the leadership of the SCAAS, an affiliate of the anti-Sandinista Independent Confederation of Labor (CGT-I). With unemployment at about 60 percent in the construction sector, the CST was able to use the threat of job loss to lure workers from the CGT-I and to establish a rump Sandinista-controlled SCAAS, which then was given legal status by the Government.

The right to strike is recognized in Article 83 of the Constitution. However, a decree law in 1981 stipulated that any worker who incited a strike could be jailed for up to 3 years. In May 1989, a series of wildcat strikes by teachers broke out throughout the country. The teachers complained about the dramatic drop in their purchasing power due to hyperinflation and currency devaluations. In response, the Government and the Sandinista-controlled mass organizations launched a propaganda campaign to discredit the teachers, accusing them of being "unpatriotic" and "agents of the U.S. Embassy." In fact, the majority of the disaffected teachers were members of the Sandinista-controlled National Association of Nicaraguan Educators. The strikes were eventually quelled through economic coercion and Sandinista-sponsored intimidation.

The CST is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. The other major Sandinista labor body, the Rural Workers Association, is not affiliated with any international body. Anti-Sandinista trade unions are allowed a measure of freedom to maintain international contacts, although subject to Government surveillance and harassment. For example, the Confederation of Labor Unification is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and the Confederation of Nicaraguan Workers is affiliated with the World Confederation of Labor (WCL).

ICFTU, WCL, the Latin American Workers' Central, and the

NICARAGUA

International Organization of Employers (IOE) have filed a number of complaints against the Government of Nicaragua. These complaints allege that the Government violated International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 87 on Freedom of Association by, among other things, the murder, assault, intimidation, and imprisonment of trade union leaders, the destruction of their property, and denial of their right to express their views. These complaints have alleged the harassment, intimidation, and imprisonment of employer representatives and the confiscation of their property. In September 1988, an ILO study mission was dispatched to Nicaragua to investigate these allegations. Based on the mission's report and conclusions, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), at its November 1988 meeting, urged the Government to take concrete measures in the shortest period of time to apply fully the Conventions on Freedom of Association, including changes in legislation and the release of worker and employer representatives from prison. The CFA recommended the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry unless the Government provided information demonstrating a change of attitude and a clear desire to make progress before the Committee's next meeting.

At its November 1989 meeting the CFA summarized the various Freedom of Association complaints brought against the Government of Nicaragua by the ICFTU, the WCL, and the IOE. Acknowledging some cooperation from the Government, the Committee noted its failures to respond to requests and recommendations and continuing contradictions between statements of the complainants and the Government, and recommended that the matter be referred to a Commission of Inquiry (COI).

During 1989 the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) and Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CACR) also considered complaints against Nicaragua. The COE noted the lifting of the state of emergency, but cited reports of ILO representatives and committees indicating that a number of excessively severe regulations remained in effect, including the General Provisional Act which forbids the publication, distribution, circulation, exhibition, dissemination, showing, transmission, or selling of writings which compromise or endanger internal security, national defense, or national economic stability. Noting that elements of the media had been suspended under this Act, the Committee called on the Government to give full guarantees of expression to worker and employer representatives so they could defend the interests of their members.

The COE noted that 60 strike actions had been recorded in 1988 but that trade union organizations had reported pressure and repressive measures against strikers. The COE noted other provisions or omissions in Nicaraguan legislation which do not accord with Convention 87, including: failure to guarantee the right of association to public servants and other groups of workers; requirement of approval of an absolute majority of workers in a work place in order to form a union; and excessive limitations on the right to strike, including the Government's authority to refer strikes to compulsory arbitration. The COE expressed the hope that new legislation correcting these and other deficiencies would be promptly enacted.

The CACR also observed the persistence of divergencies between law and practice and the full application of ILO Conventions

NICARAGUA

87 and 98 (collective bargaining), and requested the Government to take promptly all measures necessary to eliminate restrictions concerning the right of employer and worker representatives to freely exercise the rights guaranteed by these two conventions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Articles 82 through 88 of the Constitution contain a number of labor rights, including the right to negotiate individual or collective bargaining agreements. Nicaraguan workers, however, do not enjoy these rights in practice. The Government does not prohibit, but state-owned companies also do not engage in, collective bargaining with independent labor unions. Moreover, the Government directs its own Sandinista-controlled union, the CST, to accept what the Government proposes. With respect to working conditions, the Government simply does not negotiate with unions on this issue.

Restrictions on independent union organizing activity are mostly extraofficial and indirect. Union activists are subject to state-sponsored intimidation by Sandinista militants. There are no economic processing zones where additional restrictions or regulations on labor apply.

In its 1989 report, the COE repeated its longstanding request to the Government to repeal Decree 530, which requires that a collective bargaining agreement must be approved by the Government before it can become effective, in violation of Convention 98 on collective bargaining.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Although there is no official policy of using forced labor, the Government uses its Sandinista Defense Committees (CDS) to mobilize local communities to perform specific economic development projects, ostensibly on a voluntary basis. The CDS chiefs in various neighborhoods are responsible for organizing these labor crews for weekend work projects. Those who do not participate in these projects are reportedly subject to a range of sanctions that could affect their working conditions, housing situation, or children's schooling.

Children under the age of 14 legally are not permitted to work. Article 84 of the Constitution states "child labor that can affect normal childhood development or interfere with the obligatory school year is prohibited." This law is generally enforced in the small modern sector of the economy, but children frequently work on family farms at an earlier age.

The Government has not strictly enforced employer compliance with occupational health and safety requirements. In June 1988, the Government suspended the National System for Ordering Work and Salaries, although it continues to serve as a "reference point" for employers in determining wages and salaries. The minimum wage for workers varies from sector to sector. For example, the average wage for agricultural workers is about $32 per month. The average minimum wage for industrial workers is $58 per month, and in the service sector about $19 per month.

NICARAGUA

For state workers, these salaries are augmented by food allocations and other incentives. With hyperinflation having reached five-digit figures for 1988, and likely to reach four-digit figures in 1989, the real purchasing power of workers has plummeted dramatically over the past year and the living standard for the working class has declined sharply. The Government periodically adjusts state workers' salaries; however, Government officials have acknowledged that these salaries are not adequate to provide the basic needs of workers. The legal workweek in Nicaragua is 48 hours for most workers. The legal workday for agricultural workers is 6 hours, and the workday in the mining sector is 7 hours.

PANAMA

The Constitution provides for a representative democracy, with direct popular election of the president and legislature, an independent judiciary, and a broad range of civil and individual rights, but in practice Panama was ruled during most of 1989 by a military dictatorship under General Manuel Antonio Noriega, the Commander of the Panama Defense Forces (PDF). On December 19, Guillermo Endara, who was widely credited with having won elections in May that were subsequently annulled at Noriega's behest, was sworn in as President. The Noriega regime was ousted by U.S. forces that entered Panama on December 20 to protect U.S. lives, ensure U.S. ability to meet its obligations under the Panama Canal Treaties, help restore democracy to Panama, and bring Noriega to justice on narcotics-related charges in the United States.

Under the Noriega dictatorship, Panama's security and police institutions both fell under the PDF, which was composed of Army, Navy, Air Force, and police components consisting of approximately 15,000 members, all responsible to the PDF Commander. One of the Endara Government's first acts was to disband the PDF and replace it with a new organization, the Panamanian Public Force (FPP), under direct civilian authority. Although the precise structure and responsibilities of the FPP were still being worked out in early 1990, the Panamanian Government indicated that the FPP would be a national police organization, with a national air service and a national maritime service established as separate entities.

The continuing political crisis throughout 1989 had a deep impact on Panama's service-oriented economy, which is sensitive to public and international confidence. Panama's gross domestic product dropped by 20 percent in 1988 and an additional drop was projected for 1989.

Human rights under the military dictatorship steadily deteriorated throughout 1989. Elections were annulled, protest brutally repressed, and an unconstitutional regime that ruled by decree was installed. A rebellion led by PDF officers failed and many participants were tortured, killed, or imprisoned. The Noriega dictatorship closed all the country's opposition media, took over two television stations, and intimidated a third. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) concluded in its 1989 report that Noriega's de facto regime violated the rights to humane treatment, personal liberty, movement and residence, and thought and expression. On the most basic level, the report stated that the Noriega provisional government was "devoid of constitutional legitimacy." Upon taking office, President Endara made the observance of human rights, the correction of prior human rights abuses, and the prosecution of human rights violators matters of the highest priority for his administration.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Panamanian Human Rights Committee (CPDH) confirmed a number of killings in connection with the May 1989 elections, including Nicolas Van Kleef, a Dutch priest killed on election day and Alexis Guerra, an opposition vice presidential candidate's bodyguard, killed during a political rally on May 10. According to CPDH lawyers, the regime made no effort to investigate these deaths. Relatives or organizations representing the victims tried to pursue their rights through the Noriega-controlled courts, but without success. The new Attorney General named by President Endara immediately began investigating human rights abuses, with over 50 cases being handled as of early January 1990.

On August 3, eyewitnesses reported, that in reaction to a large demonstration the PDF illegally entered the University of Panama campus and deliberately shot to death a student, Luis Antonio Gonzalez Santamaria, with birdshot at point-blank range. Gonzalez apparently was picked at random for execution to deter protests on the campus. Two other students were reported wounded in the attack.

After the October 3 military uprising, there were reports that rebel soldiers who led the effort to oust General Noriega were alive when they laid down their arms. The Noriega regime later announced that 10 of them had been killed in the fighting. The new Attorney General announced that his office's investigation had found evidence that Major Giroldi Vera, who led the coup attempt, had been shot to death in jail the day after he was placed in detention.

Officials of human rights groups and the Catholic Church indicated that from 90 to as many as 233 military personnel may have been summarily executed after the military rebellion on October 3. Many are believed to have been tortured before death. Bodies returned to families reportedly had multiple fractures, cuts, evidence of severe beatings, and bullet wounds inflicted at point-blank range.

People in Panama seldom disappeared permanently under the Noriega regime, although there were a few cases in past years. CPDH lists only two persons who are believed to have disappeared, of whom only one is thought to have political implications. By the end of 1989, a University of Panama student rights group began circulating names and pictures of several persons thought to have disappeared.

Throughout the year, the Noriega regime arrested and held incommunicado a number of political opponents. Information on the whereabouts of many of these detainees was kept from family members and lawyers, and habeas corpus applications and appeals for the protection of constitutional rights were ignored.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

General mistreatment, physical and mental abuse, and outright torture at the hands of the PDF was common in 1989. After both the May 7 elections and the October 3 rebellion, many Panamanians reported waves of deaths, arrests, detentions, and torture by members of the PDF or paramilitary groups under their control. Victims commonly reported that they were robbed, held in extended solitary confinement, often in cells too small to permit standing up or lying down and filthy with human excrement, and denied the opportunity to bathe. They were frequently stripped naked and exposed alternately to cold and heat, or deprived of food, sleep, and medical treatment.

PANAMA

Other forms of severe abuse reportedly included using electric shocks to various parts of the body; handcuffing arms into extremely painful postures; burning the feet or buttocks with heaters, cigarettes, or branding irons; threatening homosexual rape; threatening death by holding a gun to the head; and employing vicious beatings.

Less commonly, victims charged that they were forced to listen to or witness the torture of others, including relatives, to be tortured in front of relatives, to sit naked on blocks of ice, to have fingernails or toenails extracted, and to suffer male and female rape. Victims also had fingers or other appendages amputated, or were cut with razor blades (in one case the word "yanqui" was carved on a victim). There was a report that four rebel military personnel were stuffed alive into body bags and placed in freezing morgue lockers until they died of suffocation or cold. During public demonstrations, common PDF tactics included the use of birdshot, rubber truncheons, water cannons using water laced with acid, and tear gas. Many of these charges were covered in the IACHR report.

After the May elections, opposition legislative candidate Olimpo Saenz was arrested and taken to Carcel Modelo prison in Panama City, where for 8 hours he was suspended by his handcuffed wrists from the rim of a basketball hoop, with his toes barely touching the ground and his neck wrapped tightly in an American flag. He was beaten repeatedly with rubber hoses, and his screams were reported from nearby apartment buildings. He suffered a similar, second round of beatings the following day, in which he was forced to remain standing during the duration of the torture which lasted 14 hours. This treatment resulted in internal injuries and his subsequent hospitalization.

On October 3 Christian Democrat Raul Ossa, a former legislator, was incarcerated and physically and psychologically tortured for 6 days. He was denied food and sleep, punched, beaten, and continuously interrogated. Another Christian Democratic activist, Gustavo Cedeno, was abducted, interrogated, and beaten on December 5 and 6 before he was released.

Prison conditions under the Noriega regime were generally inadequate and in some cases constituted cruel or inhuman treatment. Most prisoners in Panama City's Carcel Modelo prison had no beds, only blankets, and one U.S. citizen imprisoned there contracted tuberculosis from poor nutrition, unsanitary conditions, and the lack of beds. Prisoners at Carcel Modelo reported that they could hear the screams of persons who were being tortured or beaten. Conditions at the prison on the Island of Coiba were believed to be so bad that threats of being sent there were often used to subdue prisoners in other facilities. The Endara Government has publicly declared its intention to reform Panama's prison system.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution establishes the right of a detainee to a judicial determination of the legality of the detention and requires a warrant for arrest, except in cases of persons arrested during the commission of a crime. A suspect may not legally be detained for more than 24 hours without being charged and brought before a magistrate. Police are required to inform accused persons immediately of the reason for their detention. After being charged with a criminal offense, an accused person may be held until authorities conduct an investigation and bring the case to trial.

In practice, the Noriega regime routinely disregarded constitutional requirements and due process for persons incarcerated for political offenses. Frequently, prisoners were moved from one place of detention to another while authorities were denying to attorneys and family members that the detainees were in custody. A favorite tactic was to have night courts impose lengthy, "noncommutable" sentences (criminal sentences are otherwise routinely commuted for good behavior). For example, in several cases a year-long, noncommutable sentence was imposed for the distribution of opposition newsletters. In many cases, prisoners were never charged and had to file a writ of habeas corpus, which can take as long as 6 weeks to process and was regularly ignored by PDF authorities.

The judicial system suffered from a chronic backlog under the Noriega regime, resulting in as many as 3 years' incarceration of prisoners awaiting trial. Such prisoners constitute a large portion of the prison population. Time spent in jail awaiting trial counts toward completion of the final sentence for those convicted.

In 1989, by conservative estimates, 300 Panamanians went into exile and three times as many were incarcerated (military prisoners are included in the estimate). Approximately 300 persons were jailed during the elections in May, and another 100 civilians were incarcerated thereafter. In the wake of the October 3 military insurrection, reported estimates of PDF personnel arrested and incarcerated varied from 200 to 600.

The persons who went into exile in 1989 included three key opposition figures: Aristides de Icaza, owner and director of Radio Exitosa radio network; Jose del Carmen Serracin, of the opposition Authentic Panamenista Party (PPA); and newspaper publisher Jaime Padilla Beliz. (All three returned to Panama after December 20.) The Noriega regime attempted to deport two members of the Catholic clergy: Spanish priest Jose Majadas and Peruvian nun Elsa Maria Schaus, the principal of a Catholic school (who was actually forced to leave Panama for a few days). In both cases, public pressure resulted in the return of the clergy to their communities.

During 1989 the PDF was involved in hundreds of incidents of harassment of U.S. military personnel and dependents in Panama, often culminating in illegal detentions and denial of due process under the Panamanian Constitution and the Panama Canal Treaty. A U.S. citizen and military dependent, Kurt Muse, was arrested in April, subjected to sleep deprivation, intimidation, and interrogation, and held without charge in solitary confinement until December 20, when he was freed by U.S. forces. Another American citizen, Leonard Accles, was also held without charge in similar "preventive detention" for over a year, with lengthy periods of solitary confinement, until after the U.S. intervention when he was released. He was physically and psychologically abused when arrested, and consular access was denied for long periods.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

PANAMA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides that persons charged with crimes are presumed innocent until proven guilty and have the right to counsel. The local bar association and National University law school offer legal counsel at nominal fees. The Government provides public defenders for indigent defendants, but only after the pretrial phase. A new judicial code, which became effective April 1, 1987, provides for public trials based on oral testimony and argument. However, most trial procedures are still conducted with written presentations by the prosecution and defense without the presence of the accused. The documents produced are available for examination by both sides. In general, the burden of proof rests on the prosecution. The right to appeal a verdict is available to the prosecution and the defense.

The Constitution provides a number of safeguards designed to maintain the independence of the judiciary: the Supreme Court is chartered to uphold the Constitution and laws; magistrates are barred from simultaneously holding other public office or otherwise participating in politics; Supreme Court magistrates, who are nominated by the President and ratified by the Legislative Assembly, nominate all lower court judges. The Attorney General, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Legislative Assembly, appoints Superior Court District Attorneys, who in turn nominate Circuit District Attorneys. A system of magistrates, named by mayors, deals with a high volume of minor civil and criminal cases. Magistrates are empowered to impose fines of less than $600 and to order detentions of up to 1 year, and their decisions can be appealed only to the mayor and not to any judicial official.

However, the Constitution's provisions for an independent judicial system were largely ignored by the Noriega regime. The most serious obstacle to obtaining a free and fair trial lay in the interference of the PDF. The military not only meddled with the outcome of specific trials, but in practice appointed judges and transferred or dismissed those who did not respond to PDF directives. This influence extended to all levels of the court system.

In June the CPDH asserted that the Noriega regime had violated many provisions of the country's legal code by its practices of holding mass trials without due process, refusal to recognize habeas corpus writs, detention and sentencing of persons without charges, sentencing of minors as adults, and rejecting or ignoring evidence offered in defense of accused persons.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were credible charges that the Noriega regime routinely tampered with mail and that telephone calls were extensively monitored. The CPDH reported that one regime official publicly admitted this in a radio interview. Under the Constitution, judicial warrants must be issued before officials may enter homes. However, warrants to search homes of regime opponents were freely granted to the PDF by the PDF-controlled courts. The military and paramilitary forces also frequently searched homes, destroyed or removed private property, and detained persons found on the premises without appropriate warrants or court orders.

PANAMA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, and in the past Panama traditionally enjoyed free media which engaged in spirited and open criticism of the Government. The Noriega regime responded to the ongoing political crisis by subjugating the media, both electronic and print, either to complete regime control or severe self-censorship. All opposition media were closed in February 1988. At that time, the regime also eliminated local distribution of foreign news publications.

In 1989 the Noriega regime further tightened control of the media by prohibiting opposition newsletters, closing a semi-independent radio network, and attempting to curb the international press. By December 19, there remained only one nonregime radio program of news commentary, and it stayed on the air by never criticizing the military. In November an earlier prohibition against live call-ins for radio news commentary programs was extended to sports and general entertainment programs as well. Many Panamanians listened to frequently jammed Radio Impacto, which broadcast news and anti-Noriega information from Costa Rica, and to the Voice of America. Any Panamanian caught with a copy of the Tropic Times, the English-language newspaper of the U.S. Southern Command, was subject to a $300 fine. Regime commentators launched a campaign of personal attacks against some Panamanian journalists who worked for international wire services or otherwise tried to maintain some objectivity in reporting.

Before and during the May elections, foreign journalists were allowed to come to Panama, but 10 of them were expelled immediately afterward. Also during the elections, Panamanian cameraman Fernando Arauz was severely wounded when he was reportedly shot in the chest by armed government supporters. French journalist Bertrand de la Grange, a Le Monde reporter, was hit in the waist by birdshot fired by a soldier.

The Endara Government has declared its full commitment to freedom of the press. Since it assumed power on December 20, three newspapers, (La Prensa, El Siglo, and El Panama America) which had been banned by the Noriega regime, have reappeared and are being operated by their rightful owners. A fourth paper, Critica Libre, has been returned to its rightful owner. Soon after the December 20 U.S. military intervention, the owner of television channel 4 took possession of that station's facilities and began broadcasting freely. The Endara Government has taken possession of a number of radio stations that had been confiscated by the Noriega regime for distribution to Noriega's followers, pending investigations to determine the rightful owners. Former Noriega supporter Tomas Altamirano "Fito" Duque continues freely to publish his newspaper, La Estrella de Panama.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right of peaceful assembly, but the Noriega regime continued to interfere with this right on a systematic basis. Harassment--including attacks on demonstrators by brutal paramilitary squads and random detentions--was used to disrupt protests or even peaceful assemblies. In 1988 the PDF formed "dignity battalions"--paramilitary groups of civilians, PDF members, unemployed persons, released criminals, and government employees charged with political or publicity functions. The dignity battalions received small arms and other military training from the PDF. In 1989 the PDF increasingly used these groups to harass political opponents and public demonstrators and to commit other human rights abuses. For example, dignity battalions participated in the attack against opposition political candidates at the Santa Ana Plaza on May 10, where at least one opposition supporter died and many people--including an opposition candidate for vice president--were bloodied and injured in events covered by the world media. The PDF also responded to peaceful protests with the use of tear gas, baton charges, birdshot, and water cannons using water mixed with acid.

Meetings of professional, social, and civic groups were severely restricted by the Noriega dictatorship in 1989. A 1988 decree prohibited nonprofit groups (which range from charities and church organizations to civic clubs such as the Lions) from supporting or engaging in any activity the regime considered threatening to the security of the State. On October 5, 1989, Noriega announced so-called war laws, which forbade political gatherings by any civic organization and eliminated all government employee associations that functioned like unions. (Unions legally registered with the Government were exempted from this law. An exception was also made for the public employee umbrella group FENASEP, which has a history of government control.) With an elaborate system of informants in the student and teacher ranks, frequent school closings, and repeated arrests, antiregime student leaders were effectively intimidated.

The Endara Government, in response to the breakdown in public order immediately following the December 20 U.S. intervention, declared a temporary curfew from 11:00 p.m. to 5:00 a.m. The new Government stressed that the curfew was temporary and was designed to protect lives and property in an uncertain security situation.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for religious freedom, and there is no state religion. Although Roman Catholicism is predominant, there are no restrictions on the free exercise of religious beliefs, including proselytizing. The Catholic Church took a strong anti-Noriega moral position, and its leadership was attacked sharply by the Noriega-regime press. Priests (many of whom are foreigners) were threatened with expulsion to deter them from speaking out against the Noriega regime.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution permits Panamanians to move freely within the country and to emigrate. However, freedom of movement was curtailed severely in the days before and after the May elections. PDF members manning checkpoints searched vehicles and asked for passenger identification. Election observers were frequently escorted away from the interior of the country. In one case, their airplane was confiscated, and the observers had to return to the capital by road. The authorities interfered with and detained opposition leaders attempting to visit constituencies in the interior.

Following the December 20 military action, U.S. forces temporarily blocked certain roads and established a number of vehicular and pedestrian checkpoints. The Endara Government worked with U.S. military authorities to remove obstacles when no longer needed and to replace U.S. troops with FPP personnel at the few checkpoints that remained as of January 15, 1990.

Panama has accepted refugees of widely differing ideological persuasions, and hundreds of displaced persons and exiles from other countries reside in the country.

In early 1989, faced with approaching elections, the Noriega regime launched a wave of repression, closed most opposition media, limited the opposition's access to the media, and attempted to keep the foreign press out of Panama. Although some opposition rallies were permitted, free campaigning was clearly restricted. Despite massive regime fraud, the Civic Democratic Opposition Alliance (ADOC) won the election by a three-to-one margin, according to independent observers, including the Catholic Church. The Catholic hierarchy, an international observer delegation led by former President Jimmy Carter, and the official U.S. delegation headed by Congressman John Murtha (D-PA) denounced the electoral fraud.

After the elections, in which vote counters were attacked and four people were murdered, many opposition candidates and participants were forced into hiding and exile or were arrested and tortured. On May 10, the winning opposition slate leaders were publicly beaten, and one was hospitalized. One of their bodyguards was killed and another wounded. The CPDH reported that by June 1 over 140 persons had been detained in postelection roundups of political opponents.

The May 1989 elections removed any remaining pretense of quasi-legal civilian government. Provisional President Francisco Rodriguez was installed by General Noriega on September 1 as the regime's chief executive. New elections, although alluded to by the regime, were not scheduled. On the civilian side, the PDF wielded its control in part through the governing Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD). Although the legislature was disbanded in September, the PRD continued to play an important role because its members filled most key positions in the Government.

On October 3, a group of PDF officers led an unsuccessful attempt to overthrow the Noriega regime. Thereafter, Noriega and his loyalists reportedly killed as many as 90 PDF personnel and arrested or dismissed several hundred others for their alleged involvement in the rebellion.

On December 20, the ADOC candidates for President (Guillermo Endara), First Vice President (Ricardo Arias Calderon), and Second Vice President (Guillermo "Billy" Ford) took their oaths of office. The Electoral Tribunal announced that its annulment of the May 7 election had been coerced by General Noriega and the PDF, and issued a new decision recognizing the victory of the ADOC candidates. As of January 15, 1990, the Electoral Tribunal was engaged in issuing the official election results of the May 7 legislative elections. Most legislative races were expected to have clear winners. In cases where doubt existed, new elections were to be held.

The IACHR in November issued a severely critical report on human rights violations in Panama, calling on the Noriega regime to restore political rights, return to constitutional order, stop all violence against the civilian population, release political prisoners, authorize the return of exiles, and open the media.

Other international human rights groups were critical of Panama, but during the past year, only the IACHR visited the country and carried out an investigation. The IACHR delegation visited prisons and spoke with political opponents but was prevented by the regime from visiting the opposition newspaper La Prensa. The International Committee of the Red Cross requested but was denied access to political prisoners in 1989.

Several private human rights groups operate in Panama, including one organized by students at the University of Panama. Since the political crisis began in June 1987, these groups have collected data about individual cases of abuse, acted as advocates for detainees, observed opposition demonstrations, and voiced concern about human rights violations. Toward the end of 1989, many of these human rights activists were harassed and arrested by the Noriega regime. Two private groups that are generally respected both within and outside Panama are the CPDH and the Center for Investigation of Human Rights and Juridical Assistance of Panama.

The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, birth out of wedlock, social class, sex, religion, or political views. Owing to traditional bias and general economic conditions, Panamanian women generally do not enjoy the same economic opportunities as men. Panamanian law does not recognize community property, and divorced or deserted women are often left destitute. Although the Constitution mandates equal pay for equal work, wages paid to women are lower than those for equivalent work performed by men and increase at a slower rate.

According to local officials of the Catholic Church, violence against women and children in the family is a serious problem; however, there are few published statistics. A 1985-86 study funded jointly by the Government and the University of Panama entitled "Exploratory Study on the Physical Mistreatment of the Panamanian Woman," by Dr. Carmen Anthony and Gladys Miller, used data gathered from hospitals. The study concluded that the problem was serious and needed to be addressed by the Government and social agencies. Both the Catholic Church and the Ministry of Social Welfare have programs directed at the problem. Church officials state that their program mainly serves poorer women because upper-class women tend to seek private medical assistance.

PANAMA

Panama is a racially mixed country. The traditional monopoly of power by persons of European descent effectively ended with the ouster of the civilian government by the military in 1968. People of mixed race are active politically and are represented in senior civilian positions in the executive branch and in the PDF.

The law does not discriminate against any social, religious, or cultural group. However, naturalized citizens may not hold certain categories of elected office, and the Constitution reserves retail trade to native Panamanians.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Historically, Panamanian workers enjoyed a wide range of benefits under the law. The rights to organize labor unions and to strike were generally unrestricted in the private sector as well as in certain public sector agencies specified by law. Elections within Panamanian labor organizations, as well as employer and professional associations, were generally democratic and free from government interference. These organizations were unrestricted in their right to affiliate with international bodies, and their members freely participated in political parties and other aspects of Panamanian political life. However, the political crisis has had a severe negative impact on workers' rights in Panama. Workers have been fired, arrested, and jailed for exercising their labor rights. The Noriega regime effectively controlled almost all labor organizations and leaders. Within this constraint, workers remained generally free to join the union of their choice.

Four decree laws handed down in October gave the Noriega regime added power to dismiss public employees, suspend the award of legally mandated bonuses, hire and fire free of traditional restraints, and regulate employee meetings. The regime subsequently used all of this authority.

Most public-sector employees are forbidden to form unions or to strike. The "war laws" enacted by the Noriega regime in 1989 abolished public employee representative associations, which functioned like unions. Only the regime-controlled public employee umbrella association, the Federation of Public Sector Employees (FENASEP), was granted an exemption. Legally registered unions also were exempted from these laws.

In an October speech to labor leaders, Noriega told them that they no longer had the right to strike. This was echoed by then Government and Justice Minister Renato Pereira in an October 1989 television address, when he said that "it is no longer legally possible to declare a strike." No major strikes occurred in 1989.

The Endara Government has indicated its receptivity to labor concerns, including revising labor decrees and laws. Exiled labor leader Isaac Rodriguez returned to Panama soon after December 20 and has led labor efforts to persuade the new administration to rescind the Noriega regime's antilabor provisions.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) reiterated its observation that certain provisions of the law do not conform with Convention

PANAMA

87 on Freedom of Association, including: a requirement of 50 workers (or 10 employers) in order to form a union (or employer organization); prohibition of more than one union in an enterprise; a requirement that 75 percent of the members of a union be Panamanian; automatic removal from office of union officials dismissed from their employment; extensive powers of the authorities over records and accounts of unions; and the exclusion of public employees from the labor code and, consequently, from the right to organize and bargain. The committee urged the Noriega regime to bring its legislation into compliance.

A complaint filed by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and the World Confederation of Labor and its regional organization for Latin America, the Confederation of Latin American Workers, allege that the Noriega regime arrested 4 trade union officials and 50 members of the Water and Electrical Workers Union, searched and closed the union's offices and confiscated its funds, and arbitrarily discharged 50 trade union officials and 350 workers. At its May-June 1989 session, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association asked the Noriega regime to supply details of the judgments and the status of the cases against the union officials and workers and urged the regime to reply to the other allegations in the immediate future.

In June 1989, the ILO Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations considered the same issues regarding Panamanian labor law that were addressed by the COE and repeated its request that Panamanian law and practice be brought into conformance with the Convention.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Denial of the right to organize in two important private sector areas, the Colon Free Zone and offshore banking, has long prompted concern among labor leaders. In other areas, the Noriega regime selectively denied, or interfered with, this right. During 1988 and 1989, the Noriega regime succeeded in illegally gaining control of the elections and the leadership of the largest private sector labor central, the Confederation of Republic of Panama Workers (CTRP). The right to bargain was in jeopardy in those cases in which the Noriega regime perceived that its economic or national interests were at stake. Labor leaders charge that the regime used the Ministry of Labor to protect extensive economic interests of regime members in violation of the labor code.

c. Prohibition Against Forced or Compulsory Labor

Panama has an extensive labor code, which prohibits forced or compulsory labor. There was no forced labor in Panama in 1989.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law prohibits work by children under 14 years of age or under the age of 15 if the child has not completed primary school. Both hazardous and night work are prohibited for persons under age 18. Children between ages 12 and 14 may perform farm or domestic labor as long as the work is light and does not interfere with schooling. However, in the deteriorating economic climate, some children worked in violation of the existing law.

PANAMA

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Panama has a comprehensive labor code, which in theory gives extensive rights and benefits to workers. The maximum legal workweek is 48 hours. The law has established a minimum wage for most work categories and requires that substantial bonuses be paid for overtime. According to Panamanian labor leaders, the minimum wage is sufficient to provide at least a minimally decent standard of living for a worker and his family. Although changes in the labor code in 1986 released employers from the obligation to pay certain bonuses and overtime premiums, employers still are required by law to provide workers with compensation adequate for a decent standard of living. The economic downturn resulting from the political turmoil since mid-1987 has caused many employers to reduce work hours or employee pay in order to stay in business, and many workers accepted the nonenforcement of certain labor code provisions to prevent a permanent loss of their jobs.

The labor code details numerous health and safety standards for all places of employment. Female employees are entitled to receive 12 weeks' mandatory maternity leave and the right to return to their jobs. The Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare is responsible for ensuring compliance with these regulations, but too few inspectors and widespread corrupt practices have hampered strict enforcement of the labor code.

PARAGUAY

Paraguay, independent since 1811, has been ruled almost continuously by authoritarian regimes. In early 1989, however, a new Government committed itself to a transition to democracy and respect for human rights and subsequently took important steps toward that goal. On February 2, 1989, General Andres Rodriguez overthrew the 34-year-old dictatorship of General Alfredo Stroessner. On May 1, in what were judged by observers to have been relatively free and fair elections, President Rodriguez received a mandate to guide the country's transition to democracy. Nonetheless, at year's end, the military and the ruling Colorado Party remained the principal sources of power.

The police forces, under the overall authority of the Ministry of Interior, hold primary responsibility for internal security and maintaining public order. However, after the February coup, the military, which in the last years of the Stroessner regime seldom was called upon to control the civilian population, was used several times to end illegal land occupations by campesinos.

The political opening initiated by President Rodriguez was complemented by economic reform. The new Government pursued market-oriented economic policies, including the elimination of a multiple exchange rate system that contributed to corruption and contraband. Corruption, however, remains a serious problem. The Government also is considering the privatization of some unprofitable state enterprises. Paraguay is a predominantly agricultural, private enterprise-oriented country. Business associations, influential during the Stroessner years, continue to be significant, both politically and economically, but they now are confronted by the growing strength of organized labor.

The new Government took significant steps to reverse the repression of human rights prevalent during the Stroessner years. Political exiles were allowed to return, and opposition political parties, previously banned, were legally recognized and allowed to operate freely. Press restrictions were largely lifted, but a cautious press continued to exercise a measure of self-censorship. Newspapers and radio stations closed by Stroessner were allowed to reopen. Movement was made toward an independent judiciary by including one member of the opposition on the Supreme Court and several others on lower benches. There was a much greater, although not complete, respect for freedom of assembly. Short-term political detentions were fewer (though problems remained), and the country's last two political prisoners were freed. Meanwhile, recognition of and respect for labor rights improved substantially, with workers free to organize, meet, and march. Two of the country's leading human rights activists were elected to Parliament. Two laws used by the Stroessner regime to prosecute opponents for political activity were repealed, and the Government ratified the American Convention on Human Rights and the Inter-American and U.N. Conventions against torture. Several police officials accused of torturing political detainees under the Stroessner regime were removed from their jobs, and criminal proceedings were initiated against some.

Human rights concerns shifted from basic to more complicated issues. A very significant impediment to full transition to democracy lay in the flawed voting procedures and electoral laws that make it very difficult for any opposition party to win an election against the President and his party. The freer political climate gave birth to rising expectations among previously repressed groups, particularly landless campesinos and independent labor unions. The new Government at times reacted by violently breaking up demonstrations and detaining leaders; the investigation and prosecution of former police torturers moved slowly; respect for habeas corpus remained questionable; the press was circumspect in criticizing the President; and the Government often failed to protect worker rights to collective bargaining.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Two unsubstantiated cases of politically motivated deaths were reported by the press in 1989. Neither case appeared to involve government culpability. On March 25, opposition Authentic Radical Liberal Party (PLRA) leaders reported that a party committee member in the interior town of Acahay was slain. According to the local press, the man was killed by another member of the PLRA. In another case, a Colorado youth was killed on October 1, reportedly as a result of internal party bickering in the town of Borja.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of politically motivated disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Paraguay ratified the Inter-American Convention Against Torture in October. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission reported in September, however, that it still was receiving reports of sporadic cases of torture and abuse by security personnel. Nevertheless, these appeared to be isolated cases mostly in areas outside the capital city and neither systematic nor reflective of government policy. The Government dismantled torture centers used by the Stroessner regime and initiated prosecution of former officials accused of torture. Additional investigations were under way, but by the end of the year no cases had been concluded, and it remained to be seen to what extent those responsible for human rights abuses under the previous regime would be held accountable (see Section 1.e.). While abuse of prisoners occurs relatively less frequently than during the Stroessner years, rough treatment of prisoners is still common.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides for a judicial determination of the legality of detention and stipulates that any person arrested without a warrant must be presented formally before a judge within 24 hours of his detention and have charges filed against him within 48 hours. Authorities continued frequently to ignore these provisions in both political and criminal cases during 1989 although not as routinely as in the past. Some political detainees continued to be held incommunicado. For example, Efigenio Lisboa, a prominent trade unionist in Ciudad del Este, was arrested in June by military authorities and held incommunicado in military detention for 27 days for a speech the military found offensive. No charges were filed, and Lisboa was released.

Exile no longer was used as a means of political control in 1989, with one exception. Although the exact number is unknown, beginning immediately after the February coup, political exiles--political and trade union activists as well as writers and members of the performing arts--began returning to Paraguay. The only exiles not permitted to return were members of the still illegal Paraguayan Communist Party (PCP). Many PCP members returned clandestinely and were not arrested or otherwise harassed by the Government. However, Ananias Maidana, the Secretary General of the PCP who had been living in exile for more than a decade, was refused permission to enter Paraguay when he attempted to return to the country on December 12.

Mario Mancuello, whose son disappeared in police custody in 1976, was freed from the arbitrary punishment of having to sign in before 7 a.m. every day at his local police station, as he had been required to do for the previous 12 years.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In general accordance with the civil law tradition, trials are conducted almost exclusively by presentation of written documents to a judge, who then renders a decision. The accused often appears before the court only twice--to plead and to hear sentencing. All judgments are automatically reviewed by an appellate judge, and the law provides for appeals to the Supreme Court. Court proceedings are not open to the public. Court proceedings in cases of a sensitive political nature are held in secrecy, and any subsequent press reports are based only on the attorneys' or judges' comments.

The Constitution and the Penal Code provide numerous safeguards to protect the rights of individuals. While nominally independent, the judiciary has been, in effect, subordinate to the executive branch, which exercised its influence through the presidential appointment of judges, control over the judiciary's budget, and through the discipline of the ruling Colorado Party. Supreme Court Justices are appointed to serve for the same 5-year term as the President of the Republic. Executive interference, administrative shortcomings, and the lack of adequate financial support for the judicial system limit the right of an accused to a fair and speedy trial. More than 70 percent of accused persons, after serving in detention the normal time prescribed as a penalty for the crime of which they are accused, are then released without ever having their trial proceedings completed. To protest the long delays in the judicial processing of their cases, 166 detainees in the men's National Penitentiary of Tacumbu went on a hunger strike in May. The hunger strike produced no major results. While no prisoners were released, public attention was drawn to the plight of detainees being held for prolonged periods without having been tried or sentenced. Judges, including the Supreme Court Justices, continued periodically to visit the country's prisons to interview inmates to determine the status of their cases.

PARAGUAY

The popular perception that the police and judicial institutions of the State still serve those with political, military, or economic power discourages some citizens from reporting police abuse. Public confidence in the equal application of the law was not enhanced in 1989 when high-level Stroessner-era public officials accused of theft of public funds were allowed to take advantage of a technicality in the law to evade prosecution by donating to the State large sums of money or land. By contrast, in September, an attorney who had filed several such criminal complaints was detained without bail on charges of extortion and blackmail, which, according to the press, were based on accusations from an official of a government ministry.

President Rodriguez assumed office promising an independent judiciary. A move toward that goal was the unprecedented appointment in June of a non-Colorado Party member, Christian Democratic jurist Jeronimo Irala Burgos, to the Supreme Court. Another sign of change came in early August when the executive branch acceded to a decision of a lower court judge and allowed two Europeans married to Paraguayans to return to Paraguay. The two had been expelled by the Stroessner Government on charges of carrying out subversive activities and were turned back by the police when they tried to return in July. As a sign that much remained to be done, however, judges alleged that they had been pressured to slow down the processing of cases against ex-Stroessner officials accused of human rights abuses and theft of public funds. Later, the Government threatened but stopped short of transferring four judges presiding over such cases.

The new Government abolished the infamous security laws 209 ("Defense of Public Order") and 294 ("Defense of Democracy") used by the Stroessner regime to jail political opponents arbitrarily.

Paraguay's last two remaining political prisoners were freed during 1989. Alejandro Mella Latorre, a Chilean journalist imprisoned for 8 years as a coconspirator in the Asuncion assassination of ex-Nicaraguan dictator Anastasio Somoza, was released February 16. Mella Latorre had remained imprisoned after completing his original sentence, awaiting the outcome of his trial for alleged involvement in a prison riot. The Stroessner regime had refused to release him even though he already had served more time in jail for the alleged second offense than the penalty for that crime. Remigio Gimenez, who was serving a 30-year sentence, was freed August 29, after 11 years in prison, after the Supreme Court overthrew his 1978 conviction, ruling that the statute of limitations had run out before he had been found guilty of the crimes police alleged he had committed in the 1950's.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

While government and security forces generally do not interfere in the private lives of citizens, there have been notable exceptions. Although private homes are protected constitutionally from police entry except under the terms of a judicial warrant or to prevent a crime, this protection often has been ignored in practice.

With the exception of some isolated cases, after the coup the Government stopped interfering with the Paraguayan Human Rights Commission's (PHRC) mail. The organization reported no knowledge of further problems mailing its newsletter overseas.

PARAGUAY

The Interior Ministry in February voided the use of Special Agent police identity cards. Known as "stool pigeons," these police informants were a notorious tool used by the Stroessner regime to maintain surveillance over the populace.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite broad constitutional assurances of freedom of speech and press, Stroessner tolerated little of either. After February 2, however, an unprecedented degree of freedom of expression emerged in Paraguay. Both the print and broadcast media, as well as political activists and individual citizens, were able to speak out without government interference on subjects they never dared broach during the Stroessner years. The day after the coup, General Rodriguez publicly pledged his Government would respect freedom of expression; he has kept that promise. The Catholic station, Radio Caritas, forced by the Stroessner regime to reduce its broadcasting power weeks before the coup, returned to full strength the day after Stroessner's fall. Radio Nanduti, jammed and then forced off the air by the Stroessner Government in 1987, resumed broadcasting within days after the coup. The newspaper ABC Color resumed publication in March, 5 years after being closed by Stroessner. The opposition Febrerista Party's weekly newspaper El Pueblo, shut down in 1987, also returned to the streets. The Inter-American Press Association (IAPA), which met in Paraguay for the first time in April, praised the new journalistic freedom in Paraguay.

Only 2 weeks after the coup, Paraguayan television viewers were treated to a televised debate among opposition and Colorado Party spokesmen. Opposition party presidents Domingo Laino (Authentic Radical Liberal), Euclides Acevedo (Febrerista) and Jorge Dario Cristaldo (Christian Democratic) exchanged views with Colorado Party Vice President Edgar Ynsfran on a range of issues. Radio Nanduti owner Humberto Rubin was the guest journalist. Under Stroessner, the opposition effectively was barred from all appearances on the two national television stations, even during news broadcasts. During the campaign for the May elections the government-owned radio station granted free broadcasting time to the competing opposition parties. Two weeks after the coup, Asuncion's Channel 13 televised live a discussion on torture in which the panelists, victims of torture during the Stroessner regime, told their stories and answered call-in questions from viewers.

Despite its newfound freedom, the press demonstrated a certain discretion, even caution, in 1989. Paraguayan editors exercised a considerable degree of self-restraint in what they did and did not publish. While radio and television were more aggressive and provocative, one glaring taboo remained: no one publicly said anything derogatory about President Rodriguez. In one example, the Central Unitaria de Trabajadores (CUT) labor federation waged a vociferous campaign against Colorado Senator Blas N. Riquelme in support of striking workers at his brewery. Although it was widely known that President Rodriguez was a part-owner of the brewery, CUT never publicly attacked the President.

PARAGUAY

In a specific instance of limitation of freedom of expression in 1989, the Government prohibited the performance of the play "San Fernando," written by Paraguayan playwright Alcibiades Gonzalez Delvalle, which portrays national hero Francisco Solano Lopez in an unfavorable light.

Although legally the public National University (UNA) is autonomous, under Stroessner faculty positions were reserved for Colorado Party members, and students complained about the lack of differing perspectives taught in the classroom. In 1989 change in academia was slower than elsewhere in the society. After the coup, students clamored for a voice in administrative and faculty appointments and repeatedly demonstrated to protest alleged abuses. A major objective of the students was to bring about the ouster of Stroessner-era deans who, according to the students, had repressed student activism, were guilty of financial irregularities, or were incompetent. Students won a number of those battles. In one example, the dean of UNA's School of Philosophy resigned in August after students campaigned for months for her removal, accusing her of administrative irregularities. In 1989 student groups favoring opposition political parties and dissident Colorado Party factions continued to participate openly in free student government elections, often winning.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The rights of peaceful assembly and association provided for by the Constitution were violated regularly by the Stroessner Government. In 1989 one of the clearest and most immediate changes after the coup was the removal of many former restrictions. Before the coup, police insisted on prior authorization for opposition gatherings and routinely denied such authorization. The new Government required no such authorization. Just 3 days after the coup, the Government announced that it would not interfere with a march planned by the opposition National Accord that Stroessner's Government had vowed to prevent. The march of thousands took place February 11, without police interference. Radio Nanduti, which frequently was prevented from holding public forums in its auditorium in 1988, was the site of numerous opposition political gatherings after the coup, especially during the election campaign. Opposition political, labor, and student groups held many rallies and marches during the year.

There were limits, however, to the new respect for freedom of assembly. In February the Interior Ministry imposed a ban on demonstrations in the heart of downtown Asuncion, citing the need to maintain public order in the congested commercial district. In July the youth arm of the PLRA canceled a march after the police vowed to use all necessary measures to enforce the ban. In one case, the Government unleashed attack dogs on procampesino demonstrators in the restricted area on June 23; several persons were bitten. On October 11, police detained for 20 hours three prominent trade unionists belonging to the CUT after they led a march on the presidential palace. That night, police used water-hoses to break up a demonstration by workers protesting the arrests. The next day, police used force against landless campesino and urban homeless marchers. No one was injured seriously, but the incidents showed that government tolerance for demonstrators had its limits.

The Government also showed greater respect for freedom of association. Under Stroessner two of the country's five opposition political parties--including the largest, the PLRA--were illegal. Before the May 1 election, the Government granted legal recognition to all parties that applied. These recognized parties included the existing PLRA and Christian Democratic Parties, as well as six new parties formed during the campaign. In another move, teachers were no longer required to belong and contribute financially to the Colorado Party.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholicism is the predominant and official religion in Paraguay, but the Constitution provides for freedom of conscience for all persons. The new Government continued to respect that freedom in 1989, with all religious denominations free to worship as they chose. Adherence to a particular creed confers no advantage or disadvantage, and conversion from one faith to another is not interfered with. Foreign and local missionaries proselytize freely.

The Rodriguez Government has attempted to mend the rupture that occurred in church-state relations during the Stroessner years. In his first public statement after taking power, General Rodriguez listed respect for the Catholic Church as one of the reasons for the coup. A Spanish priest expelled in 1988 was allowed to return to Paraguay.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

In general, Paraguayan citizens travel freely within the country with virtually no restrictions, but there continued to be periodic and random roadblocks in rural areas to verify possession of national and voter registration cards and the current payment of registration fees, as well as to intercept stolen cars and contraband. In 1989 the Government discontinued the practice of denying passports to opposition leaders. Paraguayan passports still are not valid for travel to Communist countries, and the Government does not allow citizens of Communist countries to enter Paraguay. There were, however, some exceptions to these rules in 1989. The Government chose not to interfere in the travel of a Paraguayan delegation to the Communist-sponsored World Youth Festival in North Korea in July. Earlier, the Government first denied and then agreed to grant a visa to a Hungarian youth leader to allow him to visit Paraguay to assist the organizing efforts of the Paraguayan delegation to the Festival.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In 1989 Paraguay was in the process of a transition to democracy, scheduled to culminate in 1993 with the election of a new President, but significant problems remained. Although the May 1 general elections, following a free and open campaign, were the most honest in recent Paraguayan history, Paraguay still was in the process of building effective democratic institutions. While there was more tolerance of opposition in 1989, President Rodriguez dominated the political scene, as did Stroessner before him. The ruling Colorado Party's two-thirds majority in the Senate and Chamber of Deputies gave it complete control of the legislature, which did not reject any significant presidential proposal during the year.

Although President Rodriguez and the Colorado Party received approximately 70 percent of the votes, certain factors diminished the citizenry's ability peacefully to change their government. Paraguay's antiquated polling system allowed for fraud. Among the widespread voting irregularities were the consistent lack of secret balloting, registration of voters on election day, inaccurate voter lists, and distribution of ballots outside polling booths. Another shortcoming was the law that gives the party that wins a plurality of the parliamentary vote two-thirds of the seats in both chambers. Nevertheless, eight parties, including two formed during the campaign, competed in the multiple-party, multiple-candidate election that was witnessed by over 100 international observers. These observers were allowed to travel and visit polling places freely.

General elections, held every 5 years, next will take place in 1993 (the 1989 election was to select a government to complete Stroessner's term). Municipal elections, also held nationwide every 5 years, will be held in October 1990, when for the first time local governments will be directly elected. The law requires that all Paraguayans between 18 and 60 years of age vote; sanctions for not voting rarely were applied. Although the Constitution provides for equality of political rights for women, in practice women continued to play only a minor role in Paraguay's political life.

During 1989 the Government welcomed discussion of human rights in Paraguay with a variety of outside governmental and nongovernmental organizations. In August Paraguay ratified the Inter-American Human Rights Convention, and agreed to a visit in 1990 of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC) of the Organization of American States, which had been barred by the Stroessner regime. The IAHRC's 1989 Annual Report on Human Rights in Paraguay noted the Government's pledge to correct the pervasive abuses of the former regime.

Local organizations remained active in the investigation and defense of human rights. Four major human rights groups operate in Paraguay: the Committee of Churches (supported by foreign churches), the Paraguayan Human Rights Commission (which publishes a periodic newsletter), PRODEMOS (a group that includes Roman Catholic Bishop Mario Melanio Medina among its leaders), and the local chapter of the Association of Latin American Lawyers for the Defense of Human Rights. The Catholic Church also is an active advocate of human rights. The Church's weekly newspaper Sendero includes reports on alleged human rights violations as a major part of its editorial format. Two of Paraguay's leading human rights advocates, Carmen Casco de Lara Castro of the Paraguay Human Rights Commission, and Francisco Jose de Vargas of the Committee of Churches, were elected opposition members of Parliament in the May election. As a result of the country's improved human rights situation, the Committee of Churches in 1989 underwent a reorganization, shifting some of its attention away from prisoner assistance toward civic education.

PARAGUAY

Ethnically, socially, and culturally, Paraguay has one of the most homogeneous populations in South America. More than 90 percent of the people are of mixed Guaraní Indian and Spanish descent. An even larger percentage of the population is Roman Catholic. The large majority of Paraguayans speak both Guaraní and Spanish. Partially because of these common unifying elements, there is no clear evidence of discrimination based on race, religion, or language in Paraguay. In fact, in political and military circles, fluency in Guaraní and ties to peasant or rural origins are considered advantageous.

The participation of women in the social and political system of Paraguay is limited through informal means in this still predominantly male-dominated society. There are, however, no laws limiting participation of women. There are several nongovernmental women's organizations which focus primarily on encouraging civic education and greater participation in the democratic transition process. While the traditional social system limits the participation of women, they long have been active in the economy, particularly those women from lower income groups, and they increasingly participate in business, the professions, and the artistic world. In 1989 the Congress studied a proposal formulated by women's groups to reform discriminatory provisions of the Civil Code pertaining to marriage and property rights of women. President Rodríguez broke a longstanding informal barrier when he appointed a woman, Dr. Cynthia Prieto, as Minister of Health--the first woman minister in the history of Paraguay.

Violence against women, such as wife beating, is fairly common in Paraguay. Such abuse is against the law, but the law is not generally well enforced. Legislation pending in the Chamber of Deputies would establish a subsecretary ministerial position (probably within the Ministry of Health) with responsibility for women's issues.

Paraguay has an unassimilated Indian population estimated at 75,000-100,000 which is generally ignored and neglected. The Government's National Indigenous Institute has the authority to purchase land on behalf of Indian communities and expropriate private property under certain conditions to establish tribal homelands. The Government actively encourages church groups to work with indigenous populations in health and welfare, as well as in religious matters. The problems of the indigenous population, particularly those involving land claims, continued to receive frequent media attention. Although there is a government agency responsible for Indian affairs, the social services (schools, health posts, etc.) in Indian areas are generally of relatively poor quality compared with those in other areas of the country.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Paraguay has been without beneficiary status in the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) program since 1987, when it was found not to be in compliance with the GSP statutory requirements regarding internationally recognized worker rights. Paraguay was removed from the program after a review of charges that Paraguayan workers were being denied freedom of association and that their leaders were being harassed.

After the February coup, private sector workers became free from government interference to form and join unions of their choosing without previous authorization. Public sector workers, however, continued to be prohibited by law from unionizing. After the extralegal restraints of the Stroessner regime were removed, Paraguayan workers organized scores of new unions. Only a small proportion of Paraguay's workers were organized, however.

Numerous International Labor Organization (ILO) experts came to Paraguay in 1989 for meetings with the Ministry of Labor to explore ways of improving labor rights in Paraguay. In August international trade unionists from Latin America, Western Europe, and North America attended meetings in Asuncion of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), including a session of the ICFTU's Human Rights Committee. In October the Ministry of Labor hosted an international, tripartite conference on "Labor Relations in a Democratic Society" in cooperation with the Government of Spain. Government, business, and labor leaders from Argentina, Spain, Uruguay, and Paraguay shared their recent experience of the transition from authoritarianism to democracy. However, the lack of participation by the principal leaders of Paraguay's major business associations drew criticism from their foreign counterparts and from the Minister of Labor.

In a significant change from the Stroessner era when the government-controlled Confederation of Paraguayan Workers (CPT) dominated organized labor, by the end of 1989 it appeared that most Paraguayan trade unions were independent of the Government and the ruling Colorado Party. A second labor central, the National Workers Central (CNT), was legally recognized in July 1989. It is affiliated with the World Confederation of Labor and its regional organization, the Latin American Confederation of Labor (CLAT). In August a third labor central, the Unified Workers Central (CUT), was formed by approximately 80 independent labor unions and campesino organizations. The CUT was legally recognized in October. The new CUT maintains contacts with the ICFTU and its regional body, the InterAmerican Regional Workers Organization (ORIT), the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), as well as with Brazil's CUT.

During the year, CUT increasingly came to dominate the labor scene while the CPT, which maintained its ties to the Colorado Party after the coup, suffered from internal divisions. The Stroessner Government, for political reasons, often arbitrarily denied legal recognition to independent trade unions. After the coup, the Ministry of Labor recognized all unions that met the legal requirements. By the end of the year, over 200 unions had been recognized. Among the newly recognized unions that previously had been denied legal status was the first union at a savings and loan bank. The Inter-union Workers' Movement (MIT), grew from eight member unions to approximately 30 in the first 6 months after the coup. MIT is not formally a labor central.

The right to strike, while recognized under Paraguayan law, remained difficult to exercise due to the complex legal process of factfinding, arbitration, and adjudication--which can involve delays of several years--required before a strike can be considered legal. There were no major strikes declared legal in 1989. In late August, a wave of worker walkouts hit the country, of which the four major strikes all were declared illegal by the Ministry of Labor's Conciliation and Arbitration Board. The law prohibits public sector workers from striking.

Meanwhile, in response to growing labor unrest, the Government in September formed a new nonofficial government-worker-employer Labor Mediation Commission made up of representatives of the Ministries of Labor and Commerce, the country's three labor centrals, and the two leading business associations. In its first case, the new tripartite panel resolved a dispute at a lumber mill, ending both a strike by the workers and the temporary closing of the plant by the company.

The general respect for human rights that began with the overthrow of Stroessner directly affected the labor movement. Workers were free to hold meetings and stage protests, and the Government generally did not harass their leaders. There were some exceptions, however. Efigenio Lisboa, a prominent trade unionist in Ciudad del Este, was arrested twice in 1989, and spent much of the year in detention (see Section 1.d.). In October police detained overnight three CUT leaders for leading a march on the Presidential Palace. Meanwhile, police used water-hoses to break up a demonstration by workers protesting the arrests. (See Section 2.b.)

Two striking workers were killed by the Armed Forces at Itaipu Dam on December 12. The two were members of a splinter faction of the union representing workers employed by Itaipu contractors, a faction which had been on strike for the past 2 weeks. The two workers were taking part in an illegal effort by the striking faction to block the main access road to Itaipu and keep nonstriking members from entering. Under circumstances which still are not entirely clear, a military detachment assigned to guard the dam opened fire on the strikers while attempting to clear the road, killing the two and wounding several others. The unit claimed that strikers fired first, while the union claimed that none of the strikers were armed. The Paraguayan Government has launched an investigation. The confrontation and violence shocked labor, management, and Paraguayan society as a whole. Government mediators got the parties to sit down and negotiate a solution, putting an end to the strike.

The Government permits labor unions to maintain contact with regional and international labor organizations. The American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) reopened its office in Asuncion 3 months after the coup. AIFLD had closed its office in 1981, severing its relationship with the government-controlled CPT. In 1989 AIFLD continued working with MIT, while extending assistance to the new CUT.

At its November 1989 session, the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) considered four cases concerning Paraguay. These cases, involving complaints filed before 1989, allege antiunion discrimination, including dismissal, transfer, and detention, without charges, of workers; employer interference in the legitimate activities of the union; interference with the right to strike; and failure of the Government to recognize a union. Three of the cases arose in the private sector and one in the public sector. Noting that the union which had been denied recognition had subsequently been recognized, the Committee requested the Government to improve its machinery for enabling employees dismissed for union activities to seek reinstatement; recalled the need for legislation specifying remedies and penalties for employer interference; expressed deep regret for the detention and subsequent dismissal of a teacher, allegedly for union activities; and requested the Government to provide detailed information regarding the actions taken with regard to all the individuals involved in the cases.

Several of these cases were also addressed by the ILO's Committee of Experts (COE). Among its recommendations, the COE urged that measures be adopted to protect those categories of workers--in particular public employees--not covered by the Labor Code from antiunion discrimination; reiterated the need for the Government to grant, unequivocally, the right to organize and bargain collectively to public employees.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

A favorite antiunion tactic of Paraguayan employers after the coup was to fire the leaders of nascent unions. The Labor Code, dating from the Stroessner period, provided little protection. Several labor leaders have challenged their dismissals through the courts, a lengthy process that can take years. At year's end, the Congress still was studying a proposal presented by the MIT in July to strengthen those provisions of the Labor Code that protect the job stability of union leaders. According to a study done by CUT, 629 workers were fired for union activity between February 4 and September 20, although not all of those workers were union leaders. Subsequently, 101 of those workers were rehired by one firm ordered to do so by a labor court.

The right to bargain collectively is recognized in the Labor Code, but the Government did little to enforce the provision, and it was not practiced generally. Some employers agreed to collective bargaining, but there are no legal sanctions or government pressures forcing them to do so. The labor laws permit a union to represent all of the employees of a company in collective bargaining even if less than half of the employees are members of the union. The law also allows multiple unions to represent the same employees at a work place.

Under the law, there exist no areas, such as special economic zones, exempt from the provisions of the Labor Code. Paraguay has no export processing zone. In practice, the rights of labor are more strongly exercised in the capital city, Asuncion, than in other cities or the rural areas because the vast majority of the country's unionized jobs are located in the capital.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by law and was not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Minors between 15 and 18 years of age can be employed legally only with parental authorization and cannot be employed in dangerous or unhealthy conditions. Children between 12 and 15 years of age may only be employed legally in a family enterprise, an apprenticeship, or in agriculture. The Labor Code prohibits work by children under 12. These age restrictions are generally enforced, except in the informal economy. It has been estimated, for example, that there are about 15,000 children, many younger than 12, working in the streets of Asuncion (500,000 population) selling newspapers, shining shoes, cleaning car windows, and so forth.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Government establishes a private sector minimum wage, which depends on the type of work and the region, based on studies of the cost of living prepared by the National Economic Coordinating Committee. The minimum monthly wage in Asuncion was approximately $125. The minimum wage is barely sufficient for a worker and his family to maintain a minimally decent standard of living. Furthermore, it has been estimated that 72 percent of Paraguayan workers earn less than the decreed minimum, which the Government does little if anything to enforce.

The Labor Code provides minimum guarantees of worker rights and benefits. The law does not cover public sector, temporary, or domestic workers. According to the Code, maximum weekly hours are 48 for day work and 42 for night work, with 1 day of rest. The law provides for a 1 month annual bonus. Married women need their husbands' consent to enter a labor contract, although labor contracts cannot be denied to women who worked prior to marriage. Paid maternity leave of 6 weeks prior to and after birth is required. Day care centers for children under 2 years of age are mandatory for enterprises employing more than 50 women. Severance pay is specified and compensation provided in cases of unjustified dismissal.

The Labor Code also governs conditions of safety, hygiene, and comfort. The nascent independent trade union movement has yet to focus on occupational safety and health. That, coupled with the slowness and relative expense of the labor law system, resulted in the frequent failure to provide the protections established by the Labor Code. In general, the Government did not effectively enforce the safety and hygiene provisions of the Labor Code, partially for lack of inspectors.

PERU

Peru has a freely elected democratic government, with an executive branch headed by a president, a bicameral legislature, a separate and independent judiciary, and an attorney general's office (the Public Ministry). Peru's history has been punctuated by periods of military rule, most recently from 1968 to 1980. President Alan Garcia and his center-left American Popular Revolutionary Alliance (APRA) won the last general elections in 1985 by a large margin. The next elections are scheduled for April 8, 1990.

Public security responsibilities are shared by the police and the military. The Interior Ministry and its police services have the primary counterterrorist role in the city of Lima and in the 114 provinces which are not under a state of emergency. The military leads the effort to combat subversion in the 69 provinces which are currently under a state of emergency. The states of emergency place all executive branch authority in the local military command, suspend restrictions on arbitrary detention and the requirement for search warrants, and restrict rights of movement and assembly. More than 50 percent of Peru's population of 22 million lived under a state of emergency in 1989. Peru's history of military coups has weakened civilian control over the military. There is little oversight of military activities in the emergency zones by civilian judges or prosecutors, and the constitutional rights of persons detained by the military are routinely ignored.

In Peru's mixed economy, private property is generally respected. Unfavorable terms of international trade, lack of foreign investment, capital flight, and internal structural problems led in 1989 to stagnant exports, rising unemployment, fiscal disaster, and one of the world's highest inflation rates. Austerity measures produced a deep recession and a 50-percent cut in per capita annual income to an estimated $800, without curbing inflation.

The chief factors driving human rights violations in Peru remain the terrorist activities of the Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) Maoist guerrillas. The Sendero regularly assassinate anyone perceived to be an opponent, or merely uncooperative, including ordinary citizens, typically Indian residents of the Andean highlands. As measured by the number of reported deaths of government workers (144 civilian, 243 police, and 105 military), 1989 was the most violent year since Sendero announced its "popular war" in 1980. Sendero also increased its control over Peru's major coca-growing region, the Upper Huallaga Valley, where it both represented peasant coca growers in their dealings with narcotics traffickers and cooperated with traffickers to thwart law enforcement efforts. The Senate Commission on Violence estimated that Sendero was responsible for a total 1,526 deaths in 1989. Several other smaller terrorist groups were also active. Independent human rights groups charge that the Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement (MRTA) committed 161 political murders in 1989 and that the Rodrigo Franco Command (CRF) murdered eleven.

Human rights abuses by government security forces also increased in 1989, although independent investigations were increasingly difficult to carry out because military commanders restrict access to emergency zones. The Public Ministry reports a backlog of over 3,000 pending cases of disappearances, over 500 of them filed in 1989. There were credible reports of summary executions, arbitrary detentions, and frequent use of torture by police and the military. The Senate Commission on Violence estimated that government security forces were responsible for a total of 1,228 deaths in 1989. Trials of military personnel accused of human rights violations move slowly, if at all. In December two police officers were sentenced to prison terms for their roles in the 1986 massacre of 124 prisoners at Lurigancho prison. The 6 army officers and 69 other police personnel on trial were all acquitted.

A special congressional commission on paramilitary activities was established after the April and May assassinations of two members of the Chamber of Deputies. Commission members concluded that extremist members of the ruling APRA party, working with elements of the Ministry of Interior, are using the Rodrigo Franco Command (CRF) vigilante terrorist group to conduct operations against suspected antigovernment terrorists and sympathizers.

It is estimated that at least 3,198 persons (civilian and military) were killed in terrorist-related violence in 1989, an increase of over 50-percent from the previous year.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political and other extrajudicial killings rose again in 1989. Sendero Luminoso continued to assassinate teachers, engineers, development and human rights workers, Indian peasants, and political candidates, as well as government, police and ruling party officials. Official government sources reported more than 1,450 civilian deaths from terrorist violence. The independent National Coordinator for Human Rights calculated a total of 823 civilian political assassinations, 720 of them by Sendero, through the first 10 months of 1989. The Senate Select Committee on Violence and Pacification calculates that Sendero's forces committed 1,526 killings in 1989. Sendero's killings thus remained primarily aimed at the general public; by comparison, government security forces suffered 157 deaths at Sendero's hands. Due to the isolation of many rural areas where Sendero is most active, the number of victims almost surely is underreported. Sendero continued to use violence in the countryside, particularly assassinations, to impose its control over certain areas, punish peasants who withhold their support, and eliminate opposition. In one such incident, Sendero killed at least 45 peasants in three settlements in Huancavelica department on June 9. The townspeople were rounded up, community leaders and those who had refused Sendero's earlier call for a work stoppage were selected for "trial," and then shot, stabbed, or had their skulls smashed as family and neighbors looked on. Another massacre, also probably by Sendero, took place in the village of Canaire in Ayacucho department, in which 35 were killed on February 27.

In the cities, Sendero used attacks more for propaganda and intimidation purposes. In a major effort to disrupt the nation's November 1989 municipal and April 1990 presidential elections, it expanded its attacks on government and APRA party officials to include opposition officeholders and candidates for public office, regardless of party affiliation. Sendero attacked and killed several foreigners in 1989, including tourists, development workers, and journalists.

A second terrorist group, the MRTA, has expanded beyond its original base of operations in Lima and environs to field its own paramilitary cadres in some rural zones, most notably in northern San Martin department. Though the MRTA chiefly seeks the destruction of property through the selective bombing of banks, factories, foreign businesses, and diplomatic installations, these attacks killed at least 161 people in 1989. Among those killed was a police sergeant during a September attack on the Lima residence of Economy and Finance Minister Cesar Vasquez Bazan.

A third terrorist group, the CRF, also increased its activities in 1989. Suspected of being controlled by elements of the APRA party and the Ministry of Interior, the CRF carried out a campaign of intimidation, bombings, and assassinations. Among those targeted by CRF in 1989 were journalists, human rights workers, labor union members, lawyers, leftist politicians, and others the CRF accused of working to advance the cause of Sendero or MRTA. According to the Senate Committee on Violence, CRF was responsible for 11 murders in 1989, a figure which closely tracks with that of independent human rights organizations.

There are no official statistics on the number of summary executions in 1989. Because the number of confirmed disappearances sharply rose for the second consecutive year, it appears probable that the number of summary executions also increased in 1989. In an August 1989 report, Amnesty International (AI) charged that not only did the number of extrajudicial killings and disappearances in emergency zones grow "in a spectacular manner" during 1988 and the first half of 1989, but that for the first time these practices were no longer confined to the emergency zones, nor were the victims only from indigenous peasant communities in the Andean highlands.

Several notable cases of probable military killings occurred in 1989. On May 17, some 100 troops of the Third Ollantaytambo Infantry Battalion entered the town of Calabaza, Satipo, Junin department. According to survivors' accounts filed with the Attorney General's office, the townspeople were assembled, and two hooded individuals (said to be former Sendero members cooperating with the army) selected approximately 20 persons. The prisoners were taken to a ravine, tortured, and killed, although several escaped. The next day the bodies of 11 townspeople, including those of 3 students aged 14, 16, and 17 years, were found on the shores of the Calabaza river.

The last surviving witness of the May 14, 1988, army massacre of at least 28 villagers in Cayara, Ayacucho department, was killed in circumstances suggesting army involvement. Martha Crisostomo Garcia was shot to death after eight hooded individuals in military dress burst into her house in Huamanga at 3 a.m. on September 8, 1989. The ninth witness to disappear or to be killed since the Cayara massacre, Crisostomo had identified the body of one of those killed, thus implicating General Jose Valdivia, then political-military chief of the Ayacucho emergency zone. A Public Ministry investigator concluded that there was clear military responsibility for the Cayara massacre. The ruling party member leading the congressional investigation into the killings, however, concluded there had been "no excesses committed on the part of the military," even though the commission has yet to produce its official report. At year's end, the investigation remained stalled.

Also in May, Delfin Ortiz Serna, a witness to the November 1988 killing of a journalist, who had filed a deposition implicating the military, was shot to death. In neither the Calabaza massacre nor the murder of Crisostomo, nor in any other 1989 incident of alleged military or police violations of a civilian's human rights, were the results of official executive branch investigations ever made public, nor were charges brought against security officials.

The public military trial of 77 army and police officials accused of the June 1986 killing of 124 inmates at the Lurigancho prison in the aftermath of a failed Sendero uprising concluded in December with two convictions--and 75 acquittals due to "lack of evidence." Although police Colonel Rolando Cabezas Alarcon and a police lieutenant were sentenced to prison terms of 15 and 7 years respectively, none of the military officers implicated were convicted. The military justice code contains no specific language for dealing with cases of killing, kidnaping, or torture--only "negligence" and "abuse of authority."

The assassinations of Chamber of Deputies members Eriberto Arroyo Mio (April 27) and Pablo Li Ormeno (May 6) prompted the Chamber to establish a commission to investigate paramilitary activities. The commission's preliminary report was submitted in mid-August, "hypothesizing" that APRA party youths are the actual perpetrators of the bombings, murders, and threats being committed in the name of the CRF, with Minister of Interior Agustin Mantilla as the driving force behind the CRF. Commission members received a number of death threats; the daughter of commission member Manuel Piqueras was briefly detained by armed men who threatened her father. After the APRA congressional leadership declared the commission dissolved, the non-APRA commission members issued a final report in October, again implicating APRA and Minister Mantilla. The APRA members had not issued any separate report by year's end. Interior Minister Mantilla has resolutely denied any involvement in the CRF or similar groups. Although several suspects were detained and later released, by year's end no criminal charges were pending in connection with any actions undertaken by the CRF.

The CRF is also suspected in the January murder of Ayacucho journalist Juvenal Arroyo, along with his wife and two children. In April Tingo Maria radio personality Guillermo Lopez Salazar was shot to death in his home by suspected CRF terrorists. Sendero killed Peru's most prominent environmental reporter Barbara D'Achille in May. American journalist Todd C. Smith was kidnaped, tortured, and killed by unknown assailants in Uchiza, San Martin Department in November.

Miners Federation Secretary General Saul Cantoral was kidnaped and murdered by unknown assailants on February 13. Also in February, a demonstration of striking farmers in Pucallpa, Ucayali department (not then an emergency zone) was broken up by police who may not have known that last-minute approval had been given for the demonstration. Eight died and dozens were wounded after the police fired first tear gas and then bullets into the crowd. Some 300 persons were arrested; most were quickly released. Campesino organizers claim 28 remain unaccounted for and are presumed dead.

In late August and early September, several dozen bodies were found floating down the Huallaga river near Santa Lucia in the north central department of San Martin. Many of the bodies had been decapitated and were also missing hands and feet. Although no organization claimed responsibility for the deaths, public speculation centered on the possibility that the military had killed drug traffickers, Sendero members, or other civilians. Others pointed to the possibility of a war between rival drug gangs or to Sendero having killed traffickers or civilians. The inability of police or private human rights groups to ascertain responsibility for these deaths, much less arrest those responsible, is indicative of the level and variety of major violence prevalent in Peru today.

Since 1983 there have been an estimated 2,800 to 3,500 cases of disappearances involving the security forces, the majority of which occurred prior to 1985. Local human rights groups report having received formal complaints of 297 new cases of disappearances in the first 10 months of 1989, compared to the 170 cases reported by the United Nations Working Group on Disappearances in 1988. Most cases involved Army detention of persons suspected of terrorist links in the emergency zones, but there have been notable cases in Lima as well. Though a large percentage of those detained by security forces within the security zones have reappeared, human rights groups believe that most of the remainder were or will be summarily executed. The bodies of disappearance victims are rarely found. Based on the testimony of survivors, it appears that most victims are taken to military bases for interrogation. Some are turned over to the police after lengthy detentions and are later freed for lack of incriminating evidence. Human rights groups argue persuasively that the rest are summarily executed by the armed forces. An unknown number of "disappeared" persons are unaccounted for because they joined the ranks of MRTA or Sendero, either voluntarily or involuntarily.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the Constitution prohibits torture and inhuman or humiliating treatment, charges of brutality toward detainees are common. Human rights groups state that suspected subversives held by the Government are routinely tortured at military detention centers; lawyers and others familiar with the police and judicial system concur. In 1987 the Public Ministry noted that the majority of detainees held by military authorities showed signs of mistreatment or torture. In 1989 there were reliable accounts from released detainees of torture or mistreatment both by police and the military.

The 1987 terrorism law requires that persons detained for terrorism be interrogated only in the presence of a defense attorney and a Public Ministry prosecutor. In these cases, a court indictment must be sought within 15 days of arrest or the prisoner must be released. Reliable reports of violations of these standards occur frequently in areas governed by the military under a state of exception. There is some dispute as to whether under Peruvian law the military is required to adhere to these terrorism law requirements under a state of exception, but Peru is obliged to meet such standards under its international treaty obligations. In any event, the military frequently ignore these standards. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in 1989 regained some access to detainees in the military-controlled emergency zones and to police detention centers where interrogations occur prior to indictment.

Many victims of Sendero terrorism also show signs of having been tortured before death. Torture of those victims often follows a brief "popular trial," normally held in the presence of rural villagers as a method of intimidation. Sendero uses particularly brutal methods of execution, including slitting throats, strangulation, stoning, and burning.

Prison conditions are extremely poor, and prisoners are likely to experience unsanitary facilities, poor nutrition and health care, and ill-treatment by prison staff. Many prison cellblocks have reportedly fallen under Sendero or MRTA control, with guards refusing to venture into them.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution, the penal code, and antiterrorist legislation clearly delineate the arrest and detention process. However, most if not all of these protections are suspended in those areas under a state of emergency. In areas not subject to a state of emergency, a warrant approved by a Public Ministry prosecutor is required for arrest. Persons arrested must be arraigned within 24 hours, except in cases of drug trafficking, terrorism, or espionage, for which the limit is 15 days. Detainees have the right to choose their own attorney, or the Government must provide counsel at no charge. Arrested persons are entitled to have an attorney present when they make statements to the police. Under the 1987 terrorism law, police must also notify the detainees' family and human rights groups of an arrest, although in practice this is not consistently done. There is no bail or provisional liberty for persons accused of terrorism.

Arrest procedures are different in the rural emergency zones. The armed forces do not need an arrest warrant, and detainees are often denied access to an attorney during interrogation and to family members during their imprisonment. All detainees, including those in the emergency zones, have the right to seek judicial determination of the legality of their detention, but this right is routinely disregarded by military commanders in the emergency zones. Of the several thousand prisoners held by the military inside the emergency zones, human rights groups know of few who were turned over to civilian authorities for prosecution. Arbitrary arrests and detentions in the emergency zones in 1989 are estimated to be in the hundreds.

In 1989 the military continued the practice of detaining persons who enter the emergency zones to investigate human rights cases or to instruct citizens on their constitutional rights. Labor union organizers also often found themselves detained under the broad terms of the terrorism law. In the 3 days before the mid-August start of a miners' strike, at least 34 organizers were detained and charged with terrorism.

PERU

Another 10 were arrested the following week. By September 2, all had been released and charges had been dropped against all 44.

The Constitution prohibits, and there have been no known cases of, involuntary exile in the past 9 years. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is one of three separate branches of government. Supreme Court judges, 23 in all, are nominated by the President from slates supplied by an advisory committee, and must be approved by the Senate. In the Peruvian legal system, which is based on the Napoleonic Code, once criminal charges are filed, a judge determines whether probable cause exists. The judicial process prior to trial may last several months, followed by a public trial. Defendants have the right to be present at the trial, at which verdicts are rendered by a judge or a panel of judges. Sentences may be appealed, and judges may send cases back to lower courts for additional investigation. Many judges on the Superior and Supreme Courts are active in political parties, and there are occasional claims that decisions have been politically motivated.

Courts face severe backlogs, a product of inefficiency, influence peddling, and the sharp increase in terrorism cases. There are too few public defenders for the large caseloads. The Ministry of Justice reported in July 1988 that there was a backlog of nearly 45,000 criminal cases. Human rights groups have documented numerous cases of persons who have been detained without bail, while awaiting trial, for periods of up to 4 years. There are also widespread charges of corruption and the suborning of judges, police, and witnesses at all stages of the judicial process. Narcotics traffickers reportedly have been able to buy their release from jails. Outgoing Minister of Justice Cesar Delgado Barreto acknowledged in September that fully two-thirds of all prison inmates are awaiting trial for crimes of which they have been accused, with only one-third having been judged, found guilty, and sentenced.

Threats and intimidation of judges handling terrorism cases represent a serious problem, accounting in part for the low conviction rate of accused terrorists. Barely 5 percent of those arrested for such actions are convicted, a notoriously low rate that leads to police frustration with the judicial process and to public tolerance of police abuses (this figure does not include those held in military facilities inside the emergency zones). In 1987 Congress created special tribunals to hear terrorism cases, and promised greater security measures to protect judges and witnesses. There were immediate problems with finding judges who were willing to serve on these courts, with providing the guarantees of safety required in the enabling legislation, and with the large backlog of cases. Overwhelmed by these problems, the special tribunals were abolished in April 1988. There continues to be criticism of the lack of cooperation between the Interior Ministry's technical police, who investigate and arrest, and the Public Ministry prosecutors, who conduct their own investigations as a part of the trial process.

Although the Constitution mandates that civilians be tried in civilian courts, President Garcia proposed in July 1989 that civilian terrorists be tried by military tribunals throughout the country, both in and outside the emergency zones.

Although this proposal was not adopted, special civilian courts were established late in the year to try terrorism cases in Lima and the rural emergency zones. The Supreme Court decides whether military or police offenders are tried in civilian courts or in a separate military court system. The military generally asserts its jurisdiction in these cases, and the Court typically rules in its favor. In the first attempt to have a civilian court try a military officer since 1986 (that case was thwarted when the officer fled the country), nine army personnel, including at least one officer, are to be tried in Sullana, Piura department, for the April 1989 murder of Army Sgt. Jorge Yanez Ceci after a round of drugs and drinking. The civilian courts are making slow progress on several cases involving alleged police violations of human rights. Ongoing cases include those against police charged in the 1981 killing in detention of Cusco University student Marco Antonio Ayerbe, the 1982 killing of prisoners in an Ayacucho hospital, the 1982 death of Francisco Nufflo, and the 1986 torture of detainees in a Cusco police station. Two police officers (of 71 police on trial) were sentenced to prison in December 1989 for their roles in the June 1986 Lurigancho prison massacre (Section 1.a.).

Military trials may be closed to the public at the discretion of the ruling magistrate, and little is known about specific cases. Although the military claims that human rights offenders are severely disciplined, no member of the armed forces has ever been convicted in either military or civilian courts for human rights violations. Cases reportedly still pending in military courts include charges against: a lieutenant for the 1985 murder of 69 persons in Accomarca; an officer for 3 1985 Huanuco deaths; and officers accused of summary executions in 1986 in Parco and Pomatambo. The military prosecutor asked for sentences ranging between 6 and 25 years against the 77 accused security force members (6 army officers, 20 police officers, and 51 police) accused of involvement in the June 1986 massacre of prisoners at Lurigancho prison. The prosecutor requested a 25-year sentence for police Colonel Roland Cabezas and 6 years for army General Jorge Rabanal. Cabezas received a 15-year prison sentence. Police lieutenant Jaime Oswaldo Marquina was sentenced to 6 years. All other defendants, including army General Rabanal, were found not guilty due to "lack of evidence."

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution stipulates that the police need a judicial warrant to enter a private dwelling, and this requirement is generally respected in practice. The requirement is suspended in the emergency zones, however, and security forces in those areas routinely conduct searches of private homes without warrants.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Approximately 1,748 combatants, including some 1,400 presumed terrorists, died in armed clashes in 1989. Previously the Government claimed to have killed 4,500 terrorists from 1980-1988, including 630 in 1988. Though the military may inflate these counts, confirmed killings of terrorists may also be underreported because Sendero attempts to retrieve all its casualties, including fatalities, after clashes with the military. Local human rights groups charge that a significant but unknown number of captured terrorists and innocent civilians were executed by the military. Sendero's disregard for the rules of war and humanitarian law are infamous. As AI reported in August, "the violent adversaries of the Government routinely torture, mutilate and assassinate their captives." Both Sendero and the military are known to have blocked passage of relief supplies and humanitarian assistance. The international relief organization Medicins Sans Frontieres suspended its efforts in the emergency zones.

Abuse of the rights of prisoners (able-bodied, wounded, and sick alike) was widespread by both security and terrorist forces. The military's violations of international norms ranged from the routine blindfolding of prisoners, to the frequent refusal to admit to holding certain persons in detention, to the less frequent summary execution of unarmed prisoners. Responding to a Sendero ambush of a military patrol, army helicopters on June 19 strafed a village near Aguaytia in the Upper Huallaga valley, killing or injuring an unknown number of civilians.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and the press. With 8 television stations, dozens of radio stations, and 15 daily newspapers in Lima alone, Peruvians have access to a very broad range of opinion and information. The media are highly partisan. The Government owns one of the two national television networks, a radio network, and three newspapers; APRA operates two newspapers, and close advisors of the President control a third. The independent media are quick to criticize any branch of the Government. Most major opposition parties boast their own newspapers, and opposition figures also have frequent access to the government media.

There were occasional and credible complaints of government pressure on the media and restrictions on journalists. However, there was no discernible trend in these incidents, nor did they constitute government policy.

Journalists were often barred from traveling in the rural areas of the emergency zones, and those who attempted to do so were occasionally detained by the military, although they were generally released within hours. There were also frequent complaints of police confiscation of video and photographic material of events the Government did not want publicized.

Police arrested Janet Talavera, the interim director of the pro-Sendero newspaper El Diario, in June. She was detained under the provisions of the legislation prohibiting "apologies for and encouragement of terrorism." Additional charges of committing terrorist acts were later filed; she was awaiting trial at year's end. Police raided the offices of El Diario on November 2, arresting a dozen workers and closing the paper. Nonetheless, it appeared irregularly for the remainder of the year, edited and printed clandestinely. Luis Arce Borja, the paper's permanent director, is also under indictment for "apologies for and encouragement of terrorism" and spent most of the year living in Europe. A local lawyer attempted to invoke the same statute against Cesar Hildebrandt, one of the country's most prominent journalists, who was at the time the editor of the influential magazine Si. Hildebrandt alleged that the move was orchestrated from the Presidential Palace. Whatever the truth, the move ultimately came to naught. The antiterrorism statute has been applauded by some journalists as necessary; others fear that it can be used to stifle press freedom.

Journalists were sometimes the victims of violence and threats. Four noted journalists were killed in 1989 (see Section 1.a.); the College of Peruvian Journalists reported that as many as 22 persons involved in the news media were killed. The owner of the Panamericana Radio and Television network, Hector Delgado Parker, was kidnaped by MRTA on October 4, and his bodyguards killed. MRTA announced Delgado Parker would be "tried" for unspecified "crimes against the people." There were also death threats against other journalists. The local ANSA correspondent temporarily fled the country in May after a reported threat.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These rights are expressly provided for in the Constitution and are normally respected in practice except in areas under a state of emergency (where the right of assembly is suspended). Public meetings in plazas or streets require advance permission, which can only be denied for reasons of security or public health. Municipal authorities usually approved permits for demonstrations in nonemergency zones. Many unauthorized demonstrations also occurred, and, for the most part, the Government dealt with them in a nonconfrontational manner. However, as opposition groups adopted more provocative and violent tactics, the Government often denied permits or broke up marches. Police resorted more often to clubs, tear gas, buckshot, and firetruck-mounted water cannons to disperse unruly or threatening crowds. At least eight (and possibly many more) were killed in February when police opened fire on a demonstration of striking farmers in Pucallpa (see Section 1.a.).

There are no particular restrictions placed on political activity by trade associations or professional bodies. Such organizations are permitted to, and routinely do, maintain relations or affiliate with recognized international bodies in their respective fields.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholicism predominates in Peru, and the Constitution formally recognizes the Church. The Constitution also establishes the separation of church and state and ensures freedom of religion and conscience. These rights are respected in practice. Members of minority religions encounter no government interference in practicing their faith or in exempting their children from religious instruction in public schools. Organized religions are free to establish places of worship, train clergy, engage in religious publishing, and proselytize. Foreign-born clergy are not barred from entry; rather, they constitute a significant presence, even within the dominant Catholic Church. Missionary organizations operate freely in the country.

PERU

Nonetheless, particular members of various religious organizations report having received death threats from Sendero, MRTA, or the CRF during 1989. Several religious workers were killed. These incidents appear prompted by the terrorist group's perception that a given individual's activities "strayed" from pastoral to political. Some religious officials fear, however, that Sendero is increasingly antagonistic to organized religion in general. They cite the December bombing of a Catholic church, increased amounts of Sendero vitriol directed against the church, a spate of killings of religious workers, and reports of death threats in some areas of the country against those who celebrate Christmas. MRTA bombed three Mormon churches, which it publicly accuses of having links to U.S. corporate interests.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for the right of free movement, and there are no political or legal constraints on foreign travel or emigration. Approximately 150,000 Peruvians emigrated to other nations in 1988, and similar numbers are believed to have emigrated in 1989. Departure taxes and passport costs, although substantially reduced at year's end, nonetheless constitute a prohibitive expense for millions of Peruvians.

Freedom of movement is legally suspended within the emergency zones and travelers may be detained by authorities at any time. Other domestic and international travel is not known to be restricted for political reasons. There have been no major resettlement efforts by the security forces in several years. Persons fleeing turmoil in other countries traditionally have been encouraged to return eventually to their country of origin or to emigrate to third countries, but have not been forced to do so. Involuntary repatriation occurs only in cases of persons accused of nonpolitical crimes.

Peru is a democracy governed by a freely elected president and congress. The political process is open, subject to monitoring by an autonomous National Elections Board, and elections are vigorously contested by parties ranging from conservative to Marxist. In the November 1989 municipal elections, for example, 10 political movements fielded candidates for mayor of Lima. Sendero Luminoso persistently sought to deny citizens their political rights--particularly in the more remote areas--by killing candidates and elected officials and threatening voters. Sendero leaders have repeatedly and publicly stated their intention to disrupt the 1990 presidential elections, just as they tried to disrupt the November 1989 municipal elections. By September 30, over 590 mayors and city aldermen elected in the general municipal elections of 1986 had been forced from their posts by terrorist threats or violence. Over 75 mayors and other municipal, district, and provincial officials were killed by Sendero during 1989. After Sendero assassinated Fermin Azparrent, the Mayor of Ayacucho City, on September 19, Sendero warned that any mayoral or city alderman candidate in Ayacucho who did not withdraw his candidacy within 24 hours would also be killed. All but one candidate withdrew (and he moved to Lima). A second candidate reentered the race the week of the election. Nationwide, 252 districts (12.5 percent of the total) fielded no candidates for municipal office.

Suffrage is both universal and mandatory for persons 18 to 70 years of age, except for active duty police or military, who are barred from voting or holding public office. Balloting is direct and secret. Although the fine for failing to vote was raised from $4 to approximately $50 (roughly equal to a month's minimum wage) on the eve of the November elections, the National Elections Board announced afterwards that the fine would not be enforced. Elections are held every 5 years for president and the two vice presidents, as well as for the Senate and Chamber of Deputies. The president is barred from running for consecutive terms of office. Elections for the nation's newly established regional parliaments are to be held every 3 years, at the time of the nation's municipal elections. Under the Constitution the Government is headed by a powerful executive. More than 95 percent of all new laws are enacted through unilateral presidential decrees. Nonetheless the legislature (currently also dominated by the APRA party) freely and openly debates government policies and does on occasion vote against government positions.

The political system, although legally open to all, is dominated by Peruvian males of European or mixed European and indigenous background.

Access by the ICRC to the emergency zones and to detainees which had been denied in mid-1988 was restored in early 1989 and ICRC personnel visited over 100 security detainees in September. AI last sent a formal delegation to Peru in November 1988 and was received by various members of the Cabinet. Outside of the emergency zones, the Government did not impede or restrict their access. In May 1989 AI forwarded a draft report to the Government for comment but did not receive a reply. AI published the report, "Peru: Human Rights and State of Emergency," in late August, noting that "grave violations of human rights" had increased throughout the previous 18 months. In November AI released a second report, "Caught Between Two Fires," charging that "torture, mutilation, 'disappearance,' murder, and rape have become a hallmark of the armed forces' 'campaign against terrorism.'" The Ministry of Defense issued an immediate, heated denial but did not further address the charges.

Local human rights organizations complain that they are limited by the military in their efforts to investigate human rights abuses in the emergency zones and that their requests to the Government for information are usually ignored. Although most groups state that they are usually not harassed or threatened by the Government, incidents continued to occur. In September three visiting human rights lawyers and five local residents preparing a seminar on constitutional rights were arrested on terrorism charges in San Marcos province of Cajamarca department. They were held for 2 1/2 days before all charges were dropped and the eight were released. Human rights groups also received threats from terrorist groups, mostly from Sendero, but also from the CRF. Due to violence and the specific threat of continued violence, a number of human rights and humanitarian assistance organizations were forced to close their offices in certain emergency zones during 1989.

A number of local private human rights organizations constitute the independent National Coordinator for Human Rights. These include the National Human Rights Commission, the Institute for Legal Defense, the Association for Human Rights, and the Catholic Church's Commission for Social Action. Other smaller groups work in the departmental capitals and other cities. These groups are generally credible observers, investigating and reporting on human rights abuses to the extent possible, regardless of the perpetrator.

In 1989 the Government repeatedly complained that both local and international human rights groups distort or exaggerate Peru's human rights problems. The Government's general unresponsiveness to specific inquiries, however, has done little to improve its credibility. Peru is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

The Constitution grants women equality with men, and laws on marriage, divorce, and property rights do not discriminate against women. Nevertheless, tradition impedes the access of women to leadership roles in major social and political institutions.

Spouse abuse is a chronic problem. Anecdotal police reports indicate that such abuse is increasing in frequency as the nation's political and economic frustrations grow. In late 1988 a special police center, staffed by policewomen, was established in Lima to provide legal, medical, and psychiatric assistance to abused spouses and children. A number of women's organizations and feminist groups are active in Peru.

Peru's large indigenous population and its small black population were also subject to pervasive social discrimination, although far less so than before the Velasco resolution of 1968. The former group, mostly speakers of Quechua, Aymara, and other native languages, traditionally has lacked access to public services. Peru is a classic case of differential development, with public investment traditionally focused on the coast, drawing migrants to the cities, especially Lima. Recognizing this fact, the Government has increased the flow of resources and services to poor, largely Indian, rural areas. Development efforts, however, have been impeded by the difficulty and cost of providing services to remote areas which are out of the mainstream of Hispanic culture, and by the continued disruption of these efforts by Sendero. As a result of current problems, as well as historic and continued prejudice, the economic and social needs of Peruvians of European ancestry continued to be met to a far greater extent than those of Peruvians of black, mixed, or pure Indian heritage.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for the right of workers freely to associate and form labor unions without previous authorization. In practice, however, there are legal restrictions on the right to organize (see below), and a requirement to register with the Ministry of Labor in order for the union to become legal and capable of performing its functions. Suspension or dissolution of labor unions is forbidden by the Constitution, but it can be done legally through the civil court system at the request of the union itself, or by cancellation of the union's registration by the Ministry. Unions may form industrywide federations which can, in turn, form confederations, all of which can be affiliated with international labor organizations. Private and public sector unions of workers performing the same type of work cannot join together as a confederation at any level. Police and military are proscribed from forming unions.

About 18 percent of the labor force is organized. Organized labor, however, is found in industries responsible for about 70 percent of Peru's gross national product. The majority of unorganized Peruvian workers are those in the countryside and those involved in the vast underground "informal" sector that work outside government regulations.

Although a significant percentage of Peruvian organized labor belongs to independent unions and federations, those unions with a political party affiliation are routinely manipulated to serve political interests.

The Confederation of Peruvian Workers is a member of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers and is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The Communist party-controlled General Confederation of Peruvian workers is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions and its Latin American organization, the Permanent Congress for Trade Union Unity of Latin America.

The Constitution provides for the right to strike "according to law." There is no strike law, however, even though Congress has considered various implementing bills since the Constitution was promulgated in 1979. By Supreme Executive Decree (which defines some strike behavior in the absence of a formal law), workers in the private sector must give 72-hour notice to the employer and the Ministry of Labor before going on strike. When direct negotiations between workers and employers break down, the Government intervenes and constitutes a tripartite (government, management, labor) board to review the situation. If no agreement is reached, the Government then weighs the overall economic implications of the employer's and the workers' positions and makes a decision (which can be appealed in the civil court system). The Government may then make a final offer which, if rejected, will open the way for declaring the strike illegal. A government determination that the strike is illegal can lead to the dismissal of workers or union leaders and permits employers to hire strikebreakers legally. Despite these restrictions, innumerable strikes, often wildcat in nature, did take place in 1989. There are no norms regulating strikes in the public sector and all such strikes were therefore open to legal challenge. In spite of the constitutional right to strike, nearly all strikes in Peru are declared illegal. However, the penalties on the workers who strike illegally are seldom implemented.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee on Freedom of Association, at its meetings in June and November 1989, considered at length several pending complaints against the Government of Peru. Among these complaints were allegations from several trade union organizations that the Government has used force to repress trade union demonstrations and strikes resulting in the injury and death of strikers and demonstrators, including the alleged murder of 88 peasants who were participating in a meeting; and, that it has violated trade union autonomy by searching union offices, detaining their leaders, and interfering in their organizations. The complaints also alleged that the Industrial Relations Bill and administrative actions of the Government violate the right to strike. The Committee deplored the violence, requested the Government to submit further information, and agreed with the union allegations regarding the Industrial Relations Bill.

By law, employers cannot discriminate against union members or organizers. In practice, however, union activists are sometimes harassed by employers who threaten to fire them, or who pay off the workers to leave the enterprise. (There were reported incidents during the year of more serious harassment of labor union activists, including arbitrary detention (see Section 1.d.), kidnapping, and killing (see Section 1.a.)). The workers can appeal their case through the Ministry of Labor or, in case a decision is not acceptable to both parties, through the civil courts. Throughout this process, which can be lengthy, the worker is kept on the company's payroll until a final legal ruling is obtained.

The right to bargain collectively is provided for by the Constitution, but there are restrictions on what can be negotiated. In the public sector, for example, only working conditions can be negotiated, and then only if the changes do not involve expenses greater than the funds already budgeted. In the private sector, collective bargaining can cover both working conditions and pay. Labor laws and regulations are applied uniformly throughout the country, including in an area of the Amazon Basin, granted in a Peru/Colombia border agreement, which is analogous to a free trade zone .

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits compulsory labor, and this is usually respected in practice. There have been reports of compulsory labor on plantations in remote areas of the country where law enforcement is all but nonexistent. Sendero has also been accused of forcibly recruiting peasants to either join its ranks or render support services.

In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts urged the Government to adopt pending legislation prohibiting practices which violate ILO Convention 105 on forced labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law prohibits the employment of children under 14 years of age. In the formal sector of the economy, the law allows for the employment of older children in some jobs, for a limited period of time, and for a curtailed workweek at full pay. According to a 1987 Senate report, however, 1.1 million children 6 to 14 years of age work. Unofficial sources estimate that about half a million children work in the Lima area alone. A June 1989 survey of 133 working children by the Agrarian University in Lima showed that 78 percent of them were between 10 and 12 years old. Some 40 percent sold assorted merchandise as street vendors, and 53 percent went to school only occasionally or not at all. One-third worked 7 days a week, and 57 percent of the total worked between 2 and 5 days a week.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor code provisions concerning conditions of work are routinely ignored for the majority of the working population. The code provides for an 8-hour day and an official 48-hour week for men, and 45 for women. There are government standards for health and safety by industry, but these are rarely enforced, either by the employer or the Government (which has no inspectors). Accidents are common, and there is usually no emphasis on prevention; once accidents occur, employers normally make compensation.

All workers are entitled to 30 days' paid vacation. Those in the private sector have to work a minimum of 260 days (excluding 30 days' sick leave) or forfeit their vacation. The minimum wage is increased regularly by the Government, but it continues to lag inflation. Equal to about $40 per month on the parallel market, the minimum wage is not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for a worker and family. However, many Peruvians are paid more than the minimum wage and many others supplement their income through multiple jobs and/or subsistence farming.

ST. KITTS & NEVIS

St. Kitts and Nevis is a small two-island state with a parliamentary democracy modeled after that of the United Kingdom. The Constitution provides the smaller island of Nevis considerable self-government, as well as the right to secede from the federation if certain enumerated procedures are followed. The country is governed by a prime minister, a cabinet, and a legislative assembly. The Governor General, with largely ceremonial duties, is the titular Head of State. The Constitution requires general elections at least every 5 years. Prime Minister Kennedy Simmonds and his People's Action Movement came to power in a coalition Government in 1980 and were returned to power after general elections in 1984 and 1989.

Security forces consist of a small police force, which includes a Special Service Unit that receives some light infantry training, and a small coast guard.

St. Kitts and Nevis has a mixed economy based on sugar cane and tourism. Most commercial enterprises are privately owned, but the sugar industry (the country's largest) and 85 percent of all arable land are owned by a state corporation. The approximate 1988 per capita gross domestic product was $2,534. Steady economic growth continued in 1989.

St. Kitts and Nevis maintained its good human rights record during 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Law enforcement authorities abide by the constitutional prohibitions against the use of torture or other forms of inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Family members, attorneys, and clergy are permitted to visit detainees regularly.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and detention, and this provision is respected in practice. The law requires that persons detained be brought before a court within 48 hours. There were no reported cases of exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides that every person accused of a crime receive a fair, speedy, and public trial, and these requirements are generally adhered to. The judiciary, a part of the Eastern Caribbean legal system, is highly regarded and independent. Final appeal may be made to the Queen's Privy Council in the United Kingdom. There are no military or political courts. Legal assistance is available to indigent defendants.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Neither the Government nor the police interfere arbitrarily in the private lives of individuals. Warrants are required to search private homes.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and of the press. The Government owns the only radio and television station on St. Kitts. There is a religious television station and a privately owned radio station on Nevis. The government-owned radio and television generally do not adequately publicize rallies and conventions held by the opposition political party.

St. Kitts and Nevis does not have a daily newspaper, although each of the major political parties publishes a weekly or biweekly newspaper. The papers are free to criticize the Government and do so regularly and vigorously. International news publications are readily available.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right of peaceful assembly. Organized demonstrations, rallies, and public meetings sponsored by political parties occur regularly. Usually these take place without government interference.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for the free exercise of religion, and religious practices are not restricted. Most church members belong to Protestant denominations. All groups are free to maintain links with coreligionists in other countries.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel inside and outside of the country is unrestricted.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens are able to change their government by peaceful means. A vigorous multiparty political system exists in which political parties are free to conduct their activities. Periodic elections are held in which all citizens 18 years of age and older may register and vote by secret ballot.

The People's Action Movement (PAM) of Prime Minister Kennedy Simmonds holds a majority of seats in the Parliament. PAM has worked closely with the Nevis Reformation Party of Nevis

ST. KITTS & NEVIS

Premier Simeon Daniel. In the March 1989 national election, the two parties won 8 of 11 elected seats in Parliament. The former head of the main opposition St. Kitts Labour Party, Lee Moore, charged before the elections that PAM had used fraudulent ballots to help insure its 1984 victory and was prepared to employ fraud to maintain its majority in the 1989 elections, but he presented no credible evidence to indicate that the elections were not conducted in any other than a free and fair manner.

No international human rights organization maintains an office in St. Kitts and Nevis. The Government is firm in its respect for human rights.

There were no reports of systematic discrimination based on race, sex, creed, language, or social status. The role of women in society is not restricted by law. However, the role of most women in the country is still circumscribed by culture and tradition. The Government created the Ministry of Women's Affairs to help redefine the role of women in society and to ensure that women's rights are promoted. According to a Ministry official, violence against women is a problem in St. Kitts-Nevis, but gauging the extent of the problem is difficult because many women are reluctant to file a complaint or pursue their complaints in the courts. Despite this reluctance, there were publicly reported cases of both domestic violence and rape in 1989, and a number of convictions. According to the Women's Affairs Ministry, the police stand ready to investigate allegations of violence (both domestic violence and rape) but may be cautious about going to court, because many women eventually withdraw their complaints. If the woman pursues the complaint, enforcement by police and courts is effective. Penalties range from fines to long-term imprisonment, depending on the gravity of the offense.

The Women's Affairs Ministry sent a ministry official to the United States in 1989 for training in counseling abused women. A policewoman was also sent to the United States for the same training, and now heads a special unit dedicated to abused women. The Ministry also sponsored a workshop on child abuse with an expert on domestic violence, which was attended by police, clergy, teachers, community workers, and guidance counselors. Ministry officials met regularly with police to increase awareness of the problem of violence against women, and also ran a 3-day radio program on the problem of domestic violence.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for the right to form and belong to trade unions. The major labor union, the St. Kitts Trades and Labour Union, is affiliated with the opposition St. Kitts Labour Party and is organized in all sectors of the economy. Membership appears to be declining, as the Government assumes some of the social welfare roles formerly played by unions.

ST. KITTS & NEVIS

There is also an independent teachers' union and a union representing dockworkers in the capital city.

The right to strike, while not specified by law, is well established and respected in practice. There were no major strikes in 1989, although workers on a public highway project held a brief work stoppage to obtain a holiday pay concession, which was granted. Unions are free to affiliate with federations, confederations, and international bodies, although St. Kitts is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right To Organize and Bargain Collectively

Labor unions are free to organize and to negotiate for better wages and benefits for union members. There are no areas where union organization or collective bargaining are discouraged or impeded. There is no legislation governing organization and representation of workers, and employers are not legally bound to recognize a union, but past practice has been for employers to do so if a majority of workers polled wish to organize. The Labor Commission attempts to mediate in disputes between labor and management on an ad hoc basis.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution forbids slavery and forced labor, which do not exist in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum legal working age is 14. The Labor Ministry relies heavily on school truant officers and the Community Affairs Division to monitor compliance, which they do effectively.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The workweek is 40 hours in 5 days. Workers are guaranteed a minimum vacation of 2 weeks. Minimum wages for domestic servants and retail store employees were established by law in 1984 and updated in 1989. These range from about $24 per week for a shop clerk to $36 per week for a maid and $60 for a shop supervisor. The minimum wage would provide an adequate, though Spartan, living for the wage earner and family. Wages may be supplemented by the widespread practice of keeping small animals (goats, chickens). Most people live in extended families where there may be more than one wage earner. The Labor Commission undertakes regular wage inspections and special investigations when complaints are received; employers found in violation are required to pay back wages. While there are no specific health and safety regulations, the factories law provides general health and safety guidance to labor ministry inspectors.

ST. LUCIA

A member of the Commonwealth of Nations, St. Lucia is a multiparty, parliamentary democracy. For much of its 10 years of independence, St. Lucia has been led by incumbent Prime Minister John Compton. Compton's United Workers Party defeated the St. Lucia Labor Party in the 1982 elections; Compton was reelected in 1987, and the United Workers Party currently holds a small majority of seats in Parliament. The opposition Labor Party actively seeks to expand its bases of support; elections are next due in 1992 but can be called earlier by the Prime Minister.

The Royal St. Lucia Police is the only security force in the country. Within the police force is a small Special Service Unit (SSU) with some paramilitary training. A coast guard unit has also been established under police auspices. A police inquiry in 1988 dealing with allegations of corruption resulted in the ouster of the Police Commissioner and several high-ranking officers. Trinidadian Clive Sealy, the new Acting Commissioner, has worked diligently to improve operations and restore corps morale. The police have traditionally demonstrated a high degree of integrity, professionalism, and respect for human rights.

St. Lucia has experienced several years of sustained economic growth, particularly in agriculture, tourism, and, more recently, in manufacturing and construction. Economic performance in all four sectors was strong during 1989. Although an unemployment rate of around 15 percent remains a source of potential instability, the situation has improved in the last year.

St. Lucia continued to have a good human rights record in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances or politically motivated abductions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution specifically prohibits torture, and no such incidents were reported.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government adheres to the constitutional provision prohibiting arbitrary arrest or imprisonment and requiring a court hearing within 72 hours after detention. There were no reports of arbitrary arrest or other forms of extralegal detention, or of forced exile in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

ST. LUCIA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution requires public trials before an independent and impartial court, and the provision of legal counsel for indigents. Criminal defendants are entitled to select their own legal counsel, are presumed innocent until proven guilty, and have the right of appeal. Both constitutional and statutory requirements for fair public trials are followed. The regional West Indies Court of Appeal, a circuit court long noted for its impartiality, serves as St. Lucia's appeals court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reports of arbitrary intrusion by the State into the private lives of individual citizens. Authorities consistently observe constitutional prohibitions against arbitrary search, seizure, and entry.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional provisions for free speech and press are respected in practice. The Government neither interferes with the operations of the press nor censors the content of the three privately owned major newspapers, which cover the spectrum of political opinion and are often highly critical of the Government. The one local television station is also privately owned. While Radio St. Lucia is government owned and operated, the programming staff is allowed a large measure of autonomy following a 1988 incident in which the Government suspended a controversial radio call-in program. This provoked a public outcry. Although the program in question was never reinstated, the programming staff was subsequently permitted a greater degree of programming autonomy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of association and of assembly are provided for by the Constitution. Permits for public meetings and demonstrations are necessary if meetings are to be held in public places such as streets, sidewalks, or parks. Permits are routinely granted and are not denied for political reasons. Refusal to issue a permit is rare and generally stems from the failure of the organizers to request a permit in a timely manner, normally defined as a 48-hour notice. In one instance in 1989, police peacefully disbanded a group of demonstrators in front of the House of Assembly for failing to obtain a proper demonstration permit. This was the only incident of this type in several years.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The majority of the population is Roman Catholic, but other denominations are free to maintain places of worship, train clergy, establish religious schools, and engage in the full range of activities normally associated with religious organizations. St. Lucia's small Protestant community functions without impediment.

ST. LUCIA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are provided for in the Constitution and generally honored in practice.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

St. Lucia's parliamentary system provides for genuine choices among parties, policies, and officials. Although currently there are two main parties, several other political organizations also participate in free elections, which are held at least every 5 years by secret ballot. The opposition St. Lucia Labor Party plays a significant role in the country's political life, and presently holds 7 of 17 seats in the House of Assembly.

There are no local human rights groups in St. Lucia. International human rights organizations filed no reports or requests for investigations in 1989.

Government policy is basically nondiscriminatory in the areas of housing, jobs, education, and advancement opportunities. There are no legal restrictions on the role of women or minorities.

Although violence directed specifically against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, is not considered to be a major problem in St. Lucia, lack of statistical data makes it difficult to gauge its true extent. An additional factor may be a reluctance on the part of some victims to report cases or to press charges. In 1989 a women's rights organization was established to monitor existing abuses. The group has held a number of public meetings to publicize the plight of battered women, and staged a large demonstration to protest the killing of a woman who was beaten to death. Because cases of this sort are rare, the Government does not consider additional legislation or other specific remedial action to be necessary but does support the efforts of the monitoring group.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution, under the broader rubric of the right of association, specifies the right of workers to form or belong to trade unions. Unions are independent of the Government and are free to choose their own representatives. Union elections are sometimes vigorously contested. All unions are free to publicize their views and determine policies aimed at representing members' interests.

One recently formed union, the Technical and Allied Workers Union (TAWU), led by St. Lucia Labor Party Deputy Peter Josie, has experienced difficulties with the Registrar of Trade Unions and may be deregistered for failure to comply with government regulations (the Trade Union Act). There have been no suggestions that the difficulties are a result of discrimination or political considerations. To the extent the Government plays a role in trade union activities, it has been in the direction of supporting initiatives promoting national trade union unity. During 1989 the Government succeeded in negotiating a 6-year wage agreement with five unions representing public servants, resulting in an unprecedented period of harmonious government-labor relations.

Strikes in the private sector are legal if efforts sponsored by the Government to resolve disputes fail. Strikes do occur in practice. A strike by nurses was resolved in late 1988; there were no strikes in 1989.

Unions are free to affiliate with international organizations, and some have done so. St. Lucia has ratified International Labor Organization Conventions 87 and 98 pertaining to freedom of association and collective bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions are legally free to engage in collective bargaining and they do so. Unions represent the majority of wage and salary earners. Antiunion discrimination by employers against union members is prohibited by law, and there are effective mechanisms for resolving complaints. Union organizing and collective bargaining are neither legally nor administratively discouraged in the industrial free zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is illegal in St. Lucia and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum legal working age in St. Lucia is 14, as stipulated by the Women and Young Persons Act. The law is enforced effectively by Labor Ministry officials.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Although no minimum wage is established by law, a government-sponsored Wage Council reviews wage rates in different sectors and offers wage recommendations which generally are accepted as having the force of law. The workweek is 40 hours in a 5-day period, and workers are guaranteed a minimum annual vacation of 2 weeks. Occupational health and safety regulations are relatively well developed. The Labor Ministry periodically inspects health and safety conditions at places of employment under the Employees Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1985. The act is enforced through threat of closure of business if violations are discovered and not corrected.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

Since independence in October 1979, St. Vincent and the Grenadines has retained the parliamentary system of government it inherited from the United Kingdom. Democratic institutions and respect for the rights of the individual are well established. After defeating the incumbent St. Vincent Labor Party in 1984 elections, James F. Mitchell and his New Democratic Party won all 15 seats in the Parliament in general elections held in May 1989. Although some concern was voiced about the absence of any parliamentary opposition, the elections were judged to be free and fair.

The Royal St. Vincent Police is the only security force in the country. The Coast Guard serves under Police command, and a small Special Service Unit (SSU) with some paramilitary training has been established within the police force. The force, which is controlled by and responsive to the civilian government, maintains traditions of professionalism which place a high value on respect for human rights.

One of the poorer countries in the region, St. Vincent has a very young population, a relatively high rate of illiteracy, and serious unemployment problems. After several major setbacks in recent years (primarily due to poor weather), the nation's economy, centered on the vital banana industry, has largely recovered. Banana exports boomed during 1988 and the first half of 1989, but diversification to other export crops had only limited progress.

The country's human rights record remained good in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by the Constitution, and there were no reports of such practices.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

According to the Constitution, persons detained for criminal offenses must be provided legal representation and have their cases reviewed periodically. The Government strictly adheres to these provisions.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for public trials before an independent and impartial court. Criminal defendants are entitled to select their own legal counsel; alternately, counsel may be provided by the court. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty and can appeal cases to a regional high court system and ultimately to the Privy Council in London.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reports of arbitrary search and seizure or other government intrusions into the private life of individual citizens in 1989. The Constitution prohibits such actions.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and of the press. The Government does not censor or otherwise interfere with the operation of the press. There are two major newspapers and numerous smaller, partisan publications; all are privately owned, and most are openly critical of the Government's policies. In 1988 the government-owned radio station canceled a program which the Government considered provocative; however, the station, with the Government's approval, agreed to reinstate the program late in 1989.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are provided for in the Constitution and respected in practice.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

All religions are free to practice and proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are provided for by law and honored in practice.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Notwithstanding the New Democratic Party's clean sweep of all 15 parliamentary seats in the May 1989 elections, St. Vincent still has a genuine multiparty political system, with at least four active parties. Although the "first past the post" system tends to mask the degree of support for various contenders, in the last election the opposition garnered over 30 per cent of the vote. Constitutionally, elections must be held at least every 5 years, by secret ballot, with universal suffrage.

Opposition political groups and the Vincentian press occasionally comment on human rights matters of local concern. The Government is responsive to public and private inquiries on its human rights practices. Until late 1989, the small Caribbean-wide human rights monitoring group CARICARE was based in St. Vincent. However, the organization moved to Trinidad for better access to transportation and communication facilities.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

The Constitution provides for equal treatment under law regardless of race, sex, or religion, and the Government adheres to this provision. This year the Government took a significant step forward in terms of wage scales for women, adopting for the first time in a new minimum wage law the concept of equal pay for equal work.

Violence against women occurs in St. Vincent but does not appear to be characteristic of Vincentian society, according to such sources as the director of St. Vincent's National Council of Women, several government officials, and local lawyers who handle such cases. The Vincentian newspaper also reports all court cases and known incidents of violence. Penalties for violent crimes against women are identical to acts of assault perpetrated against men. For rape, depending on the magnitude of the offence and the age of the victim, the penalty is generally 10 or more years in prison. However, the House of Assembly in 1989 was considering legislation specifically addressing penalties for violent acts against women. During the year, there were two convictions for rape, as well as several others for assault against women. Although some victims of such violence, especially domestic violence such as wife beating, are reluctant to report it or to press charges, in the past few years women have been increasingly willing to report such incidents to the police and the National Council of Women. The Government's Ministry of Education, Youth, and Women has a Women's Desk which assists the National Council of Women with seminars, training programs, and public relations. The Government provides some funding for the National Council of Women and has been supportive of radio call-in programs dealing with women's issues.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

By law, Vincentians have the right to form unions, organize employees and strike; laws of association are generally respected in practice. Unions are independent and personal and property rights of trade unionists are given full protection under the law. With the partial recognition of the St. Vincent union of teachers this year, the overall proportion of the unionized labor force has increased slightly from the approximately 15 percent level in 1988. Unions may form or join federations or confederations. Unions are free to affiliate and do affiliate with international labor bodies, and both the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions have affiliates in St. Vincent.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There are no legal obstacles to organizing unions; however, employers are not legally bound to recognize a particular union as an exclusive bargaining agent. The law prohibits antiunion discrimination by employers against union members and organizers. Fairly effective mechanisms exist for resolving complaints. In 1989 the National Workers Movement achieved a recognition agreement with one foreign-owned firm after a brief strike and the personal intervention of the Prime Minister. At the same time the Public Service Union has not yet attained recognition because it still has not reached the necessary 50-percent membership of civil service employees. There are no sectors or areas, including export processing zones, where union organization and collective bargaining are legally or administratively discouraged or impeded.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is illegal in St. Vincent and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

By law 15 years is the minimum working age; this provision, which is monitored and enforced by the Ministry of Labor's Labor Inspection Office, is generally respected in practice.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The workweek is 40 hours in 5 days. Workers are guaranteed a minimum annual vacation of 2 weeks. Minimum wages, which are set by law for economic sectors, were raised substantially in 1989. The main impact has been in the small manufacturing sector, where daily rates almost doubled from $3.85 to $7.40. This was the first increase in the minimum wage since 1982. To date the impact on employment has been slight; several firms have reduced their work force, but only one company has closed due to the higher wage bill. Many minimum wages are not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for workers and their families, but most workers earn more than the minimum. Informal arrangements covering occupational safety and health do exist, but the Government has made little progress in converting these into law.

SURINAME

Suriname returned to constitutional democracy in 1988 following 8 years of military rule. The governing three-party coalition, the National Front for Democracy and Development, has a large majority in the popularly elected National Assembly. The Government's composition reflects Suriname's ethnic divisions by including political parties representing each of the country's three largest racial groups, the Hindustanis (Asian Indians), the Creoles (generally the descendants of emancipated slaves), and the Javanese. The Presidency is held by a member of the Hindustani party, while the Vice Presidency is filled by a leader of the principal Creole party. Both officers are chosen by the elected National Assembly.

The Surinamese military, whose influence had diminished following the return to elected government, has reestablished itself as the dominant political force in the country. In contrast to the first year of Front Government, no military men hold civilian government positions, but reports of apparent harassment by members of the security services continue. The military remains the most important threat to the future health of Suriname's democracy. Throughout the year, Surinamese military leaders acted to forestall government actions with which they disagreed on issues affecting their perceived interests. For example, they carried out a well-publicized campaign against a peace agreement reached in July at Kourou, French Guiana, designed to end 3 years of debilitating maroon insurgency in the interior. (Maroons are the descendants of escaped slaves who fled to the interior several centuries ago.) Despite a government announcement of the end of a state of emergency in the interior, travel and the shipment of food and medicine outside the capital remain restricted by the military, and maroon refugees in French Guiana and displaced persons in the capital are still afraid to return to their traditional territories because of possible military retaliation. In June the Government passed an amnesty law which provides a general pardon for military and rebel actions taken since January 1, 1985.

The Surinamese economy enjoyed a limited resurgence in the first half of 1989, even though the civilian Government had made few significant economic policy changes. Real gross domestic product rose strongly, due primarily to a significant recovery in the key bauxite sector which traditionally accounts for 70 to 80 percent of foreign exchange earnings.

In the aftermath of the military era, Suriname's human rights situation continued its spotty improvement. The press offered a forum for the robust expression of all shades of opinion and, to an increasing extent, journalists were more willing to criticize the military. The state-owned news agency became somewhat less blatant in propagating the military's viewpoint. While competing for political influence with the military, the Government was slow in implementing the Constitution which was overwhelmingly approved by the population on September 30, 1987. Not until mid-1989 were representative assemblies formed at the province and subprovince level, and by year's end they had not yet become active. Only a few of the 120 new laws required to implement the Constitution had been passed by the Assembly, and the constitutional court which will interpret the Constitution and rule on human rights issues was not yet established. Although the "state of emergency" was abolished by National Assembly action in September 1989, the Government had taken no steps to deprive the military of such "emergency" powers as investigation and detention of civilians, issuance of visas, and supervision of customs and immigration at airports and harbors.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There was one credible report of a politically motivated killing in 1989. A man filmed by a television crew carrying an antimilitary placard in a demonstration in the town of Moengo was forcibly removed from his home on October 30, several weeks after the demonstration, and shot dead by masked men. The incident occurred during a raid by Amerindian insurgents on the town, which had been occupied by maroon insurgents. Independent observers believe the killers were Amerindian insurgents.

In December unknown assailants made an attempt on the life of Suriname's most prominent human rights activist, Stanley Rensch, at his home. Rensch subsequently left the country.

An amnesty law covering acts committed by the military and rebels during the period January 1, 1985, to a date to be fixed by the president (as yet undetermined), was passed by the National Assembly in June. There is an exemption for crimes against humanity, which are to be determined by the Attorney General in accordance with relevant international conventions. At year's end, the law still awaits steps by the executive branch for its implementation.

Two suspects accused of murdering supposed regime opponents during the years of military rule won acquittal on narrow technical grounds. Both suspects are closely connected to the Army. Government prosecutors indicated an interest in bringing charges in one of the cases again, but by year's end no date had been announced.

The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) is conducting investigations into the December 1987 killings of 7 maroons at the village of Pokigron and the November 1988 death while in military police custody of a Surinamese citizen who had just returned from the Netherlands. Government representatives announced their willingness to cooperate with the investigations. In September the IACHR held a hearing on the Pokigron case; further consideration by the IACHR was deferred until the next session of the commission in 1990.

Credible indications of disappearances were few in 1989. Human rights activists and the press noted that in several instances, maroons in outlying areas were detained by the military authorities under state of emergency regulations. One such incident reportedly took place in February and a second in June. In both cases, the detainee was eventually released.

SURINAME

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no indications of a systematic pattern of mistreatment, but there was a sharp rise in the number of reported instances of police brutality. Several police officers were punished administratively in May for beating a suspect arrested earlier in the year. The press reported also that police officers severely beat a suspect detained in connection with a drug investigation in July. Another press report noted that a man detained in September after a traffic mishap was beaten. A human rights organization claimed that a police officer publicly pistol-whipped a man during a late July soccer match and that a maroon arrested in mid-August received harsh treatment before being released.

Credible sources charged that in May and September persons entering and leaving the international airport were subjected to humiliating strip searches by military police, who still control that facility. The May incident involved a family returning from Holland in which several female members were detained several hours for reasons which were never explained. A human rights activist leaving the country in August was also strip searched by military police before being permitted to depart. The activist's organization had considered legal action against the Government but had not taken any steps by year's end.

According to law, a person suspected of committing a crime for which the sentence is longer than 4 years may be detained for investigation for up to 10 days before being brought before a judge to be charged. The detention may be longer only if the judge decides there is sufficient evidence to support the charge. There is no provision for bail during this period.

There were four apparent instances of arbitrary arrest in 1989. In late April and early to mid-May, military police detained several persons for suspected involvement with the Jungle Commando, an insurgent group in the interior. Two of the detainees are recognized leaders of the human rights community, the third is a medical doctor involved with the provision of care in the interior, and the fourth is a civil servant. The detainees underwent 4 to 6 hours of rigorous questioning before gaining their release after expressions of concern by the public and diplomats. The authorities did not bring charges against any of those detained.

Exile is not used as a method of political control. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for an independent judiciary and the right to fair public trial in which the defendants have the right to counsel. Indigents generally have access to free or low-cost legal representatives. Civilian defendants before the military court do not receive public trials, but news of military court proceedings regularly appear in the press.

In late April, the military forcefully interfered with judicial procedure. A paramilitary soldier accused of involvement in a brutal 1986 massacre was removed from a civilian jail by an armed platoon on the grounds that the civil authorities had no power to arrest and try military personnel. A government commission set up after the incident to determine whether military or civilian authorities should prosecute the case had not reported its findings by year's end.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although the Constitution protects the right to privacy, there were frequent allegations concerning the monitoring of overseas telephone calls by security service personnel. The charges persisted despite the reported withdrawal in March of security service personnel from an office in the facilities of the state-owned telephone system. Airport military security personnel confiscated papers belonging to a departing Dutch human rights activist in August after he was strip searched (see Section 1.c.). Throughout the year, several labor and political officials reported harassment by anonymous figures. The officials believed the harassment to have been due to their peaceful opposition to the previous military regime.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

There were numerous reports of violations of humanitarian law in 1989, and many appeared to be credible. Following a lull of many months, conflict in the interior flared in April and continued through the summer until the signing of the Kourou peace agreement. One of the more serious violations of humanitarian law was discovered in April when residents of the maroon village of Pokigron fled to the capital bearing reports of the village's destruction. According to still confused accounts of what happened in Pokigron, it appears that elements of the maroon Jungle Commando insurgency torched the dwellings of villagers believed to be allied with the military and that in response other promilitary elements took similar action against Jungle Commando supporters. The persons displaced from Pokigron now live under difficult conditions in the capital.

Following the June start of an Army offensive in the area around Suriname's central reservoir, there were frequent reports of firing on unarmed civilians by military personnel. A human rights group charged that a helicopter fired on civilians on June 3 and on unarmed boats during the first week of June. Beginning in July, there were many credible reports of arbitrary restrictions on the amount and type of material which residents of the interior could bring in to the region. Foodstuffs and medicine were restricted most severely. These restrictions reportedly contributed to or directly caused the closure of medical posts in the interior and the death of several patients, including women, children, and infants.

In late August and September, armed Amerindians hijacked a small aircraft and held the pilot hostage for 1 month. Another group of Amerindians hijacked a ferry boat, killing a passenger in the process. Credible observers believe Amerindian actions are connected to or have been ordered by the military, and stem from military dissatisfaction with the Kourou peace process. The Army took no actions against the Amerindian insurgents, and military spokesmen publicly sympathized with their objectives and praised their tactics. The uprising of Amerindians contributed to a drastic deterioration in already inadequate medical care arrangements for the interior. One source noted publicly that the

Amerindians had taken custody of the only ambulance available in the Western Suriname settlement of Apoera and that the transport of patients from the interior to the capital for acute care had declined from around 95 per month to 6.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and of the press is protected by the Constitution. As during the first year of civilian rule, the Surinamese robustly exercised their right to criticize government policies. Opposing political views faced little or no restriction in gaining a forum, particularly in the print media. In contrast to the first year of democratic government, critics of the military were less reluctant to speak out.

The Surinamese print media are privately owned and include several church-owned newspapers. Most radio stations are also owned privately, but the State operates both a television and a radio station. The state-owned telephone company also operates a television station. Government restrictions generally prevent this station from broadcasting news and public affairs programming. Academic freedom is legally protected and appears to be protected in practice.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to assemble peaceably and to form associations for nonviolent purposes is protected constitutionally. These rights are respected in practice. Official registration is required in many instances and is generally granted. Most large public meetings require a permit, and these are granted routinely. Trade associations and professional bodies face no restriction on engaging in political activity or affiliating with international organizations.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of worship is respected in Suriname, a multicultural and multireligious society. Foreign clergy are allowed to administer to the needs of both local and expatriate congregations, and missionaries enter the country freely to proselytize. Organized religions are free to establish training facilities for their clergy. Religious groups maintained international contacts, freely organized trips abroad, and published periodicals.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Surinamese may change their residence and workplace freely, and may travel abroad as they wish. Although the authorities lifted the state of emergency which limited travel to certain interior districts on September 1, travel to the interior remains limited in practice, largely as a result of the precarious security situation. Troops at military checkpoints have repeatedly denied permission to travel into the interior, often on what appear to be arbitrary grounds.

Surinamese may emigrate without interference and may return to take up residence at any time. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons. There were no known instances in which refugees were forced to return to countries in which they fear persecution.

Some 6,500 to 7,500 Surinamese refugees remain in camps in French Guiana along the Surinamese border. Following the July signing of the Kourou accord, representatives of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees began preparations for their orderly return and opened an office in Paramaribo toward that end. Although many refugees have expressed an interest in returning to their traditional homes in Eastern and Central Suriname, few if any have done so. The refugees cite fear of the unstable security situation in their home region or retaliation by the military for suspected connections with the insurgency. During 1989 hundreds of maroons moved from the interior to Paramaribo and its southern outskirts, mostly because of Amerindian actions in their home areas.

Power and authority rests with the Surinamese people under the Constitution approved by popular vote in 1987. Among other rights, the Constitution provides for the right to change government peacefully through the direct election by secret ballot of a National Assembly of 50 members every 5 years. It also protects the existence of political parties. Opposition parties regularly present opposing views in the National Assembly, the mass media, and in public gatherings. Dissenting votes were cast in the National Assembly on a number of bills and on procedural questions.

There are no special conditions or restrictions on nationality or citizenship which limit participation in the political system. In practice, however, the less educated maroons and Amerindians from the interior are largely outside the political process.

Although the authorities have repeatedly expressed a willingness to cooperate with international and private human rights groups, there has been little progress in the implementation of these groups' recommendations concerning the investigation of past atrocities and disappearances. During 1989, representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross visited Suriname regularly and conducted a course for military personnel on the Geneva Convention and the laws of war.

In addition to the official National Institute for Human Rights (NIM), there are several other local human rights groups. The NIM was not particularly active during the year and appeared unable to secure much official cooperation for inquiries into such atrocities committed during the years of military rule as the late 1987 massacre at the village of Pokigron (see Section 1.a.). Private human rights groups were largely responsible for the collection of evidence on this and other incidents for use before the IAHR, which began an inquiry into the tragedy in September. Private groups in general are able to interview victims and report their findings, generally through self-produced publications but also to international and nongovernmental human rights groups. Moiwana '86, Suriname's best known human rights group, has faced repeated harassment. Following a December attempt by unknown assailants on the life of the group's founder, Stanley Rensch, and Rensch's subsequent departure from the country, the future of Moiwana '86 was uncertain.

Legally sanctioned discrimination is prohibited and is rare in Suriname's multiracial society. Ethnic consciousness remains strong among all groups, however. Maroons and Amerindians report the existence of unofficial discrimination. Such ethnic differentiation is in many cases the result of limited access to technical and higher education.

Women have a legal right to equal access to education, employment, and property. However, social pressures and customs inhibit the full exercise of these rights. In certain spheres, notably marriage and inheritance, civil law holds only limited sway. Thus Hindustani women (and men) must be over age 30 to marry without the permission of the family head. Maroon women cannot keep the estates of their dead spouses; all property and money pass to the tribe. There is no officially sanctioned violence against women. Surinamese law does not differentiate between domestic violence and general assault cases. Women's rights advocates do not consider violence to be one of the major problems they must address, but acknowledge that, due to the traditional practice among various ethnic groups of resolving instances of domestic violence within the community, violence against women could be underreported.

Section 6 Worker Rights

Suriname's Constitution protects the right of workers to associate and to choose their representatives democratically. This right is exercised energetically--about one-half of the total work force is organized. Unions are independent of the Government and play an active role in local politics. The right to strike is also protected by the Constitution. Although there were no major industrial strikes during 1989, labor officials have reported no instances of interference with the exercise of this right. A nationwide general strike on May 5, called to protest inaction by the Government concerning the economy and the maroon insurgency, provided a strong impetus to addressing these problems. The strike demonstrated the power of the labor movement, which has fully recovered from the havoc wreaked by the murder while in military custody of several prominent labor leaders in 1982.

Though not legally protected, strikes and other labor actions by civil servants are permitted in practice. There is an active process of consultation between civil servants and their employer. A 2-day strike by police personnel in April was resolved after the installation of a government commission to investigate police claims that the army had overstepped its bounds in forcibly removing a soldier from civilian custody (see Section 1.e.).

Surinamese trade unions are permitted to maintain contacts with regional and international labor associations. By 1989 the principal labor unions were represented in the democratic international trade union movement. The Moederbond, following a hiatus in affiliation that resulted from the events of 1982, was fully reinstated to membership in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). Two other Surinamese unions, C-47 and the Public Service Unions (CLO), affiliated with the ICFTU at the same time. Another union, the OASF, was affiliated to the World Confederation of Labor.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is explicitly recognized by the Constitution and was respected in practice in 1989. Collective bargaining agreements cover approximately 50 percent of the labor force. There are no special economic zones in Suriname, and labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country. Surinamese law prohibits antiunion discrimination by employers, and there are effective mechanisms for resolving complaints of such discrimination.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by the Constitution, and there were no known incidents of this practice in 1989.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age for employment of children is 15 years. The Ministry of Labor is responsible for enforcing this law. There were few complaints of violations in 1989, especially in the principal cities and towns. Persons under age 15 occasionally are employed as newspaper sellers and street vendors. Most such employment generally occurs after school hours.

There is no legal minimum wage in Suriname, but wages remain high by regional standards and provide workers with a decent standard of living. Work in excess of 8 1/2 hours per day or 48 hours per week on a regular basis requires special government permission, which is routinely granted. Overtime work is payable at a premium. Occupational safety and health regulations were fully in effect, and a number of workplaces were closed down during the year for noncompliance.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Trinidad and Tobago is a republic with a parliamentary form of government. Free and fair elections have been held at regular intervals since independence from Great Britain in 1962. Prior to December 1986, each election had been won by the People's National Movement (PNM). The election of the National Alliance for Reconstruction (NAR) Government on December 15, 1986 marked the first change of political power in 24 years of independence.

The Trinidad and Tobago police force is, generally, a capable and professional force. However, reports of abuse of authority and corruption and the filing of court cases against individual police officers continued during 1989. The legal system provides measures for redress for the complainant in such cases. Both the police and the Trinidad and Tobago Defence Force are under the control of and responsive to civilian authorities.

The country's mixed economy is based primarily on petroleum production and refining, but efforts continue to diversify the economy into agriculture, manufacturing, and tourism. Many major industries are either wholly or partially owned by the Government. There is a strong tradition of private enterprise and ownership of property, however, and the Government is endeavoring to sell several state enterprises, in whole or in part. The economy has suffered with the worldwide fall in oil prices, but Trinidad and Tobago continues to have a high standard of living.

Political and civil rights are provided for by the Constitution and are generally respected in practice. In the event of a presidentially declared public emergency, legislation may be enacted for limited periods that derogates from constitutional rights and protections unless determined by the Court "not to be reasonably justifiable" for the purpose of dealing with the emergency. There were no significant changes in Trinidad and Tobago's good human rights record in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated or other extrajudicial killings. In September 1989, several shots from a passing car were fired at a vehicle carrying the wife of President Noor Hassanali. The motivation behind the attack has not been determined.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution forbids such treatment, and any evidence obtained by such means is inadmissible in court. Torture is not practiced. During 1989 there continued to be credible allegations in the press and charges in the courts that individual police officers have mistreated persons under arrest. The law permits victims of such treatment to sue for civil damages and to file criminal charges against the individual police officer involved, and such suits are occasionally initiated. The courts often find in favor of the complainant, and police officers found guilty of misconduct are subject to disciplinary action. There is no evidence that police brutality or other misconduct is systematic or condoned by the Government.

The law requires a public coroner's inquest in any case of death by unnatural causes in which a coroner finds the circumstances warrant it. In 1989 there were 11 instances of persons being shot by police officers who allegedly were acting in the line of duty. In one instance a 14-year-old girl was shot, which raised questions as to whether the use of lethal force by the police was justified. Inquests were initiated, with heavy media and public scrutiny at the time. Some of the inquests in these cases have been completed while some have been delayed by court backlogs. One inquest in progress at year's end involved the death of a convicted prisoner, who was allegedly beaten to death in 1988 by prison guards after killing a guard. Police officers rarely are indicted following an inquest. The verdict is generally that the officer acted in self-defense.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution specifies that a suspect has the right to be "informed promptly" of the reason for arrest or detention. In practice, police usually charge a suspect within 48 hours, but there have been cases in which charges have not been brought for 4 or 5 days. Court orders may be obtained by the police to hold an individual longer than normal to gather more evidence. Arrests without warrant are permitted when a person is apprehended committing an offense or when reasonable suspicion exists that an offense has been or is about to be committed.

The law does not allow preventive or incommunicado detention. Persons arrested have the right to a judicial determination of the legality of their detention. Detainees generally are allowed access to a lawyer if one is requested, and to family members, but police sometimes deny access if they believe it would impede an investigation. There continue to be recurring charges in the courts and press that the police have violated one or more of these procedures in several cases. The courts, which monitor police practices in these matters, have found for the complainant in some but not all of the cases.

The Government introduced antidrug trafficking legislation in 1989 that included provisions for forfeiture of assets. Several of the bill's search and seizure provisions prompted concerns among lawyers, the media, and legislators that civil liberties would be infringed. The Government has sought to allay these concerns by amending the bill, which has not yet been adopted by Parliament.

The practice of exile is illegal and does not exist.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution specifies that accused persons receive a fair and public trial by an independent judiciary; appeals may be made to the Court of Appeals and eventually to the Privy Council in London. Under common law practice, defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence and the right to confront witnesses and present evidence. These rights are respected in practice.

All accused persons have the right to an attorney. Legal assistance is available from the Legal Advisory Board of the Ministry of Social Development and Family Services for persons who demonstrate that they cannot afford an attorney. An accused may be freed on bail pending trial unless charged with murder; the Presiding Magistrate may suspend bail after consultation with the prosecution and defense. Judicial officials have noted, however, that bail jumping is a common practice. Draft legislation proposed in 1988 by the Government to restrict or deny bail for certain serious criminal offenses was withdrawn by the Government for further study after much criticism from the media and the legal profession. The bill has not been reintroduced. Despite continuing attention by government officials and the Bar Association to the large backlog of cases awaiting trial or appeal, there remain significant delays in bringing cases to trial and in processing appeals.

There are no political prisoners in Trinidad and Tobago.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits such interference, a prohibition generally respected in practice. Warrants are required for searches.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of expression, and this right is protected in practice by the country's independent judiciary, a democratic and pluralistic political system, and independent and privately owned print media. Academic freedom is respected and is protected by law.

The import or circulation of publications may be prohibited under the Sedition Act if they are deemed to have a seditious intention. The law has been rarely invoked in recent years. A Board of Film Censors is authorized to ban films it considers to be against public order and decency or undesirable in the public interest. Within the past year, the Board's action came to public attention on one occasion when it banned "The Accused." The Prime Minister, acting under the Cinematograph Act, banned the showing in Trinidad and Tobago of "The Last Temptation of Christ."

Foreign exchange scarcities have reduced allocations to newspapers for the import of newsprint. One newspaper which is generally critical of the Government won a court case against the Government in 1989 after charging that the Government had unconstitutionally reduced the newspaper's foreign exchange allocation for the purchase of newsprint. The newspaper continues to claim that it is receiving discriminatory treatment with respect to foreign exchange allocations.

Trinidad and Tobago Television (TTT), the sole television station in the country, is government owned. Its coverage is generally unbiased, although the opposition has claimed that informational programming on government-sponsored activities, identified as NAR (the ruling National Alliance for Reconstruction) initiatives, gives the NAR an unfair political advantage. In recent years, the Government has received a few applications for the licensing of one or more privately owned television stations. No action has been taken on these applications to date.

One of Trinidad and Tobago's two radio stations is government owned, and the other is privately owned. Both are currently operating without licenses while the Government develops a telecommunications policy which will cover all broadcast media. A government draft telecommunications white paper circulated for public comment was criticized by media officials because of certain sections which pertained to government regulation. Those sections were thereafter deleted by the Government. Political opponents of the Government have argued that the presence of ruling party supporters on the executive boards of the government-owned radio station leads to the same political bias in broadcasting policy as they claim exists in TTT.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are protected by law and respected in practice. Registration of private organizations is not required. Permits are required in advance for street marches, demonstrations, or other public meetings, and these are normally granted, both to critics and supporters of the Government.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The right to practice one's religion is provided for by the Constitution and is respected in practice. There is no state religion and no religious test for public office. There are large groups of Christians, Hindus, and Muslims in the population, and these and other religious groups are allowed to maintain association with organizations and persons in other countries and to perform religious travel. Religious groups are free to establish places of worship and to engage in religious training, education, and publishing. Missionaries are permitted to enter the country and proselytize. Conversion from one religion to another is not hindered. Licensing of religious organizations is not required. (N.B. Parliamentary approval is not a requirement for incorporation of religious organizations as previously reported.)

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no arbitrary restrictions on emigration or travel either within or outside the country, nor on the changing of residence or workplace.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The citizens of Trinidad and Tobago choose their government by secret ballot in free and fair multiparty, multicandidate elections held, as required by the Constitution, at intervals not to exceed 5 years. Elections for municipal and county officials are held every 3 years and elections for the 12-member Tobago House of Assembly every 4 years. The Constitution allows citizens, as well as legal residents with citizenship in other Commonwealth countries, who are at least 18 years of age, to vote, and there are no restrictions on the participation of women in political activities.

The country is governed by a bicameral Parliament: an elected 36-member House of Representatives whose members represent single-member voting constituencies and a 31-member Senate whose members are appointed by the President, 16 on the advice of the governing party, 6 on the advice of the opposition, and 9 at the President's discretion. The Prime Minister, who is the Head of Government, is the member of the House of Representatives who commands the support of the majority of the House. The President, elected by Parliament, is the Head of State.

Opposition parties have contested every general election since party elections were begun in 1956, except in 1971 when the opposition chose not to participate. Several opposition parties combined in 1985 to form the NAR which, in the December 15, 1986, elections, won 33 of 36 elected Parliamentary seats. The PNM, which now forms part of the opposition, had until then governed since 1956. During 1988 the NAR expelled some of its prominent leaders, who in 1989 formed a third major party, the United National Congress (UNC).

An Amnesty International representative familiar with the area regularly visits the country on routine business, and the Government cooperates with these visits. Besides the judiciary, which acts on legal cases involving alleged human rights violations, there is an Ombudsman, an officer of the Parliament, who is empowered to investigate complaints of violations of law or policy and to report the findings to Parliament. There is also a nongovernmental Bureau of Human Rights, which was established by a local attorney and focuses on areas of interest and concern to him. Trinidad and Tobago is a party to the United Nations' international covenants on human rights.

In 1989, the Caribbean Institute for the Promotion of Human Rights relocated its headquarters to Port of Spain from St. Vincent. This regional organization is composed of respected Caribbean human rights activists who seek to collect information and report on Caribbean human rights matters.

There is no evidence of systematic official discrimination based on race, sex, religion, language, or social status in Trinidad and Tobago. All persons are fully protected under provisions of the Constitution. Trinidad and Tobago includes various ethnic and religious groups that live together peacefully, generally respecting each other's beliefs and practices. Nevertheless, relations between Afro-Trinidadians and Indo-Trinidadians, who each comprise approximately 40 percent of the population, are complex and at times tense. The private sector, which has long been dominated by Caucasians and Indo-Trinidadians, continues to be the bulwark of employment for these ethnic groups; at the same time, Afro-Trinidadians are employed in disproportionate numbers in some segments of government services, particularly in the police and military. Government cabinets have been predominantly composed of Afro-Trinidadians.

Women enjoy equality under the law. Many hold positions in the Government, civil service, political party leadership, business, and the professions. Women's groups speak out publicly and are heard on all aspects of public life. Women make up approximately 34 percent of the paid labor force, and collective bargaining agreements cannot be registered with the Industrial Court if they exhibit wage disparities between men and women.

Although there has been no definitive collection of data, it is generally speculated that as many as one in three women have suffered physical abuse from their spouse or other family member. The Government is concerned about this problem, as well as child abuse. Since 1987, a cabinet-appointed committee has been studying abuse patterns in Trinidad and Tobago, and its recommendations for governmental and private action are now before the Cabinet. There are several privately operated shelters for battered women in the country.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association is respected in law and practice. An estimated 22 percent of the work force is organized into 45 labor unions. The unions are independent of government or political party control, and they freely represent their members' interests. Union members are free to choose their own representatives, and unions are free to publicize their views and determine their own programs and policies. The majority of the unions are grouped into two labor confederations, the larger of which is associated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, while the other is associated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Workers are permitted, upon expiration of a conciliation period, to strike, and employers are permitted to lock workers out. After a strike or lockout has gone on for 3 months, either of the parties involved can request the Minister of Labor to refer the question to the Industrial Court, which is part of the independent judiciary, for a binding decision. Workers in two state-owned oil companies went on strike in 1989. Strikes and lockouts are not permitted in essential public services, and the Minister of Labor may apply for an injunction to halt any labor action he finds contrary to the national interest. This power has not been invoked since independence.

Workers in essential services with labor grievances may call on the conciliation services of the Ministry of Labor or may take their cases directly to the Industrial Court. They may also file civil suits against the Government.

The Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has for several years concluded that various aspects of the country's labor legislation, including those related to strike and binding arbitration procedures, are inconsistent with ILO Conventions 87 and 98.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The constitutional right of workers to organize and bargain collectively is well exercised. Antiunion discrimination is prohibited by law, and trade union property, as other private property, is protected under law. The Ministry of Labor acts as an impartial conciliator in collective bargaining impasses. There are a few complaints each year to the Ministry of Labor about private antiunion activities, usually involving a suspension or dismissal of an employee who alleges the action was taken in part because of union activity. The Ministry of Labor is generally able to resolve the cases brought to it.

During 1989, the Trinidad and Tobago Unified Teachers Association filed a complaint with the ILO against the Government for its 10 percent reduction of the salaries of public servants, calling it a violation of collective bargaining rights. The Government intends to respond to the complaint in accordance with ILO procedures.

The Parliament in 1988 enacted legislation to regulate the establishment of free trade zones. It is anticipated that wages and terms of employment in the free trade zones may be less favorable than the prevailing minimum standard, but the legislation provides for internationally accepted worker rights, including the right to organize and bargain collectively.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced labor in Trinidad and Tobago. Although there is no domestic legislation on this matter, Trinidad and Tobago is a party to the relevant ILO conventions. The ILO's Committee of Experts criticized provisions in Trinidad and Tobago's law which permits penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labor for breaches of discipline by seamen and other persons employed in certain public services.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Legislation prohibits the employment of children under the age of 12 years, and children aged 12 to 14 years are permitted to work only in family businesses. These restrictions are generally respected in practice. Education is compulsory until the age of 12 years.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no nationwide minimum wage rate. Most wages are covered under collective bargaining agreements and provide a decent living for workers and their families. The Ministry of Labor is studying recommendations regarding the institution of a nationwide minimum wage. Minimum wages and working conditions were, in the past, set by the Minister of Labor for three occupations considered difficult to organize into unions: gas station attendants, shop clerks, and domestic servants. That of shop clerks, for example, was $20 per week. This government wage order expired in 1984, however, and some employers now pay lower than the previous minimum wage. Because this minimum wage level is not considered enough to live on, minimum wage workers usually have secondary sources of support, generally from their families. Working hours are determined through collective bargaining agreements or other employment agreements. The standard workweek is 40 hours. Additional hours are considered overtime at a negotiated rate. Daily rest periods and paid annual leave form part of most employment agreements. There are no legal restrictions on overtime work.

Occupational health and safety is governed by the 1948 Factories Ordinance Bill, which sets requirements for health and safety standards in certain industries and provides for inspections to monitor and enforce compliance. The Government enforces compliance with health and safety regulations, although such enforcement is sporadic due to a shortage of inspectors. Trade union representatives also monitor compliance. A new occupational safety bill was prepared and sent to the Legislative Review Committee of Parliament, but there has been no action on the bill since 1986. Workers who file complaints with the Ministry of Labor regarding illegal or hazardous working conditions are protected under the Industrial Relations Act. Government inspectors investigate such complaints.

A severance and retrenchment law enacted in 1985 aims at providing improved severance benefits for laid-off workers. Controversial draft legislation to establish a severance benefit fund remained under Cabinet consideration at year's end.

Uruguay is a constitutional republic governed by an elected president and a bicameral legislature. On November 26, 1989, a free and fair presidential election took place for the first time since Uruguay returned to constitutional government in 1985 after 12 years of military rule. (The 1984 election was not completely free since the armed forces prohibited some politicians from campaigning.) Luis Alberto Lacalle of the National (Blanco) Party was elected President and will begin his 5-year term on March 1, 1990, succeeding Julio Maria Sanguinetti of the Colorado Party. Uruguay's judicial branch is independent, as is its legislature. Political parties, the press, labor unions, private interest groups, and other nongovernmental groups function freely, and political debate is vigorous and unrestricted.

Uruguay's small military establishment, consisting of an army, air force, and navy, is under the supervision of the Ministry of Defense. The military does not participate in domestic security matters unless ordered to do so by the civilian authorities. Domestic security and public safety matters are under the jurisdiction of the Interior Ministry, which administers all of the country's police departments.

Uruguay is a middle income country (with a per capita gross domestic product of $2,596 in 1988) whose economy is still heavily dependent on agricultural exports and agro-industry. After significant growth in 1986 and 1987, the economy slowed dramatically in 1988 and was not expected to rebound significantly in 1989. The slowdown is due to a reversal of the same trends which fueled growth in 1986-1987, such as increases in oil prices and higher international interest rates; declining domestic demand and investment; and a severe drought which seriously affected the agricultural sector.

During 1989 there were no credible reports of significant human rights violations. After the return to democracy in 1985, all political prisoners and even some nonpolitical ones received amnesty. The most important human rights event in 1989 was the referendum on the 1986 Law of Expiration, put forth by the Government under heavy pressure from the military, which effectively exempted military and police personnel from prosecution for human rights abuses committed during the military regime. Opponents of the law were able to have the issue submitted to a referendum, and on April 16 the law was upheld by a margin of 1,082,454 to 799,109 (57.5 to 42.5 percent of the valid votes cast) in a national plebiscite. In 1989 the Supreme Court, by a 3 to 2 vote, again upheld the Law of Expiration in cases challenging its constitutionality, but only after classifying it as an amnesty. The Government, to avoid offending the military, had avoided calling the law an amnesty.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No cases of politically motivated or other extrajudicial killings were reported.

URUGUAY

b. Disappearance

No cases of disappearance were reported during 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits brutal treatment of prisoners. In July 1989, the death of a laborer while in police custody led to charges of police mistreatment. The police maintained that the prisoner hanged himself in his cell. The resulting controversy led to the resignation of the Minister of the Interior, and a Deputy Police Chief was convicted of misconduct in connection with the death. There were no other reports of possible mistreatment of prisoners in 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires a written warrant for an arrest except in cases where the accused is apprehended during the commission of a crime. It also provides for the right to a judicial determination of the legality of detention and requires that the detaining authority in an arrest explain and justify to the judiciary the legal grounds for the detention. A prisoner has the right to counsel and the right to give a statement and appear before a judge within 24 hours of detention. The judge must begin the judicial process within 48 hours of arrest. Failure to comply with this 48-hour rule has led to the release of detainees. Bond is allowed in those criminal trials which could lead to a penitentiary sentence. Military justice is applicable to civilians only during a state of war or insurrection. These constitutional provisions are generally respected in practice.

The victim mentioned in Section 1.c. had been detained during a "razzia," a random police sweep of bars and nightclubs in which young adults are arbitrarily detained and held for short periods without charge. Following the conviction of the deputy police chief for deprivation of liberty in this case, the police have ended their practice of "razzias." Young adults involved in the "razzias" are the only persons known to have been subjected to arbitrary detention. Since the end of the military dictatorship, no Uruguayans have been forced into exile for any reason.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary regained its autonomy in 1985, and military officers appointed by the military regime to the Supreme Court or the Higher Appeals Court retired from those positions at that time. The law provides for two military justices on the Supreme Court, who participate only in cases involving the military. The Constitution requires that all trials must open with a public statement of the charge by the prosecutor or the complainant. However, Uruguayan court procedures require the lawyers' arguments to be submitted to the judges in writing, and these written statements are normally not made public. There is a parallel military court system under the Military Justice Code. Uruguay has no political prisoners.

Uruguay has a judicial system based on the Napoleonic Code. Under the provisions of the Uruguayan Penal Code, an arrested person may be held incommunicado by the police for a period of 24 hours. After 24 hours, the prisoner must be presented to a judge who, in turn, has an additional 24 hours to release the prisoner or issue a processing order which is based on evidence that the accused person could be responsible for a crime. When a processing order is issued, the prisoner then is given access to legal counsel, and if he cannot afford a lawyer, a public defender is appointed. If the crime carries a penalty of at least 2 years in prison, the prisoner is confined during the judge's investigation until the authorities agree to release him on bail, or until the case is closed. Trial proceedings are based on written arguments, and the defense attorney has access to all documents which form part of the written record. Under Uruguayan law, there is no provision against self-incrimination, and the defendant may be compelled to answer any questions to the judge.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the right to privacy. The home, absolutely inviolable at night, can be entered and searched only with a legal warrant during the day. Protection for private papers and correspondence is equally strong, and a warrant is required for confiscation. These rights and protections are well respected. Investigations of wiretapping during the military regime continue, but there has been no evidence of any such activity after March 1985.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press. All elements of the political spectrum express their viewpoints in both the print and broadcast media. Formerly proscribed organizations such as the Tupamaro Movement, which conducted terrorist campaigns in the late 1960's and early 1970's, and the Communist Party freely publish newspapers and operate radio stations. There are three nonaffiliated independent television stations and one public service government station. Montevideo has eight daily newspapers, and there are approximately 65 to 70 newspapers in the interior of the country (primarily weeklies). Uruguay has 23 FM and 87 AM radio stations, and 20 television stations. The only government-owned media outlets are one television station and one AM radio station.

In 1988 a conservative journalist was convicted for a second time under the 1984 criminal libel law. He remained free during 1989 pending appeal of the 6-month jail sentence which he received. Each of this journalist's convictions resulted from complaints brought by private citizens.

The National University is autonomous, and academic freedom is respected. University elections have been held three times since 1985, and student groups have resumed campus political activities. Most professors dismissed for political or ideological reasons by the military regime have returned to their positions, although a few cases continue under study.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are protected by law. Formerly banned groups, such as the Tupamaros, are free to organize and express their opinions. Public marches and demonstrations are allowed with permits from the Ministry of the Interior and occur without official harassment or intimidation. Persons denied citizenship rights by the military regime because of political affiliation or activity have had their rights fully restored.

There were numerous attacks, generally late-night vandalism but some cases of arson, against the offices of political and labor groups, primarily but not exclusively leftist. These incidents resulted in little damage and few injuries. No arrests were made beyond that of one ex-policeman, dismissed in 1983, who was identified by a witness to one of the attacks.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion, provided for by the Constitution, is respected in practice. Most Uruguayans who practice a religion are Roman Catholic. Members of other religions exercise their faiths unhindered, and missionaries are free to proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal and foreign travel and emigration are unrestricted. An estimated 300,000 Uruguayans left the country during the military regime, some for political and many for economic reasons. Programs exist for their repatriation, and Uruguayans who wish to return are encouraged to do so. All of the prominent political figures exiled by the military regime have returned.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The citizens of Uruguay have the right and ability peacefully to change the government. Uruguay is a multiparty democracy, with mandatory universal suffrage for those 18 years of age or older. Voting is not restricted by race, sex, religion, or economic status. The Colorado Party, the National (or Blanco) Party, a coalition named the Broad Front, and a coalition named the New Space are the four major political entities. Each allows ideological divisions within the party, and each such division may field its own slate of candidates for general elections. The Uruguayan electoral system combines a primary and general election in a double simultaneous vote. Each party fields different lists of candidates; in essence, voters express a preference for a list rather than an individual candidate, as well as vote for a party. The winning list of the party which gets the most votes wins the Presidency and a percentage of seats in the Senate and Chamber of Deputies corresponding to the percentage of votes that the party as a whole received. A party therefore may run multiple presidential candidates, each with his or her own slate of legislative candidates. National and provincial elections are held simultaneously every 5 years.

URUGUAY

The human rights performance of the Government since its return to democratic rule in 1985 has not been the subject of attention by international and local human rights organizations, with the major exception of their serious concern about, and opposition to, the Law of Expiration. The Government is open to inquiries from such organizations and does not restrict the activities of human rights investigators.

Local human rights groups, some of which could not operate openly under military rule, now function freely and without restriction. A prominent local human rights group, Peace and Justice Service (SERPAJ), was legalized in early 1985 after operating underground for 2 years during the military regime. SERPAJ investigates human rights issues, such as prison conditions and cases involving killing, torture, and disappearances which occurred during the military regime. An effort by SERPAJ to have the Senate deny promotions to 11 military officers it claimed took part in past human rights violations failed, and all 11 were promoted.

Uruguay has long been one of the most egalitarian countries in Latin America. There are few racial or linguistic minorities in the country. Nonwhites are disproportionately represented at the lower end of the economic scale, but this is not the result of legislation or official policy.

Uruguayan women enjoy equality under the law, but they face a number of forms of discrimination owing to traditional attitudes and practices. Pay is not always equal for men and women, especially in less skilled jobs.

Violence against women, including wife beating, exists, but until recently this problem received little publicity. It is believed, however, that wife beating is common and widespread. According to women's rights activists, abuse against women, especially domestic violence, has apparently always been common in Uruguay. Since the return to democracy in 1985, this problem has been receiving increased public and governmental attention. A government body called the Commission of Women receives complaints of abused women, and the penal code mandates a sentence of 3 months in jail to 3 years in prison for the crime of "private violence." However, in practice the legal system is not effective in dealing with what is essentially a cultural and educational problem. The main legal recourse for abused women lies in making a legal complaint against a spouse or boyfriend. However, many women find it very difficult to make and sustain such a complaint, especially those who continue to reside with their partners. Several women's rights groups provide assistance to abused women and also have programs to publicize the problem and educate the population. One of these groups led a demonstration in front of the Women's Commission offices on November 14, 1989, to protest the Commission's failure to assist a woman who was murdered by her husband on November 12, 1989, after 17 years of abuse.

URUGUAY

The President signed into law an antidiscrimination bill which calls for prison sentences, ranging from 3 months to 2 years, for defamation as well as incitement to, or perpetration of, acts of violence motivated by racial, religious, or ethnic reasons. The law, Equality of Opportunities and Treatment For Both Sexes in the Labor Field, was approved by Parliament on May 17, 1989.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for the right of workers to organize freely, and the formation of unions is encouraged. Civil servants may join unions, as may employees of state-run enterprises. There are no legal restrictions on union membership for workers in special economic zones.

All labor unions are independent of government or governing party control. There are no restrictions on union political activities. While some union members and leaders are politically active, unions themselves have traditionally refrained from participating in partisan politics. Workers have the right to choose their own representatives, publicize their views, and determine their own programs and policies. Union officials have the right to represent the members' interests. The member unions of the central labor organization, the Interunion Workers Assembly-National Workers Association (PIT-CNT), have about 250,000 members representing over 80 percent of organized workers. The PIT-CNT is a voluntary confederation of independent unions, and there are a number of strong autonomous unions as well.

Uruguayan workers, including some civil servants, have the right to strike, and many unions did so during 1989. Sympathy strikes are not prohibited. Most of the contracts for the industrial sectors negotiated in 1988 included "no strike" clauses which restrict the workers' right to strike over pay disputes during the term of the contract (18 to 24 months). Of the strikes which took place during 1989, most were resolved when the two parties involved reached a mutually acceptable settlement. In the case of a job action in August involving port workers, the Ministry of Labor and Social Security (MTSS) stepped in, with the permission of both sides, in a mediating capacity. There are no institutionalized mechanisms for arbitration or mediation; the MTSS performs the role of mediator on an ad hoc basis.

Workers can be legally compelled to work during a strike if their work is considered to be an essential service, the definition of which is relatively limited although it may in some cases exceed International Labor Organization (ILO) definitions. In the 1-day general strike on June 27, municipal public transportation was declared essential and minimal levels of bus service were maintained. During the August strike by municipal workers, garbage pickup was declared an essential service by the municipal government. Workers were ordered to return to their jobs; few responded, but there were no cases of workers being penalized for their refusal.

There are no restrictions on unions' right to affiliate with international trade union bodies. By choice, the PIT-CNT is not officially affiliated with any of the three world federations. Many individual unions are affiliated with international trade secretariates.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Discrimination by employers, including arbitrary dismissal, for union activity is prohibited. There is no institutionalized mechanism for resolving such complaints against employers, however, and no formal complaints are known to have been filed with the Government.

Industrial contracts are generally negotiated on a sector-wide, rather than plant-by-plant, basis. These negotiations take place under the auspices of a tripartite (government, workers, management) organization known as a Salary Council. Each industrial sector has its own council. The role played by the government representative can vary from council to council. In some, the government representatives see themselves as primarily arbitrators or mediators and only participate in the negotiations when there is an impasse. In others, the government representative is an active, equal participant in all phases of the negotiations. Individual firms and unions are not prohibited from bargaining outside the council framework. The Government must approve contracts before they become legally binding on the parties involved; during the last round of wage negotiations (1988) the Government approved only those contracts negotiated under the council system. Most employers like the security gained from the council system; most unions like the equity of wages that results from the sector-wide negotiations.

In November 1989, the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) reached interim conclusions regarding a complaint presented by the PIT-CNT alleging, among other things, that the Government exercises a veto power over salary council collective bargaining agreements that exceed anti-inflationary wage guidelines imposed by the International Monetary Fund and in some cases has directly fixed wage guidelines without convening the salary councils. The CFA concluded that these allegations were largely unfounded, noting that there has been a positive evolution as regards collective bargaining in Uruguay to the extent that 83 percent of the wage earners in the private sector are now covered by agreements negotiated essentially bilaterally. The Committee, however, urged the Government to legalize the right of employees of autonomous and decentralized state enterprises to conclude collective agreements.

Workers employed in the two special export zones are fully covered by all labor legislation.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law, and there is no evidence that would indicate its existence in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children are protected by a child labor code, violations of which are punishable by fines of up to $500. Children under the age of 15 generally are not employed, but children as young as 12 may be legally employed if they have a special government work permit. Children under the age of 18 may not perform dangerous, fatiguing, or night work, apart from domestic employment. Salaries and hours for children are controlled more strictly than for adults. Children over the age of 16 may sue in court for payment of wages, and children have the legal right to dispose of their own income. Children working in the expanding informal sector, such as street vendors or others with no fixed place of work or in the agrarian sector, are generally less strictly regulated and receive lower pay.

The legislated minimum wage is approximately $72.37 per month for industrial workers. The minimum wage appears to be effectively enforced and adhered to by the sectors to which it is applicable. The minimum wage is adjusted every 4 months; raises in the minimum wage are indexed to 90 percent of the rate of inflation for the previous 4-month period. The minimum wage was raised in November to approximately $79.59 per month. A family dependent on one minimum-wage income would be living below the poverty line and would be in the poorest 20 percent of the population. The median family income for Uruguayans during the April-June 1988 period, however, was close to double the minimum wage.

The standard workweek is 48 hours in 6 days. Industrial workers receive overtime in compensation for work in excess of 48 hours. Workers are entitled to 10 days' paid vacation after a year of employment; this vacation period increases with each year of employment. Workers are protected by legislation regulating the health and safety of working conditions, and these existing laws and regulations appear to be effectively enforced or adhered to in practice. However, concern has risen in the last year over inadequacies in the current legislation which governs health and safety in the workplace, and the Parliament was studying more stringent measures prior to year's end. Some labor regulations cover urban and industrial workers more thoroughly than rural and agricultural workers.

VENEZUELA

Venezuela is a republic with an active multiparty democratic system, a free press, strong unions, and a longstanding commitment to democracy. For more than 30 years, power has passed peacefully between the two major political parties through open elections. In 1988 a third Venezuelan party emerged as a significant factor.

The Venezuelan security apparatus has civilian and military elements, both of which are held accountable to popularly elected authorities. The military services still focus on conventional war, but are occasionally called upon to maintain domestic order, for example, during the urban rioting which erupted early in 1989.

Venezuela's mixed economy is dominated by the public sector. The state-owned petroleum industry currently accounts for some 20 percent of the gross domestic product, more than any other industry. The Venezuelan Government is in the process of a major economic restructuring to reduce its dependence on oil exports and to enable domestic business to compete more effectively in the international market. To reduce the scope of public sector intervention in the economy, authorities have rationalized the exchange rate, reduced interest rate and price controls, as well as the level of subsidies for consumer goods. In the short term the adjustment program is likely to be painful.

The principal human rights concerns in Venezuela result from weaknesses, including alleged corruption, in the country's judicial system, which often result in prolonged pretrial imprisonment, and in the law enforcement system, which continues to be charged with numerous instances of arbitrary detention, of abuse of detainees, and of extrajudicial killings. The 1989 human rights record was marred by widespread riots and the reactions of security forces. On February 27-28, crowds, reacting to a sharp increase in bus fares, began burning buses. The violence grew when mobs, frustrated by reduced food supplies, began widespread looting of groceries and other businesses. With police unable to restore order or to safeguard property, the Government temporarily suspended some constitutional rights and used military force to restore order and to feed the population. While most Venezuelans were relieved at the army's success in restoring order, many persons were killed, and critics characterized some of the army's tactics as heavy-handed and unjustified.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Authorities do not engage in or condone unlawful or arbitrary killing for political motives, and there were no reports of such killings. There have, however, been instances of extrajudicial killings, including police shooting and killing of criminal suspects, of security forces killing civilians, and of arrested persons dying while in police custody.

In the only incident of its kind to occur under democratic rule in Venezuela, a large number of extrajudicial killings took place in February, when the Government, in response to widespread rioting and looting, declared a curfew and instructed regular military forces to restore order in numerous neighborhoods in Caracas and other cities. Critics of the Government charged that security forces shot at random into houses and businesses, killing people both in their homes and on the street who were breaking no laws and represented no threat. The Minister of Defense denied that an order to "shoot on sight" was issued and said that his forces only responded to attacks against them. Critics acknowledge that snipers challenged the military in some areas (although the prevalence of such activity is in dispute), and the Government admits that in some instances excess force might have been used. The Government called on the army when the efforts of police to control mob violence broke down. (In a few instances, police officers actually joined the looting during the first 2 days, before the armed forces intervened.) The rioting spread not only through most of the capital but also to smaller towns and cities throughout the country. It was primarily in Caracas, however, that casualties occurred. Violence subsided in most other urban areas before deadly force was employed.

The Government estimated that there were from 275 to 300 deaths resulting from the riots. Other estimates were much higher, and some government officials agreed that the official figures were too low. A few sources, citing reports from family members and personal contacts in hospitals and morgues, contended that the death toll exceeded 1,000. The exact number of deaths could not be established, nor could the proportion of deaths caused by security forces versus those caused, accidentally or deliberately, by mob actions.

President Carlos Andres Perez appointed a special committee to investigate military actions during the riots, which found that some abuses had occurred. An arrest warrant was issued for two municipal police officers accused of abuse of authority for entering a private residence and removing, beating, and shooting at two persons with whom they had personal differences. Some critics complained that the Government's attempts to redress grievances arising from these incidents were inadequate. The Government maintained that, while unfortunate abuses did occur during February, many were unavoidable given the extent of the disturbances.

In another case of extrajudicial killing, the shooting to death of 14 civilians by Venezuelan security forces in the town of El Amparo, near the Colombian border, during October 1988, was considered by both military courts and the Supreme Court during 1989. Arrest warrants issued against some of the officers involved in the shootings, based on the testimony of two survivors, were revoked by the military court of appeals on the grounds that the issuing court did not have jurisdiction. Fearing for their safety, the two survivors were given temporary refuge by the Catholic Church. The court decision was sharply criticized as obstructing a full inquiry into what generally is regarded as having been a massacre. In a further appeal, the Supreme Court refused jurisdiction. On December 5, however, a separate section of the Supreme Court reviewed and annulled the earlier decision by the military court. This second decision declared that the military court does, in fact, have jurisdiction and should issue a new decision based on "accurate" legal interpretations. At year's end, it remained unclear what effect this ruling will have on the El Amparo case.

VENEZUELA

In the February-March violence, when civil liberties were temporarily suspended by the Government using martial law authority, numerous persons disappeared for varying lengths of time. Some of these persons were later found dead, reportedly having been shot in the head or back. Persons claiming to have been eyewitnesses told of individuals taken from their homes by security officials; some were later found in prisons or other detention centers, and others were reportedly later found dead. The Committee for the Disappeared, a group composed of family members of the missing people, lists 16 persons as still being untraceable. Other human rights groups, not necessarily made up of missing persons' families, offer figures in this same range. Human rights groups reported that the Public Prosecutor's office has increased efforts to assist the families of the missing.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law. Constitutional provisions for the integrity of the individual are generally enforced, but allegations of physical abuse of detainees are prevalent. There are claims that electric shocks and beatings are not uncommon during ordinary times--some detainees have publicly told of such experiences--and that more extreme abuses occurred during the February riots.

In an August conference on Venezuelan prison conditions, Justice Minister Guerra, who has been a strong proponent of judicial and penal reform, noted that the prison system was in need of "urgent" and "total reform." The nation's prisoners live in "subhuman conditions," according to the Minister. He was joined by Chief Public Prosecutor Escobar Salom in recognizing that prison conditions are exacerbated by serious overcrowding--28,643 prisoners are kept in institutions designed to hold 9,000. Sanitation and health care in prisons are inadequate, as is the diet unless supplemented by donations from friends and family. Discipline within prisons is widely considered to be inadequate, and violence by guards against the prisoners, and among the prisoners themselves, is said to be common. Official personnel involved in such violence are not known to be punished. Some sources argue that conditions in preliminary detention centers, not set up for extended incarcerations, are even worse, as they are often pressed into service as de facto prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The right to judicial determination of the legality of detention is provided for by law. Arrested persons or persons under preventive detention legally can be held for up to 8 days without a formal detention order, during which time they may be held incommunicado. Arbitrary arrests and arrests with improper warrants are common, and the time limits for holding persons are frequently exceeded, usually because of inefficiencies in the legal system. A law increasing the power of judges to redress abuses by ordering the release of someone unjustly imprisoned aids in enforcing the 8-day limit within which an arrestee must be formally charged or set free. Even if a person is detained under a proper order, the time of detention pending trial often exceeds the amount of time the person would have been required to serve had he been found guilty. For several days following the start of the

February riots, the Government used martial law authority to suspend the constitutional right which protects citizens from detention without charge.

Bail is permitted only for relatively minor crimes. Venezuela's bail laws have been under review by the Congress, and the Government hopes to increase the applicability of bail provisions, a step which would contribute to relieving overcrowded prisons. Bail is not available in cases involving allegations of government malfeasance.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.C.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair trial is provided by law, and there exist a number of procedural safeguards. However, once formally charged, the burden of proof is on the accused to prove his or her innocence, and lengthy pretrial detention is the norm. The law provides public defenders for those unable to afford competent defense; however, the number of public defenders in the country (350) is insufficient to meet this obligation. In some cases, defendants who remain outside the country pending assignment of a court date (to avoid extended pretrial detention without bail) may not select their own attorneys; the court appoints an attorney in these cases.

According to the Ministry of Justice, fewer than 25 percent of all prisoners have been convicted. Judicial authorities attribute the backlog to an insufficient number of qualified judges, automatic review of all lower court decisions by higher courts unable to limit their dockets, and failure to enforce procedural deadlines at each stage of the legal process. Delays of 2 or 3 years in a normal case are not infrequent. The judicial process is almost exclusively a written one, requiring costly and time-consuming production of voluminous reports by judges, attorneys, and witnesses at every stage.

Some Venezuelan leaders and legal experts also attribute delays and other irregularities to corruption and the use of personal influence. The civilian judiciary is legally independent, but connections to the two major political parties are important in the judicial selection process. In September, the Public Prosecutor charged political parties with "interfering abusively in (public) institutions, even impeding the autonomy of the judiciary." To help prevent such political meddling, there is a five-member Judicial Council which is responsible for the nomination, training, and discipline of judges. One member is selected by Congress, one by the President, and three by the Supreme Court. A law passed in October 1988 reduced the membership of the Judicial Council to five from nine in an attempt to reduce political party influence on the selection process.

Civilians charged with armed subversion are tried by military courts as insurgents. There is no statutory time limit on the adjudication of cases in military courts, although persons convicted under the military justice system have the same right to appeal to the Supreme Court as those prosecuted under the civilian system. Military judges are appointed by the Supreme Court. There has been criticism of the preponderant referral to military courts (230 to 240 out of approximately 280 cases) of the legal cases brought against security agents for alleged abuses during the February riots. Besides the lack of deadlines in the military system, critics contend that the system's secrecy and tendency to close ranks make it unlikely that the defendants would undergo an impartial, complete prosecution.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

The Constitution and law provide safeguards against arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence. These safeguards are largely honored in practice, although there is evidence that some wiretapping takes place. Most of the charges of invasion of privacy connected with a 1989 wiretap scandal came from politicians accusing opposing parties of spying and eavesdropping. A Supreme Court Justice was quoted by the press in June as saying the "violation of privacy has created a syndrome of national anxiety." He stated that he would undertake a study of Venezuelan law to ensure it incorporated sufficient safeguards against wiretapping. The proscription against government agents entering houses without a warrant was briefly suspended in the wake of the February riots.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of the press and free speech. These liberties, along with academic freedom, are almost universally honored, although the previous Government on one occasion restricted newsprint to a journal deemed to be "too free" in its investigations.

Venezuela has a free and lively press, which frequently criticizes the Government and denounces instances of government interference in the media. From February 28 through March 22, the Government rescinded a number of constitutional guarantees, including freedom of speech and of the press, because the media were allegedly reporting the disturbances in an inflammatory manner. While human rights sources report their press contacts exercised greater self-censorship after the guarantees were restored, journalists themselves say press freedom has generally increased under the new presidential administration. The media followed vigorously and with no apparent restraint the development of various government corruption cases, including the deliberations of the ruling party ethics tribunal which expelled and disciplined some leading party members during the latter part of the year.

Venezuela has 4 nationwide television networks, 2 of which are government owned, 3 regional television stations, 168 radio stations, and numerous newspapers and magazines, with 9 dailies in Caracas alone. The Government is a significant source of advertising revenue for the media, but there appear to be no recent instances where government advertising was channeled for political ends.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is normally respected in Venezuela, although it, along with several other constitutional guarantees, was suspended from February 28 through March 22, when a nighttime curfew was also enforced. Public meetings, including those of all political parties, are held without interference. Permits are required for public marches but are not denied for political reasons. Professional and academic associations operate without interference. Most have ties to political parties.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The population is predominantly Roman Catholic, although other religious groups enjoy freedom of worship and proselytize actively. Foreign missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, are active throughout the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens and legal residents generally have freedom to travel within the country and to go abroad and return. Travel in the Amazon military zone is an exception and requires a special permit for security reasons. Venezuelans may emigrate if their tax obligations have been met. Citizenship can be renounced. Recovery of nationality requires a residence period of 2 years for Venezuelan-born repatriates. The Constitution provides for revocation of citizenship for naturalized citizens on specific, limited legal grounds.

Venezuela traditionally has been a haven for refugees, exiles, and displaced persons from many European, Caribbean, and Latin American countries. Refugees are given normal residence status and may be expelled only for criminal activities.

The Government is freely elected by secret ballot. Venezuela is a multiparty democracy, with mandatory suffrage for all those 18 years of age or older, and the political process is open to all. Elections for the President, Congress, and state legislative assemblies are held every 5 years. Over two dozen parties participated in the 1988 national presidential elections. Eleven parties are represented in the House of Deputies and 4 parties are represented in the Senate.

In December governors in 20 states and mayors in 269 municipalities were elected for the first time in Venezuelan history. This election was also the first to use a system allowing the voter to choose individual candidates by name, rather than selecting only among party slates. Critics contend that the method developed for counting the votes, which guarantees minority party participation, is unfair and denies citizens truly direct representation.

Political views are freely expressed, and persons from the entire political spectrum contend for positions ranging from municipal council seats to the presidency. Minor parties won 18 percent of the seats in the national legislature in 1988; some of these parties are outgrowths of former guerrilla organizations. The two largest parties are the centrist social democratic and social Christian parties. The Movement Towards Socialism party, founded by disenchanted members of the Venezuelan Communist Party, increased its share of the total vote to 10 percent in the congressional elections of 1988. Even some of the smaller parties provide mechanisms by which minority elements within their membership are guaranteed a voice in administrative and policymaking decisions to preclude their disenfranchisement.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Latin American Foundation for Human Rights and Social Development and the Federation of Families of Disappeared Persons have offices in Caracas, and human rights organizations are able to operate free of government restriction. Both Amnesty International and Americas Watch delegations visited in 1989 to investigate the February riots and the 1988 massacre at El Amparo.

The number of local human rights groups proliferated noticeably after February. Human rights groups do not suffer from government persecution and vigorously criticize perceived government inadequacies in redressing grievances.

There is no evidence that economic and social needs and cultural aspirations are denied on a discriminatory basis to any portion of the population. The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex and accords women and children "special protection" in the workplace. Women workers receive extensive maternity leave benefits, and laws limit their involuntary overtime.

The Venezuelan Government recognizes that violence against women, including domestic violence such as wife beating, is a problem. Due to inadequate statistical data, the true extent of such abuse is impossible to gauge. Victims frequently are reluctant to report cases or to press charges. The Ministry of the Family operates shelters for beaten women. In an effort to educate women about their rights, the Government distributes pamphlets, especially in poor neighborhoods, to alert residents to the illegal nature of domestic violence and their legal remedies. While Venezuelan authorities are sensitive to the problem, the ineffectiveness of Venezuelan justice offers little prospect of quick relief.

Restrictions on property rights based on sex, religion, or social status do not exist, but there are some restrictions on ownership of business property and employment based on nationality. For example, there is a wage/salary and headcount rule in the labor law which requires that 75 percent of all wages and salaries and 75 percent of the payroll employees be Venezuelan nationals. The Superintendency of Foreign Investment has interpreted foreign investment legislation to mean that "mixed" and "national" Venezuelan companies should have Venezuelan nationals as president.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Both constitutional and labor law recognize and encourage unions' right to exist. There are no restrictions on this right in practice in either the public or private sectors (except for the armed forces). The Government's positive attitude toward unions reflects the prevailing political climate. Unions play a major role in the Venezuelan economy.

One major union confederation (the Venezuelan Confederation of Workers--CTV) and three small ones, as well as a number of independent unions, operate freely in Venezuela. About 25 percent of the national labor force is unionized, and the figure is about 44 percent in the urban formal sector. There are no restrictions on affiliation with international labor organizations; the CTV is an active participant in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). In 1989 it hosted a congress of the ICFTU's regional organization for Latin America.

The CTV's top leadership includes members of several political parties. The majority are affiliated with the country's largest party, Accion Democratica (AD) (the social democratic party), and AD and the CTV reciprocally influence each other. The CTV, however, has repeatedly demonstrated its independence from both the Government (in which AD holds the presidency and a plurality of the seats in Congress) and the parties. The clearest example of this independence is the CTV's frequent criticism of the Government's economic policies, culminating in the general strike of May 18.

The right of public and private sector employees to strike is recognized legally and upheld in practice. In recent years Venezuelan workers seldom resorted to use of the strike, but the decline in living standards during the year, as the Government introduced austerity measures, increased the popularity of this tactic. In 1989 the Government resorted to mandatory arbitration in the case of a strike by doctors against the Social Security Administration. The arbitration board awarded doctors a considerable increase over the previous contract, but less than they believed they had been promised. The award provoked considerable controversy among doctors, but most returned to work.

The labor law specifically states that workers will be free from all "interferences, prohibitions, subordinations, and coercions" in the exercise of their rights to organize unions and elect officials. The same legislation states that it is the duty of unions to represent their members in negotiations for a collective contract, and it also protects employees who engage in union activities from reprisals by employers. Venezuelan law encourages collective bargaining, which is widely practiced. At the end of 1988, 39 percent of public and private sector employees were covered by collective contracts, including 36 percent in manufacturing, 61 percent in construction, 18 percent in commerce, and 42 percent in transportation.

Workers' legal rights are not restricted in free trade zones. Labor law is enforced by Ministry of Labor inspectors, tripartite (labor-management-government) commissions (which hear complaints regarding firings), and labor courts. Although parts of this system are overburdened and slow, overall it is regarded as effective in protecting workers' rights. In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts repeated its earlier request to the Government to increase the severity of sanctions under the law for antiunion discrimination.

VENEZUELA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor in Venezuela; unremunerated labor is prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Venezuelan law prohibits the following: the employment of children under age 14; a workday of more than 6 hours for 14- and 15-year olds; and night work or employment at hazardous tasks for those under age 18. This legislation is enforced in the formal sector of the economy but much less so in the informal sector. Worsening economic conditions are probably pushing more workers into the informal sector, including children.

The minimum wage for new hires in the urban sector in September 1989 was about $105 monthly, plus mandatory fringe benefits that vary with the workers' individual circumstances, but in general would increase wages by about one-third. Because of an across-the-board wage increase given to the urban private sector in March, the effective minimum wage for anyone hired before that time is about $121 monthly plus benefits. The agricultural minimum wage is lower, approximately $68 monthly. While wages increased significantly in 1989, a high rate of inflation, especially in basic items such as food and transportation, offset these gains. There is a consensus that workers' standards of living dropped faster in 1989 because subsidies were reduced as the Government's oil revenues fell.

By law, the workweek for blue-collar workers may not exceed 48 hours plus 2 hours' daily overtime or a maximum of 200 hours overtime per year. The maximum legal workweek for white-collar workers is 44 hours. Some unions, such as the petroleum workers, have negotiated a 40-hour week. Employees must be given a rest period of at least a half-hour after 5 hours of work. The law is generally observed with the exception of restrictions on overtime. Paid holidays and weekly rest days are also provided by law.

A health and safety law was passed in 1986, but its enforcement awaits the development of standards and issuance of implementing regulations. Opinions regarding the potential effectiveness of this law vary. Some businessmen regard the penal sanctions of this law for cases of negligence resulting in injury as too harsh, and some labor leaders believe that efforts to improve working conditions are proceeding too slowly. The Ministry of Labor prepared for the establishment of an Office of Occupational Health and Safety which is scheduled to open in 1990.

EAST ASIA AND THE PACIFIC

AUSTRALIA

Australia has a long history as a multiparty, parliamentary democracy operating within a federal system of government. Federal elections, last held in July 1987, must be held again no later than November 21, 1990.

Federal, state, and local police in Australia carry out their functions in accordance with civil law, which respects and safeguards individual human rights. The law is observed in practice.

Australia's developed economy, with important mining and agricultural sectors and growing manufacturing and service sectors, provides most Australians with a high per capita income. Furthermore, the Government provides assistance for the minority of relatively disadvantaged citizens. Individuals are free to hold private property, pursue their economic and personal interests, associate with others, and organize trade unions.

Fundamental human rights are assured by law and respected in practice in Australia. The Government's commitment to the promotion of, and respect for, human rights is firm, domestically and internationally. During 1989 protection of the rights of Australia's 200,000 Aboriginals, the most economically and socially disadvantaged minority in the country, continued to receive significant government and public attention. Also in 1989, a Royal Commission continued investigation of deaths of Aboriginals in police custody, a precedent-setting federal-state agreement resolved a long-running land rights dispute, and a national council system to give Aboriginal communities a more direct voice in federal government neared enactment. Women's rights continued to receive attention under the Federal Government's national agenda for women, which includes a nationwide campaign to reduce domestic violence.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Killing for political motives by the Government or by political organizations does not occur.

b. Disappearance

There have been no instances of political disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Australian law prohibits all these practices, and this prohibition is generally respected. However, concerns over deaths in custody of Aboriginals continue to be addressed by the Government.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Australian law prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. This prohibition is respected in practice.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

AUSTRALIA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Australian law provides for the right to a fair public trial before an independent judiciary. Defendants have full due process rights including a presumption of innocence, an unimpeded right of counsel (at public expense for indigents), a right to confront witnesses, and a right to appeal. These rights are respected in practice.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under Australian law and in practice, no search may be conducted without a judicial warrant. The Government does not interfere with the privacy of family, home, or correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The democratic political system, an effective judiciary, and diverse and independent news media combine to ensure freedom of speech and press and full academic freedom.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although Australia does not have a bill of rights, it is a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which provides for freedom of assembly and expression. These freedoms are respected in practice.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Australians have complete freedom of religion. A provision in the Constitution precludes the adoption of an official state religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Australia imposes no restrictions on movement within or outside of the country. The rights of emigration and repatriation are also protected.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Australians elect representatives to a two-chamber Federal Parliament as well as to numerous state and local bodies through free and open elections. Candidates are drawn from three major parties and a number of minor parties. Voting, by secret ballot, is compulsory in general elections for Australians 18 years of age and older; eligible voters who do not vote may be fined. Elections are held at varying intervals as prescribed by federal, state, and local laws.

As a matter of policy, the Government responds to any communication from the United Nations alleging violations of human rights in Australia. The Government also permits unimpeded access to all international and nongovernmental groups investigating alleged human rights violations.

On the international level, Australia actively promotes human rights as a member of the U.N. Working Group on Indigenous Populations and in other forums.

By law, Australians have equal access to government services without reference to race, sex, religion, language, or social status. Basic food, shelter, health care, education, and social security benefits are guaranteed for all. The Racial Discrimination Act of 1975 prohibits discrimination on grounds of race, color, descent, or national or ethnic origin.

A national multicultural agenda, announced by the Federal Government in July 1989, launched a 3-year education campaign to improve intercultural understanding and committed the Government to additional federal legislation if existing state laws were found to address inadequately the concerns of ethnic and racial groups. The following month, the Federal Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission began a special review of the causes of racial unrest and incidents of alleged "racist violence". However, Aboriginal groups and others claim that Aboriginals, who comprise about 1.25 percent of the nation's population, suffer widespread discrimination. The Government acknowledges that the Aboriginal population is the most disadvantaged group in terms of education, housing, health, and employment. In addition to the broad range of programs available to all Australians, the Government provides services specifically aimed at improving Aboriginal socioeconomic conditions.

A Royal Commission created in 1987 to investigate Aboriginal deaths in police custody continued to review cases and take testimony in 1989. The Commission's mandate was extended until December 1990, but its findings will be based primarily on an examination of the over 100 deaths in custody which occurred between January 1, 1980 and May 31, 1989. Interim social, legal, and law enforcement reforms recommended by the Commission were endorsed by national police officials and Aboriginal leaders in February 1989. Although many of these reforms were implemented by state and local governments, deaths in custody continued.

An agreement reached by the Federal and the Northern Territory Governments in September 1989 recognized a limited number of Aboriginal groups' land claims in exchange for their acceptance of a land rights appeals process through the Northern Territory court system. The agreement gave the 3,000 to 5,000 Aboriginal squatters in the disputed areas legal status and allowed them to qualify for federally funded community services.

The Federal Senate took up consideration of a controversial plan to replace the Federal Department of Aboriginal Affairs with the Aboriginal and Torres Straits Islander Commission (ATSIC), comprised of commissioners elected from the Aboriginal councils around the country. Supporters of the ATSIC maintain that it would give Aboriginals a greater voice in issues affecting them. The Federal Government is publicly committed to a more formal delineation of Aboriginal rights than currently exists.

Government at all levels and the Australian public place considerable emphasis on women's issues, including violence against women. There is growing concern about domestic violence, the victims of which are mostly female. It is difficult to measure the extent of domestic violence due to the lack of reliable statistics and the reluctance of victims to report incidents. However, a widely quoted April 1989 study by the Australian Institute of Criminology estimated that between 1 in 3 and 1 in 10 families, from all socioeconomic backgrounds, may be affected.

In response to public concerns, the Government began a 3-year national domestic violence education campaign in 1987 which included a nationwide awareness month in 1989. In coordination with women's rights groups, law enforcement authorities, and state and local governments, the campaign has led to victim protection legislation, improved police training and tactics, and increased sensitivity to domestic violence on the part of community service agencies. Women's and legal rights groups generally agree that these efforts have raised community awareness, but that additional governmental resources are needed to reduce the incidence of domestic violence.

The Sex Discrimination Act of 1984 prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex, marital status, or pregnancy. In 1986 the Government passed affirmative action legislation obliging employers to provide equal employment and promotion opportunities for women employees. Women's rights and welfare are promoted by a number of women's rights groups and the Federal Government's Office of the Status of Women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Australian law and practice provide workers with full freedom to establish and join trade unions, choose their union representatives, and formulate union programs. These rights of association include the right of Australian unions to associate directly with their counterparts in other nations and to participate in international labor organizations. Unions represent about 40 percent of the work force and are extremely active and influential. Australian workers enjoy the right to strike, which is well established in practice. However, a 1989 ruling of the Victoria Supreme Court declaring the airline pilots union liable for damages arising from the pilots' dispute with the airlines underscored that the right to strike is not protected under domestic law.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Australian workers are granted the right, by law and in practice, to organize and bargain collectively and to be represented in negotiating the prevention and settlement of disputes with employers. A pattern of centralized wage negotiations with quasi-judicial arbitration and settlement, as opposed to company-by-company collective bargaining, has generally prevailed since the establishment of the Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Commission in 1904. The Industrial Relations Act of 1988 made important technical changes in the basic system, creating a new Industrial Relations Commission with expanded scope for performing essentially the same tasks as its predecessor.

Industrial disputes are arbitrated by a system of federal and state industrial courts in which trade unions receive a full and fair hearing. The rights of trade union officials are fully protected in both law and practice.

Federal labor law and practice are uniform throughout the country. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Australia has ratified and fully respects International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 105 concerning forced labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Australia has ratified and fully respects the following ILO conventions concerning minimum age for employment: Convention 7 (minimum age); Convention 10 (minimum age for agricultural workers); Convention 15 (minimum age for trimmers and stokers); Convention 112 (minimum age for fishermen); and Convention 123 (minimum age for underground workers). In addition, federal and state ministries of labor monitor and enforce a network of legislation (which often varies from state to state) governing such interactive factors as minimum school-leaving age, minimum age to claim unemployment benefits, and minimum age to engage in specified occupations.

Australia has long had a tradition that workers should be guaranteed a decent standard of living. Although Australia has a formal federal minimum wage of $156 per week, the federal minimum wage is rarely, if ever, used. Instead, different minimum wage rates for individual trades and professions are embodied in a comprehensive system of "awards" sanctioned by various state and federal commissions. The lowest current award of $217 per week is for clothing workers. Combined with other regularly provided benefits and government entitlements for low-income families, this wage provides a decent standard of living.

In addition, a body of regulations and commission decisions prescribes the 40-hour (often 38-hour) week, paid vacations and sick leave, and health and safety standards in the workplace, as well as other benefits for the overwhelming majority of Australian workers. Compliance with these and other regulations, such as minimum age of employment, is actively monitored and enforced by federal and state ministries of labor.

BRUNEI

Brunei is a small, wealthy, Islamic monarchy located on the north coast of Borneo. It is predominantly Malay in population, although there are substantial Chinese and other minorities. Brunei is a hereditary and traditional Sultanate that has been ruled by the same family for over 500 years. A British protectorate until January 1, 1984, it has been internally self-governing since 1959.

The Constitution promulgated in 1959 provided for the first sharing of political power by the Sultan with an advisory Council of Ministers. The Constitution, however, permits the Sultan to override the decisions of legislative and executive bodies in most instances. In elections for a legislative council in 1962, a party opposed to policies of the Sultan won a large majority; tensions over policy differences led to an armed uprising in December 1962 that was put down by British troops. The Sultan then invoked an article in the Constitution that allowed him to assume emergency powers for 2 years. This state of emergency has been renewed every 2 years and is still in force. Several persons detained under emergency powers following the 1962 uprising remain in custody without trial. Although the Constitution is not suspended, the state of emergency allows the Sultan great latitude in ruling by orders. These orders have in effect suspended certain articles of the Constitution.

The activities of the Royal Armed Forces are devoted to protecting the country against external threat and they are not involved in maintaining internal security. The police force is firmly under the control of the civil authorities, and there is no evidence that it resorts to extralegal measures in the discharge of its duties.

Since 1962 there have been no disturbances or agitation in Brunei. Economic factors have much to do with the general sense of well-being. Brunei has only about 240,000 people, but produces about 150,000 barrels of oil per day and slightly over 5 million tons of liquefied natural gas per year. It has one of the highest per capita gross national products in the world. Brunei has no debts, and the nation's financial reserves are commonly estimated at between $20 and $30 billion. Petroleum revenues and interest on invested reserves allow the Government to provide free medical care, schools, and university training to its citizens. A large proportion of the Malay population is employed by the Government at generous salaries which permit a higher standard of living than in surrounding countries. Government employees are eligible for low-interest or no-interest loans to purchase homes, automobiles, and appliances. The nation's second largest employer, Brunei Shell, provides similar benefits to its employees. Brunei has no income tax. There are several substantial, low-cost housing plans designed to provide homes for the landless. There is a chronic shortage of labor throughout the economy, which helps to keep employee wage and benefit packages high and makes it relatively easy for women to find work in traditionally male occupations.

There were no major human rights developments during the year; human rights remain restricted with regard to arbitrary detention, freedoms of speech, press, and association, and the right of citizens to change the government.

BRUNEI

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In late 1988 whipping became mandatory as punishment for certain offenses, including rape, assault, extortion, robbery, theft, vandalism, and drug-related crimes. Since then, occasional sentences of whipping have in fact been handed down and carried out. Previously, the penal code allowed for whipping, but in practice this punishment was rarely administered. There was no other evidence of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution has no provision for habeas corpus. The right exists, however, as the Application of Laws Act states that the Law of England (1951) applies except where Brunei has passed its own law. Under normal circumstances, a magistrate must "endorse" a warrant for arrest. On rare occasions, warrants are issued without this endorsement.

The Internal Security Act (ISA) permits the Government to detain suspects without trial for renewable 2-year periods. Since the abortive rebellion in 1962, the Government has occasionally used the ISA to detain persons suspected of antigovernment activity.

The Government acknowledges that five former members of the Brunei People's Party (BPP) have been in detention under the ISA since 1962 when that party was banned for its role in the abortive uprising. Amnesty International (AI) has said it believes the five BPP members are being held not for any role in the 1962 rebellion, but as a general deterrent to political activity. Two former leaders of the Brunei National Democratic Party (BNDP) have also been in detention under the ISA since February 1988, when that party was dissolved by the Government. None of these detainees have been tried or convicted of any crime.

In previous years the Government had announced the release of some ISA detainees around the time of the Sultan's birthday on July 15. None were announced in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The legal system in Brunei is derived from the British system. Those suspected of common crimes are detained, tried, and punished according to the law. Lacking a senior judiciary of its own, the Brunei High Court has for its Chief Justice a judge seconded from Hong Kong. There were no known instances of interference with the judiciary by the Government in 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although the Government is empowered by law to intrude into the privacy of individual persons, families, or homes, in practice it has not been known to do so.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedoms of speech and press, though not restricted by law, are not generally exercised. There is no political opposition, and hence there have been no challenges which might have tested the degree of government tolerance of political criticism.

Brunei's only television station is government owned (two Malaysian stations can also be received). It usually avoids controversial issues, as do newscasts on the radio stations.

The single independent weekly newspaper generally avoids controversial issues. A second weekly newspaper is published by the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom to assemble for political purposes has not been seriously tested in recent years. In 1985 the Government allowed establishment of the Brunei National Democratic Party (BNDP), the first political party since party activity was prohibited in 1967. Just before its first public meeting, the Government announced that government employees could not attend party meetings, become members of political parties, or otherwise engage in organized political debate. In February 1988, the Government dissolved the BNDP and detained two of its leaders, charging that the party's contacts with the International Democratic Union were in violation of the Societies Act.

In 1986 the Government approved the establishment of a second political party, the Brunei National United Party (BNUP); however, the organizers never announced its formation, and nothing further has been heard of it. The Government requires the registration of private economic, recreational, or other organizations.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official state religion, but the Constitution provides for freedom of worship for other religions. There are several Christian churches in the country. There are also missionary schools in Brunei.

BRUNEI

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement in the country for citizens, permanent residents, and expatriates. Some restrictions on travel abroad are placed on certain expatriates as part of contract obligations to the Government. Travel to Communist nations is restricted, and travel to China by Brunei's ethnic Chinese citizens and ethnic Chinese residents is tightly controlled. Brunei has not been willing to accept refugees. In September 1989, a boat with approximately 40 refugees from Vietnam was found in Brunei waters. The refugees were given food, water, and medical attention for about a week while their boat was being repaired, at which time they were given provisions and required to depart.

There is no way in which citizens can change their government through established democratic processes. Under the continuing state of emergency, there are no representative bodies at the national or local level and, since the dissolution of the BNDP in 1988, no known functioning political parties. However, citizens may seek to influence government by working through appointed village headmen and district officers, who meet regularly with their constituents. They may also attempt to effect change by petitioning the Sultan directly.

There are no government or private organizations in Brunei which deal specifically with the protection of human rights. AI reports it has on several occasions appealed to the Sultan for the release of a number of political prisoners, some held for many years without trial, but has received no reply. In 1988 the Government appeared before the United Nations Human Rights Commission to answer AI allegations of human rights violations relating to ISA detentions. The Government acknowledged the detentions, but maintained that they are justified in the interest of national security.

Women are denied equal status with men in a number of important areas such as divorce, inheritance, and custody of children. While there are no separate pay scales for women and men, women in the work force traditionally have been concentrated in lower paying clerical and secretarial jobs, and have been less likely to find positions offering rapid advancement. In recent years, however, employment opportunities for women have greatly improved throughout the economy, largely because of a chronic labor shortage. A growing number of women hold senior level professional positions, and the number of female university graduates is also increasing. Religious authorities strongly encourage Brunei Muslim women to wear the tudong, a traditional head covering, and a growing number do so. There is no pressure on non-Muslim women to wear the tudong, and few, if any, choose to wear it.

BRUNEI

The incidence of domestic violence against women is extremely low. Because of the close-knit nature of Bruneian society, this kind of behavior would be difficult if not impossible to conceal, and would not be tolerated. The criminal penalty for a minor domestic assault would be 1 to 2 weeks in jail and a fine. An assault resulting in serious injury, such as broken bones, would be punished by whipping and a longer jail sentence. Rape cases are similarly rare.

The majority of the substantial Chinese minority in Brunei are not citizens (those having no claims to other nationalities were "British-protected persons" prior to independence and are now either stateless permanent or temporary residents). Permanent residents cannot own land but usually resolve this problem through 7-year leases, the maximum amount of time for lease agreements in Brunei. The process of obtaining citizenship in Brunei is long and difficult. In general, the Chinese community has prospered in Brunei, and much of the country's commercial activity is in Chinese hands. While the Chinese have done well economically, many are now reevaluating their position in Brunei, especially the prospects of their children in a society in which Malay citizens are favored in such areas as government employment. Some are emigrating to other nations, especially Australia and Canada.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Trade unions are legal in Brunei but must be registered with the Government. Signatures of seven members are required for registration. There are four registered trade unions, with a total membership amounting to less than 5 percent of the work force. The Trade Unions Act of 1962 permits the formation of trade union federations in Brunei, but forbids affiliation of Brunei trade unions with labor organizations outside Brunei. Brunei is not a member of the International Labor Organization. An individual contract is required between an employer and each employee, but trade union activities are not illegal and cannot be deemed to violate employee contracts. Local legal experts interpret this provision as conferring the right to strike. However, there have been no strikes in recent memory.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no government interference with lawful union activity. It is illegal to refuse employment or discriminate against an employee for being or not being a member of a trade union. While unions are legal and easy to register, conditions in Brunei are not conducive to the development of trade unions. Wage and benefit packages far exceed those of neighboring nations; there is a lack of those kinds of industries in which unions have traditionally developed; and there is a long cultural tradition of trying to achieve consensus rather than cause confrontation. As a result, collective bargaining is limited to only a few industries.

There are no export-processing zones in Brunei.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited and it is not practiced.

BRUNEI

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Employment of children below the age of 16 is prohibited, and below the age of 18 requires parental consent and approval by the Labor Commission. Women under 18 may not work at night or on offshore oil platforms. Laws on employment of children are effectively enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor is in short supply, and market forces allow most citizens of Brunei to command high wages. The minimum wage in Brunei is approximately $11.35 per day for citizens and permanent residents, and approximately $9.80 per day for foreigners. There is no special minimum wage for any particular industry. Overtime must be paid for work in excess of 48 hours, and double time must be paid for work performed on legal holidays. Working conditions are subject to inspection by the Labor Commission on a routine basis and in response to complaints. Brunei's labor regulations are effectively enforced by the Labor Department, which is empowered to close any place of employment in which health, safety, or working conditions are unsatisfactory.

BURMA

Burma's military leaders seized power in September 1988 and lethally suppressed sustained, countrywide, prodemocracy demonstrations. The 1988 popular uprising, unprecedented in Burma's history, had ended the long rule of the Burma Socialist Program Party (BSPP), under now-retired chairman Ne Win who had drawn the nation into isolation and allowed it to decline economically. The September 1988 military takeover restored Ne Win's 26-year dictatorship by placing in power a group of senior military officers subservient to Ne Win and other top officials of the previous government. These men form the current ruling body--the 19-member State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC).

The SLORC has repeatedly assured the populace and the international community that its stay in power is temporary and that it will hold multiparty elections in May 1990. It established an election commission and provided for the registration of political parties, which reached as many as 233 during 1989. In practice, the military leadership has maintained absolute control, keeping a heavy military presence in Rangoon and other urban areas, enforcing martial law, including a 10 p.m. to 4 a.m. curfew, imposing extensive surveillance on government employees and private citizens, and launching an aggressive propaganda campaign in the government-controlled media which inaccurately portrayed the events of 1988. It also attempted to blame Burma's political and economic instability on elements of the right and left, as well as foreign governments and news organizations. Early in the year, it tried to hinder opposition campaign efforts through intimidation, and eliminated much of the opposition through wide-scale arrests of the most popular party leaders and other political activists.

Burma has fought various insurgencies since 1948. Some of the ethnically based insurgents have fought for a measure of autonomy, if no longer for outright independence, against perceived domination by the Burmans, the majority ethnic group. In recent years most insurgent groups, financed primarily through narcotics production and trafficking, have engaged only in small-scale fighting in areas on Burma's borders. The Government has used their continued existence to justify in part continued authoritarian rule, including the operation of an extensive security apparatus. During 1989, the Government sought accommodation with several insurgent/narcotic trafficking groups, to gain short-term advantages vis-a-vis other dissident groups, to reinforce a split in the Burma Communist Party, and to secure areas for teak and logging concessions.

Over the last 27 years, Ne Win's "Road to Socialism" reduced what was once the richest country in Southeast Asia to one designated by the United Nations as a "least developed" country. The military leaders promised a new open-door economic policy and passed a law to permit foreign investment but did not develop an economic strategy. The leadership, which lacked economic training or expertise, failed to address past mistakes--highly centralized decisionmaking, a vastly overvalued currency, uncontrolled monetary expansion, and an ineffective banking system--and made a bad economy worse.

Burma's dismal human rights situation deteriorated even further in 1989. Government control over the population and interference in individual lives significantly increased, as did credible reports of torture, wide-scale arbitrary arrests, disappearances, and compulsory labor.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Although instances of government-instigated political killings were fewer in 1989 than 1988 (after the widespread shootings of demonstrators in 1988), there is substantial credible evidence of an undetermined number of civilian deaths at the hands of military government officials or individual soldiers throughout the year. The Government repeatedly denied these charges and, despite international criticism, made no apparent effort to investigate or to bring perpetrators to justice.

In January numerous reports surfaced that some students who fled after the September takeover were killed after returning to their homes. These reports strongly indicated that a number of returned students died after having been mistreated while in government custody, and that the authorities routinely informed the dead students' parents that their children had died of disease. There were also credible reports that throughout the year some political prisoners died in jail as a result of torture or other mistreatment at the hands of the authorities.

Eyewitnesses reported seeing deaths of men impressed as Burmese army porters after they were forced to walk ahead of troops through mine-infested terrain; deaths from gangrene after troops abandoned injured porters; overlaid porters falling to their deaths from mountain paths; and ill-fed, inadequately clothed porters dying of disease. Amnesty International (AI) reported in August an eyewitness account of a soldier shooting a porter who could no longer walk. In that same report, AI also cited allegations of the killings of other porters, including members of ethnic minorities, and stated that their sources repeatedly accused the Burma Army 33rd Light Infantry Division of unlawful killings.

In some instances, soldiers reportedly committed murder and the crimes were then officially covered up. While it was not possible to confirm these reports, they are plausible and highly detailed, containing names of victims and perpetrators, addresses, military ranks, and sometimes regiment or division and military identification numbers, as well as date, time, and place of killing. Methods of killing reported included stabbing, bayoneting, and shooting. The victims' ages ranged from 13 to young adult.

There were unconfirmed reports of summary executions by soldiers in the field. In one case, opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi charged during a June press conference that eight students had been shot near a jade mine in Mohnyin township, Kachin State, by soldiers who reportedly made an effort to separate and kill students from among nonstudent youths present. AI also expressed concern about several reports of executions of students by soldiers in remote areas near the Thai/Burma border.

As in past years, for security reasons, Burmese authorities did not allow diplomatic observers to travel to areas of heavy insurgent activity. Therefore, it was not possible for them to gather directly information about alleged human rights practices by the Government or by the insurgents in these areas. Government-controlled media continued to cite numerous examples of insurgent-generated violence that resulted in civilian deaths, and AI cited reports that insurgent forces had fired on civilian areas.

It is impossible to estimate with any accuracy the number of persons who disappeared and remained unaccounted for during the year. Families and friends of many who disappeared assumed the persons were under detention or died in jail, whether this was the case or not (see Section 1.d.). Others may have been impressed to serve as army porters. Some persons who disappeared may in fact be among the estimated 2,000 to 3,000 students hiding in the Thai/Burma border areas and the 200 to 300 who have crossed into Thailand. During periods of mass arrests--March-April, July-September--some persons disappeared but were later found to have been detained. Some of these were subsequently released.

Burmese authorities are reluctant to respond to diplomatic inquiries as to the whereabouts of Burmese and resident foreigners, mostly South Asians, who have been jailed or disappeared, and, if they reply, limit comments to general statements that individuals were arrested for violations of existing laws.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Diplomatic observers in Rangoon had a considerable body of credible evidence--including eyewitness accounts--that torture, beatings, and mistreatment of political detainees were commonplace.

Instances of torture and mistreatment appeared more numerous in 1989 than previously, but this may have been due to increased reporting; most of the victims and their families and friends were educated and had greater access to foreigners. Physical and mental torture included beatings that caused permanent damage; sleep and food deprivation; cigarette burns; electrical shocks to the genitals and elsewhere; and interrogations while the detainee was forced to stand in water or to assume painful, unnatural positions for long periods of time, (e.g., the "airplane" or "motorcycle" postures which forced victims into a half-sitting stance with arms outstretched; they were beaten if they collapsed). Sometimes detainees were falsely told that family members had died or were in trouble.

Despite public and private expressions of concern by foreign governments and international human rights organizations over charges of torture, the Government repeatedly denied that it practiced or condoned torture and made no apparent efforts to investigate the charges. In at least some cases, victims were forced to sign a document stating that they had not been tortured.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government arbitrarily arrested or detained several thousand persons during 1989. A government spokesman stated on September 8 that "only" 811 persons, including 170 students, had been detained since the military takeover and denied that it had arrested anyone for political beliefs. However, the Government has asserted that it is a crime to criticize the Government and its leaders; many have been detained for this reason.

While exact numbers are unknown, a conservative estimate of politically motivated arrests during 1989 would be at least 4,000. Many persons were arrested on ostensibly criminal charges. For example, a prominent political figure and a student leader, both members of the leading opposition party, were arrested and sentenced to 3 and 10 years respectively for alleged involvement in an abortion case, even though Burma's abortion law is rarely enforced. Many others were accused of "violating law and order." Regardless of the charges, most of the estimated 4,000 persons arrested were either active members of opposition political parties, persons involved in peaceful antigovernment demonstrations or pamphleteering, or students who returned home after having fled to Thailand or the border area after the military repression in September 1988. In a September 1989 report, AI expressed continuing concern about 3 students said to have been forcibly repatriated from Thailand and arrested January 7 by Burmese authorities, and about 22 returned students reportedly detained January 10 and held incommunicado since then.

In the period from July 23 to August 12, the Government released 18,752 prisoners from jails and prisons throughout the country. All of these prisoners had been arrested prior to the September 1988 takeover and most had been charged with nonpolitical crimes. It was widely believed but unconfirmed that the Government released them to make room for the large numbers of persons arrested for political reasons from July to September.

Although arrests continued throughout 1989, there were several distinct periods during which larger numbers than usual were detained. Of the estimated 4,000 to 6,000 students who fled to Thailand and the border following the military takeover, an unknown number returned or tried to return to their homes; many of these were taken into custody despite government guarantees of their safety.

In March and April, authorities detained at least several hundred political activists in Rangoon and Mandalay; by the first of May, many of the best known leaders in Burma's student opposition were in jail.

On July 20 the Government placed Burma's most popular opposition figure, Aung San Suu Kyi, and her colleague, Tin Oo, under house arrest where they have been held incommunicado. Their detentions were followed by the largest wave of arrests to date as authorities rounded up most of the leadership of many of the country's major opposition groups.

Even before the establishment of military tribunals on July 18 (see Section 1.e.), there was no provision in Burmese law for a person in detention to seek a judicial determination of the legality of his detention. Previously, in serious cases involving national security, some persons were not formally charged but instead were held under an antisubversion act in indefinite detention without trial. In less serious political and security cases, detention under the act was nominally limited to 180 days. According to Burmese law, those designated "dangerous and destructive elements" can be placed under house arrest without formal charges for up to 1 year, as was the case with opposition leaders Aung San Suu Kyi and Tin Oo. However, under martial law and the military tribunals, anyone violating martial law orders is subject to summary justice. Individuals have no pretrial rights under martial law, particularly since the establishment of the military tribunals. The accused has no right to a defense lawyer, although in at least some cases military authorities allowed the presence of defense attorneys. There is no bail, although some defendants gain release by bribing officials.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Burma was under martial law throughout 1989. On July 18, the Government invested regional military commanders with summary judicial powers and gave them discretion to try offenders either by courts formed under existing law or by military tribunals. However, military tribunals have exclusive jurisdiction over cases concerning defiance of orders issued by the ruling State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC) or regional military commanders, and can mete out the death sentence, life imprisonment, or at least 3 years' imprisonment with labor regardless of existing law. The tribunals also can reject or summon witnesses. Trials are public only at the township level, and never under the military tribunals. Under Burmese law, attorneys are not provided at public expense, and the accused is not presumed to be innocent.

In practice, military tribunals tried virtually all offenses --criminal or political--committed after the tribunals were established, although civilian judges continued to hear some earlier cases. On October 19, a military tribunal sentenced to death an interpreter for a French journalist who allegedly had helped the journalist film a beheading in 1988. During trials, court officials must submit daily reports for military review. Although reports were also given to the attorney general, military authorities had the final say. The accused were not guaranteed the right to a defense attorney. When allowed to participate in a trial, a defense attorney's role was severely limited. Lawyers were warned that an overly aggressive defense jeopardized both client and lawyer. In numerous cases, the tribunal refused to admit witnesses or evidence central to the defense. Military tribunals imposed heavy sentences on political prisoners. For example, a writer was sentenced to 20 years with labor for allegedly exhorting navy personnel to join in the 1988 prodemocracy demonstrations, and a lawyer was given 14 years' labor for providing "false" news to the British Broadcasting Corporation. Appeal is theoretically possible, subject to certain conditions: appeal of a sentence to 3 years' imprisonment must be submitted to the regional commander within 30 days; in cases involving the death sentence, life imprisonment, or sentences over 3 years, appeals must be made to the army commander-in-chief within 30 days. The army commander-in-chief was designated final arbiter on all tribunal decisions and sentences. In practice, military authorities have been known to hamper the appeal process by refusing to cooperate with and attempting to intimidate attorneys.

It is impossible accurately to estimate the number of political prisoners held at any one time. However, separate reliable sources reported about 6,000 prisoners, including 2,000 students in Insein jail in April and about 2,000 political prisoners in Insein in September. It appears there were at least 4,000 politically motivated arrests during the year, many of which involved ostensibly criminal charges. The Government denies holding any political prisoners (see Section 1.d.).

In 1989 the State intruded extensively into the lives of private citizens. Under martial law, forced entry and warrantless searches of private homes and other premises were commonplace and were often conducted without warning. The Government strictly monitored the travel and whereabouts of many individuals. A well-developed system of neighborhood informers reported on dissidents and criticism of the Government. Most people believed that security personnel monitored private correspondence and telephone calls.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

The Burmese army has fought various insurgencies for the past four decades. These conflicts apparently have resulted in numerous transgressions on all sides, such as the mistreatment or killing of prisoners, neglect of the sick and wounded, impressment of civilians for porter duty, and indiscriminate attacks on civilian areas. Insurgents and the Government have repeatedly accused each other of human rights violations. In August, AI expressed concern over allegations of ill-treatment and unlawful killing by the Burma army in insurgent areas. AI also stated that several insurgent groups continued to attack civilian targets.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Already severely restricted, freedom of speech and press in Burma became virtually nonexistent in 1989. Imposition of martial law overrode even nominal constitutional provisions for freedom of expression. Although the Government permitted the registration of political parties, in practice opposing views and criticism of the Government were not tolerated. After popular opposition figure Aung San Suu Kyi publicly criticized the current leadership as well as former leader Ne Win, she was placed under house arrest, as was the chairman of her party, the National League for Democracy. Thousands of other political activists were also detained after peaceably expressing antigovernment views (see Section 1.d). Government workers were instructed not to discuss politics in their offices at the risk of losing their jobs. They were not allowed to join or support political parties and had to sign statements promising they would not participate in political activities. Even private citizens became reluctant to express opinions out of fear of government-paid informers.

As government employees, teachers and college professors are subject to the same restrictions on freedom of speech, political activities, and publications, and fear of reprisal as other civil servants. Content of lessons and lectures is severely circumscribed.

BURMA

As in the past, the Government runs and operates the mass media, including television, radio, and the sole national newspaper, The Working People's Daily. Newspaper editors are appointed by the Government and editorials must be approved in advance. Journalists are subject to strict publishing and broadcast guidelines, especially on domestic matters. Even international news is subject to prior review and selection. All forms of communication--domestic and imported books and periodicals, stage plays, motion pictures, and musical recordings--are subject to government control and censorship. Criticism of the Government, government officials, or sectors of the economy controlled or partially controlled by the Government is not permitted in the press. On May 26 the Government announced a stricter enforcement of the 1962 Printers and Publishers Registration Law expressly to prohibit political parties from releasing documents not previously cleared by the Government. Also in 1989, the Government imposed stricter regulations over video and audio cassette rentals and for a period of time closed down all video and cassette rental shops.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly exists only for those organizations permitted by law and duly registered with the Government. In practice, however, even the activities of these organizations are severely restricted. The martial law edict decreeing that people are not allowed to gather in groups of more than five was unevenly enforced. Assembly within the premises of political parties has been limited to 50 persons. In fact, however, some party members in groups of less than 50 have been arrested on their premises for "violating law and order." For a time, people were allowed to congregate at government-sanctioned rock concerts, and in June and early July authorities did not interfere with increasingly large crowds that gathered to hear opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi. In mid-July troops beat with bamboo sticks or arrested peaceful demonstrators for violating martial law regulations.

Trade associations and professional bodies, like other organizations in Burma, are permitted only if sanctioned by the Government. Their activities are strictly monitored and their members are not free to discuss politics or express criticism of the Government.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Burma is a secular state dominated by the Burman ethnic group. Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution and, even under martial law, is widely observed in practice. The great majority of Burmese are Buddhist, although there are sizable Christian, Muslim, and animist minorities based principally in various minority ethnic groups.

While minority religious groups are allowed to practice freely, security services monitor the activities of some religious communities closely. Some persons of mixed Burman and ethnic minority ancestry have been known to convert to Buddhism as a way of strengthening their claim to be considered ethnic Burmans.

BURMA

There is considerable social prejudice against Muslims in Burma. Occasionally this erupts in violence and has led to government action infringing on the practice of Islam. Religious groups can and do maintain links with coreligionists in other countries, including the Catholic Church, which maintains ties to the Vatican. Foreign religious representatives are usually allowed only tourist visas and are not permitted to preach, proselytize, or remain to carry out missionary work. There is at least one long-time resident foreign Catholic priest (Italian) in Burma.

All religious organizations are required to register with the Government. Religious publications are subject to the same governmental control and censorship as other publications. On occasion, the Government has used a nationalization law to take control of the property of religious organizations.

The Government in recent years promulgated two directives that limit the right of assembly and association of Buddhist monks. Acting through the government-controlled hierarchy of the monkhood (Sangha), the State has prohibited monks from attending various forms of public entertainment. While this ostensibly has been done, in part, to maintain the moral purity of the Sangha, it is also aimed at curbing the political activities of monks, one of the most influential groups in Burmese society and one which has been heavily involved in the 1988 antigovernment protests.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Burmese citizens have the right to live anywhere in the country. Except for limitations in areas of insurgent activity, Burmese citizens can travel freely within the country but must inform local authorities of their temporary place of residence, a restriction greatly tightened under martial law. In 1989 people who failed to report either guests or intentions to stay overnight to the authorities were subject to a jail term and arrests sometimes were made. Noncitizen residents, including persons born in Burma who hold foreigners' registration cards, must obtain prior permission to travel. Legal requirements, bureaucratic procedures, and corruption cause long delays in obtaining passports. Severe limits are placed on what emigrants are allowed to take with them.

Burmese citizens who left the country legally are generally allowed to return to visit relatives. However, Burma does not recognize dual citizenship; acquiring citizenship in another country results in the loss of Burmese citizenship. With few exceptions, those who take citizenship in another country are banned from returning to Burma. Emigrants wishing to return permanently are required to reapply for Burmese citizenship. Burmese who leave the country illegally cannot legally return. There were reported instances of Burmese wishing to return to visit ill or dying parents being denied permission to enter Burma.

Burma does not permit foreign refugees or displaced persons to resettle or seek safe haven within Burma. The Government treats persons claiming to be refugees as illegal immigrants and imprisons them, although it freed and deported a number of imprisoned Vietnamese refugees in 1988.

BURMA

Throughout the year, the Government imposed a 10 p.m. to 4 a.m. curfew on the entire country. In most cases, the curfew was strictly enforced and violators were often punished. On at least several occasions, riverboat passengers, stranded at the jetty in Rangoon after curfew, were sent before a military tribunal and sentenced to 3 years' imprisonment.

During 1989, and particularly in November and December, the Government carried out a forced relocation of urban poor countrywide, most often to inadequately prepared sites far from jobs, schools, and extended families. In the great majority of cases, there was no compensation. Those forced to move were compelled to dismantle their old homes at their own expense and also to bear the costs of purchasing a new site, construction materials, and labor for building a new house, as well as transportation expenses. There were many unconfirmed reports that those without funds or assets to sell were moved to reclaimed jungle sites miles from urban areas to cultivate agricultural products to sell to nearby government factories at controlled prices. The Government described all those forced to move as "squatters," but in at least some instances people had purchased their property and held deeds to it. Some reportedly lived in apartments or houses coveted by the military or were told they lived too near military installations or government offices. At the same time, the Government offered attractively priced, relatively luxurious housing in areas of rapid real estate appreciation to high-ranking military officers, and also provided houses and land free of charge to former members of the now defunct Burma Socialist Program Party which ruled Burma for 26 years.

The Burmese people do not have the right or the ability peacefully to change their government. In 1988 the military seized power and suppressed a massive prodemocracy movement by killing at least 1,000 peaceful demonstrators and injuring many more countrywide. Throughout 1989 the SLORC tolerated no dissent or criticism and controlled the population by imposition of martial law, wide-scale arrests of political activists, and intimidation. Although the SLORC allowed the formation and registration of political parties and promised elections scheduled for May 1990, its subsequent barring of the major opposition figures from the elections virtually eliminated hopes that this process would be free or fair.

The Government does not permit investigation of its human rights practices, nor is it willing to discuss human rights problems with outside government or nongovernmental organizations. Requests for meetings specifically to discuss broad human rights issues or individual cases are usually deflected. The Government consistently denied charges of human rights violations and publicly and repeatedly criticized the U.S. Government and AI for what it called "fabricated" reports of torture and other abuses and blamed both for "interfering in Burma's internal affairs."

No internal human rights organizations exist. A group calling itself Amnesty International of Burma, established during the 1988 prodemocracy demonstrations, was subsequently denied registration as a legal organization by the Government and apparently has been disbanded.

The Government is conscious of and resents the outside scrutiny to which Burma's human rights record has been subjected since its lethal suppression of prodemocracy demonstrations in 1988. Burma was the subject of a U.N. Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) decision in February 1989 and also is scheduled to be discussed at the 1990 UNHRC meeting. AI expressed concern about actions of the Burmese Government several times during 1989. The Governments of the European Community and of Australia on several occasions publicly expressed concern over human rights abuses in Burma.

Burma's numerous ethnic minorities have their own distinct cultures and languages. Economic development among minorities has lagged, and many still live at the subsistence level. This is due in part to geographic factors which impede economic development in the rugged, isolated, border areas populated by minorities. Minorities have been underrepresented in the Government and are largely excluded from the military leadership.

Persons of nonethnic Burmese ancestry, primarily Indians and Chinese, while denied full citizenship and excluded from party or government positions, continue to play an important role in the economy, a factor resented by many majority Burmans.

The government press has repeatedly denigrated Westerners or those with mixed blood in pejorative terms, such as "long-noses" or "green eyes."

Women in Burma have historically played an active role in society, but this varies with cultural traditions and ethnic backgrounds. In general, Burmese women enjoy most of the same legal rights as men. They keep their own names after marriage, are active in trade, and often control family finances.

There is no violence directed specifically against women in Burma. Although women as well as men died or were injured at the hands of the Government, and in some cases reportedly were raped, indications are that authorities generally treated women better than men in detention. While in 1988 there were unconfirmed but persistent reports of rape of several women in detention by soldiers or police, rape is viewed with great abhorrence by Burmese society.

Burma is governed solely by the military. Members of the armed forces and their families enjoy privileges not available to others. For example, during the enforced closure of all schools and universities, which lasted over a year, military children were allowed to attend special schools often taught by military spouses. At the same time, the military leadership closed down private schools set up by political parties for teaching poor children whose parents could not afford privately funded tutors and threatened legal action against those who taught children privately.

BURMA

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

There are no trade unions and no independent labor movement in Burma. Workers do not have the right to organize independently, to bargain collectively, or to strike. After the Government violently suppressed prodemocracy demonstrations in 1988, and imposed martial law, even government-controlled workers' and peasants' mass organizations were disbanded. There were no strikes in 1989.

In April the United States suspended Burma's eligibility for trade concessions under the Generalized System of Preferences program until the Government takes steps to afford its labor force internationally recognized workers' rights. Again in 1989, as in previous years, committees of the International Labor Organization (ILO) criticized Burma's legislation imposing a single trade union structure which contravenes the principles of ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which Burma has ratified. The ILO committees, however, expressed the hope that prospective political changes which auger an end to the single party system would also lead to the repeal of the single trade union law.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

As noted, workers have no right to bargain collectively. Labor arbitration boards which, while government controlled, at least theoretically provided an opportunity for the airing of labor disputes, have been disbanded. The military authorities are the sole authority over workers' issues. No special economic zones exist in Burma.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Burma's legal code does not contain any statutory prohibition of forced labor. For years the Burma army frequently conscripted civilian males in the vicinity of military operations (primarily in areas populated by ethnic minorities) to serve as porters. On September 22, a government spokesman acknowledged that the Burma army has traditionally used local residents in insurgent areas as porters, but denied reports that the military authorities had used students or other detained youths. According to eyewitness and firsthand reports during 1989, the Government conducted periodic roundups on the streets of Rangoon and other major cities of unemployed or those who could not prove employment. An unknown number of these persons were impressed for duty as Burma army porters in insurgent areas, while others were able to bribe their way out of custody. Some reliable reports strongly indicate that students and other political activists also were taken from Rangoon to serve as porters or as laborers in government mines or other installations.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children between 13 and 15 may work for 4 hours a day. The penalty for employers who disregard this regulation is 2 years in prison. However, the regulation is not strictly enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is a 5-day, 35-hour workweek for employees in the public sector and a 6-day, 44-hour workweek for private and parastatal sector employees, with overtime paid for additional work. However, public sector employees seldom actually work more than 6 1/2 hours a day. Workers have 21 paid holidays a year, and there are numerous legal provisions to protect workers' health and safety, but these are not strictly enforced even for government workers. The legal minimum government wage was raised in March from about $1.00 per day to approximately $2.25 at current official exchange rates, although at the more realistic free-market rate this works out to about 21 cents a day. Wages commonly have lagged far behind inflation and are not nearly enough for subsistence, particularly in the case of large or extended families. In the private sector, the minimum wage law applies only to cherooot-rolling plants and rice mills. There are rules governing health and safety conditions at workplaces, pertaining to room size, ventilation, fire hazards, and the availability of latrines and drinking water. In practice, these are seldom enforced, particularly in the private sector.

CAMBODIA

The regime in place in Cambodia's capital is widely known as the People's Republic of Kampuchea (PRK) although it now calls itself the State of Cambodia. The PRK regime is headed by Council of State Chairman Heng Samrin and Prime Minister Hun Sen. The regime was installed by the Vietnamese army after it drove the Khmer Rouge Communists from Phnom Penh in 1979. The PRK is not recognized by the majority of the international community. In September Vietnam apparently withdrew virtually all of its main force units. However, Vietnam continues to exert considerable influence over the PRK regime's policies. Recently, the PRK regime has begun to pursue a set of increasingly liberal economic policies.

PRK political institutions tend to follow the Vietnamese model. Power is wielded by the Communist Kampuchean People's Revolutionary Party (KPRP), but the KPRP's control over Cambodia has been challenged by the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea (CGDK), composed of two non-Communist resistance groups, and the Khmer Rouge. As in previous years, resistance forces continue to wage a guerrilla war against the PRK, operating primarily from areas along the Thai-Cambodian border and in small enclaves in western Cambodia. Occupying Cambodia's seat at the United Nations, the CGDK was formed in 1982, when the non-Communist resistance groups joined with the Khmer Rouge in a loose political alliance.

In August 1989, all four Cambodian factions, along with Vietnam, the ASEAN countries, the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, and several other nations, met in Paris in an attempt to work out a negotiated settlement to the conflict. After a month of discussions, the conference recessed without an agreement, but efforts to reach a diplomatic settlement continue.

The Khmer Rouge, with between 30,000 and 40,000 men under arms, is considered the most effective fighting force in the resistance coalition. While in power from 1975-1979, the Khmer Rouge compiled one of the worst records of human rights violations in history as a result of a thorough and brutal attempt at restructuring Cambodian society. More than 1 million people, out of a total population of approximately 7 million, were killed or died under the Khmer Rouge's genocidal reign.

Although the Khmer Rouge has intensified a major public relations effort aimed at convincing the world that it has abandoned its past genocidal policies, its authoritarian and brutal treatment of Cambodians under its control continues in camps along the Thai-Cambodian border not accessible to international agencies and in parts of Cambodia under direct Khmer Rouge control. Conditions are better at Site 8--the first Khmer Rouge camp accessible to international agencies--and two other open camps, but Khmer Rouge administrators of all camps go to great lengths to prevent the departure of people from their control. (See Section 2.d. for an explanation of the various types of Khmer Rouge camps.) The Khmer Rouge top leadership from the 1975-79 period remains in power and is reliably reported to retain its ultimate goal of regaining control over Cambodia.

The non-Communist resistance (NCR) is made up of two groups. The first is the National United Front for an Independent, Neutral, Peaceful, and Cooperative Cambodia (FUNCINPEC) whose de facto leader is Prince Sihanouk, Cambodia's former hereditary king and head of state. FUNCINPEC's military force is the Sihanoukist National Army (known as the ANS, an abbreviation of its name in French).

The Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF) is the older of the two NCR groups. Its political leader is former Prime Minister Son Sann who espouses a parliamentary form of government for Cambodia. It was formed in 1979 with the merger of several existing NCR groups, many led by former soldiers from the pre-1975 period of the Khmer Republic.

While these two groups have been comparatively free of human rights violations, there have been some credible reports of violations committed by their respective armed forces.

The PRK's economic system began to change significantly in 1989 when the regime began to permit citizens to own land and operate private businesses. There have been reports that the official exchange rate was abolished in 1989, permitting the market to determine the value of the riel against hard currency. Hundreds of privately owned businesses are now flourishing in Phnom Penh and, on a smaller scale, in provincial towns. Lured by the prospect of commercial opportunities, many foreign investors, particularly from nearby Southeast Asian countries, are already doing business in Cambodia or making plans to do so. Many visitors also report growing corruption among PRK officials.

Reliable reports from travelers to Cambodia and Cambodians who have left the country indicate that widespread and serious human rights violations by the PRK regime continued in 1989, despite evidence of improvement in some areas. The PRK continues to discourage efforts to monitor its human rights record.

During 1989 the human rights situation began to improve in many of the displaced persons camps located along the Thai-Cambodian border, in part because the United Nations began a program of assigning security liaison officers to each camp to train camp police and to institute a code of justice and a court system.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The few Cambodians who departed the country in 1989 did not report political killing by the PRK or Vietnamese in regime-controlled areas of Cambodia.

Political killings by the Khmer Rouge appear to have been reduced, but information on what happens in Khmer Rouge camps, especially in those of its camps not open to international and humanitarian organizations (where at least 50,000 people reside), is sparse. One defector from a closed Khmer Rouge camp reported that the Khmer Rouge, in an effort to regain popular support, now imprison or attempt to "reeducate" violators of their policies rather than kill them. He said, however, that serious offenders are sometimes placed in jails where they are starved to death.

CAMBODIA

Khmer Rouge defectors report that civilians from the border camps and prisoners from Khmer Rouge jails have been killed by mines while performing forced labor, such as transporting supplies for guerrilla forces in Cambodia. They also report that those who attempt to flee Khmer Rouge closed camps run the risk of being shot. One 1989 defector from a closed Khmer Rouge camp reported that those accused of selling weapons or associating with the NCR sometimes receive the death penalty.

Civilians continue to be killed during attacks by the Khmer Rouge on towns, lines of communication, and economic targets within Cambodia. Often the Khmer Rouge, before attacking a town, have threatened all residents with death if they resist. The Khmer Rouge policy of killing captured Vietnamese troops and some PRK officials does not appear to have changed.

KPNLF and ANS units were not generally accused of political killings during 1989. Murders by NCR troops did occur in camps run by both factions, but these appear to have been the result of domestic conflicts. In September, however, a section leader in the major FUNCINPEC camp of Site B was assassinated in what was believed to be retaliation for alleged spying activities.

NCR forces attempt to avoid civilian casualties as much as possible during their military operations. This was especially evident during its major offensive launched September 30 when the safety of civilians who occupied the area attacked was a high NCR priority.

Reports of disappearances in Cambodia increased during 1989, but it appears that most of these cases involved the PRK's forced induction into the armed forces of young men between the ages of 18 and 30. There were also sporadic reports of residents from the displaced persons camps along the Thai-Cambodian border being impressed for the resistance armed forces. Disappearances from closed Khmer Rouge camps were also reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Prisoners who were released or escaped from PRK prisons during late 1988 or 1989 reported that the use of torture by PRK authorities, who took over administration of the prisons from their Vietnam advisers, has been reduced. Some prisoners report that, in lieu of being tortured, prisoners are sometimes just shown the tools of torture which could be used against them unless they confess their alleged crimes. Article 35 of the new PRK Constitution, promulgated in April, specifically prohibits the use of coercion or physical abuse against prisoners.

According to reports gathered by Amnesty International (AI), in the past, persons suspected of being involved with the resistance ran the highest risk of torture. Recent reports indicate this continues to be true. This category has been defined by the PRK authorities to include persons alleged to have expressed opinions critical of regime policies or the role of the Vietnamese, as well as those thought to be trying to leave or return from areas under the control of the resistance.

CAMBODIA

According to AI and prisoners recently released from PRK jails, beatings have been inflicted on political suspects detained for interrogation. PRK authorities have been known to use various forms of torture, but recent information on such practices is unavailable. The PRK refuses to permit outside inspection of its prison facilities.

As in previous years, some detainees undergoing interrogation continue to be held incommunicado in small and completely dark solitary confinement cells that are poorly ventilated and unsanitary. They are constantly immobilized by shackles on both legs; sometimes they also are handcuffed. They are allowed no bedding or mosquito netting. To intensify ill-treatment during interrogation, some detainees are also deprived of food and water to progressively undermine their physical strength and resistance to illness. They may not bathe or go outside their cells to relieve themselves and are permitted neither medication nor medical attention.

Although it is rarely reported that a suspect has been killed during the actual interrogation, the indefinite period of detention without charge or trial that usually follows interrogation exposes detainees to the risk of death from a combination of injuries sustained during interrogation, unattended diseases, and inadequate diet.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

As a rule, PRK authorities often detain, interrogate, and jail resistance sympathizers for extended periods without formal charges. Estimates of the number of political prisoners held by the PRK, including the estimates of AI, range up to several thousand, but reliable figures are not available.

In April an AI current report noted that an additional 430 people had been detained by PRK authorities for political reasons in 1988. Much of this information has come from official PRK broadcasts reporting the arrests of people accused of being "agents" of the CGDK or merely "political enemies." AI has repeatedly urged the PRK "to provide details about the fate of people reportedly arrested on political grounds," but has received no response.

Separate sections within the police are responsible for the investigation of activities by the non-Communist (KPNLF and ANS) and Communist Khmer Rouge resistance groups. The Ministry of Interior maintains at least three prisons in which suspected supporters of the resistance are held without formal charges. Provincial police and military internal security units maintain additional detention and interrogation centers. Regime regulations call for the arrest and "reeducation" of "any person carrying out propaganda campaigns to sabotage internal unity and Kampuchea-Laos-Vietnam solidarity." Such "reeducation" means indefinite detention to force a change in political thought.

In general there has been a virtual absence of legal process for those detained. Detainees have seldom been informed of the charges against them, or given access to lawyers, or informed of any rights or legal protections. There has been no requirement that officials notify anyone of a person's arrest. The same PRK authorities have been responsible for arrests, interrogation, decisions on a subject's guilt or innocence, and prison administration.

CAMBODIA

Since 1981 the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has unsuccessfully sought permission to visit prisoners captured in combat. It has also not yet been able to gain access to Thai prisoners reportedly held in PRK prisons.

During the October offensive against the PRK in northwestern Cambodia, NCR troops captured 600 prisoners of war (POW's). These prisoners are being detained for interrogation and political orientation and, if they do not wish to join the resistance forces, the NCR says it will release them. In addition to these 600 POW's, the NCR forces also detained and later released additional PRK soldiers, providing them with money so they could return home. The Khmer Rouge also captured POW's during 1989. The Khmer Rouge presented some POW's they claimed to be Vietnamese to the press in October as "evidence" that Vietnam still had troops in Cambodia. No information is available as to what has since happened to these prisoners.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Article 85 of the 1989 PRK Constitution guarantees defendants the right to lawyers at all trials. In addition, this Constitution states that "all stages of court proceedings shall be held in public. Nevertheless, cases may be held in secret if provided for by law." In past years, political prisoners were regularly denied fair trials. There are no indications that this situation has changed since the new Constitution was adopted.

The PRK has used trials primarily for propaganda or public intimidation, with verdicts decided in advance. There are few procedural safeguards for defendants. Defendants have been required to memorize carefully and rehearse in advance all the questions and answers to be presented in court, even in cases where the interrogators had already decided to release them; if these defendants satisfactorily recited their testimonies as rehearsed, they were released. Other reports indicated that prisoners who had been arrested by PRK authorities for alleged cooperation with the resistance were incarcerated, not as a result of judicial proceedings, but rather because they confessed to their crimes under interrogation. There are no indications that these practices changed in 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

PRK authorities search whenever and wherever they wish. Networks of informers report to the secret police. Almost all villages in Cambodia close to the Thai-Cambodian border in the northwest provinces have been relocated inside a border security zone, especially those near known infiltration points. There are also numerous reports, confirmed by former PRK district officials, that the regime confiscates rice and other foodstuffs from villagers in some parts of the country in an effort to prevent cooperation with the resistance.

In most of their camps along the Thai-Cambodian border, especially in the south, the Khmer Rouge maintain strict control on the social activities of those under their control. The rules appear to differ little from those imposed by the Pol Pot regime of 1975-78. For instance, the Khmer Rouge punishes persons who marry without permission or forbids marriages altogether. If a marriage is permitted, the bride and groom are often not allowed to live together. Contacts with foreigners are restricted, and listening to unauthorized radio broadcasts can result in punishment. Relief workers who visit those Khmer Rouge camps open to outsiders report that residents require permission to visit the health clinics run by voluntary agencies or the ICRC's surgical facility at Khao-I-Dang. One Khmer Rouge defector during 1989 reported that in his camp, which was closed to international access, between 5 and 10 children and adults died each month because of the absence of medical care and the refusal of the Khmer Rouge leaders to allow camp residents to leave to seek help from international relief organizations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The press and radio within Cambodia are wholly controlled by the PRK regime. Criticism of the regime is not generally tolerated. Possession of foreign books and periodicals can result in arrest, but it is doubtful that such regulations are strictly enforced. Some limited criticism of the regime was tolerated in 1989 in publications such as the newspaper Kampuchea. On one occasion, this criticism took the form of a comparison implying that the PRK regime's armed forces sometimes engaged in undisciplined behavior similar to that of Pol Pot's soldiers.

In some areas of the country, people can listen to foreign radio broadcasts relatively freely, while in other areas, people are discouraged from listening to these broadcasts and threatened with arrest if they persist. The PRK makes a nominal attempt to control what types of movies the population sees, but widespread smuggling of video tapes has made movie censorship virtually impossible.

The PRK has, in the past, controlled individual contacts with foreigners. Recently, however, visitors to Cambodia have noted that Cambodians appear to be free to talk with anyone they wish, including foreigners.

In Site 8, a Khmer Rouge camp open to international assistance, residents have access to a relatively wide range of foreign publications and can listen to the radio with relative freedom. However, this was not the case during 1989 in the closed Khmer Rouge camps where, defectors report, those who listen to foreign broadcasts, or even those of the non-Communist resistance groups, are imprisoned. Residents of closed camps also lack access to foreign publications. In areas of Cambodia seized by the Khmer Rouge, the schools are closed. The non-Communist groups do not have similar restrictions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The only associations permitted by the PRK are those created to support the regime, such as those for farmers, women, and youth. These are usually headed by ranking party or regime officials.

CAMBODIA

c. Freedom of Religion

Article 6 of the PRK's 1989 Constitution made Buddhism the state religion of Cambodia. The regime also announced in May that all men were free to enter the monkhood, provided the ordination was approved by the regime and carried out by designated senior monks.

Interviews with Cambodians who left the country in 1989 indicate that in many parts of the country there is now considerable freedom to practice Buddhism and enter the monkhood. There are reports, however, that in some areas, men are still discouraged from entering the monkhood. Sometimes this involves a requirement to pay a bribe to obtain the necessary permission.

Generally, PRK authorities attempt to use Buddhism as one of a number of organizations for "mass mobilization" to implement party policies. Religious affairs are overseen by the National United Front for Construction and Defense, the same government agency that seeks to organize women, youth, workers, and religious groups to support the State. Communities that wish to construct Buddhist temples must apply to the local front committees for permission. The most senior monk is a Vice Chairman of the National Assembly, indicating the subordination of the Order of Buddhist Monks to political ends.

When in power in Phnom Penh, the Khmer Rouge disestablished Buddhism as the state religion and systematically murdered much of the Buddhist monkhood. Since being driven from power, the Khmer Rouge has tried to give the impression of reform. This is most noticeable in the large Khmer Rouge camp at Site 8, which has been accessible to international organizations and relief workers since it was established as an evacuation site in 1985 for people fleeing a Vietnamese offensive. This camp has a temple with monks in residence. However, defectors from other Khmer Rouge camps, and those relief workers occasionally allowed into those camps, reported in 1989 that Buddhism is still repressed by the Khmer Rouge outside of Site 8. Christianity and Islam were even more ruthlessly suppressed by the Khmer Rouge when it controlled the country and are not known to have been revived in Khmer Rouge-controlled areas.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The PRK has attempted to control tightly all travel within areas under its authority through systems of neighborhood surveillance, family registration, and identification documents. Despite formal regulations governing movements of families and individuals, there is a growing ability to travel within Cambodia as evidenced by the expanding domestic trade. However, checkpoints are still ubiquitous, and bribes as well as passes are required to pass through them.

Permission is required to travel abroad, and it is rarely granted except for official business. Cambodians seeking to leave the country to escape the conflict flee to the Thai border or to U.N.-supported refugee or displaced persons camps in Thailand. The regime routinely imprisons those caught attempting to flee as well as those believed to be returning from border camps affiliated with the CGDK.

CAMBODIA

Most of the several hundred thousand Cambodian refugees who fled to Thailand before 1980 have been approved for resettlement and have departed for Western countries. However, over 11,000 Cambodians approved for refugee status but deemed "non-resettleable"--generally because of close contacts with the Khmer Rouge regime before 1978--remain at the Khao-I-Dang holding center in Thailand. Another 291,000 Cambodians--generally those who have fled since 1980--are considered "displaced persons" and remain in other camps on the Thai-Cambodian border. The PRK regime has agreed in principle to accept returning displaced persons from camps in Thailand. During 1989, 20 displaced persons were repatriated from Thailand to Cambodia.

The Khmer Rouge tightly controls movement within areas under its control. During 1989 some Khmer Rouge nonassisted camps were relocated, in some cases to "hidden" locations closer to the border. There are indications that these moves may be only interim steps to the Khmer Rouge objective of transferring some of its population back into Cambodia. Defectors reported in 1989 that the civilian populations in some closed Khmer Rouge border camps, especially in the south, are not allowed to leave the camps. Those attempting to escape run the risk of being shot by Khmer Rouge guards. Along the northern border, however, many Khmer Rouge were seen walking freely along roads on their way to new camps, including the U.N.-assisted camp of Au Trao. Also, residents of the Khmer Rouge camp at Site 8 are often allowed to leave the camp each day to work for Thai farmers.

The Khmer Rouge limits access by international organizations and voluntary agency personnel to camps under its control in Thailand. International organizations continued their appeals to the Thai Government in 1989 for greater access to Cambodians in closed camps. In January the Thai Government agreed to create U.N.-assisted camps for civilians under Khmer Rouge control in the northern and southern sectors of the border--at Au Trao and Site K respectively, similar to Site 8 in the central area. This decision resulted in the number of Khmer Rouge civilians in U.N.-assisted camps rising to around 73,000 in October, up from 51,500 at the end of 1988.

Freedom of movement is also restricted in the non-Communist camps. Residents wishing to move to a camp controlled by a different faction must obtain permission from the camp leadership or leave surreptitiously. International organizations and voluntary agencies have good access to NCR-affiliated camps in Thailand.

Cambodians do not have the right to change their government. The Kampuchean People's Revolutionary Party controls political life in the majority of the country. Elections have been staged by the PRK regime to attempt to demonstrate legitimacy as well as the relative status of leaders by varying reported percentages of the "vote." Although National Assembly members are supposed to serve terms of 4 years (the second round of elections should have been held in 1986), no elections have been held since 1982. There were various announcements by the regime during 1989 that elections would take place before the end of the year. At year's end, no date for elections had been set. The PRK regime has asserted that the scheduling of elections is pending external diplomatic developments.

CAMBODIA

Human rights violations in Cambodia have been the subject of intense international attention since 1978, when the United Nations Human Rights Commission and its Subcommittee on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities began investigating the Khmer Rouge record of atrocities. In February 1988, the Commission adopted the latest in a series of resolutions on Cambodia, reiterating its condemnation of persistent violations of human rights and reaffirming that Cambodia's occupation by foreign forces deprives the people of Cambodia of their right to self-determination.

With the exception of a brief visit in August 1989 by the Cambodia Documentation Commission to investigate past Khmer Rouge atrocities, the PRK authorities have not permitted investigations of alleged human rights violations. The regime has not responded to requests by the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights and by AI to visit regime-controlled areas. Repeated requests by the ICRC to visit detainees under PRK control have never been granted. Local Red Cross organizations exist, but neither they nor any other groups have a role in the protection of human rights. The Khmer Rouge also does not permit investigations of the human rights situation in areas under its control, except in U.N.-assisted camps.

Directives issued by the PRK regime in 1982 seemed to accord a privileged status to Vietnamese immigrants; there have been reports of Vietnamese taking advantage of this privileged status to force Cambodians out of desirable occupations or off of property. Cambodians arriving on the border in 1988 frequently reported that Vietnamese in the cities continued to supplant Cambodian merchants, and this privileged status appeared to continue to be backed by the Phnom Penh authorities. Many Vietnamese moved into Cambodia to join other returning residents who had been expelled during the Khmer Republic or Khmer Rouge periods. Most are traders or fishermen, but a large group of Vietnamese farmers have settled on rich marshland in Takeo Province.

In 1989, however, with the announced departure of Vietnamese troops, many Vietnamese merchants and settlers began to leave for Vietnam, apparently believing that the regime would not or could not protect them. The CGDK has repeatedly claimed there are up to 1.2 million Vietnamese settlers in Cambodia and demands that they must all depart the country before a peace settlement can be reached. There is no independent, verified data on the number of Vietnamese settlers in Cambodia.

There is no specific information available on discrimination of other types, including violence against women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers in Cambodia do not enjoy the right of association and have no right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. Organized labor is totally under the PRK's control, and industries have organized branches of the official "Trade Union for National Salvation." The "Kampuchean Federation of Trade Unions" is an official mass organization headed by Communist Party politburo member Mat Ly. As far as can be determined, there is no right to strike.

Cambodia became a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1969 but has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining. The PRK regime has not supplied any information on unratified Conventions to the ILO in 5 years.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no right to collective bargaining in Cambodia. The PRK has not established any economic incentive zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is commonly used by the PRK, although not primarily as a sanction or means of racial, social, or other discrimination. Although the use of forced labor appeared to decrease in 1989, the regime still conscripted thousands of laborers to clear brush, cut timber, and build roads.

The decrease in the number of forced laborers during 1989 appeared to result from the institution of a nationwide military draft. There were many reports of young men being taken forcibly and sent directly to the front, with minimal or no training. One student who fled to Thailand to escape the draft reported that the authorities deliberately failed students in his school to force them into the military. This mass conscription policy has resulted in many of those subject to the draft fleeing to Thailand. On one day in 1989, 119 PRK defectors crossed into Thailand.

The Khmer Rouge also requires labor from all persons under its control, including women, children, and the handicapped. Khmer Rouge civilian defectors continued to report in 1989 that they were forced to carry supplies and ammunition into the interior of Cambodia in support of military operations, saying they were punished if they failed to comply.

There is no known minimum age for the employment of children. Children are regularly employed as soon as they are physically able to perform the tasks required.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

No attention appears to have been given by PRK authorities to ensure acceptable conditions of work, and there is little information on this subject. Wage scales for the few industrial and government workers are set by the regime and are universally regarded as insufficient, forcing employees to supplement their wages in other manners.

CHINA

The People's Republic of China (PRC) is an authoritarian one-party state ruled by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). Following the Beijing massacre in early June, the Government reinforced totalitarian measures to control political views. A closed inner circle of a few senior leaders exercises ultimate power over the nation, with Deng Xiaoping the first among equals. Some of these party elders hold positions within the Politburo, the Central Military Commission, or other organs. Others hold no formal positions of authority but still wield considerable influence.

The Government maintains control through a nationwide security network which includes the Ministry of State Security; the Ministry of Public Security; the Ministry of National Defense; state judicial, procuratorial, and penal systems; and through traditional societal pressure. In 1989 the security network was responsible for widespread human rights abuses, especially in Beijing and Xizang (Tibet).

Despite 10 years of economic reforms intended to expand the role of market forces, China's centrally planned economy still retains price controls and allocation of some key goods by administrative directive. The Government has decentralized some economic decisionmaking authority and endorsed the development of a small private sector, particularly in retail sales and services. As part of a comprehensive economic austerity and restructuring program initiated in late 1988, the Government took a more aggressive approach in scrutinizing private firms, punishing tax evaders, and attempting to limit the incomes of private entrepreneurs. The central authorities also withdrew some of the economic decisionmaking power delegated to lower levels.

The human rights climate in China deteriorated dramatically in 1989. On March 5-7, People's Armed Police (PAP) used indiscriminate and excessive force in suppressing demonstrations in Lhasa, Tibet, killing scores of persons. These killings and other serious human rights abuses, however, were dwarfed when the leadership ordered the People's Liberation Army (PLA) and other security forces to suppress forcefully a peaceful, student-led movement seeking greater freedom for China's people. At least several hundred, and possibly thousands, of people were killed in Beijing on June 3-4. The Beijing massacre was followed by a drastic, country-wide crackdown on participants, supporters, and sympathizers. Thousands were arrested and about a score are known to have been executed, following trials which fell far short of international standards, for alleged crimes committed during the unrest. There have also been persistent but unconfirmed reports of numerous unannounced executions. At year's end the crackdown was still continuing. The Government attempted to defend its actions by a massive disinformation campaign, expulsion and harassment of foreign journalists, a ban on the sale of books by dissidents, and the jamming of the Voice of America and some other foreign radio stations. Virtually all internationally recognized human rights discussed in this report are restricted, many of them severely.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

By far the most serious instance of extrajudicial killing in China in 1989 was the June 3-4 massacre in Beijing. Credible evidence indicates that the leadership deliberately ordered the use of lethal force to suppress peaceful demonstrations. The excessive force employed resulted in the deaths of many unarmed civilians. As noted above, estimates of the number killed vary widely, and an exact accounting may never be possible.

In early March, the PAP shot and killed scores of Tibetan monks and their supporters during demonstrations in Lhasa. Hundreds more were injured as police used indiscriminate and excessive force to quell protests in support of Tibetan independence.

Many independent observers believe that the number of persons actually executed in connection with the 1989 demonstrations throughout the country is far higher than those officially announced to date. Confirmation of such executions is not available, and Chinese officials have refused to respond to diplomatic requests for information.

According to reliable sources, 2 persons were killed and 150 injured, 10 seriously, during an April police raid on an underground Catholic church service in Shijiazhuang, Hebei Province.

The Government, as a matter of course, does not publicly announce the names of those detained or arrested. In view of the large number detained after the Beijing massacre, concerns have arisen over the fate of those detainees whose status has not been clarified.

There were credible reports of numerous raids on university campuses, private residences, workers' dormitories, think tanks, and hotels in the weeks following the June 3-4 massacre by both the PLA and various security bureaus. Large numbers of persons who participated in or supported the spring demonstrations were detained. While most of these detentions occurred soon after the June massacre, the crackdown continued months later. When universities reopened, returning students were investigated, and some students were detained by security forces. The Government acknowledges that some students, such as Liu Gang, Zhou Fengsuo, Ma Shaofang, and others on the list of 21 most wanted, have been arrested; however, it has not publicly charged, or acknowledged holding, the majority of students reportedly detained whose whereabouts are unknown. Some workers at a computer firm that supported deposed CCP General Secretary Zhao Ziyang, journalists from Beijing-based newspapers, and intellectuals also remain unaccounted for. Since announcing a total of about 2,500 detentions by the end of June, the Government has refused to comment on the number of additional detentions since that time or to provide any information on those detained.

Detention of leaders of unofficial religious groups continued in 1989, often with no notification to followers or family members. At least two dozen bishops, priests, and laymen of the underground Catholic church were detained during the year, and the status of several of them remained unknown at year's end.

The whereabouts and status of many Tibetans detained during demonstrations in Lhasa are also unknown. A security official told a Western journalist in October that 400 had been arrested after the March demonstrations and that 323 were subsequently released. Other reports from Tibet cite significantly higher figures.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Reports of torture and degrading treatment of persons detained for committing so-called counterrevolutionary crimes have been persistent and consistent. Many Chinese citizens who participated in the demonstrations suffered beatings and other forms of ill-treatment in police efforts to extract information about others who may have been involved in the demonstrations. A person involved in erecting the Goddess of Democracy statue in Tiananmen Square was reportedly detained, beaten, and forced to implicate others. He remains under detention, and it is not known if he has been officially charged. As of year's end, there were continuing reliable reports of beatings of political detainees in the Beijing area by security forces.

In Tibet officials have rebuffed diplomatic requests to visit prisons and to discuss individual human rights cases. Since the suppression of the March 5-7 demonstrations in Lhasa, there have been persistent and convincing reports of torture of those detained or arrested. A March 1989 report by U.S. Congressional staff related accounts, based on interviews with refugees from Tibet, of cruel and unusual punishment of Tibetans.

Conditions in Chinese prisons are invariably harsh and frequently degrading. According to press reports, more than 200 students and intellectuals are being held in the Qincheng maximum-security prison north of Beijing. Prisoners are reportedly packed eight to a cell. A person imprisoned prior to the June massacre reported beatings in prisons in western China. Prisoners, both criminal and political, are subjected to severe psychological pressure to confess their "errors." Those who resist are sometimes beaten and denied family contact. According to an official of the Supreme People's Procuratorate, cases under investigation concerning illegal arrests and the extraction of confessions by torture rose 57.7 percent during the first 6 months of 1989 as compared with the same period in 1988. The People's Procuratorates agreed to hear 21,838 cases involving charges of torture. Of these, 838 were major criminal cases.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

China's Criminal Procedure Law proscribes arbitrary arrest or detention. According to the law, interrogation should take place within 24 hours of detention, and the detainee's family or work unit should be informed of the reasons for it and the place of detention. Articles 43-52 of the Criminal Procedure Law, however, permit the police to delay notifying the family and work unit "in circumstances where notification would hinder the investigation." Frequently family members are not informed when individuals are detained for political reasons. A detainee may be held legally for up to 10 days prior to formal arrest. In some cases, however, detainees have been held for months without charge.

Under Article 19 of "The Regulations of the PRC on Administrative Penalties for Public Security," police have the authority to assign persons accused of disturbing the peace, fabricating rumors, hindering government officials from performing their official duties, and other minor public order offenses to "labor education" camps for up to 3 years. According to an article in the official press in October, some 2 million Chinese citizens have been sent to these camps in the past 10 years.

Sentences imposed by criminal courts may be served in prisons or in "reform through labor" camps, whose function is not fully explained in the legal code. Many of these are in remote areas such as Xinjiang or Qinghai. Upon release from these camps, many prisoners reportedly have been denied permission to return to their homes and forced to remain in these underpopulated regions. This amounts to a form of internal exile.

Some of those detained since the June massacre may be charged with "crimes of counterrevolution," under Articles 90-104 of the Criminal Law. These articles are cast in such broad terms that they empower the State to detain people for a wide range of activities considered in violation of the law. Those detained for committing "crimes of counterrevolution" are treated in theory the same as those detained for other crimes, and their cases are supposed to be handled in accordance with the Criminal Procedure Law. The imposition of martial law in parts of Beijing in late May permitted martial law authorities to issue orders and detain people independent of the authority of the local Beijing government. Large numbers of people may be detained for long periods of time without any public notification while the PLA and police conduct their investigations.

In 1989 the number of persons accused of political offenses rose dramatically as a result of the spring demonstrations. The number of people initially detained and the number who remain under detention has not been released. Estimates of the number of detainees after June 4 vary from the 2,500 officially announced in late June to over 100,000 according to some journalists and human rights groups. Western press reports in December quoted "well-informed" government sources as putting the figure at 10,000.

Most of those detained appear to be manual workers. A number of prominent intellectuals were also detained, including journalist Dai Qing, former Democracy Wall prisoner Ren Wanding, reformist Party official Bao Tong, and several student leaders.

Some applicants for foreign visas have reportedly been detained and interrogated for at least several days.

Several hundred people connected with the March 5-7 proindependence demonstrations in Lhasa were subsequently detained. The Tibet Daily published on September 14 and 25 the names of 14 Tibetan Buddhist nuns who were detained and sentenced to 2 to 3 years of "labor education" for demonstrating in Lhasa on September 2 and 22. The nuns were detained for shouting in a public area slogans demanding independence for Tibet and were accused by the police of engaging in "separatist activity." The police detained the nuns and immediately adjudicated their cases under their own authority. Because of the secrecy surrounding these matters and the Government's refusal to discuss them, reliable estimates of the total number of political prisoners in Tibet, as in the rest of China, are not obtainable.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

China's judiciary is not independent but is controlled by the CCP. The highest court is the Supreme People's Court. The next level is the High Provincial People's Court, followed by the Intermediate Local People's Court, and then the Basic Local County People's Court. Separate and special military, maritime, and railway courts function directly under the Supreme People's Court.

In recent years the CCP and the Government have moved toward establishment of a more independent legal system. There have been efforts to define broadly stated laws more narrowly, including the provisions of the law on "crimes of counterrevolution," to make clear what are criminally indictable offenses. Programs have been set up to provide professional training for judges through overseas training courses to acquaint them with legal procedures in the West. Since June, however, the impetus for legal reform has waned.

Due process rights are stipulated under the Constitution but are often ignored in practice. The law requires that all trials be held in public, except those involving state secrets, juveniles, and "personal secrets." It also states that a defendant may be held in custody during investigation prior to the trial for a maximum of 2 months, although a 1-month extension may be requested from the next highest procuratorate. The procuratorate then has 1 1/2 months to decide whether or not to prosecute the case. An additional month is permitted if "supplementary investigation" is needed. Any further delay requires approval of the Standing Committee of the NPC. In practice, the period of pretrial detention can be much longer. Two American citizens arrested for alleged fraud and forgery were held for 7 months before a decision was made not to prosecute.

The procuratorate sends to trial only those persons it determines are guilty. Persons appearing before the court are presumed guilty, and trials are thus, in effect, sentencing hearings. Defense lawyers almost never contest their client's guilt; their function is generally confined to requesting clemency. There is an appeal process, but initial decisions are rarely overturned, and sentences can actually be increased. Defendants are expected to "show the right attitude" by confessing their crime, and, because they are presumed guilty, those who fail to confess are treated more harshly.

The Government has publicly announced the executions of a score of persons who were tried and found guilty of crimes directly linked to the spring demonstrations. For example, three were executed in Shanghai on June 22 allegedly for burning a train, seven in Beijing on June 22 allegedly for "setting fire to military trucks, stealing military goods, and assaulting soldiers," and two in Chengdu in July allegedly for arson. A factory worker in Jinan was sentenced to death in late October for allegedly setting fire to a car, three in Chengdu in November for burning a cinema, and two in Beijing in December for beating a policeman to death.

The Government has repeatedly argued that those executed were "legally" found guilty of destroying government property or other internationally recognized crimes, and not of political offenses. The executions in Shanghai at least tend to belie the Government's assertion. On June 6, during demonstrations protesting the massacre of civilians in Beijing, a train ran over a group of demonstrators in the Shanghai suburbs, killing six. Angered by this, hundreds of people reportedly stormed that train or the next train nearing the station and burned it. A railway court convicted and sentenced to death three people for burning the train. No one was detained in connection with the death of the six demonstrators. The Government contended that the defendants were accorded their full rights. Serious doubts about the fairness of the trial remain, however, including the excessive sentences, the selection of these three persons for prosecution from among the hundreds involved, the hurried nature of the trial, and the mental competence of at least one of the defendants. Given the near total lack of procedural safeguards in these trials, government claims that the accused received "due process" are not credible.

Those arrested for crimes of counterrevolution frequently are tried in secret and family members are not informed of the charges or details of the case. Credible reports suggest that even years after the conviction and imprisonment of a person considered a dissident, family members still do not know the details of the alleged crime.

A number of political prisoners jailed in previous cycles of repression, notably "Democracy Wall" dissident Wei Jingsheng, remain in prison. Yang Wei, a former student in the United States who was jailed for 2 years for activities during the 1986 demonstrations, was released in January but detained again in July for involvement in the spring protests. Among those who have been tried and convicted for clearly political offenses during 1989 are Xiao Bin, who received a 10-year sentence for "spreading rumors" about the demonstrations to the American Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) television; Zhang Weiping, sentenced to 9 years' imprisonment for telephoning information on Hangzhou protests to the Voice of America (VOA); and Chen Zhixiang, a teacher in Guangzhou who was given 10 years for painting a "counterrevolutionary" slogan. Persistent reports claim that many others, perhaps several hundred, have been secretly convicted of similar political offenses.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law requires that search warrants be issued before authorities may search premises, but it is often ignored. It is unlikely the army and the security forces obtained warrants prior to their raids on homes and businesses to arrest "counterrevolutionaries" for their role in the democracy demonstrations.

CHINA

Personal and family life are extensively monitored and regulated by authorities. Most persons depend on their work unit for employment, housing, ration coupons, permission to marry or have a child, and other aspects of ordinary life. The work unit, along with the neighborhood watch committee, monitors activities and attitudes. In the wake of the demonstrations, authorities have redefined the function of the neighborhood watch committees, requiring them to work more closely with the Public Security Bureau. Mail is often opened and read, telephones monitored, and television cameras located at some key intersections, in luxury hotels, and in some buildings. After the post-Tiananmen crackdown began, the authorities produced television footage from clandestine cameras showing alleged Taiwan spies observing the Tiananmen Square demonstrations, and student leader Wuer Kaixi and other demonstrators eating at the Beijing Hotel.

The Government strictly regulates dealings between Chinese citizens and foreigners. Virtually all foreigners are forced to live separately in designated residential compounds, and all Chinese entering the foreign areas are closely monitored by guards and video cameras on roofs and in elevators. Residences of foreign diplomats, journalists, and businessmen are assumed to be electronically and physically monitored.

The Chinese Government maintains a comprehensive and highly intrusive family planning program. Individual and family decisions about bearing children are controlled by the State, with severe sanctions against those who deviate from official guidelines. The Central Government sets an annual nationwide goal for the number of births to be authorized. This is then apportioned among provinces, and further down through prefecture, county, town, and district levels. Ultimately, each work unit (village, factory, or government office) receives a target figure for births over the next few years. As the allotments are quite small, couples wishing to have a second child often must wait many years before receiving permission. In some areas, newly married couples have also been required to wait years before having their first child.

While strongly encouraging all couples to have only one child, Chinese policy allows two or more children for many rural families. Members of ethnic minorities, particularly in remote areas, are also generally not subject to the same strict limitations imposed on the Han majority.

Implementation of the policy varies widely from place to place and from year to year. In many areas, couples apparently are able to have several children without incurring any penalty, while in other areas enforcement has been excessively harsh. Periodic campaigns exhort all Chinese to have fewer children, to have them later in life, and to space them more widely. When national targets are not met, officials call for stricter implementation, and some have advocated more coercive methods than central government policy currently authorizes. Local officials have great discretion in how, and how severely, the policy is implemented.

Under China's national Marriage Law, women may not legally marry before age 20; men before age 22. In practice, early marriages are discouraged, and the press frequently extols the virtues of later marriage. Lack of available housing and other social concerns are often cited as additional reasons to delay marriage.

Couples are not allowed free choice about whether to practice family planning, how many children they may have, or when they may have them. In practice, most couples have little choice concerning the form of birth control to use.

The population control policy relies primarily on heavy doses of education and propaganda, augmented by severe psychological pressure on those who resist. Disciplinary measures against couples who violate the policy include stiff fines (often as high as a year's salary), withholding of social services, demotion, and other administrative punishments. If a unit exceeds its allocation, punishment may be meted out to the offending couples, to unit officials, and to the unit as a whole. Some local officials have reportedly destroyed or confiscated the private property of families with unauthorized children if fines are not paid. In 1988 a Chinese couple studying in the United States, Dr. Li Quanbang and Ms. Ping Hong, were threatened with severe punishment if Ms. Ping refused to abort her second child before returning to China. Ms. Ping's employer warned her that, if she returned, she would have to have an abortion even in the third trimester of pregnancy. If she insisted on having the child, she would be placed on probation and the entire factory would be punished. Eventually the authorities relented, but the U.S. Government determined that the Li family and a few other Chinese couples who faced similar situations had demonstrated a well-founded fear of persecution and granted them asylum in the United States.

Physical compulsion to submit to abortion or sterilization is not authorized, but continues to occur as officials strive to meet population targets. Reports of forced abortions and sterilizations continue, though well below the levels of the early 1980's. In early 1989, a U.S. Congressional staff delegation interviewed Tibetan refugees in Nepal. They, and some previous news stories, reported harrowing accounts of abuses in Tibet.

Chinese officials have consistently maintained that China does not condone forced abortion and sterilization and that officials who commit such abuses are punished. They admit, however, that such punishment is rare and have refused to provide documentation of any punishments.

Female infanticide also persists in some rural areas. Insistence that local officials meet population goals has contributed to the reemergence of this traditional practice, generally by parents who hope to have more sons without incurring official punishment. There are allegations that some Chinese officials and doctors have participated in infanticide or in abortions so late in pregnancy as to be tantamount to infanticide. The Chinese Government strongly opposes infanticide, to the point of prosecuting offenders, but has been unable to eradicate it.

One recent development in China's population control policy was the passage in November 1988 of a set of eugenic regulations in Gansu province prohibiting people with severe mental handicaps from having children. Provincial officials estimate the rules will affect some 26,000 persons whose intelligence quotient is judged to be 49 or lower. Should any of these persons decide to marry, one spouse must undergo sterilization. For those already married, one partner must be sterilized and any pregnancies compulsorily aborted. Officials claim that permission for any operation requires the consent of a mentally competent relative but acknowledge that heavy psychological pressure may be employed to obtain consent. As of December 1989, provincial officials said that 1,714 persons had been identified as requiring sterilization, and 731 operations had been performed. According to a Health Ministry official, the Government is drafting a new law to extend the ban nationwide.

Despite a decade of efforts, officials acknowledge that population growth has significantly exceeded the national targets and that the goal of holding China's population to 1.2 billion by the end of the century will not be met. This realization, together with a recent escalation of official rhetoric, have led some observers to suggest that China may be entering a new cycle of strict enforcement of family planning policies, after a period of relative relaxation.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

On June 3-4, in order to clear peaceful demonstrators who had occupied Tiananmen Square for several weeks, PLA troops fired heavily and indiscriminately at crowds in the approaches to and around Tiananmen Square, resulting in at least hundreds of deaths and thousands of injuries. Some were crushed by military vehicles driven into the crowd. The PLA also suffered scores of casualties as enraged citizens fought back. According to Western diplomats, some PLA casualties also resulted from soldiers accidentally shooting or injuring other soldiers. While it is difficult to know precisely how many civilians died or were injured, the numbers are certainly far greater than those cited by authorities. Mayor Chen Xitong, in a speech before the National People's Congress Standing Committee on June 30, said over 200 civilians were killed, including 36 students, and 3,000 injured, with "dozens of soldiers and police killed and 6,000 injured." Hospitals and human rights groups, however, provided much higher estimates. Visiting several hospitals in Beijing after the June 3-4 massacre, diplomats and other observers viewed scores of dead civilians, including women and children, with bullet wounds and other injuries, and heard from medical personnel the hardships the hospitals faced in treating the dead and injured. At one hospital, doctors said that on June 3, 50 civilians had died from bullet wounds in their hospital alone.

The authorities clearly used excessive deadly force against the demonstrators. While they used tear gas and rubber bullets briefly in some areas of Beijing, the PLA and security forces relied primarily on lethal force rather than traditional riot control techniques to clear demonstrators from the roads leading to Tiananmen Square. Foreign diplomats and their families did not escape the heavy-handed actions of the PLA. On June 7, PLA soldiers, allegedly returning fire from a sniper, shot at a diplomatic housing complex, spraying scores of apartments with gunfire but causing no casualties. Chinese authorities have produced no evidence that a sniper was actually present in the compound and firing at the PLA.

Security forces used excessive force in breaking up a religious ceremony and demonstration by members of the underground Catholic Church near Shijiazhuang, Hebei Province in April, leaving 2 civilians dead and at least 150 injured.

CHINA

In another major incident involving the use of excessive force during demonstrations in Lhasa on March 5-7, police shot and killed scores of Tibetan monks and their supporters.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and self-expression are severely restricted. Limited criticism of government policies and officials is tolerated and had increased in recent years. However, the limits were tightened again after June 4. Citizens are not permitted to criticize senior leaders or to express opinions contrary to the "Four Cardinal Principles": Marxism/Leninism/Mao Zedong Thought as the theoretical foundation of the State, socialism as its goal, Communist Party leadership, and the "people's democratic dictatorship" (which includes the right to use force against "counter-revolutionaries").

Those who violate these guidelines frequently are severely punished. Xiao Bin, a worker in Dalian, was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment for expressing personal views on the Beijing massacre to an ABC news crew, and Zhang Weiping, a student, was sentenced to 9 years' imprisonment for informing VOA about antigovernment demonstrations.

Renowned scientist and dissident Fang Lizhi sent senior leader Deng Xiaoping an open letter on January 6 appealing for amnesty for political prisoners. On February 16, 33 prominent intellectuals signed an open letter to the national leadership supporting Fang's call for amnesty. The Government attacked the letter in the official press on February 23 and later characterized it as an act of "counterrevolution." Some signatories have since fled China while others have been detained. Security forces stepped up surveillance of Fang and restricted his movements. He and his wife Li Shuxian were physically prevented from attending a banquet in Beijing hosted by President and Mrs. Bush. In June Fang and Li took refuge in the U.S. Embassy, after which the Government charged them with criminal "counterrevolutionary" activity and named them as key "conspirators" in the student demonstrations.

Television and radio are strictly controlled by the Government and used to propagate the party's version of events. In the wake of the June 3-4 events, the authorities began a massive disinformation campaign, asserting that the spring demonstrations had evolved into a counterrevolutionary rebellion led by a few conspirators. State Council spokesman Yuan Mu claimed on June 16 that only 300 had died on June 3-4, half of them PLA soldiers. Regular programming was replaced by special programs giving the CCP's version of events. These programs were broadcast several times a day for weeks. In July China Central Television (CCTV) broadcast a four-part program conveying the official version of the massacre. Events were altered to suggest that the troops had been called in to "quell a riot" rather than that troops fired on peaceful demonstrators who then reacted in a rage. Again on September 23, CCTV televised a special program countering charges by activists in the United States and featuring comments by Liu Xiaobo, detained since June, denying that anyone had died in Tiananmen Square. In the wake of the massacre, television news constantly replayed assertions of government officials such as Yuan Mu and selected remarks by the handful of foreign observers supportive of the Government position.

Following the imposition of martial law in Beijing, the Chinese cut off the satellite feed for U.S. network news services. Security authorities and PLA soldiers on the night of June 3-4 detained two U.S. reporters along with a number of other foreign journalists. In the aftermath, authorities severely restricted the movements of foreign journalists, harassing and expelling several of them.

After an 11-year moratorium, the Government resumed jamming VOA Chinese-language broadcasts on May 21. The official press has harshly attacked VOA reports, claiming that they were part of a Western conspiracy to subvert China. Chinese authorities confiscated film from foreigners leaving the country and insisted on developing it for review and censorship.

Restrictions on the publication of books and other printed material, which had generally eased during the 1980's, have become much more stringent since June. Print media, like the broadcast media, have been used to disseminate disinformation about the spring demonstrations and the Government's crackdown.

A number of journalists were detained or otherwise officially harassed in 1989. During the demonstrations, then Shanghai Party Secretary Jiang Zemin sacked the editor of the World Economic Herald, Qin Benli, and closed the newspaper, silencing one of the country's few independent journalistic voices. Since June, Qin has been under investigation. His Beijing bureau chief was arrested and several staff writers are still detained. Other journalists apparently still under detention include personnel from the government mouthpiece People's Daily, the official English-language China Daily, Guangming Daily, and Radio Beijing. Others have been dismissed from their jobs for printing material at variance with the party line, including editor Tan Wenrui and director Qian Liren of People's Daily, publisher Zhang Li and editor Li Jiawei of the Sichuan Provincial Social Science Academy Publishing House, Editor-in-chief Yao Xihua of the Guangming Daily, Editor-in-Chief Li Xiaoshi and Deputy Editor-in-Chief Sun Changjiang of the Science and Technology Daily.

On July 17 the Government temporarily removed from the newsstands foreign language newspapers, magazines, and publications in order to limit access by Chinese citizens to foreign news and to consolidate government control over the importation and distribution of foreign printed material. While the ban was lifted at the end of August, tighter control on distribution has enabled authorities to censor foreign language material more effectively. For example, several issues of the Far Eastern Economic Review were withheld from newsstands or had offending articles removed. More recently, foreign media reports on the overthrow of Romanian dictator Ceaucescu have been barred from distribution.

The Government reportedly has also banned publications by activists and other authors considered unacceptable. Writings by astrophysicist Fang Lizhi and his wife Li Shuxian, investigative journalist Liu Binyan, playwright Su Xiaokang, intellectuals such as Su Shaozhi, Bao Tong, Jin Guantao, Ge Yang, Cao Siyuan, Li Honglin, Zhang Xianyang, Dai Qing, Liu Xiaobo, Yan Jiaqi, and dozens of others have reportedly been banned. Li Ruihuan, member of the Standing Committee of the Politburo, on August 24 announced a campaign to "clean up and rectify" the publishing and audiovisual industries. Li said the campaign was aimed at curbing publications advocating "bourgeois liberalization" (Western social, political, and cultural ideas) and pornography.

In the wake of the student demonstrations, the Government has worked to reimpose more rigid ideological control over the school system. The State Education Commission ordered that 30,000 fewer first-year students be admitted to universities for the fall 1989 semester. The cuts were primarily among those seeking to study the social sciences. The number of students studying Western philosophy, political science, and management were reduced. The entire first-year class at Beijing University, a main center for the demonstrations, was sent to an isolated camp for a year of military training and ideological indoctrination. (The Government said this program might be expanded to include additional universities in the future.) Some recent college graduates are being sent from Beijing to the countryside or to factories for ideological training. On July 1, a State Education Commission official told the Chinese press that "students' level of patriotism and willingness to serve their country should be major criteria" in decisions on who should be permitted to study overseas. Required study of the writings of Communist theoreticians has been sharply increased.

Investigations into press activities have led to intimidation of journalists and broadcasters, stronger press control, and a complete halt, for now, of press reform. The Government has made it clear that the press must support the party line and cannot question the "Four Cardinal Principles." The detention of journalists and broadcasters described in earlier sections reinforced the Government's message.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Article 35 of the Constitution guarantees the right "of assembly, of association, of procession, and of demonstration," but such activities may not infringe "upon the interests of the State" (Article 51). In an effort to prevent students from again demonstrating or occupying Tiananmen Square, the National People's Congress Standing Committee on October 31 adopted a law governing assemblies, parades, and demonstrations that significantly limits the right of individuals or groups to organize mass political activities.

The law, in theory, guarantees the right to assemble and demonstrate but stipulates that parades and demonstrations must abide by the Constitution and laws and may not "infringe on the interests of the State, society, and collectives or the legitimate freedoms and rights of other citizens." In practice, this proscribes any protests against socialism or the leadership. Moreover, this stipulation could be used to ban protests that disrupt traffic, interfere with business, or occupy public places, and all acts that could be interpreted as "infringing" on the freedoms of other citizens. Also banned are demonstrations that advocate national separatism or jeopardize national unity.

The law does not apply to "traditional cultural, recreational, or sports activities; normal religious activities; nor traditional, nongovernmental activities among the people." Also exempt are celebrations held by the State and assemblies held by "state organs, political parties, social groups, enterprises, or institutions in accordance with the law or their organic charters." Presumably, local authorities retain the power to determine what are "normal" religious activities; unapproved gatherings, such as evangelical revivals, religious retreats, and outdoor masses could be restricted or banned. Similarly, local officials would decide when "traditional" cultural activities carry unacceptable political overtones related to such sensitive issues as national separatism.

Procedures for obtaining a permit are extremely restrictive and constructed in such a way as to discourage exercise of the right of assembly. Demonstration organizers must apply for a permit at least 5 days before the event, specifying the purpose, type of demonstration, slogans to be used, the number of participants and vehicles, the routes and times of the march, the number and type of audio equipment, and the names, addresses, and occupations of sponsors. Marches are generally to be confined to the hours of 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. except with special permission. The law reserves to local officials the right to change the time, location, and route of a demonstration, even after giving approval, requiring only that they "promptly notify" the sponsors. Citizens cannot organize or participate in demonstrations outside their own locality, nor can government employees organize or participate in protests that "go against their responsibilities and obligations prescribed in relevant laws and regulations."

Professional and other mass associations are for the most part organized and controlled by the Communist Party. Other new regulations require all organizations to be officially registered and approved, including societies, research units, foundations, and chambers of commerce. Ostensibly aimed at secret societies and criminal gangs, the regulations are also used to prevent the formation of unauthorized political or labor organizations, such as the student and worker groups that emerged before and during the spring prodemocracy protests. The regulations can also be used to close down unregistered house churches or discussion groups that local leaders deem potentially subversive.

In parts of Beijing, martial law was imposed on May 20 and remained in effect until lifted in January 1990. Under martial law, groups of people were not permitted to gather and demonstrations were strictly forbidden. Martial law has also been in effect in Lhasa since demonstrations broke out there in early March. In areas where martial law is not in effect, authorities also have adopted a stricter policy toward allowing groups of people to assemble. Informants and security forces maintain a close watch on groups formed outside the Party establishment, particularly unauthorized religious groups and other associations. Associations recognized by the State are permitted to maintain relations with recognized international bodies, but these contacts are monitored and limited by the Government.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious freedom is subject to tight constraints. While the Constitution affirms toleration of religious beliefs, the Government severely restricts religious practice outside the officially recognized and government-controlled religious institutions. Religious proselytizing is restricted to officially sanctioned places of worship or to the homes of persons properly registered with an officially recognized religious institution. Religious conversion is tolerated (though generally not for Communist Party members).

By far the largest group of religious believers in China are Buddhists who belong to the dominant Han ethnic group. Han Buddhist leaders generally cooperate with the Government and have experienced few reported difficulties. Daoism, widely practiced in southern coastal provinces, is officially respected as an important part of traditional Chinese culture, but many of its practices conflict with government strictures against superstition and waste of arable land and have been heavily criticized. China permits Muslim citizens to make the hajj to Mecca, and over 2,000 Chinese, most subsidized by the Chinese Government or by overseas Muslims, make the journey annually.

The Government insists that no religious institution may be subject to foreign domination or influence. In order to eliminate perceived foreign domination of Christian groups in the past, the Government in the 1950's established the Catholic Patriotic Association (CPA) and the Protestant Three Self Movement (TSM). The CPA ordains its own bishops and priests, generally follows pre-Vatican II practices, and rejects papal authority. Proselytizing by foreign groups is forbidden. Americans and other foreigners have been expelled for distributing Bibles or proselytizing. Twelve Americans were detained in Kunming on June 23 and were later expelled for having imported religious materials. Officially sanctioned religious organizations are permitted to maintain international contacts as long as these do not entail foreign control. The TSM and its Buddhist and Muslim counterparts have established extensive networks of international support. The CPA has no official ties to Catholic churches outside China, but its leaders frequently visit Catholic and other religious leaders abroad.

Tibetan Buddhism is also tightly controlled. Religious activity is thriving with some government support, though the number of monasteries and monks remains far below the pre-1949 level. The Government does not tolerate religious manifestations that advocate Tibetan independence. The Government recognizes the Dalai Lama as a major religious figure, but condemns his political activities and his leadership of a "government in exile." As with other religions, Tibetan Buddhist activities are subject to government monitoring and control. The Government exercised a considerable degree of control over the late Tibetan Buddhist Panchen Lama, the second most revered religious figure in Tibetan Buddhism. Following his death early in 1989, the State Council approved procedures for selecting the "reincarnated" Panchen Lama which will give the Government a prominent role.

After forcefully suppressing all religious observance during the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, the Government began in the late 1970's to restore or replace confiscated churches, temples, mosques, and monasteries. The official religious organizations administer more than a dozen Catholic and Protestant seminaries, nine institutes to train imams and Islamic scholars, and institutes to train Buddhist monks. The Government supervises the publication of religious material for distribution, to ensure that it conforms to religious beliefs and philosophical positions sanctioned by the Government.

There are active underground religious movements which pose an alternative to the state-regulated churches and temples. The Catholic underground church claims a membership far larger than the 3.5 million officially registered with the CPA, though actual figures are unknown. It has its own bishops and priests and conducts its own services. Protestants also conduct private services independent of government control; some of these groups are apparently quite dynamic. The Christian underground movement imports religious materials, including Bibles, from abroad. Underground church officials reject legally published material because it does not conform to their beliefs. The Government generally tolerates but sometimes actively suppresses nonsanctioned religious groups. Security forces have raided illegal underground services, resulting in arrests, injuries, and even deaths, as in the raid on an underground Catholic service in Hebei in April in which 2 persons were reportedly killed and 150 were injured.

A large number of Catholic leaders and somewhat fewer Protestants have spent long periods in prison. Most long-term Catholic prisoners had been released by late 1987, but detentions continue. Bishops Julius Jia Guozhi, Joseph Fan Xueyan, Pietro Liu Guandong, Giuseppe Li Side, Jiang Liren, Mattia Lu Zhensheng, Filippo Yang Lipo, Paolo Li Zhenrong, Bartolomeo Yu Chengdi, and other priests in the underground Catholic Church as well as underground Protestant leaders were reportedly detained during 1989 for varying periods of time. Underground Catholic Bishop Casimir Wang Milu has not been seen since his arrest in 1986 and is presumed to be in prison. As of year's end, no information was available on at least 20 Catholic priests detained by security forces in Hebei, Gansu, Sichuan, and Fujian provinces. International human rights groups report that at least 30 underground Protestant leaders may also be in detention.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government uses an identification (ID) card system to restrict the movement of Chinese citizens within the country. Citizens are registered as residents of a particular jurisdiction and assigned to a specific work unit. Movement within the country or change of workplace can, in most cases, be done only with government permission and agreement by the work unit. Those workers on short-term work contracts with a work unit have more leeway in movement. On expiration of a contract, the worker may be able to negotiate a position in another area or continue his contract. Significant numbers of farmers have moved from the countryside to cities in search of employment. Authorities are trying to limit the migration, but they estimate there are at least a million unregistered persons in Shanghai and Guangzhou and 700,000 in Beijing. Measures undertaken in connection with the Government's current austerity program will result in large-scale unemployment and authorities reportedly intend to enforce their return to the countryside.

After the June disorders, the Ministry of Public Security ordered full national implementation of regulations on carrying and checking residents' identification cards as of September 15. The cards have been under partial and experimental use for several years.

CHINA

Under the new procedures, citizens are required to carry their ID cards at all times when out of doors and must present them on demand of authorities. They must also present ID cards when registering for voting, residence, military service, marriage, or school entrance; applying for employment, licenses, loans, notarization of documents, social insurance or relief, travel to restricted areas or to leave the country; participating in lawsuits; picking up mail or claiming remittances; boarding an airplane; or registering in a hotel.

More stringent scrutiny of ID cards will close loopholes through which many Chinese have slipped in recent years. Some have used the relative freedom of travel to act as business middlemen and fixers, often involved in quasi-legal or illegal cash-and-carry deals, money changing, and black market activity. Also likely to be caught in the tighter net are itinerant preachers and evangelists, many of whom lack a permanent residence. Recent Chinese press reports decry incidents in which people caught without their ID card were subjected to extortion by police or shaken down by criminals posing as police.

Existing restrictions on foreign travel were tightened in 1989. In the wake of the Beijing massacre, the Government has implemented more restrictive criteria for passport issuance. Procedures reportedly include obtaining a political "bill of good health" from the work unit and its party committee and submitting to background checks by the Public Security Bureau (and, in Beijing, the martial law command). Passport applicants are screened to determine the applicant's political loyalty and his role in the spring demonstrations. The double exit permit system implemented on June 20 was designed to support this objective. In Shanghai, dissident Zhang Cai was detained at the airport when trying to board a flight out of China. There are also reports that some Chinese who marry foreigners and wish to emigrate have had to repay the cost of their education in order to obtain a passport.

The Government has imposed restrictions on overseas studies. New regulations reportedly require tighter ideological screening, and perhaps several years' work experience, as prerequisites for permission to study overseas. Furthermore, lower limits will be set on the number of publicly funded students sent abroad to study humanities, with the emphasis instead going to more practical studies such as the sciences and specialized training.

China has continued to relax restrictions on internal travel by foreigners. Since last year it has increased the number of cities open to foreign visitors from 504 to 626. Tibet, the capital of which remains under martial law, has begun again to allow tourism. Tourists, however, must travel in groups of at least three, obtain prior permission, and travel with officially designated travel agencies. Most requests by foreign diplomats for travel to Tibet since March have been denied.

China encourages its citizens who are legally overseas studying or doing research to return to assist in China's development. Some 35,000 Chinese citizens are currently studying or conducting research in the United States. The State Education Commission declared on December 8 that scholars returning from overseas would not be held accountable for participation in prodemocracy activities while abroad. However, many of these scholars claim that they or their families have been subject to threats of reprisals by Chinese officials.

The Chinese Government accepts repatriation of PRC citizens who have entered other countries or territories illegally. The Hong Kong Government says it returned to the PRC 11,392 illegal immigrants in the first 9 months of 1989, compared to 21,001 in 1988. None of those returned were believed to be considered by the PRC Government to have been participants in or supporters of the spring demonstrations. To retaliate against the Hong Kong Government for having allowed dissident swimmer Yang Yang to depart for the United States, the PRC temporarily suspended repatriation for 2 weeks in October. Japanese authorities have decided to proceed with repatriation of illegal immigrants from China who entered Japan by sea during the summer of 1989. It remains unclear what punishment, if any, these PRC citizens will face once they have been repatriated.

China accepted more than 280,000 refugees and displaced persons from Vietnam and Laos between 1978 and 1982. These refugees were predominantly ethnic Han Chinese or married to ethnic Chinese. In recent years, the Government has adopted a stricter policy of "no new admissions." Thus, Chinese authorities currently discourage Vietnamese refugees from settling in China. There have been persistent reports that local authorities along China's southern coast help to provide food, water, and fuel to Vietnamese migrants so they may proceed to Hong Kong, and in some cases, to Japan and Korea. There also have been credible reports that Vietnamese refugees reaching China's interior provinces have been forcibly repatriated. Other credible reports suggest that the PRC has also repatriated persons of other nationalities seeking refugee status. Although China signed the Comprehensive Plan of Action (CPA) negotiated at the International Conference on Indochinese Refugees in Geneva in June 1989, it is unclear whether China considers itself a CPA "participating state." China has yet to create formal mechanisms to enforce CPA provisions, and its policy on the principle of first asylum remains ambiguous.

The people of China do not have the right or the ability peacefully and legally to change their government. Chinese citizens can neither freely choose nor change the laws and officials which govern them. China is ruled by the CCP, the paramount source of political authority. Within the party, a closed inner circle of a few senior leaders exercise ultimate power over the nation. Most hold key positions within the six-member Standing Committee of the Politburo, the Central Military Commission, or other organs. Former senior leaders continue to influence government policy. Deng Xiaoping remains first among equals in this group despite his formal retirement in October. The senior party leadership determines policy, which is then implemented by the Government. According to the 1982 Constitution, the National People's Congress (NPC) is the highest organ of state power. It nominally selects the President and Vice President, decides on the choice of the Premier, and elects the Chairman of the Central Military Commission. It had been granted, and had begun to exercise, increasing independence and influence during the late 1980's. Debates had become much more open, and several important government proposals were sent back for further study. During the May-June crisis, some NPC members attempted to convene an extraordinary meeting of the body to revoke the Government's declaration of martial law in Beijing, but were unable to do so. Since that time, the NPC has generally resumed its previous role of ratifying decisions already made by the senior leadership.

The Government neither tolerates dissent nor accepts challenges to its authority. The authorities denounce as "counterrevolutionary" proposals to limit the power of the Party or to alter the nation's ideology. The Government's handling of the spring demonstrations, the killing of its citizens, its subsequent crackdown on dissent, and its massive disinformation campaign aimed at rewriting history demonstrate the senior leadership's determination to retain power.

China rejects the concept of universal human rights despite its adherence to the United Nations Charter, which mandates respect for and promotion of human rights. Chinese official commentators in recent months have increasingly argued that each nation has the right to define human rights as it pertains to the human conditions existing within that country. No nation or international organization, they say, has the "legal right" to apply its definition of human rights to conditions in other countries. Officials strongly reject any criticism of China's human rights situation by international human rights organizations and other nations, and they assert that international groups and foreign nations use human rights as a means to interfere in China's internal affairs.

A resolution passed by the U. N. Human Rights Commission's (UNHRC) Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities in August, calling on the Secretary General to collect information on the human rights situation in China, was denounced by the Chinese Government as brazen interference in its internal affairs. China defended its use of force in suppressing the demonstrations in June legalistically, citing the legitimate right of the Chinese authorities "to maintain law and order." It has also rejected Amnesty International's August 1989 report condemning the June massacre, and it has harshly and aggressively attacked the VOA for its coverage of and commentary on the June events.

In October the Government denounced the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to the Dalai Lama, who has been an outspoken critic of human rights violations in Tibet, as "gross interference in China's internal affairs" and as "hurting the feelings of the Chinese people." A Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesman on October 7 said that awarding the Nobel Peace Prize to the Dalai Lama "constitutes open support to the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan separatists in their activities to undermine and split China."

There are no organizations within China which specifically monitor or comment on human rights conditions. The Government crushed an incipient human rights monitoring group--Amnesty 89--following the June crackdown and has made it clear that it will not tolerate the existence of such a group. It has reacted with equal defensiveness to international accusations of human rights violations in Tibet. Authorities have refused to respond to charges of human rights violations in connection with the killing of demonstrators in Lhasa on March 5-7. They have generally not permitted reporters or human rights workers to visit Tibet, have refused diplomatic requests to discuss human rights issues, and have generally denied diplomats access to Tibet.

While laws designed to protect women and minorities exist, in practice discrimination persists in housing, jobs, education, and other aspects of life based on sex, religion, race, and class. The 1982 Constitution states that "women in the People's Republic of China enjoy equal rights with men in all spheres of life," and it promises, among other things, equal pay for equal work. In fact, however, the general status of women is not equal to that of men, and there was no significant improvement in upholding women's rights or in the working conditions of women in 1989. By many standards, the status of women has regressed in recent years. Within the work force, 83 percent of the 220 million women employed perform physical labor. Seventy-seven percent of employed women work in agriculture, 13 percent in industry, and 4 percent in the service trade. In industry, most women are employed in lower skilled and lower paid occupations. The number of professional women is low. Women who graduate from college are less likely than men to be placed in prestigious positions. There is a significant wage gap between men and women performing the same tasks.

China's recent enterprise and labor reforms have sought to streamline enterprises and give workers greater job mobility. Women apparently bear the brunt of these reforms in terms of job insecurity and cutbacks in welfare programs. Many employers have admitted they prefer to hire men, citing the avoidance of maternity leave and child care provisions as their chief reason. Complaints from women of discrimination, unfair dismissal, demotion, or wage cuts when they needed maternity leave have risen significantly. There has been an increasing number of reports of young women in the special economic zones being fired when they become pregnant or reach child-bearing age. The New China News Agency reported that during factory efficiency drives in the second half of 1987, over 60 percent of "redundancies" were women. To combat the problem, on July 25, 1988, the State Council issued a regulation on female employees' legal rights, stating that work units will not be allowed to discriminate against women or reduce their maternity benefits, but there is no evidence that the regulation has been implemented effectively.

While the gap in the education levels of men and women is narrowing, the majority of the educated, particularly the highly educated, are men. Women now make up 37.4 percent of high school students and 25.7 percent of university students. Similarly, a disproportionate number of government-funded scholarships for overseas study go to men. Women also reportedly need higher scores than men to gain admission to select universities.

There are reports of violence against women, particularly wife beating, selling of women for wives, abuse of female children, and female infanticide in some rural areas--practices the Government condemns and attempts to curb. The Chinese have admitted that there is very little legal recourse to curb what is a traditional tolerance for abuse of women. Selling women for wives is a growing problem; in December the Government began a campaign against the practice, labeling it one of "six evils" to be eradicated. Official statistics are lacking but unofficial estimates are in the tens of thousands. A New York Times article quoted a confidential government document in September that cited the rising cost of traditional rural weddings (more than $2,500) versus the cost of buying a wife ($500 to $800) as one reason for the practice. Female children are seen, particularly in the countryside, as unproductive. They will leave the family and not provide assistance for the parents' retirement (as sons are expected to do). Some provincial and local authorities have attempted to ease this traditional bias by facilitating establishment of retirement homes. Many female children are forced to work long hours at an early age and are sometimes beaten if chores are not completed. Numerous reports tell of young girls being removed from school at the age of 8 or 9 to work in rural enterprises or the fields so that their families can "make some money from them before they leave home."

Chinese authorities have not succeeded in stopping abductions and the trading of women and children. People's Daily reported on November 15 that between 1981 and 1988 some 16,000 women and 900 children who were abducted in Shandong Province were saved by authorities. Of the more than 14,000 arrested for abducting women and children, 22 percent or 3,100 were sentenced to prison. The number of abductions nationwide is not known, but the statistics from Shandong would indicate that the number is high.

The economic progress of minorities is viewed by the Government as one of its significant achievements. Ethnic minorities benefit from special treatment in marriage and family planning, employment, and university admission. Nevertheless, discrimination based on ethnic origin persists. The concept of a largely homogeneous ethnic race of the Han people pervades the general thinking of the majority Han Chinese. Less than 7 percent of the population belong to one of the 55 designated ethnic minorities. Most reside in areas they have traditionally inhabited. Their standards of living remain far below the national average. Despite the CCP's avowed policy of increasing minority representation in the Government and in the CCP, ethnic minorities are effectively shut out of all but a few leadership positions and play a minor role in decisionmaking. Some minorities resent Han officials holding key positions in minority areas. Tibetans in Tibet and Uighurs in Xinjiang have demonstrated against Han Chinese authority. PLA troops are stationed in these areas, and martial law remains in place in Lhasa. During an inspection tour of Xinjiang August 26, Minister for Public Security Wang Fang accused Uighur separatists of fomenting local instability.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The PRC's 1982 Constitution guarantees "freedom of association," but the guarantee is heavily qualified by references to the interest of the State and the leadership of the CCP, and, in fact, workers do not have the right to form or join independent unions of their own choosing. Union membership is theoretically voluntary for individual employees, but each enterprise must have a union and each union must join the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU), nominally an independent organization, but in fact closely controlled by the CCP and the only legal national federation. Virtually all state-sector workers and nearly 90 percent of all urban sector workers belong to ACFTU chapters.

The right to strike, which had been included in China's 1975 and 1978 Constitutions, was removed from the 1982 Constitution on the grounds that the political system had eradicated class contradictions between the proletariat and capitalists. However, in 1983 the ACFTU Chairman stated that if a trade union and its labor protection safety officers found that a workplace was too dangerous, the union should organize the workers to leave the hazardous areas. Thus, authorities usually view strikes as justified only when they respond to problems such as a sudden deterioration in safety conditions. Nevertheless, strikes and, more commonly, work slowdowns do occur. In the first half of 1988, 49 strikes were reported officially. The number for 1989 is unknown, but reports of job actions in support of prodemocracy demonstrations in the spring of 1989 were widespread. Strikes and slowdowns generally occur over distribution of benefits or safety concerns at individual enterprises. They are usually resolved without the need for intervention from outside the enterprise. The usual role of the trade union in such strikes is to persuade the workers to return to their jobs.

During the countrywide political demonstrations in the spring of 1989, "Workers' Autonomous Federations" (WAF) were formed in major cities. The Beijing WAF claimed to represent over 100,000 workers from 40 industries in the capital. WAF leaders insisted they wanted to organize legally and did not oppose the rule of the CCP. The concerns of the WAF included bureaucratic corruption, wage disparities between workers and plant managers, the absence of workplace democracy, the lack of genuine workers' representation in the policymaking process, and poor safety and working conditions. Established primarily to mobilize and express workers' sympathy for the demands of student demonstrators, the WAF did not have time to build organizations at the enterprise level. Thus, although there are workers who purport to carry on the work of the WAF, the June crackdown apparently destroyed the federations. Many observers believe concern over growing worker support for students' demands prompted the Government to order troops into Tiananmen Square on June 3-4. According to international eyewitnesses, most of the Beijing WAF leaders were killed during the massacre.

After June 4, workers became a primary target of government reprisals. The Hong Kong Trade Union Education Center (HKTUEC) compiled a list of 211 workers arrested in connection with the demonstrations. According to the HKTUEC, 89 were held on charges related only to their participation in the autonomous federations. All of those known to have been executed for offenses linked to the demonstrations were manual workers.

At the ACFTU annual conference in December, its appointed president declared that "trade unions must implement resolutely the party's line and general and specific policies." A senior party official, addressing the conference, demanded that party committees at all levels "exercise centralized leadership" over the union movement. He explicitly ruled out the formation of independent unions:

organizations that contravene the "Four Cardinal Principles," put forward proposals contrary to party policy, or threaten state stability, would be "dealt with according to the law immediately."

The ACFTU claims to have contacts with trade unions in over 120 countries or regions and has stated that it will establish links with foreign unions regardless of whether they are affiliated with Western, Communist, or other federations. However, its relations with the International Labor Organization (ILO) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) have been strained. China has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 regarding Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining. The ICFTU vigorously protested Chinese violation of worker rights at the ILO Conference in Geneva shortly after the Beijing massacre. In November, the ILO's Governing Body approved stiff detailed questions on the death of workers during the massacre, arrests, death sentences, and executions, and government allegations against the WAF.

The Government does not permit collective bargaining. The terms and conditions of employment, including wages, are unilaterally determined through administrative regulations which are treated as confidential material and are not publicly available. Without legal status as a collective bargaining body, the ACFTU's role has been restricted to consultation in decisionmaking on wages and wage reforms. Trade unions have limited themselves to channeling workers' complaints to the management of individual enterprises or municipal labor bureaus.

Clause 33 of the "Provisional Directive on Private Enterprises in the PRC" issued on June 3, 1988 states that trade unions in private enterprises have the right to represent employees and to sign collective agreements with the enterprise. Depending on how it is implemented, this could form a basis for important new trade union rights in China.

Under the labor contract system, which now covers approximately 10 percent of the work force, individual workers may negotiate with management over contract terms. In practice, however, very few are able to negotiate effectively on salary and fringe benefits. At its October 1988 National Congress, the ACFTU leadership recognized that it would need to be more responsive to worker demands for benefits and improved safety conditions or face worker demands for a more independent union. In reaction to the creation of the WAF, the party began efforts to reassert control at every level of the union structure. Thus, unions enjoy less freedom of action than they have had for the last several years.

Labor practices in the Special Economic Zones do not vary substantially from national practice. Although there are reports of child laborers working in the Special Economic Zones, the practice appears more prevalent in small enterprises in the rural areas. Wages in the Special Economic Zones, like those in other Chinese enterprises, are set by the factory management in consultation with the factory Worker Congress. In general, wages in foreign-invested joint ventures tend to be higher than in Chinese enterprises.

Although Chinese workers still do not have complete mobility, foreign-invested joint ventures are given greater freedom to recruit workers than their Chinese counterparts are allowed. Like Chinese state-run and collective enterprises, joint ventures are required to have unions and to provide office space and facilities for union activities.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

China is still considering ratification of ILO Convention 105 on Forced Labor. Assignment of minor offenders to punitive "education through labor" camps without benefit of trial would appear to violate the Convention. Prisons and labor reform camps are expected to be partially self-supporting and thus require productive and profitable labor, with little compensation, from their inmates. Some observers consider the recent directives requiring students to perform manual labor during the school year and university graduates to work for a year or more in "grassroots units" before pursuing careers or graduate study as another form of compulsory labor. More broadly, the longstanding practice of unilaterally assigning school graduates at all levels to specific jobs and effectively trapping them in those jobs through the worker's dependence on the work unit deprives workers of any significant degree of choice in employment.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Regulations promulgated in 1987 prohibit the employment of school-age minors who have not completed the compulsory 9 years of education. The employment of child labor is pervasive, however, particularly in the rural areas and reportedly in the special economic zones. In addition, many private enterprises regularly employ children, often falsely representing them as the children of the enterprise owner. The problem is most serious in Guangdong Province, where a recent State Statistical Bureau survey found that only 71 percent of the province's school-age children were attending school. As noted (Section 5), there have also been increasing reports of children, particularly girls, being removed from school at the age of 8 or 9 to work in the fields. In September 1988, the Ministry of Labor issued a circular designed to curb pervasive child labor problems. It imposes severe fines, withdrawal of business licenses, or jail for employers who hire child laborers under 16 years of age. According to Ministry of Labor officials, however, the circular cannot be fully implemented until a national conference is convened sometime in 1990 to discuss the problem of child labor. Guangdong has not yet promulgated any regulations to enforce the 1987 directive.

China has not yet adopted a labor code, and deliberations on a draft labor law appear to have been derailed by the post-June crackdown. There is no minimum wage in China, although administrative regulations apparently fix the minimum at between $9 and $13 per month. A large proportion of a worker's income comes in the form of bonuses or subsidies added to a basic wage rate. For example, many foreign investors have found that basic salary costs may make up as little as 20 to 30 percent of overall costs per employee. As part of a comprehensive economic austerity program initiated in late 1988, the Government is attempting to reduce the amount of bonuses paid to workers.

CHINA

The maximum and normal workweek is 48 hours, of which 3 to 12 hours are generally spent in political study or "education" on current social issues. The time spent in political study increased sharply in the second half of 1989, particularly in work units whose members had been active in the spring demonstrations.

At factories and construction sites, occupational health and safety are constant themes of posters and campaigns. Every work unit of any size must designate a health and safety officer; the ILO has established a training program for these officials. Even so, general health and safety conditions in the workplace are extremely poor. The safety consciousness of both workers and managers is generally very low. State procurators deal annually with thousands of negligence and accident cases involving criminal or civil liability. The absence of a national labor code, however, makes enforcement of safety regulations extremely difficult.

TAIWAN

Taiwan in 1989 continued its transition from an authoritarian political system dominated by the Nationalist Party (KMT) to a more open and pluralistic system. In January the authorities legalized the establishment of opposition political parties. The largest opposition group, the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), registered as a legal party in April and vigorously contested the island-wide elections in December. The elections were the most free and fair in Taiwan's history.

The Legislative Yuan (LY), Taiwan's lawmaking body, continued to expand as a forum for policy debate. DPP and younger generation KMT legislators representing Taiwan constituencies influenced the policymaking process through interpellations and criticism of the Executive Yuan (the Cabinet). The LY is gradually becoming a more representative body as elderly members representing Chinese mainland constituencies die or retire. However, Taiwan's central parliamentary bodies, including the National Assembly (the Electoral College) as well as the LY, remained constituted under a representational formula that maintains the predominant role of the KMT. The authorities have initiated reforms to enhance the representative nature of these bodies, but changes remain controversial, both within the KMT and between the KMT and the opposition.

Native Taiwanese comprise an estimated 85 percent of the island's population, with Chinese mainlanders and their offspring comprising the remainder. As increasing numbers of Taiwanese and younger generation "mainlanders" ascend to leading administrative and political positions, including within the KMT, the dominant position of old guard KMT mainlanders continues to erode. However, leadership of the military and security agencies has remained predominantly mainland.

The military's role in politics has been reduced considerably since the lifting of martial law in 1987. However, several cases in 1989 raised questions about the military's level of tolerance for opposition criticism.

Taiwan's economy continued to grow at a rapid pace, with per capita income reaching a level of approximately $7,000. The unemployment rate was under 2 percent, with a resulting demand for immigrant labor. While basically a freemarket economy, major sectors--including finance, steel, shipbuilding, utilities, transportation, and petrochemicals--continued to be dominated by state-run enterprises. The trend, however, is towards greater economic liberalization. Privatization of state-run enterprises remained on the political agenda.

Human rights, already improved in comparison with the pre-1987 martial law period, continued to expand in 1989. While the trend towards a more open and pluralistic system continued in 1989 with the legalization of opposition political parties, important restrictions still remain. Principal areas of concern included restrictions on freedom of speech, press, movement, association, the right of citizens to change their government, and worker and women's rights. There were also concerns about politically motivated prosecutions, selective enforcement of the laws, and unfair campaign practices, including restrictions on access to the mass media.

TAIWAN

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of persons being abducted or secretly arrested by the authorities.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although Taiwan law expressly prohibits the use of torture, there continued to be credible reports of persons subjected to torture while in police custody. In some instances the authorities paid compensation to victims. There were two reported cases in 1989 of seven policemen given suspended sentences for such abuses. Ministry of Justice officials claim that all interrogations conducted by the Ministry's Investigation Bureau are tape-recorded and that all allegations of mistreatment are investigated. They also say that the right of persons to have an attorney present during interrogation is another check on torture. However, criminal lawyers and legal scholars note that abuses most often occur in local police stations where interrogations are not recorded and that most persons do not have attorneys present at the interrogation stage.

Police may legally arrest without a warrant anyone they suspect of committing a crime for which the punishment would be 5 years or more in prison and may call in persons for questioning without a formal summons. Critics in the legal establishment, the press, and the legislature point out that these procedures sometimes lead to abuses. Persons called in for questioning by the police are sometimes arrested without a warrant after questioning.

Taiwan law requires that, within 24 hours after an arrest, the arresting authorities must give notice in writing to the arrested person and his designated relative or friend, stating the reason for the arrest or detention. The code of criminal procedure specifies that the authorities may detain an accused person for up to 2 months during the investigation phase prior to filing a formal indictment, and for up to 3 months during the trial. Furthermore, during the investigative phase, the prosecuting officer may apply to the court for one extension of 2 months. The period of detention during trial may be extended twice. The authorities generally have followed these procedures and extended the periods of detention, although trial usually takes place within 3 months of indictment. Persons indicted for relatively minor criminal offenses can be released on bail at the judge's discretion.

The right to have a lawyer present during the investigation phase is generally respected, but defense lawyers complain that persons often are not advised of their right to have legal representation during police interrogation, and there is no legal requirement that indigent persons be provided with counsel.

In July 1985, the Legislative Yuan passed the "antihoodlum" law, which accords police authorities broad powers, including the power to determine whether a person should be designated as a "hoodlum." The civil courts confirm or deny police requests to remand alleged hoodlums for reformatory education. Human rights organizations and defense attorneys criticize the law as an extreme departure from appropriate standards of due process. Alleged hoodlums can be held incommunicado without legal representation, and their families need not be notified of their arrests. Attorneys for persons charged under the law have no right to examine documents or to cross-examine witnesses. There is no appeal from the decision to commit someone for reformatory education. Critics say that courts simply put a rubber stamp on police decisions.

Prior to the lifting of martial law, reformatory education for "hoodlums" was under the exclusive jurisdiction of the military. The process of transferring all nonmilitary prisoners to civilian control has been completed. The law does not authorize the courts to determine the length of reformatory education; police and prison authorities decide. The usual term is 3 to 6 months for a first offense. Repeat offenders are detained for longer periods and detention may be extended up to 3 years, depending on behavior in custody.

The antihoodlum law replaced a 1984 executive decree that did not set a time limit on incarceration. As of the end of 1988, authorities acknowledged holding 1,297 persons incarcerated under the decree and the succeeding law. This comprised about 10 percent of the prisoner population at the time. Authorities insist that they do not know how many of those now in custody are being held under the antihoodlum law.

Many minor crimes on Taiwan are handled under the police offenses law which authorizes police to punish an offender with incarceration of up to 14 days, a fine of no more than approximately $11.50, or forced labor of no more than 16 hours. Despite the 1980 opinion of the Council of Grand Justices (theoretically empowered to decide constitutional issues) that the statute is unconstitutional, it continues to be used, pending the enactment of a law for the maintenance of social order now before the legislature.

Under the executive decree and the police offenses law, the authorities reportedly imprisoned some 4,000 people in an anticrime sweep in 1984. The authorities say that all these have now been released but the laws which fail to provide basic due process protection remain on the books. There were complaints that police in certain localities threatened workers for opposition party candidates in the December 2 general elections with prosecution under the antihoodlum law or similar laws if they did not refrain from campaigning.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Taiwan's legal system is based on European and Japanese models and does not provide for trial by jury. All judges are appointed by, and responsible to, the Judicial Yuan. Informed observers characterize the judiciary as not fully independent and as susceptible to political and personal pressure.

TAIWAN

Since the lifting of martial law on July 15, 1987, civilians may no longer be tried in military courts. Trials are public, but attendance at trials involving juveniles or politically sensitive issues may require permission from the court. Defendants have a right to an attorney, but an attorney will be assigned by the court only in serious cases. In all other cases, responsibility for obtaining counsel rests with the defendant.

In a typical court case, parties and witnesses are interrogated by a single judge but not by a defense attorney or prosecutor. The judge may decline to hear witnesses or to consider evidence a party wishes to submit. Civil and criminal law specifically provide the defendant with protection from self-incrimination.

Court cases generally are heard in several brief court sessions, often separated by weeks or months. Persons convicted in cases where the sentence exceeds 3 years have a right to review. The Supreme Court limits its review to the legal aspects of the case and to specific procedural aspects. The National Security Law stipulates, contrary to provisions in the original martial law decrees, that convictions under martial law cannot be appealed in the postmartial law period.

In most cases, judicial decisions must be approved by higher court authorities before pronouncement. Although this power is supposed to be restricted to correcting errors of law and usage of legal terms, observers say this dilutes the authority of judges and tempts outside interference with the judicial process. In 1987 a review of judicial procedures initiated by the authorities proposed abolishing this practice. Changes have been made in the review procedure, but the practice continues.

The authorities continued to try political opponents on charges ranging from "sedition" (defined to include expressing sympathy with Communism, espousing views contrary to the authorities' claim to represent all of China, and supporting an independent legal status for Taiwan) to "harming public order" (arising from demonstrations led by the opposition). Two prosecutions for sedition were initiated in 1989, and three others were appealed or had final appeal denied. In one case, a new trial was ordered. In all cases but one, defendants were members or supporters of the opposition DPP.

The authorities deny holding political prisoners. However, international human rights organizations and pro-opposition Taiwan human rights groups have estimated that there are between 12 and 25 political prisoners in Taiwan. This figure is down from some 90 to 100 political prisoners held in 1986. In 1987 and 1988, the authorities granted early releases to most political prisoners. Of the eight persons convicted by military courts of sedition in 1980 for their role in the 1979 Kaohsiung Incident, all but one have been released.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Warrantless searches, common before the lifting of martial law, are unusual now. A warrant must be obtained before a search, except when the search is incident to arrest. The exception is car searches which are routinely conducted at roadblocks.

TAIWAN

Although the right to privacy is generally respected, members of opposition political parties and other political dissidents do experience invasion of privacy. Oppositionists allege that authorities routinely intercept correspondence and telephone calls and subject them and their associates to surveillance by agents of the security forces. The authorities deny that telephone conversations are monitored, or that oppositionists are routinely subjected to surveillance.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While the Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, these rights continue to be restricted in practice. Nevertheless, the authorities have demonstrated increasing tolerance for open debate, even on sensitive issues.

Security forces continue to monitor political expression, both in Taiwan and overseas. Under Taiwan law, people may not oppose the regime's basic policy of anticommunism or its claim to sovereignty over all of China. Prosecutions for allegedly promoting communism are unusual but do occur. In October 1988, a Hong Kong merchant was convicted of sedition for having been a member of the Communist Youth League as a student in the early 1970's. He was acquitted by a higher court, but the prosecution appealed and a new trial was ordered. He was retried in late 1989 and acquitted. In June 1989, a videocassette seller was sentenced to 7 years in prison for showing and selling a tape of a Peoples Republic of China (PRC) National Day parade at an opposition party rally, even though a local television station, which is partially controlled by the armed forces, played the same tape on an evening broadcast.

Those who question the legitimacy of Taiwan authorities by supporting independence for Taiwan risk being charged with sedition. While many public speeches and articles favoring independence go unpunished, the threat of punishment remains real. The editor of an antigovernment, proindependence magazine, Cheng Nan-jung, was charged with sedition for printing the text of a proposed constitution for an independent Taiwan. He committed suicide rather than allow himself to be arrested. In December Huang Hua, a veteran oppositionist, was ordered to appear at a hearing on possible sedition charges in connection with his call for an independent Taiwan. He failed to appear at the hearing. At year's end a formal indictment was expected. In an extraterritorial extension of domestic law, Taiwan convicted dissident Hsu Hsin-liang in December of "preparing to use illegal methods to overthrow the government" and sentenced him to 6 years and 4 months in prison. Evidence for the alleged conspiracy included Hsu's published articles and statements attributed to him while in the United States.

Charges of sedition are brought even in cases other than alleged promotion of communism or advocacy of independence. An opposition editor was convicted of sedition for printing an article accusing a senior military figure of plotting a military coup. However, the military tried unsuccessfully to persuade the courts to prosecute an opposition-oriented newspaper, its publisher and director with sedition for publishing an article criticizing alleged waste of public money and abuse of power by senior officers.

TAIWAN

The authorities censor publications through provisions of the Publications Law which empower the police to seize or ban printed material that commits or instigates others to commit sedition, treason, sacrilege, offenses of interference with the lawful exercise of public functions, or offenses against public order or morals. Since the lifting of martial law, publication bans and confiscations declined significantly.

Although direct censorship of newspapers and magazines has virtually ended, the KMT and the Government Information Office (GIO) continue to exert some influence over the major daily newspapers through guidance, political connections, and threats of legal action and revocation or suspension of licenses. A number of libel suits were brought by military officers alleging defamation by opposition journalists who criticized them.

The authorities have loosened restrictions on publications from the Chinese mainland, and the works of many mainland authors have been reprinted. However, even nonpolitical works by persons in the PRC Government may be deemed unsuitable for publication. Before the lifting of martial law, officials routinely censored other foreign publications. They continue, sporadically to restrict articles or periodicals they deem offensive, but, overall, there is less official interference with the free flow of international news than in the past.

In contrast with the relatively unrestrained and highly competitive environment in which the print media now operate, television and radio remain tightly controlled. The authorities partially or wholly own all three television stations. Television coverage of sensitive political subjects is restricted and slanted. Oppositionists charge that the military and the authorities control or own 82 percent of the radio stations. Requests by opposition politicians to open their own radio station have been turned down. The authorities' continuing efforts to jam PRC radio broadcasts have been ineffectual.

Restrictions on academic freedom remain. Campus publications can be and are censored by school administrators; the severity of censorship varies widely from campus to campus. Student demonstrations occur and are tolerated, at least within university campuses, but dissident students risk being disciplined if they express their opinions too vigorously. Male students risk being harassed after graduation when they report for military service if their records show dissident activity in college. Colleges and universities have "education officers," who are military officers seconded to the Ministry of Education for the purpose of teaching the thought of Sun Yat-sen but who also monitor student attitudes and behavior. Teachers are pressured to discourage students from taking part in demonstrations. Teachers themselves risk being disciplined and harming their careers if they hold unorthodox views. Changes, however, are taking place on campus, and the trend is to separate professional from political activity. In early 1989, the faculty of National Taiwan University (NTU), the most prestigious university in Taiwan, voted to prohibit faculty members from holding concurrent party and university positions. Since the vast majority of such cases involve concurrent KMT party positions, the effect is to enhance the independence of the faculty from political control. NTU also in 1989 recognized an independently elected leader of the student union.

TAIWAN

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is provided for in the Constitution but was restricted under martial law. In 1987 the Legislative Yuan passed the Assembly and March Law which allows peaceful demonstrations. They must be approved by the authorities and must not violate the Constitution or advocate communism or Taiwan's separation from China. The DPP and other opposition groups have organized and carried out numerous demonstrations under the new law.

The new law provides, however, that demonstration organizers may be held responsible for the behavior of participants. Oppositionists have been prosecuted for alleged harm to public order and interference with public functions resulting from demonstrations they organized. In April 1989, DPP legislator Chu Kao-cheng was convicted of disturbing public order at a demonstration in the previous month and given an 18-month suspended sentence. In June DPP Taipei City Council member Hsieh Chang-ting was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment in connection with a demonstration outside the LY on June 12, 1987. DPP National Assembly member Hong Chi-chang was sentenced in October to 15 months in the same case and to 18 months in connection with another demonstration on May 20, 1988. Prosecutors deny that politics plays a part in decisions to lay charges, but most observers believe that prosecutions of oppositionists are often politically motivated.

The Election and Recall Law was amended in January 1989. It supports and strengthens the right of assembly by permitting political parties to organize, advertise, campaign, raise funds, and financially support candidates. The new law relaxes restrictions on the types of rallies, the time candidates may speak, and the use of loudspeakers. Although the new law retains the restriction on campaigning to the 2-week period before the election, in practice this was not observed and no prosecutions were undertaken.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The constitutional provision for freedom to practice religion is generally observed in practice. Most Taiwan inhabitants adhere to Confucianism, Taoism, Buddhism, animism, or a combination of these beliefs. Other religions include Christianity and Islam. There is no established or favored religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for the freedom to change residence, but registration of one's residence is required. Except for military and other restricted areas, there is general freedom of internal travel. An exit permit is required for travel abroad. Emigration and private travel abroad have become freer since 1987 when the authorities began to allow travel to mainland China to visit relatives. There are now no countries to which civilian residents of Taiwan may not travel.

Exit permits may be refused for a number of reasons, including failure to complete compulsory military service. Under the implementing regulations of the 1987 National Security Law, however, reasons for refusal must be given, and appeals may be made to a special board. Although in the past outspoken critics have been denied exit permits, no one was denied in 1989.

The authorities claim to recognize the right of Chinese who hold Taiwan passports, and who normally reside in Taiwan, to return from abroad. Nonresident citizens are usually issued "overseas Chinese" passports and require visas to travel to Taiwan. The authorities will not authorize the entry of Chinese between the ages of 16 and 70, even those who have long held Taiwan passports, if they have lived in Communist-controlled areas within the preceding 5 years. Exceptions include persons of outstanding merit and mainland residents coming because of the serious illness or death of close relatives.

The authorities continue to deny visas to a number of overseas critics for political reasons. These included individuals who wanted to observe the December elections. A number of dissidents who entered without visas were subsequently either deported or prosecuted for illegal entry, including Columbus Leo, a Canadian citizen who received a 10-month sentence for violating Taiwan's National Security Law.

A 1984 law authorizes the authorities to detain persons or revoke their passports for behavior which harms the interests of Taiwan, or endangers security, public order, tradition, or Taiwan's economic interests. Critics of the law state that it gives the authorities the power to revoke the passport of any Taiwan citizen who makes remarks overseas that are deemed inimical to the interests of the Taiwan authorities. They argue that this violates the right of all citizens to return to their homeland. This law is not used frequently. Increasing numbers of Taiwanese dissidents previously denied reentry are now being permitted to return; however, a number of overseas Taiwanese dissidents still considered "undesirable" by the authorities have been denied entry into Taiwan under this legal provision.

Under Taiwan's "Orderly Departure Family Reunification Program," since 1977 more than 5,850 ethnic Chinese from Indochina have been resettled on Taiwan, and more than 3,000 persons who arrived from Indochina by small boats have been granted "temporary" refuge. Fifty-nine of the boat-people found sponsors and resettled on Taiwan. The others have been resettled in third countries. Although 168 remain officially classified as refugees, they have been practically resettled in Taiwan, and the refugee camp has been officially closed since late 1988. There have been no reports of refugees from non-Communist areas; authorities advise that such instances would be dealt with on a case-by-case basis. Indochinese refugees are not forced to return to their country of origin.

Taiwan has taken some significant steps away from its authoritarian political system to a more pluralistic one, but the people do not yet have the ability to change their government through democratic means. Political power still resides with the KMT, which established itself in Taiwan after the defeat of the Japanese in 1945. Reflecting their constitutional claim to be the government of all of China, the authorities maintain not only a provincial and local government system but also an array of central-level political bodies identical to those found on the mainland prior to 1949. In the past, centers of power on Taiwan have been the Presidency, the Executive Yuan, the military and security apparatus, and the KMT Central Standing Committee. Today, power is increasingly being shared with the Legislative Yuan which, in turn, is increasingly representative.

Mainlander control of political power, however, has been gradually diminishing as more Taiwanese have taken over important leadership jobs. Taiwanese Lee Teng-hui's accession to the Presidency and the KMT chairmanship, after President Chiang Ching-kuo's death in January 1988, was a particularly visible indicator of this trend. Native Taiwanese now comprise a majority in the Cabinet and the Central Standing Committee. As a result of these changes, Taiwan's top decisionmakers are gradually becoming more representative of, and more responsive to, their constituents. This trend also reflects the impact of political reforms in fostering accountability as well as generational changes in which younger and more highly educated leaders of both Taiwan and mainland origin have been appointed to positions of authority.

The most important elective bodies at the central level are the Legislative Yuan (the highest lawmaking body) and the National Assembly, which convenes every 6 years to elect the President and Vice President. There have been no general elections to these two bodies since 1948. Surviving mainland representatives elected in 1948 continue in office and form the majority of these bodies. Additional representatives from Taiwan province and the offshore islands have been chosen since 1969 in periodic "supplementary elections." Nevertheless, of the 768 National Assembly seats filled as of the end of 1989, only 84 are supplemental members. Of the 250 Legislative Yuan seats filled as of the end of 1989, 67 were supplemental legislators elected in Taiwan. These 67 were the most active members in the legislature, due largely to the advanced age and incapacity of those elected four decades ago.

In the face of persistent and growing calls for more representative institutions, the KMT has committed itself to rejuvenating the central parliamentary bodies. Elections on December 2, 1989, increased elected legislative seats to 101. Plans have been announced to triple the number of elected National Assembly delegates by 1992. There is also a draft retirement plan for aging mainlander representatives to encourage them to step down voluntarily. The authorities, however, have refused to adopt any comprehensive measures to end the mandates of those parliamentarians, believing that it would call into question their claim that these bodies represent all of China. Suspicious that the KMT is seeking unfairly to prolong its majority, the DPP is calling for the complete reelection of all central parliamentarians by the people of Taiwan. Even some supplemental KMT legislators call for the retirement of members serving indefinite terms.

The KMT continues to be the dominant political party in Taiwan, as has been the case since 1945. Originally composed overwhelmingly of mainlanders, its membership of over 2 million is now more than 70 percent Taiwanese. There are also two miniscule, nominally independent, parties which came from the mainland. The KMT's structure and control mechanisms are based on Leninist models; however, the party's operations are considerably more flexible. In 1988 the KMT began to remove formal party organs from the military and the school systems and to democratize its party structure.

The passage of the Civic Organizations Law in January 1989 legalized the organization of political parties. The major opposition party, the DPP, was formed in 1986 in defiance of martial law; it registered as a political party in April 1989. The Labor Party was formed in 1987 and the Workers Party, an offshoot of the Labor Party, in March 1989. At present there are 38 registered parties.

The DPP claims a membership of 25,000. The other opposition parties are much smaller. The role of the opposition is greater than its small numbers might indicate. Opposition members are very vocal in elective bodies and frequently use interpellation sessions to raise controversial or sensitive issues. Their activities have spurred some KMT legislators to criticize regime policies openly.

Opposition candidates still face several disadvantages in the election process, principally the authorities' virtual monopoly of television and radio. The Central Election Commission remains under the control of the Executive Yuan. Half its membership of 14 is KMT, one is DPP, and the remainder are independent. The Control Yuan (the highest supervisory organ) continues to be indirectly elected under a voting system that guarantees KMT domination. Persons convicted of sedition under martial law, including some of the best known figures of the opposition, continue to be barred from voting, holding public office, and practicing certain professions. The benefits the KMT enjoys in terms of access to public and private funds and assistance from administrative and security agencies give it an unfair advantage according to opposition politicians. Finally, although the law prohibits vote-buying and bribery, critics of the electoral system say that the law is ineffective in preventing such practices.

Nevertheless, the December elections were an important milestone in Taiwan's evolution to a more democratic system. The KMT won about 58 percent of the overall popular vote, down from 70 percent in 1986, and the DPP increased its popular vote from about 23 to 30 percent.

Universal suffrage exists for citizens 20 years of age and over. Voting is voluntary and by secret ballot; voter turnout in the December elections reached about 75 percent.

Taiwan authorities permit representatives of international human rights organizations, including Amnesty International and Asia Watch, to visit and meet Taiwan citizens freely.

Taiwan has two principal human rights organizations: the Chinese Association of Human Rights (CAHR) and the Taiwan Association for Human Rights (TAHR). The CAHR, staffed mostly by retired officials, is regarded as the establishment-oriented human rights organ. The TAHR is aligned with the DPP. The effectiveness of the two associations is limited, however, by the fact that they do not coordinate activities and, in fact, have contact only when representatives of international human rights organizations visit Taiwan.

TAIWANSection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

Taiwan's only non-Chinese minority group consists of aboriginal descendants of Malayo-Polynesians, slightly more than 1 percent of Taiwan's population, who were already established in Taiwan when the first Chinese settlers arrived. They face no official discrimination but significant cultural and economic barriers. Specially designated seats in both central and provincial legislatures are reserved for representatives of these aboriginal people, and the authorities have instituted a number of social programs to ease their transition into the dominant Chinese society. The aboriginal people complain that they are prevented from owning ancestral lands in mountain areas under the control of the authorities. Furthermore, they are not allowed to use non-Chinese personal names on legal documents. Some complain of economic exploitation by commercial or tourist concerns. The sale of aboriginal children into prostitution is a serious social problem.

The law prohibits sex discrimination, but it exists both de facto and de jure. There are still some laws that discriminate against women, relating mostly to divorce issues and inheritance, but a revised Civil Code passed by the Legislative Yuan in March 1985 provides for more equal treatment of women in the areas of marriage and divorce. Women have complained of being forced to quit jobs because of age or childbearing restrictions, and restrictive quotas exist within certain ministries to control the number of women who may be hired even after passing the rigorous civil service examination. A women's rights movement is active and growing.

Although data on violence against women are not available, women active in politics, human rights, and women's organizations single out intrafamily violence as a serious problem, especially wife beating. There is a tradition of tolerance for wife beating and strong social pressure for abused wives to conceal their treatment to avoid "disgracing" their families. The critics of this violence believe that greater mobility, education, and job opportunities are making women less inclined to tolerate such abuse and more willing to complain of mistreatment, but it is not known if the number of actual complaints filed increased in 1989. A somewhat similar situation exists with regard to rape, since the victims are still socially stigmatized. Under Taiwan law, the authorities may not undertake a prosecution for rape; only the victim may make a complaint. Because rape trials are public, women are reluctant to prosecute their attackers. Rape counseling services are not yet available, but feminist and human rights organizations have assisted rape victims, and victims are now more willing to come forward and press charges.

In 1989 the problem of child prostitutes received considerable public attention. Women's rights activists criticized police for not closing down brothels and judicial authorities for allowing parents to sell their daughters, sometimes repeatedly, into prostitution. According to some reports, violence and coercion are used by brothel owners to prevent girls from escaping.

Although the Taiwanese dialect is the mother tongue of most inhabitants of Taiwan, the authorities forbid its use in the educational system and impose limits on its use in broadcast media--Mandarin Chinese broadcasting must not be less than 55 percent on AM radio and 70 percent on FM radio and television.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Labor's right of association is seriously limited by a number of laws and regulations. One of these requires organizers to seek the approval of the authorities to establish unions. Labor unions may draw up their own rules and constitutions, but these must be submitted to the authorities for review. Unions may be dissolved by the authorities if they do not meet legal requirements for certification or if their activities disturb public order. According to official sources, no unions have been dissolved, although certification has been denied where there were competing unions. In the latter cases, the unions were asked to reconcile their differences and file as a single union. Civil servants, teachers, defense industry workers, and administrators acting on behalf of employers are prohibited from organizing unions. Public employees particularly guard their political views for fear of jeopardizing job benefits or opportunities for promotions.

Most of Taiwan's 3,300 unions are controlled by the KMT, but the DPP and Labor Party organizers have made inroads as workers have grown increasingly restive over salary issues and working conditions. In the last 3 years, workers have sometimes rejected KMT or management-endorsed union slates.

The authorities in 1988 moved to strengthen laws regarding workers' right to strike. Revisions of the labor disputes law, which became effective in June 1988, recognize labor's right to strike but place serious restrictions on it. Both labor and management are forbidden from disrupting the "working order" when either mediation or arbitration is in progress. Before a strike can be called, it must be approved by a vote of the full membership of the union. The authorities have required official approval before such a meeting can be called. Applications for arbitration may be made to the local government. The authorities have, in at least one case, not waited for such an application but deemed the dispute to be in arbitration in order to avoid a strike. Stiff penalties may be levied should no-strike/no-retaliation clauses be violated, but critics say that employers have ignored the law and dismissed or locked out workers without any legal action being taken against them. Regardless of legal limitations on the right to strike, however, workers have struck or staged slowdowns with increasing frequency.

Unions may form confederations but no administrative district, including cities, counties, and provinces, can have more than one labor confederation. The Chinese Federation of Labor, the only legal union federation on Taiwan, is closely associated with the KMT and is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Taiwan is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

As of September 1989, 2.488 million workers, or approximately 30.13 percent of Taiwan's paid employees, belonged to 3,336 unions. Under the Labor Union Law, employers may not refuse employment to, dismiss, or otherwise unfairly treat workers because they are union members. There have been occasional reports, however, of antiunion discrimination in labor disputes. The Chairman of the Workers Party was fired in May for union activity, and a foreign priest was abruptly expelled in March because of his involvement in the independent labor movement. Laws governing union activities apply equally within export processing zones.

Collective bargaining is provided for under the collective agreements law but is not mandatory. Only about 341 collective agreements were in force as of March 1989. Since such agreements are made only in large-scale enterprises and less than 5 percent of Taiwan's enterprises fall into this category, the proportion of workers covered by them is small. Legal restrictions on the right to strike and provisions for involuntary mediation or arbitration seriously weaken collective bargaining.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Taiwan law does not allow forced or compulsory labor, except as punishment for crime. However, the police offenses law permits compulsory labor up to a total of 16 hours as punishment for minor crimes without recourse to judicial due process. There have been reports of women and girls being forced into prostitution or prevented from leaving brothels.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 15, and interaction between the law stipulating this and a compulsory education law effectively keeps child labor to a very low level.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Taiwan Labor Standards Law, promulgated in 1984, was enacted to provide minimum labor standards. It covers some 3.5 million of Taiwan's 5.6 million paid workers. The law has enjoyed only limited success in several areas, and there is a growing sentiment that it and other labor laws should be strengthened and extended to cover additional workers.

By law, the workweek is limited to 48 hours (8 hours per day, 6 days per week) with certain provisions for overtime. Taiwan in 1988 increased the basic wage, which functions essentially as a minimum wage, to approximately $342 per month. There is general agreement that the basic wage is less than that needed to assure a decent standard of living; however, the average manufacturing wage is over $633 per month. Most large firms provide their employees with allowances for transportation, meals, housing, and other benefits which can amount to another 60 to 80 percent of base salary. There are minimum standards for working conditions and health and safety precautions. Unemployment insurance is being studied and may be offered to a small segment of workers in a pilot program.

The authorities' efforts to increase workers' awareness of their rights through union education programs and the establishment of complaint channels appear to be bearing some fruit. In 1988 there were 67 lawsuits filed involving management and labor.

Despite the establishment of the Council on Labor Affairs, many provisions of labor legislation have not been enforced because the number of inspectors is far too small. There are 272 inspectors for approximately 123,000 enterprises covered by the Labor Standards Law. In 1988, 13,655 enterprises, 10.6 percent of the total, were inspected. Since most enterprises are small, family-owned operations employing relatives who will not report violations, actual adherence to the hours, wage, and safety sections of various labor laws is hard to document but is thought to be minimal.

FIJI

Fiji's multiracial society is about evenly divided between indigenous Fijians and ethnic Indians, with each community constituting approximately 47 percent of the total population. Indians dominate the economy and professions and are prominent in the public service.

Fiji was a parliamentary democracy until May 1987, when the army deposed a newly elected government in a bloodless coup. Coup leader Lt. Col. (now Major General) Sitiveni Rabuka cited Indian predominance in that government as a primary reason for the coup. An interim civilian government, formed in December 1987 when Rabuka's military regime voluntarily stepped down, is headed by Prime Minister Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara, who held that office for 17 years prior to the April 1987 elections. At year's end, the Cabinet consisted primarily of civilians but included Military Forces (FMF) Commander Rabuka and four other military officers. The military remained very influential, especially in security matters.

Sugar is the mainstay of Fiji's economy, with tourism the second largest foreign exchange earner. The economy suffered a severe decline in the wake of the first coup in May 1987, but has made significant progress toward recovery. The Government is promoting light manufacturing for export as a long-term means of reducing dependence on sugar and tourism.

Human rights were less constrained in 1989 than in the previous year, but freedom of the press and assembly remained restricted, and the right of citizens peacefully to change the government remains unclear. Discrimination against Indians and women also remained a problem.

The major human rights issue in 1989 involved efforts to draft a new constitution. The interim Government and the Fijian community made it clear that the constitution, when adopted, will guarantee the political predominance of indigenous Fijians. A September 1988 draft proposed an electoral system heavily weighted in favor of the indigenous Fijians and containing numerous provisions unacceptable to the Indian community, including one interpreted as establishing Christianity as a state religion. The Government subsequently formed an independent, multiracial committee to canvass public views. After hearing many criticisms of the draft, the Constitution Inquiry and Advisory Committee (CIAC) in September 1989 called for extensive revisions to make the document more democratic and remove or dilute several provisions opposed by the Indian community.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political killings by the Government or any political group.

b. Disappearance

There were no known abductions or disappearances.

FIJI

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden under Fiji's Fundamental Freedoms Decree and is not practiced. Physical abuse of detainees occurs but is neither usual nor condoned. An escaped prisoner died during recapture several months ago; one guard was convicted of assault and battery but acquitted on the murder charge. The current situation represents a marked improvement over 1987, when there were numerous credible reports of physical abuse of detainees. Corporal punishment is allowed; strokes of the cane are administered under medical supervision.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Reports of arbitrary arrest or detention declined markedly in 1989. However, antigovernment political activists were occasionally detained for questioning at the airport when entering or leaving the country. Those detained included the deposed Prime Minister and at least one of his Ministers. Detentions lasted a few hours at most; detainees were reportedly abused verbally but not physically. In one case, a political figure was arrested on a minor fraud charge on a Friday and not allowed bail until the following Monday.

Exile is not practiced formally. It was reported that the authorities have a short list of Fiji citizens restricted from return to Fiji, but this remained unconfirmed. No Fiji citizens were denied reentry in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The court system, reorganized after Fiji's withdrawal from the Commonwealth of Nations in September 1987, remains modeled on the British system. Magistrates' courts try minor offenses. A high court has original jurisdiction in serious cases. An appeals court and a Supreme Court complete the legal structure. The Chief Justice chairs all three higher courts. No special courts exist; military courts try only members of the armed forces. The judiciary is independent, as demonstrated by a magistrate's decision to discharge without conviction about 20 political activists prosecuted for an anticoup demonstration. Due process rights are similar to those found in English common law. Right to a public trial is guaranteed, defendants have a right to counsel, and there is a public defender's office. Right of appeal is maintained. In practice, many trials and appeals have been delayed due to understaffing of the court system. Since habeas corpus and bail are normal procedure, most defendants have not experienced undue imprisonment before trial. There are no political prisoners in Fiji.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In general, privacy of the home is respected. The Internal Security Decree of 1988, adopted following discovery of a smuggled arms cache, allowed warrantless searches, but since its suspension in November 1988 the practice has stopped. Search warrants are required for searches in criminal cases. Surveillance of persons believed to represent a security threat is carried out to some degree. Many political dissidents believe their telephones and mail are monitored, but concrete evidence is lacking.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech has largely been restored. Political figures and private citizens can and do speak out against the Government. No arrests for making any kind of public statement were reported in 1989.

Privately owned broadcast and print media operate without prior censorship but with considerable self-restraint under pressure from the authorities. Newspapers refrain from printing editorials severely critical of the Government and do little investigative reporting. Statements about the political situation by opposition figures and foreign governments are reported, however. The letters column of the Fiji Times frequently carries political statements from members of the deposed government and other persons and groups opposed to the Government and the draft constitution. While the press is still less than fully free, the situation is improved over 1987, when the newspapers were closed for 6 weeks. Journalists reportedly receive frequent phone calls from government officials complaining about stories. However, no journalists were detained in 1989; in 1988 two journalists were detained in connection with published stories. Foreign reporters are required to obtain a visa to enter Fiji. Some reporters and television crews have been denied visas.

Fiji is home to the University of the South Pacific (USP), a regional institution. Prior to the coups and immediately thereafter, the USP was a center of opposition political activity. The Government made it clear that it wants the USP, especially its expatriate staff, out of Fijian domestic politics, and some politically active expatriate staff members were denied extension of their work permits.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Assembly for political purposes is allowed but restricted. Public gatherings require permission from the authorities, and permits for large outdoor political meetings or demonstrations generally are not granted. Permission was refused for an anti-French demonstration during the visit of the Prime Minister of France, and a political activist was detained briefly at the airport when she was found with an anti-French poster just before his arrival. A group of about 20 people arrested and charged with parading without a permit for a demonstration in downtown Suva in 1988 were discharged without conviction in early 1989.

Political parties are currently operating, and party headquarters, including those of the deposed coalition parties, remain open. Organizations of a political nature are allowed to operate and issue public statements. The Government refuses to negotiate with the political parties from the deposed coalition government.

FIJI

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed and honored in practice. The revised draft constitution underscores the importance of Christianity to Fiji and the Fijian people but guarantees protection for all religions. Since the 1987 coups, most commercial activities on Sundays have been banned. The Sunday bans were relaxed substantially in mid-1989 to allow public transportation and restaurants to operate and to allow agricultural activities and some sports to continue. This provoked a vehement protest from rightwing Methodist clergy, who support reimposition of strict Sunday bans such as were in effect after the September 1987 coup. Methodist clergymen organized protest demonstrations, which led to some arrests. The Sunday bans are opposed by Indians and urban residents, but are popular among rural Fijians. Some Christian leaders oppose any Sunday bans. Despite statements by General Rabuka about "Christianizing" the Indian community, there has been no attempt to translate this idea into public policy. No significant restrictions affect foreign clergy, missionary activity, charitable works, religious publishing and education, or other typical nonpolitical activities of religious organizations.

One foreign priest was deported in 1989 over the strenuous objections of many of his parishioners. No official reason was given, but it is generally believed he was deported as a result of having participated in antigovernment political activity, especially a public demonstration in 1988.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement within the country. Opposition politicians and labor leaders were able to travel abroad and return to Fiji in 1988-89, in contrast to the situation which prevailed under the military government in September-November 1987. Fiji citizens are free to emigrate. According to the best available estimates, between 20,000 and 25,000 have done so since May 1987. Most of the emigrants are Indians, many of them professionals, but Fijians and others have also left. Several thousand have claimed refugee status, especially when applying for admission to Canada, but neither the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees nor any government has recognized those claims. There are no refugees in Fiji, and no forced resettlement programs.

The right of all citizens to change their government through genuinely democratic means remained uncertain in 1989. Fiji is governed by an interim government comprising a Prime Minister and a Cabinet appointed by the President. At year's end, the Cabinet included senior politicians from Prime Minister Mara's Alliance Party as well as technocrats, five army officers, and some ethnic Fijian nationalists. There were two Indian Ministers. At year's end, the Government was scheduled to step down in January 1990 and hand over power to a second interim government, which would implement a constitution and take the country into elections. It was expected that the new Cabinet would be headed by Ratu Mara. Military members of the Cabinet were expected either to resign their commissions or to return to barracks.

FIJI

The proposed constitution provides for a bicameral Parliament. Fijians would hold 37 of 69 seats in the lower house. One seat would be reserved for Rotuma, a Polynesian island culturally distinct from the rest of Fiji. Indians would hold 27 seats, other ethnic groups 4. An upper house with the power to veto legislation would be dominated by Fijian traditional chiefs. A president chosen by the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) would act as head of state, but a prime minister and cabinet would hold most executive power.

The GCC is an all-Fijian advisory body composed of Fiji's highest traditional chiefs. Provincial representatives to the GCC are designated by provincial councils. The GCC has no administrative role in government, but its approval is a sign of legitimacy within the ethnic Fijian community. The President and Prime Minister are both members of the GCC by virtue of their high traditional positions. According to the interim government, the revised draft constitution is intended to ensure political dominance by the indigenous Fijians, while reinstating a form of parliamentary democracy and ensuring protection for Indian communal interests. Indian political leaders dispute this rationale, saying nothing less than fully proportional representation is acceptable. The CIAC-proposed revisions do provide additional protections for the Indian community compared to the 1988 draft. For example, constitutional amendment procedures would prevent the Fijian members of Parliament from amending the constitution without the concurrence of at least part of the Indian contingent; the previous draft would have permitted the Fijians to pass amendments without Indian support.

Elections are to be held by secret ballot, with voting only by communal constituencies. This latter aspect is a major change from the 1970 constitution, which provided for a complex system of cross-voting allowing Indians a say in the selection of some Fijian representatives and vice versa. The revised draft calls for elections every 4 years but the Government may call an election at any time.

There are no local human rights groups as such in Fiji, but the women's rights movement, the labor movement, and various political groups are involved in promoting a number of human rights causes. The Government regards externally based investigations of the political and human rights situation in Fiji as a violation of its sovereignty. It did allow a visit by a delegation from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in late 1989.

The stated purpose of the 1987 military coups was to ensure the political supremacy of the indigenous Fijian people and to protect their traditional way of life and communal control of land. To this end a number of measures have been taken that favor the Fijian community over the other ethnic groups. The most obvious is the reapportionment of the new Parliament to guarantee a preponderance of Fijians. The Government is also committed to raising the proportion of Fijians and Rotumans in the public service to 50 percent or more at all levels. Many Fijians felt that the precoup public service discriminated in favor of Indians, who controlled most of middle management because of their higher educational level. Current promotion and hiring policies in the public service favor ethnic Fijians. The CIAC recommended deleting a provision in the 1988 draft constitution that would have reserved certain senior positions for ethnic Fijians.

Control of land is a highly sensitive issue. About 85 percent of the land is held communally by indigenous Fijians. Most cash crop farmers are Indians, who lease their land from the Fijian villages. Individual title to land is not an indigenous concept; lands owned currently by the crown (6 percent) and by individuals (9 percent) were transferred from customary owners during the colonial period. The present land ownership arrangements were instituted to protect the interests of the indigenous Fijians. Many Indians, particularly farmers, feel that the absence of secure land tenure discriminates against them. The military coups were prompted, in part, by Fijian fears that Indians sought to take away their land.

A major complaint from ethnic Indians is inadequate protection against harassment and crime, at least some of which is racially motivated. In the latter part of the year, five Indian temples and a mosque were subjected to acts of arson or other desecration by a group of Fijian youths. Arrests have been made, and at year's end investigations were continuing. Gangs of Fijian youths sometimes stone or invade Indian homes, stealing property and/or shouting racial abuse. The perpetrators escape more often than not, and the Indian community believes the authorities do not pay adequate attention to the problem.

Corporal punishment is the norm in Fiji schools, and it can be applied quite harshly. Some observers believe that in the current racial atmosphere, some Fijian teachers are applying harsher punishments to Indian students, and vice versa. This trend may be linked to the above-noted increase in racial violence by young people.

Women in both the Fijian and Indian communities have functioned primarily in traditional roles, although some women rise to high places in the public service, politics, and business. Women can attain high status in Fiji's traditional chiefly system, although it is unusual. The Prime Minister's wife is, in her own right, Fiji's second highest-ranking traditional chief. In general, women in the Fijian community are more likely to rise to prominence in their own right than are women in the Indian community. Women have full rights of property ownership and inheritance, and a number have become successful entrepreneurs. Women are generally paid less than men, a discrepancy that is especially notable in the garment industry. Garment workers, most of whom are female, are subject to a special minimum wage considerably lower than that in other sectors. Reliable current statistics on representation of women in traditional men's occupations, business management, and the professions are unavailable. However, relatively few women are employed in these areas.

There is a small but active women's rights movement. A recent area of focus has been violence against women. The movement has pressed for more serious treatment of rape in the courts. The crime tends to draw prison sentences of only a few years. An admonition by the Chief Justice late in 1988 has resulted in some increase in the average prison term for rape. The law allows corporal punishment for rape, but this is generally used only in cases of offenses against minors. Domestic violence is also a problem in Fiji and is a second major focus of the women's movement. The authorities are generally reluctant to intervene in cases of domestic violence unless it is necessary to save the woman's life. Few cases result in prosecution, as the victim generally does not press charges. The Government has not been active in dealing with domestic violence. Suva has a privately funded Women's Crisis Centre which offers counseling and assistance to women in cases of rape, domestic violence, and other problems, such as child support payments.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers are free to form and join unions, elect their own representatives, publicize their views on labor matters, and determine their own policies. Strikes are legal. At least a dozen well-publicized strikes took place in 1989. Unions must register with, but are not controlled by, the Government. The central labor body, the Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC), is closely associated with the opposition Fiji Labour Party and the deposed Bavadra government. The labor movement is led largely by ethnic Indians. Persons with close ties to the Government have started rival unions primarily for ethnic Fijians; these unions are more amenable to political cooperation with the Government. The FTUC is free to associate internationally and it belongs to the ICFTU.

The Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labor Organization (ILO) at its November 1989 meeting found that Fijian law and practice excessively restricted trade union's abilities to hold union meetings and public gatherings.

Fiji law recognizes the right to organize and bargain collectively. Employers are required to recognize a union if more than half the employees in a workplace have joined. Recognition is determined by union membership numbers rather than by an election. The Government will order a recalcitrant employer to recognize a union, although union leaders accused the Government of failing to apply the law correctly in one recent case. Key sectors of the economy including sugar and tourism are organized, and collective bargaining is the norm.

Currently, nationwide wage guidelines are in effect. These guidelines replaced a mandatory wage cut and freeze put into effect after the 1987 coups. The Government authorized a 6 percent across-the-board wage increase in 1989. The ILO's Committee of Experts at its 1989 session noted that Fiji's wage controls did not conform with the provisions of ILO Convention 98 on collective bargaining and asked the Government to indicate when it intends to take measures to lift the legal restrictions on the free negotiation of wages.

Fiji's practice for wage bargaining has been to set national wage guidelines after consultations between the Government, employers, and unions. Wage negotiation on an industry-by-industry basis is not practiced, and a government proposal to introduce such negotiations has been resisted by employers and unions. Union leaders fear that straight market-based wage bargaining would open unacceptably large wage gaps between skilled and unskilled workers.

Prior to the coups, a tripartite forum of employers, unions, and government oversaw labor negotiations. The tripartite forum has been abolished; its restoration is a key demand of the FTUC. The Government has agreed to consider reestablishing the forum, but at year's end had not done so. Legislation protects workers from summary dismissal without just cause. The courts often rule in favor of workers in such cases.

Trade union members and properties are respected, however, there have been a few incidents of vandalism against the homes and cars of union leaders. The incidents, which were well organized, remain unsolved. There is no evidence to link such actions to the Government. The unions are generally successful in preventing discrimination against workers for union activities. Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country, including in export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor does not exist in Fiji. Both the 1970 Constitution and the draft constitution give protection from forced labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children under 12 may not be employed in any capacity. Children (under age 15) and "young persons" (age 15-17) may not be employed in industry or work with machinery. Enforcement generally is effective, with the possible exception of family members working on family farms or businesses.

No national minimum wage has been established. Certain sectors have minimum wages set by the Ministry for Employment and Industrial Relations. These are in the $0.75-$1.00 per hour range, except in the garment industry where it is only about 35 cents. In late September, the Government and employers agreed to raise this to about 45 cents; a date for implementation had not been set as of year's end. The minimum wage will support a barely adequate standard of living, except in the garment industry, where the starting wage is based on the assumption that workers are young people or married women living at home and not expecting to support a household. The more productive workers in the garment industry earn $1.00 an hour or more, a living wage.

Fiji has no regulation specifying maximum hours of work for adult males. Women are prohibited from night work in industry and underground work in mines. Certain industries, notably transportation and shipping, have problems in this area. Excessive working hours for drivers have contributed to a number of fatal bus accidents. Indians, who generally require a cash income to survive, are more vulnerable to pressure to work long hours than Fijians. Many Fijians can and will return to their villages rather than work what they consider excessive hours.

Fiji has workplace safety regulations, a workmen's compensation act, and an accident compensation plan. A tribunal sets awards for workers injured on the job. Government enforcement of safety standards suffers from a lack of trained enforcement personnel, but the unions do a reasonable job of monitoring safety standards in organized workplaces. A 1989 study of working conditions in the garment industries resulted in the Government ordering many employers to improve working conditions. Union leaders complained that the Government's action was too mild and that the employers should have been subject to criminal prosecution.

INDONESIA

President Soeharto and the Indonesian Armed Forces (ABRI)--which include the military services and the police--are the preeminent institutions in Indonesia's Government, which came to power in the mid-1960's after an abortive Communist-backed coup. Since 1967 executive authority has been exercised by retired and active-duty military officers and civilian technocrats under President Soeharto's leadership. The partly elected, partly appointed Parliament (DPR) considers but does not initiate legislation. The People's Consultative Assembly (MPR)--consisting of 500 appointed members and the 500 DPR members--meets every 5 years to approve guidelines for government policy and elect the President and Vice President.

Indonesia is the fifth most populous country in the world and the largest in Southeast Asia. Since independence, Indonesian governments have sought to create a unique national identity and to accommodate a diversity of ethnic, linguistic, religious, and social groups, while assuring internal security and cohesion. The centerpiece of the Soeharto Government's political program is "Pancasila," an eclectic state ideology emphasizing consultation and consensus and composed of five broad principles: belief in one supreme god, belief in a just and civilized humanity, Indonesian national unity, democracy, and social justice.

The armed forces number about 416,000. A little less than half serve in the army, which is primarily concerned with internal security. Under a "dual function" concept, many military officers serve in Parliament and the civilian bureaucracy at all levels. Frequent military operations took place in East Timor and Irian Jaya, where Fretilin and Organization for a Free Papua (OPM) rebels continued sporadic activities in low-level insurgencies.

Although Indonesia's mixed economy involves the State in nearly all sectors, the Government is pursuing a set of policies designed to give greater freedom to the private sector. Beginning with the collapse of oil prices in the early 1980's, deregulation aimed primarily at stimulating growth in nonoil sectors has been a major government objective. A large devaluation in 1986, and a subsequent flexible exchange rate, has helped strengthen the rupiah and boost nonoil exports. The oil sector accounted for less than 50 percent of Government revenues and foreign exchange earnings in 1988. Real gross domestic product (GDP) growth in 1988 was 5.7 percent and the industrial growth rate much higher. Despite substantial increases in real incomes in the past 20 years, the country remains poor and wide disparities in wealth continue. Corruption and influence peddling are endemic and restrict growth and economic opportunity.

Despite progress in some areas, including greater freedom of movement for Indonesians and foreigners to and within East Timor, continued tolerance for ethnic, racial, and religious differences, a broadened political debate, including enhancing the role of parliament vis-a-vis the executive, new government regulations that protect working women and formalize the minimum wage structure, and the conviction and sentencing to jail terms of several police officers for mistreatment or killing of detainees, serious human rights problems remained. These included harsh treatment of Muslim activists' efforts to organize opposition, discrimination against ethnic Chinese, reports of excessive use of force in quelling violence in Lampung, periodic detentions of East Timorese suspected of

Fretilin sympathies, killings of civilians in East Timor, harsh sentences meted out in several subversion trials, continued significant restrictions on freedoms of the press and movement, and pervasive political controls which ensure continued military domination of the Government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Casualties in Lampung Province in a clash in February between members of an Islamic sect and the military, responding to an officer's kidnaping and murder, officially numbered 38, most of them civilians. The background of the incident remains obscure, but persistent allegations of a significantly higher death toll than officially announced raise concern about the military's possible use of excessive force in restoring order.

A presidential autobiography published in April explained that the "mysterious killings" or summary executions of thousands of suspected criminals from 1982 to 1985 were a deliberate policy to stem increased crime. At that time, officials attributed the killings to criminal gang warfare. An estimated two dozen or more civilians were killed by the military in East Timor in 1989.

Temporary disappearance of persons held for interrogation by security forces occurred periodically, particularly in East Timor and Irian Jaya. Reports were often unspecific and difficult to confirm, but in some cases authorities appeared to act outside the law.

No exact figures are available on the number of permanent disappearances widely believed to occur yearly. Newspapers in May publicized the cases of Nano and Soni Abdullah, brothers who reportedly disappeared following arrest in Pekanbaru in 1984. Regular International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) access to prisons in East Timor and elsewhere in Indonesia has helped to locate some missing persons in past years.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Credible reports of torture and mistreatment of criminal suspects, detainees, and prisoners were frequent. Police treatment of detainees, even in minor incidents, often results in physical abuse. Several students detained in the wake of the Pope's visit to East Timor in October were reportedly beaten. The practice of "shooting to wound" suspected criminals allegedly attempting to elude arrest in Medan declined in 1989. The local press, nonetheless, continued to report at least one incident each month in which police shot a suspect in the leg, often repeatedly. Officials have publicly acknowledged and condemned police brutality and unacceptable prison conditions and in 1989 took disciplinary action in several cases against criminal suspects. Among other instances, the Yogyakarta military court dismissed two policemen and sentenced them to jail terms of 2 years 3 months and 2 years 6 months, respectively, for beating to death 17-year-old Bakri Budi Santoso, and a military court in

INDONESIA

Cianjur sentenced two police officers to 17 and 15 years, respectively, for killing a student, Apud Mahpudin. There were no known instances of officials being punished for mistreatment of political prisoners or detainees. East Timorese Bishop Belo and others alleged mistreatment and torture by security forces in East Timor of persons detained on suspicion of aiding or sympathizing with the Fretilin guerrillas, charges denied by officials. Similar allegations were made concerning mistreatment of persons in Irian Jaya suspected of ties with or sympathies for the Organization for a Free Papua (OPM) rebels. Rebels in both East Timor and Irian Jaya reportedly harassed and terrorized civilians from time to time.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The criminal procedures code (KUHP) contains protections against arbitrary arrest and detention and specifies the right of prisoners to legal counsel and notification of family. These safeguards are often disregarded in practice, notably in cases of alleged subversion. KUHP provisions are respected more regularly in urban areas than in small towns or remote areas. Security agencies arrest and detain persons to intimidate and inhibit activities they consider undesirable. Legal mechanisms for redress of such actions are inadequate. The Jakarta district court rejected a suit by student demonstrators against police for alleged unlawful detention on the grounds that the students were interrogated as witnesses, not suspects, and thus not entitled to challenge the legality of their detention.

Detainees in cases of alleged subversion can be held up to a year without charges. In the past the number of persons detained without trial was estimated to be as many as 500, although this figure could not be verified, and no more recent estimates were available. Security forces in East Timor on several occasions detained persons for days or weeks on suspicion of subversive activity. Most were subsequently released without charges. Implementation of a 1987 Presidential Decree on remission of prison terms produced uncertainty about the status of some prisoners, including several reportedly still in jail despite apparent expiration of their sentences. Mrs. Sundari Abdulrahman, a former official in the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) whose case was under consideration by the Inter-Parliamentary Union, was released from prison in August. A number of East Timorese left prisons in Jakarta and Dili after finishing sentences for involvement with Fretilin.

The precise functions and powers of the Agency for Coordination of Assistance for the Consolidation of National Security (BAKORSTANAS) remained unclear. In Lampung and elsewhere, elements of it appeared to exercise the emergency security provisions accorded its predecessor, the Command for the Restoration of Security and Order (KOPKAMTIB). KOPKAMTIB was permitted exceptions from KUHP procedures and wide, special powers to detain and interrogate persons thought to threaten national security, particularly in cases of suspected subversion, sabotage, secession, or corruption. BAKORSTANAS may have retained those powers. Indonesian law does not provide for the right to judicial review of such actions or for the right to protection or legal aid for the detainees. Their cases are rarely if ever publicized.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see section 6.c.

INDONESIA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A quadripartite judiciary, consisting of general, religious, military, and administrative courts, exists below the Supreme Court, the highest court of appeal. Parliament passed a law in December that will permit--once implementing regulations are drawn up--the religious courts used by many Muslims to effect judgments without consent of the general courts and to exercise jurisdiction over a somewhat widened field of family law matters. The independence of the judiciary is significantly constrained by the facts that judges are civil servants of the executive branch and that the Supreme Court cannot annul laws passed by Parliament.

Panels of three judges conduct most trials, hear evidence, decide guilt or innocence, and assess punishment. The right of appeal from district court to high court to Supreme Court exists. The Supreme Court does not consider material aspects of a case, only the application of law by lower courts. Initial judgments are rarely reversed, although sentences are occasionally changed. Most court sessions are open to the public and most defendants, if they can pay, have access to counsel. However, such access is in some cases significantly delayed and there are occasional reports of official efforts to influence the choice of counsel. If destitute, defendants can find private legal help such as that provided by the Legal Aid Institute (LBH). Alternatively, the courts have discretion to provide a limited amount of aid for those unable to afford legal assistance. The State must assure legal assistance in capital cases. Government support for programs to improve legal awareness and literacy, legal training, and legal research capabilities is a positive step toward addressing the legal system's deficiencies.

Corruption permeates the Indonesian legal system. In civil and criminal cases, bribes can influence decisions, prosecution, conviction, and sentencing. Use in trials of forced confessions and limitations on the presentation of evidence by the defense are reportedly common. The Government has occasionally taken action against flagrant offenders, but by and large these abuses continue unchecked.

Conviction is virtually automatic for persons accused under Indonesia's broad 1963 subversion provisions, which among other things forbid advocacy or actions in support of secession or creation of an Islamic state, as well as criticism of Pancasila. President Soeharto said in August that comparative study of foreign ideologies, including Communism, with Pancasila is permissible. The Government tried or announced preparations to try some 70 persons for subversion in 1989. A student and an employee at Yogyakarta's Gajah Mada University were sentenced to prison terms of 7 and 8 years, respectively, for circulating, possessing, or advocating banned writings. Appeals are expected. Trials of some defendants from the February incident in Lampung produced sentences of life imprisonment in five cases and 20 years in another. All but one of these defendants refused the Government's offer of legal assistance. Trials also began in Jakarta and Sumbawa of persons charged with seeking to establish an Islamic state.

The Government does not provide data on the number of persons serving sentences under antiradicalism laws. Some observers estimate there may be at least 400. These estimates include persons sentenced for involvement in the 1965 coup attempt and alleged Muslim extremists, many of whom, some observers believe, were convicted for peaceful protest activity.

The President (through the Coordinating Minister for Political Affairs and Security), the Minister of Justice, and the Attorney General, criticized as too lenient a district court decision in March which sentenced a convicted smuggler to a year's probation. Smuggling is classified as a subversive offense and subject to a maximum penalty of death. In April a national legal association called on its Jakarta chapter to deny legal counsel to persons charged with smuggling and corruption.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Judicial warrants for searches are required except for cases involving suspected subversion, economic crimes, and corruption. However, forced or surreptitious entry by security agencies reportedly occurs regularly, especially in East Timor. Security agencies also conduct surveillance of persons and residences to intimidate and are believed to monitor selectively local and international telephone calls, without legal restraint. Correspondence generally is not monitored, although letter mail to and from East Timor may still be an exception. Government security officials try to monitor the movements and activities of up to 2.5 million former members of the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) and approximately 20 million former members of its front groups. Even relatives of such persons can suffer adverse consequences, e.g., loss of government employment.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Significant restrictions on freedom of speech and press exist. Laws delimiting the rights of individual persons and the Government are applied by different government agencies with considerable discretionary authority and without effective judicial review. Public statements or publications which criticize or could be perceived as critical of the Government, Pancasila, top leaders, their families, or particular religious and ethnic groups are strongly discouraged if not strictly forbidden. Trials and convictions of some persons under the subversion law periodically demonstrate these limitations.

The media generally avoid or exercise great caution in disseminating views of government critics, including prominent opposition figures, because of the risk of official disapproval or informal government instructions not to publish them. The general lack of specific, clear guidelines on what is permissible has generated a significant degree of self-censorship both in public speaking and in the press. Nonetheless, the limits of government tolerance are regularly tested, and public discussion and media reporting of a number of topics generally regarded as sensitive to the Government (including human rights issues) increased significantly in 1989. Some representatives of nongovernmental organizations attending an April conference in Belgium went beyond the governmental bounds, however, and officials publicly and privately chastised them for voicing criticism outside Indonesia of the alleged negative social and human rights impact of certain development projects.

INDONESIA

The Government operates the national television network. It was criticized by the Minister of Information for airing songs the Government judged to be of low moral value and by religious leaders for showing a film considered offensive to Muslims. A private company which offers a subscription television service to viewers in the Jakarta area received a government warning for advertising and programming considered culturally inappropriate. Satellite dishes are used by the media and the elite to monitor television broadcasts from the United States and other countries. Television signals from neighboring countries are received in some parts of Indonesia. While more than 400 private radio stations operate in Indonesia, they may use only government-provided news programs. The Minister of Information warned the many Indonesians who listen to shortwave radio broadcasts not to be unduly influenced by reports critical of the country.

While academic freedom is guaranteed, constraints exist on the activities of scholars. They sometimes refrain from producing written materials, including dissertations, which they believe might provoke government displeasure. Publishers are unwilling to accept manuscripts dealing with controversial issues.

The press is largely privately owned. Civilian and military officials regularly maintain that, in accordance with Pancasila, the press is "free" but also "responsible." The Government expects the media to support national development and stability; to be educational; and to uphold professional standards. Government officials regularly advise editors and reporters about news which cannot be reported and closely monitor media outlets for material unacceptable to the Government. The Government issues oral or written warnings for published material found objectionable. If ignored, warnings could result in a circulation ban or revocation of the license to publish. The number of newspaper licenses is limited, and regulations control the amount of advertising and the number of pages. In 1989 the press received warnings for reports on land disputes, student demonstrations, and subversion trials; for speculation about future political leaders; for publication of sexually provocative pictures; and for misquotation of officials. The Attorney General banned as culturally inappropriate an Indonesian-language translation of a children's educational book depicting the human reproductive process. Several other foreign and domestic books were banned for assertedly subversive ideological content.

Chinese-language publications, with the exception of one officially sanctioned daily newspaper, can neither be imported nor produced domestically. Although organized private instruction of Chinese is discouraged, there are some private school classes, informal circles, and private teachers. No laws prohibit the speaking of Chinese, but the Government lays heavy stress on the learning and use of the national language, Bahasa Indonesia.

The Government closely regulates visiting and resident foreign correspondents and occasionally reminds the latter of its prerogative to deny requests for visas or visa extensions. One foreign correspondent was denied entry in 1989; no foreign correspondents were denied visa extensions.

The importation of foreign publications and video tapes, which must be reviewed by government censors, requires a permit. Importers usually avoid foreign books critical of the Government or dealing with topics sensitive to the Government, such as human rights. Foreign periodicals, readily available in Indonesia, are subject to censorship prior to distribution. Importation of some foreign newspapers and magazines and all Communist publications is prohibited. In 1989 the Attorney General and Supreme Court banned first the importation of "The Satanic Verses" and then its domestic circulation. Censorship of imported newspapers and other written materials generally was more relaxed in 1989.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All organizations must have government permission to hold regional and national meetings. Local jurisdictions often require prior approval for smaller gatherings as well. While obtaining such approval is fairly automatic and apparently was eased in 1989, authorities withhold permission on occasion. Officials refused to approve a Christian youth gathering in a predominantly Muslim area in southeast Sulawesi. Student gatherings have often been the target of disapprovals, and overt political activity at universities remains forbidden under the "campus life normalization" (or "NKK") law of 1978. Nonetheless, student activism, including peaceful demonstrations, increased markedly in 1989. Reactions from civilian and military officials and university rectors varied considerably. Sometimes students were applauded for bringing issues to public attention; other times tolerated, warned, or expelled; and on several occasions forcibly dispersed.

Several student protestors were hospitalized in September following a clash with security forces in Yogyakarta. Authorities detained and arrested several students for participating in protests. Two of these went on trial on criminal charges. A demonstration by about a score of students displaying nationalist banners which took place at the conclusion of the Pope's mass in East Timor was broken up by security forces. Credible reports say several students were detained; others sought refuge in the local bishop's residence.

The 1985 "Social Organizations" (or "Ormas") Law requires all organizations, including recognized religions and associations, to adhere to Pancasila. This provision, which limits political activity, is widely understood as prohibiting groups which advocate making Indonesia an Islamic state. The law empowers the Government to disband any organization it believes to be acting against the tenets of Pancasila and requires prior government approval for any organization's acceptance of foreign funds. Security forces have infiltrated and broken up Islamic study groups which met privately to advocate strict obedience to Islamic law.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees religious freedom for four state-recognized religions--Islam, Christianity, Buddhism, and Hinduism--and also permits the practice of mystic and animist religion ("aliran kepercayaan"). Although most Indonesians are Muslims, Indonesia has traditionally displayed a high degree of religious tolerance, and the practice and teachings of the other recognized faiths are respected. The Catholic church operates freely in East Timor.

INDONESIA

There are, however, a number of restrictions on religious activity. According to official statistics, nearly 400 "misleading religious cults" are banned, including some Islamic groups considered heretical. These bannings affect perhaps 20,000 adherents or more. New bannings occur periodically. Membership in Jehovah's Witnesses and the Baha'i faith is banned, although several thousand Jehovah's Witnesses are believed to practice in Jakarta alone. A central Java court in 1989 sentenced two persons to jail terms of 1 1/2 and 2 1/2 years, respectively, for spreading Jehovah's Witnesses' teachings and allegedly causing unrest. Authorities have occasionally harassed or discriminated against Baha'is. Twelve members of a banned Muslim sect were reportedly arrested in south Sumatra in September en route to Aceh for proselytizing. Because the first tenet of the Pancasila is belief in a supreme being, atheism is forbidden. The legal requirement to adhere to Pancasila extends to all religious and secular organizations. The Government often tolerates private practice of banned religions, although local authorities occasionally harass adherents or pressure them to convert.

The Government strongly opposes Muslim groups which advocate establishing an Islamic state or acknowledging only Islamic law, both of which are outlawed. An estimated 120 alleged Muslim extremists are serving prison terms on charges of subversion. Several foreign Muslim fundamentalist teachers reportedly found proselytizing while on tourist passes were deported during the year with some publicity.

There is no legal bar to conversion between faiths, and conversions occur. However, proselytizing between the recognized religions or in areas heavily dominated by one religion or another--excluding mystic and animist religions--is considered potentially disruptive and discouraged. Foreign missionary activities are relatively unimpeded. In recent years, however, some foreign missionaries have had difficulty renewing visas or residence permits. On the basis of laws and decrees issued in the mid-1970's, the Government does not allow foreign missionaries to spend more than 10 years in Indonesia (15 in exceptional circumstances only). With rare exceptions, enforcement of this policy does not discriminate by sect or nationality. Exceptions to the 10-year rule have also been granted to foreign religious workers in the remote areas of Irian Jaya and Kalimantan since late 1987. The Government says it intends over time to reduce the number of foreign missionaries in order to encourage employment of Indonesians. Foreign missionary work is subject to the funding stipulations of the "Ormas" law discussed above.

Indonesian Muslims, Christians, and Buddhists maintain active links with coreligionists inside and outside Indonesia and travel abroad for religious gatherings. The Government permits a set number of pilgrims to make the hajj annually. Such trips are available only through government-organized tours. The Pope visited Indonesia in October, offering mass to Catholics in Medan, Jakarta, Yogyakarta, Flores, and East Timor. During his visit, he praised Indonesia's respect for the ethnic, cultural, and religious pluralism among its citizens. More than 100,000 Catholics from East and West Timor attended the service in Dili at which the Pope officiated.

INDONESIA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Restrictions on freedom of movement exist. Permits to seek work in a new location are required in certain areas, primarily to control the further shift of population from rural to urban areas.

The Government said noncitizen ethnic Chinese who did not take advantage of a 1988 offer of immigration amnesty would be tried as illegal immigrants. Estimates of the number of persons potentially affected vary considerably, and no such trials have yet taken place. In the past, some ethnic Chinese encountered legal and bureaucratic obstacles to obtaining citizenship, despite official encouragement of naturalization. Officials barred 60 ethnic Chinese citizens from foreign travel for a year for visiting China without proper authorization.

By administrative action, the Government periodically prohibits foreign travel of domestic critics and others in disfavor. Although reliable figures are not available, it is estimated that some 5,000 Indonesians--including some prominent past civilian and military officials--currently may not leave the country. Some critics, however, are free to travel abroad, and a person banned at one time may be permitted to travel subsequently. Students do not need government permission to go abroad for study. In April the Government abolished the exit visa requirement for active-duty and retired members of the armed forces, state officials, civil servants, and their families, a step potentially affecting an estimated 11 percent of the population.

Restrictions on movement by Indonesian and foreign citizens to and within parts of Irian Jaya continue, officially based on the grounds of security risk or the cultural vulnerability of indigenous peoples. Beginning in January 1989, restrictions on movement to, from, and within East Timor eased considerably under a policy of "normalizing" East Timor's status. Nonetheless, frequent security checks affect virtually all transportation and travel in East Timor outside Dili. Curfews and other restrictions on movement are often in force at times of military operations in a given area. Family visits back to East Timor by East Timorese now living in Australia began in 1988 and continued in 1989.

Former political detainees, including those associated with the abortive 1965 coup, must notify authorities of their movements and may not change their residence without official permission. Members or alleged supporters of the banned Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) outside Indonesia have been allowed to return only on a case-by-case basis.

Under its refugee policy, Indonesia has given first asylum to over 106,000 Indochinese refugees since 1975. The Indochinese refugee population at Indonesia's Galang facility stood at about 6,600 at the end of October. Of this number, 1,200 are classified as refugees under the Comprehensive Plan of Action on Indochinese refugees (CPA) adopted at the June International Conference on Indochinese Refugees in Geneva; the rest are classified as asylum-seekers pending screening by Indonesian authorities for refugee status eligibility. Since May Indonesia accepted refugee boats pushed off from Malaysia with a total of 2,500 Indochinese asylum seekers.

INDONESIA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Parliament, political parties, and the general public have little ability to influence government decisions or to change the system or its leadership. President Soeharto and a small group of active-duty and retired military officers and civilian technocrats exercise governmental authority. The military, under a dual-function doctrine of defense/security plus social/political responsibilities, is preeminent in most areas of government activity, although in some parts of the Government its presence has declined in recent years. The Constitution provides Parliament a mechanism to call the President to account in extraordinary circumstances but whether it could be used effectively is in doubt. Government leaders do seek out and receive public opinion informally. In several cases in 1989, petitions to ministers and the Parliament about inequitable land decisions and other demonstrable injustices received wide publicity. Reflecting a strong cultural preference, Indonesian leaders emphasize the importance of decisionmaking through "consultation leading to consensus," rather than voting, to resolve disputes.

In 1989 lively public debate among elites on the need for political openness to keep pace with and support economic progress focused attention on the paternalistic political system and the challenge of managing change. When asked publicly whether there is a need for changes in electoral procedures, political party leaders responded that the current electoral system is appropriate and adequate.

The Parliament--whose membership must be acceptable to the Government--considers bills presented to it by government departments and agencies and does not draft laws on its own, although it has the constitutional right to do so. The Government seeks to resolve potential parliamentary concerns before bills are officially presented. Parliament changes the text and occasionally the intent of bills it reviews, and in 1989 significantly altered major bills on the national education system and religious courts.

Only three political organizations are allowed by law. The United Development Party (PPP) and the Indonesian Democratic Party (PDI) are not considered opposition parties. By law, they embrace the Pancasila, and they seldom espouse policies much different from the Government's. The third, GOLKAR, is a longstanding, government-sponsored organization of functional groups which acts as a political party. Former members of the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) and some other banned parties may not run for office or be active politically.

The leaders of the three legal political organizations are approved, if not chosen, by the Government, and their activities are closely scrutinized and often guided by government authorities. GOLKAR maintains close institutional links with the armed forces and KORPRI, the nonunion association to which all civil servants automatically belong. Civil servants may join any of the political parties with official permission, but most are members of GOLKAR.

General elections for Parliament and for provincial and district assemblies are held every 5 years. GOLKAR won 73 percent of the vote in the 1987 elections. All adult citizens, except active-duty armed forces personnel, convicted criminals serving prison sentences, and some former PKI members, are eligible to vote. Voting is not mandatory, but strong social pressures ensure participation. Protest votes take the form of blank or deliberately spoiled ballots. As in 1988, voters in several villages in Java rejected government-proposed candidates running unopposed for the position of village head.

Under the 1985 election law, the Parliament elected in April 1987 consists of 500 members, 400 elected by the voters and 100 appointed by the Government from the armed forces. The People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) consists of Parliament plus 500 other members appointed by the President and by regional governments. The MPR, which convenes every 5 years, ended its most recent session in March 1988 after approving guidelines for government policy for the next 5 years and reelecting President Soeharto to a new 5-year term, with retired Lt. Gen. Sudharmono as Vice President. For the first time an alternate candidate vied for the Vice Presidency in 1988, until he ultimately withdrew from contention.

Participation in the political process by Indonesia's many ethnic groups and minorities varies. Some are well and prominently represented; some are underrepresented and without influence; and others have a significant voice only through informal channels.

The Government considers outside investigations of alleged human rights violations to be interference in its internal affairs. AI has been refused access to Indonesia; Asia Watch visited in 1988 and 1989. Access specifically to East Timor by representatives of such organizations--which the Government considers biased--has traditionally been restricted. However, AI and Asia Watch have not yet tested the new East Timor "normalization" policy, which appears to have loosened those restrictions. Diplomats and some journalists are encouraged to visit the province. The Government ignored calls by domestic human rights groups and activists for impartial investigations of the February Lampung incident and detentions of radical preachers in Sumbawa in March. While various domestic organizations and persons interested in human rights operate energetically, the Government uses its considerable powers to discourage sustained, meaningful human rights activities, including maintenance of close ties with foreign human rights organizations.

The ICRC is authorized by the Government to visit persons jailed in connection with armed resistance in East Timor. One press report in 1989 suggested that many have not been visited despite the Government's pledge. The ICRC provides medical and food aid to prisoners and their families; carries out medical and nutritional surveys in villages in East Timor; arranged family reunification in East Timor and abroad (mainly Portugal); and arranges repatriation to Portugal of former Portuguese civil servants and their families in East Timor. The ICRC opened an office in Irian Jaya in 1989 to assist future border crossers returning from camps in Papua New Guinea and to monitor conditions of persons jailed in connection with OPM activities. In 1988 and 1989, the ICRC visited and interviewed all remaining prisoners convicted of participation in the 1965 Communist-backed attempted coup. The Government does not allow access by the ICRC or any other international humanitarian group to the numerous Muslim activists held prisoner.

Indonesia generally exhibits considerable tolerance for ethnic, racial, and major religious differences, although official and informal discrimination against ethnic Chinese is a significant exception. They are pressured to take Indonesian names. Since 1959 noncitizen ethnic Chinese have been denied the right to run businesses in rural Indonesia. Government regulations prohibit the operation of all-Chinese schools and institutions of higher learning, formation of exclusively Chinese cultural groups or trade associations, and public display of Chinese characters. However, these restrictions are not always observed in practice. Many people of Chinese ancestry have been successful in business and the professions. Social and religious groups which are, in effect, all-Chinese are not proscribed and do exist. Performances of a Chinese opera from Taiwan in Jakarta and of a play about Chinese in Medan were canceled by the Government.

Women are equal before the law, with the same rights, obligations and opportunities afforded men. Indonesia has ratified the U.N. Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women. Some Indonesian women enjoy a high degree of economic and social freedom. Women occupy important midlevel positions in the civil service, educational institutions, labor unions, the military, the professions, and private business. Women make up approximately 37 percent of the work force, with the majority in the rural sector.

Despite legal guarantees of equal treatment, women seldom receive equal pay for equal work. The Minister for the Role of Women, Mrs. A. Sulastikin Murpratomo, has called public attention to women's undue burden of illiteracy, poor health, and poor nutrition. Traditional practices ("adat") can also in some cases undercut state policy. Spouses of civil servants are strongly encouraged to participate in a government-sponsored women's organization. Several voluntary, private groups work actively to advance women's legal, economic, and political rights. The media periodically report instances of rape and other abuse against women and subsequent legal proceedings against the perpetrators. However, reliable data concerning the extent of violence against women is not available. The Government has recognized publicly that domestic violence is an emerging problem for Indonesian society. In May it held a seminar to encourage efforts to understand and overcome this problem. Several university centers studying the role of women focus some attention on domestic violence. One Jakarta-based organization provided counseling to victims and families in 210 cases of domestic violence in 1988 and in 94 cases as of April in 1989. The Ministry of Religious Affairs also offers counseling to married couples. However, cultural, social, psychological, and other factors inhibit reporting of such abuse and recourse to counseling and legal protection.

INDONESIA

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Private-sector workers are free to form or join unions without previous authorization, but such unions, in order to be able to bargain collectively, must belong to the All Indonesia Workers Union (SPSI), which, for all practical purposes, is the only legal trade union organization in Indonesia. About 5 percent of the total labor force of nearly 75 million is organized. The SPSI now consists of 9 departments covering broad industrial sectors and 9 specialized institutes. It has representation in all 27 provinces. It estimates that it has about 10,000 local units at the plant level and over 3 million members. A number of groups and professional associations, e.g., the teachers' and journalists' associations and the Joint Secretariat of Industrial Unions, function as quasi-trade unions and operate openly, although they do not have the right to engage in collective bargaining. The SPSI and its local units draw up their own constitutions and rules and elect their representatives.

The Government views unions as an essential component of its development plans, with the role of increasing worker participation in development, maintaining industrial peace, and elucidating the Government's philosophy of Pancasila as it applies to industrial relations. Labor-management relations in Indonesia are supposed to be carried out within the framework of Pancasila principles, which emphasize consultation among the parties and avoidance of confrontation. There is pressure on SPSI officials to join GOLKAR, and GOLKAR members dominate the leadership.

The Ormas law discussed in Section 2.b. governs the activities of the SPSI and the quasi-unions. Government approval is needed for meetings outside SPSI headquarters. Permission is routinely given to the SPSI and to nonregistered organizations overtly functioning as unions. A union may be dissolved, as with other mass organizations if the Government believes it is acting against Pancasila tenets. There are no laws or regulations laying out the procedures for the dissolution of a union, and there have been no cases of union dissolution.

Although the SPSI maintains extensive international contacts, it is not affiliated with any international trade union organization, except the ASEAN Trade Union Council--a regional body consisting almost exclusively of affiliates of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). As a fallout of the 1985 restructuring of the SPSI, there has been no formal ICFTU presence in Indonesia since 1986. International trade union secretariats retain links with some elements of the SPSI, such as the port and maritime workers. The "Joint Secretariat," grouping elements of the SPSI and the unions not legally recognized by the Government, has links with the World Confederation of Labor. The SPSI is seeking to affiliate with the ICFTU.

All organized workers have a legal right to strike with the exception of civil servants and employees in the 21 industries designated by a Presidential Decree in 1963 as vital to the national interest. Many of the installations and projects covered by the decree no longer exist or have been absorbed into other agencies and departments. Those that remain cover about 170,000 workers.

INDONESIA

State enterprise employees and civil servants must belong to KORPRI, the Indonesian corps of civil servants--a nonunion association chaired by the Minister of Home Affairs. The central board of KORPRI and its secretariats at the provincial level have employee relations bureaus, which are responsible for settling employee disputes. Some government departments have specific agreements with the Department of Manpower which call for the convening of a labor committee to resolve disputes.

A private-sector union must notify the local Department of Manpower office that its attempts to resolve disagreements through negotiations have failed and that the union will go on strike. No approval is required. During 1988 and 1989, there were 53 reported strikes involving 11,456 workers. Most strikes are brief, spontaneous, and nonviolent. Some observers believe that for every officially recorded strike, there may be 4 to 5 others.

The strike outcomes varied. A review of approximately 20 strikes near Jakarta showed some employee demands were met. Some involved conciliation by the local branch of the Department of Manpower, some were resolved through negotiations with management, and others resulted in the firing of union officials for ostensibly work-related reasons.

Private-sector industrial disputes are submitted to tripartite administrative tribunals. These tribunals hear arguments and issue executable, enforceable decisions. Decisions of the tribunals and private arbitrators can be enforced through the courts. The Minister of Manpower can nullify decisions of the administrative tribunals on legal or national interest grounds. Although technically the Minister's decisions can be appealed to the courts, in practice it is rarely done. Under the law the parties can elect binding arbitration in lieu of the tripartite settlement mechanism. However, this provision is seldom used; most cases are handled by the Department of Manpower's mediation and conciliation service.

Indonesia has ratified International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 98 on the Right to Bargain Collectively, but has not ratified Convention 87 on the Freedom of Association.

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) believes that Indonesian workers are denied the right of association. Specifically, it alleges that the SPSI is dominated by the Government and is an agent of government labor policy, that the Government unilaterally denies the right to strike in certain industries, that the Government regularly guarantees a nonunion environment to foreign investors, and that public employees may not organize or strike. The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) has under consideration a 1987 complaint by the ICFTU which alleges that Indonesian legislation restricts trade union rights, particularly the rights of government employees, contrary to the principles of freedom of association and the provisions of ILO Convention 98. The Committee requested at its November 1988 session that the Government take steps to amend its legislation in some areas and to provide additional information on others. The Government said in its February response that freedom of association and collective bargaining are fully respected and that Indonesia is now in the process of developing "the most suitable pattern" of applying these rights. In May 1989, the CFA still found that a large section of the Indonesian work force does not have freedom to form or join a workers' organization of their own choosing and requested the Government to amend its legislation to permit government employees to establish unions outside the KORPRI structure and to remove other restrictions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is guaranteed by law; the Department of Manpower vigorously promotes collective agreements as instruments of Pancasila industrial relations. The overwhelming majority of the SPSI's collective bargaining agreements are negotiated and concluded bilaterally with the employer. Once an employer has been notified that 25 employees have joined a union, he is under an obligation to bargain. As a transitional stage to encourage collective bargaining, regulations require that every company which has 25 or more employees must issue company regulations defining the terms and conditions of employment. Of the approximately 10,000 local SPSI units, only about half have executed collective bargaining agreements. In what the Department of Manpower has characterized as an effort to promote voluntary negotiations between employees and employers, it has encouraged the organization of unions. The Minister of Manpower has set a target of 2,000 collective bargaining agreements over the next 5 years. By regulation, negotiations are to conclude within 30 days. If not, the matter is to be submitted to the Department of Manpower for mediation and conciliation/arbitration. In practice, most negotiations are concluded before the end of the 30-day period. Agreements are valid for 2 years and can be extended for 1 year.

The law protects collective bargaining agreements and the negotiating process by imposing obligations on both the union and the employer. Both parties are obligated to execute the agreements and to bargain in good faith. The law applies equally in the export processing zones. Some companies in these zones have SPSI units; however, none has negotiated a collective bargaining agreement.

Regulations expressly forbid employers from prejudging or harassing employees because of union membership, and employees are urged to report harassment to the Government. The SPSI claims, supported by reported incidents, that some employers discriminate against its members and those wishing to form SPSI units. Charges of antiunion discrimination are handled by the administrative tribunals.

Workers can organize without restriction in a private enterprise even if it is designated vital by the Government. If the State has a partial interest, the enterprise is considered to be in the public service domain, but this does not legally limit organizing. There are a significant number of government/private joint enterprises which have labor unions and which bargain collectively.

The AFL-CIO also alleges that Indonesia denies workers the right to organize and bargain collectively. The AFL-CIO has charged that the Government routinely denies permission for union meetings and subverts collective bargaining by routinely substituting compulsory arbitration for genuine collective bargaining. The 1987 ICFTU complaint alleged that Indonesian regulations permit only the SPSI to register legitimately, thereby failing to encourage and promote collective bargaining, and that the laws do not satisfy the antiunion discrimination requirement of ILO Convention 98.

INDONESIA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is strictly prohibited and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

In 1987 the Indonesian Department of Manpower issued new regulations on child labor, acknowledged a class of children under age 14 who for socioeconomic reasons must work and noted that Indonesia's child labor laws have not been properly enforced. These laws provide detailed safeguards, including requirements for parental consent, prohibition of dangerous work and night work and limiting the workday to 4 hours. Employers must also cooperate with public authorities to assure that children under 14 comply with the 1989 National Education Law, which requires that children complete 9 years of school beginning at age 7. However, these regulations are inadequately enforced, and some observers have called for national enforcement procedures.

The new regulations call for improved enforcement of the child labor law. Employers are now required to report in detail on every child employed, and periodic inspections are to be carried out by the Department of Manpower. Employers not complying with the law and regulations will be subject to fines of $65 and/or up to 3 months in jail for each infraction.

The Manpower Department, as a follow-up to its new regulations, has issued directives to remind local Department of Manpower offices of their inspection obligations and to increase inspection in the informal sectors. However, according to the Department, as of March 1989 there were only 4,749 children registered as employed in Indonesia. Some local observers claim that as many as 2 million youths under the age of 14 are working one-half to full time or more, though most of these are thought to be employed in family-run businesses in the informal sector and at agricultural sites where normal enforcement mechanisms are difficult to implement. The Department of Manpower admits that employer compliance with the new regulations is far less than ideal and that it still lacks qualified inspectors to carry out the inspections. It estimates that less than 50 percent of companies employing children have registered.

Present efforts to control child labor focus primarily on instituting educational programs for children who must work. Future programs call for allocation of special funds to provide educational opportunities for working children cooperating with self-help institutes which will provide educational programs, and increased government inspection. The Government, however, still relies upon persuasion and teaching employers rather than penalizing them.

The law establishes 7-hour workdays and 40-hour workweeks, with one-half hour of rest for each 4 hours of work. The daily overtime rate is one and one-half the normal hourly rate for the first hour, and twice the hourly rate for additional overtime. Regulations allow employers to deviate from the normal work hours upon request to the Minister of Manpower with agreement of the employees.

In the absence of a national minimum wage, minimum wages are established for each region, and for sectors and subsectors within the region, by regional wage councils working under the supervision of the National Wage Council. This is a quadripartite body consisting of representatives from labor, management, government, and universities. It also establishes a basic "physical needs" figure for each province--a monetary amount considered sufficient to enable a single worker or family to meet basic needs of nutrition, clothing, and shelter. The annually calculated figure reflects changes in the local Consumer Price Index (CPI) for food, clothing, housing, transportation, and other family needs. Factors considered by the wage councils in setting minimum rates include changes in the local CPI, the skill level of workers, the local supply of manpower, and the ability of firms to pay. Minimum wage rates fall short of providing the decent standard of living the Government envisages. GDP per capita in 1988 was $434. Figures from 1983, the latest available, show that 26 per cent of the urban dwellers and 44 per cent of the rural population live below the absolute poverty level as defined by the World Bank. The minimum wage in the capital city of Jakarta ranges between $0.89 and $1.18 per day, depending on the industry.

A 1989 regulation on minimum wages calls for a review of minimum wages every 2 years, forbids employers from lowering wages already higher than the minimum, and provides mechanisms for enforcement and penalties for employer noncompliance. It also gives the Department of Manpower a legal basis for entering the place of work to carry out inspections.

Labor law and ministerial regulations provide workers with vacation pay, maternity leave, social security insurance, workplace accident insurance, 12 paid public holidays, generous overtime and sick leave pay, guaranteed severance and service pay, paid leave for personal and family occasions, and protection from delay in payment. In addition, workers usually receive transportation allowances, food allowances in cash or in kind or both, and holiday bonuses. Workers in more modern facilities often receive health benefits, social security contributions, and free meals.

Observance of the minimum wage varies from sector to sector and from region to region, and there are no reliable figures on compliance. Employer violation of overtime and minimum wage regulations, however, is considered to be fairly common. Manpower officials, backed by the new minimum wage regulation, have threatened to audit companies not paying the minimum wage and to take tougher action.

Both law and regulations provide for minimum standards of industrial health and safety. Five new health and safety regulations have been promulgated in the last 4 years. A national Health and Safety Council was created to oversee the enforcement efforts of the over 6,000 company safety committees. The Department of Manpower conducts yearly national campaigns to promote public awareness of health and safety needs among workers and employers and administers a country-wide comprehensive inspection system.

Workers are obligated to report hazardous working conditions and employers are prevented by law from retaliating against those who do. An ILO-sponsored program to enhance the technical capabilities of government inspectors and plant personnel in the area of chemical and major hazards control was signed in 1988, and the Government has sought additional technical assistance from other countries to increase inspection capabilities. Safety and health programs in the country's over 100,000 larger, registered industries in the nonoil sector are hampered by a limited number of qualified inspectors--less than 1,300; the slowness with which the firms established the required plant safety committees (only about 6,000 as of May 1989); and the need for more and better training of government inspectors and plant safety personnel.

JAPAN

Japan is a parliamentary democracy based on a constitution adopted in 1947. Sovereignty is vested in the people, and the Emperor is defined as the symbol of state. On the national level, power is divided among executive, legislative, and judicial branches. Executive power is vested in a cabinet, composed of a prime minister and ministers of state, responsible to the Diet, Japan's two-house parliament. The Diet, elected by universal suffrage and secret ballot, designates the prime minister, who must be a member of that body. Nearly 70 percent of the electorate usually votes in general elections, contested by six political parties covering a broad ideological spectrum. The judicial system has several layers of courts, with the Supreme Court as final authority.

A well-organized and disciplined national police force respects the human rights of the populace, although there have been reports of incidents of misconduct by individual police officers, including harsh treatment of prisoners in custody. The police force is firmly under the control of the civil authorities, and there is no evidence that it resorts to extralegal measures in the discharge of its duties. The Civil Liberties Bureau in the Ministry of Justice and the Human Rights and Refugee Division in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs monitor problems relating to human rights practices in Japan.

Japan's free market economy has the world's second largest gross national product. Despite a second quarter net drop in gross national product caused by introduction of a 3-percent consumption tax, the economy has continued to expand rapidly due to increased consumer demand and capital investment.

The Constitution states, "all of the people are equal under the law and there shall be no discrimination in political, economic, or social relations because of race, creed, sex, social status, or family origin." The human rights assured by the Constitution and Bill of Rights are secured by a just and efficient legal system. However, alien residents, the "Burakumin" (a group traditionally treated as outcasts), the Ainu (Japan's indigenous people), and women experience varying degrees of discrimination. Current laws against discrimination contain virtually no penalties for offenders.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known cases of political or other extrajudicial killing.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of abductions, secret arrests, clandestine detention, or hostage holding by security forces or any other organization.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture, cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. There is no evidence that penal treatment varies by social class, sex, or religion.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest or imprisonment is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Japanese law provides for judicial determination of the legality of detention. Persons cannot be detained without charge, and prosecuting authorities must be prepared to demonstrate before trial that probable cause exists to detain the accused. The length of time before a suspect is brought to trial depends on the nature of the crime but rarely exceeds 2 months; the average is 1 to 2 months. The Ministry of Justice has stipulated that a detained person should be able to meet with counsel within 48 hours of the accused's request, though this time limit has not been honored in a few cases. Counsel is provided at government expense when the arrested person cannot afford one. Preventive detention does not exist.

Under the criminal procedure code, a suspect may be held in police custody for up to 72 hours. This period may be extended by a judge for up to 25 days if necessary. If an indictment follows, the suspect is transferred to a criminal detention facility. The Japan Bar Association opposes the legislation, which was first presented to the Diet in 1982 (and defeated), on the grounds that police powers need to be reduced and more fundamental revisions of the detention system are necessary.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial tribunal in all criminal cases, and this right is respected in practice. The defendant is informed of charges upon arrest and assured a public trial by an independent civilian court with defense counsel and the right to cross-examination. The Constitution assures defendants the right not to be compelled to testify against themselves as well as free and private access to counsel, although the right to such access is sometimes abridged in practice. Defendants are also protected from the application of laws retroactively and have the right of access to incriminating evidence after a formal indictment has been made. Judges are appointed by the Cabinet for a 10-year term which can be renewed until the age of 65. Justices of the Supreme Court can serve until the age of 70, but face periodic review through popular referendum. A defendant who is dissatisfied with the decision of a trial court of first instance may, within the period prescribed by law, appeal to a higher court. There are several levels of courts, with the Supreme Court serving as the highest judicial authority. There is no trial by jury in Japan.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the Constitution, each search or seizure must be made upon separate warrant issued by a judicial officer. The standards for issuing such warrants exist to guard against arbitrary searches. There are no reports that the Government or any other organization arbitrarily interfered with privacy, family, home, or correspondence.

JAPAN

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution, an independent press and judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution and respected in practice. While Buddhism and Shintoism remain the two major religions, there are many others, including several Christian denominations. Foreign missionaries are welcome and receive special visa status. Some temples and shrines receive public support as treasured national properties.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Japanese citizens have the right to travel freely, both within Japan and abroad, to change their place of residence, to emigrate, and to repatriate voluntarily. Japanese nationality can be lost by naturalization in a foreign country or failure to elect Japanese nationality at the proper age.

In 1985 the Government agreed to the permanent settlement of a total of 10,000 Vietnamese refugees of which about 6,200 have been processed. An organization was set up by the Government to train these refugees and find them jobs. Officials working with the immigrants say they face frequent police harassment and widespread discrimination in obtaining housing, jobs, and health care.

Japanese citizens have the right and ability peacefully to change their government. A parliamentary democracy, Japan is ruled by the political party or parties able to form a majority in the lower house of its bicameral Diet. The Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) has been in power on the national level--through control of the lower house--continuously since its establishment in 1955; however, opposition parties took control of the upper house of the Diet from the LDP in elections in July. Local and prefectural governments are often controlled by coalitions. Elections on all levels are held frequently, suffrage is universal, and ballots are secret.

Postwar population movements have left some parliamentary electoral districts overrepresented, in a number of cases by more than a three-to-one ratio. The Supreme Court has called for greater equality in the value of votes, but the lack of a nonpartisan mechanism to make such changes has slowed the process of adjustment.

JAPAN

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not obstruct or inhibit the investigative activities of international nongovernmental organizations. Japan is a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

The exclusive nature of Japanese society, reinforced by cultural and ethnic homogeneity and a long tradition of isolation from other cultures, has impeded the integration of minority groups. Although the legal system has gradually evolved toward granting equal opportunity to minorities, entrenched social prejudice against both Korean residents (most of whom were born, raised, and educated in Japan) and the Burakumin (descendants of feudal era "outcasts" who practiced so-called unclean professions such as butchering and undertaking) has restricted the access of both groups to private housing, employment, and marriage opportunities. The Ainu, descendants of the original inhabitants of Japan, also have complained of discrimination, especially regarding employment opportunities. Societal alienation has also been faced by the nearly 100,000 illegal immigrants, mostly from south and southeast Asia, who have come in search of jobs, enticed by a labor shortage and the high value of the yen in the last few years. Although they suffer social discrimination, as Japanese citizens Burakumin and Ainu enjoy equal protection under the Constitution. The Government also has enacted a special budget measure for area improvement projects, which provides funds until 1992 to complete projects started under a similar law which expired last year. That law, first issued in 1969, was designed to help assimilate Burakumin into mainstream society through a number of social, economic, and legal programs.

In recent years the Government has enacted several laws and regulations extending to permanent resident aliens, 82 percent of whom are Koreans, equal access to public housing and loans, social security pensions for those qualified, and certain public employment rights. However, antidiscrimination laws affecting Korean residents were initiated as government guidance and are not backed up by penalty provisions, which makes enforcement difficult.

The Government addressed an issue of concern to resident Koreans in 1987 in revising the Alien Registration Law to require a single fingerprinting of foreign residents rather than repeated fingerprinting at 5-year intervals. Human rights activists representing Korean residents have called for complete abolition of the fingerprinting requirement.

In February, following the death of the Emperor, the Ministry of Justice announced a general amnesty which pardoned, among others, approximately 10,000 people who had violated an earlier alien registration law. Some critics of the present law plan to challenge the section that requires a person to carry his registration card at all times.

According to law, aliens with 5 years' continuous residence are eligible for naturalization and the simultaneous acquisition of citizenship rights, including the right to vote. In fact, however, relatively few eligible aliens have been naturalized. Many permanent residents are unwilling to seek naturalization, fearing their cultural identity would be erased by that act. A high intermarriage rate and changes in the naturalization law several years ago to allow Japanese women, as well as men, to convey citizenship to the offspring of mixed marriages will eventually reduce the number of noncitizen Korean residents of Japan.

The position of women in society and the home, although significantly improved during the last few decades, continues to reflect deep-seated traditional values in which women play a subordinate role. In this environment, violence against women, particularly domestic violence, often goes unreported due to social and cultural concerns for shaming one's family or endangering the reputation of one's spouse or offspring. Typically, victimized women more often return to the home of their parents rather than file reports with authorities. The Ministry of Justice maintains no statistics on reported crimes specifically victimizing women and was unable to provide estimates for those cases which go unreported. Local governments have begun to respond to a need for confidential assistance by establishing special women's consultation departments in police and prefectural offices.

Discrimination by private employers against women is prohibited by the Constitution. Women comprise 40 percent of the employed population. Legislation over the past 30 years has been adjusted to accord them the same legal status as men. The Equal Employment Opportunity Law of 1986 was aimed at eliminating sex discrimination in such areas as recruitment, pay, and working hours. Under this law, the Ministry of Labor attempts to induce corporate compliance with its objectives by positive inducements, including subsidies; it does not enforce them through fines or other punitive measures. According to some experts on the situation of women in the workplace, the law has been a valuable tool in promoting change in employment practices. Other observers believe that the law as written does not achieve sufficient compliance from employers. In any case, significant disparities in pay and access to managerial positions persist. The public awareness of sexual harassment in the workplace as a problem appears to be on the rise, as indicated by an increased frequency of press reports in 1989.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO) is protected. The right of workers to organize, bargain, and act collectively is assured by the Constitution. Approximately 26.6 percent of the active work force belongs to unions. Unions are free of government control and influence. There is no requirement for a single trade union structure, and there are no restrictions on who may be a union official. Most unions are involved in political activity as well as labor relations. The right to strike is implicitly assumed by the Constitution, and it was exercised frequently in 1989. Public employees, however, do not have the right to strike, although they do have recourse to mediation and arbitration in order to resolve disputes. In exchange for a ban on their right to strike, government employees' pay raises are determined by the Government based on a recommendation by the independent National Personnel Authority (NPA). The right of Japan's fire fighters to organize has been debated in the ILO for over 30 years. At the end of its 1989 deliberations, the ILO's Committee on the Application of Standards expressed the firm hope that the discussions with representative trade unions would be intensified and that they would soon lead to the recognition of the fire fighters' right to organize in conformity with Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. Unions are active in international bodies, most notably the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and maintain extensive international contacts.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Constitution states that unions have the right to organize, bargain, and act collectively and these rights are exercised in practice. Antiunion discrimination is prohibited by law and in practice. Members of the armed forces, police, and fire fighters are not permitted to organize. Japanese law also allows unions to lobby and to make political campaign contributions. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Labor Standards Law prohibits the use of forced labor, and there are no known cases of forced or compulsory labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Under the revised Labor Standards Law of 1987, minors under 15 years of age may not be employed as workers and those under the age of 18 years may not be employed in dangerous or harmful work. Child labor laws are rigorously enforced by the Labor Inspection Division of the Ministry of Labor.

The Labor Standards Law provides for the phased reduction of maximum working hours from the present 46-hour/6-day workweek to 40 hours by early in the 1990's. Although introduced as a means of increasing the leisure time available to the work force, the law has been criticized by employee groups because of the increased flexibility it gives employers in calculating actual working hours and vacation benefits. Nevertheless, despite the fact that 1988 (the last year for which figures are available) was a year of strong business expansion, annual hours worked showed a modest decline, reversing a trend which saw them increase annually since 1975.

Minimum wages are set regionally, not nationally. For example, effective October 1989, the Tokyo metropolitan area minimum wage was $3.75 hourly. This is the highest regionally set minimum. The minimum wage for Kagoshima prefecture was $3.18, Japan's lowest regional minimum wage. In addition, regions have minimum wage rates for certain industries. These vary from region to region, but they are higher than the regional minimum wage rates, which are not industry-specific. These wage rates are sufficient to provide workers and their families with a decent living. The Ministry of Labor effectively administers various laws and regulations governing occupational health and safety, principal among which is the Industrial Safety and Health Law of 1972.

KIRIBATI

Some 63,000 people, mostly of Micronesian and Polynesian background, occupy Kiribati's 33 islands scattered across a wide area of the Central Pacific. Kiribati gained full independence from the United Kingdom in 1979 and became a republic within the Commonwealth of Nations. It has a nationally elected president and a 35-member legislative assembly elected by universal suffrage. Local affairs are handled in a manner similar to the procedures followed in New England town meetings. The only security apparatus is a small police force, responsible to and effectively controlled by civilian authority.

The economy is very small; the majority of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture and farming. The islands' isolation and their meager resources, including poor soil and limited arable land, severely limit prospects for economic development. Fishing is viewed as one of Kiribati's few economic opportunities.

Kiribati society is egalitarian, democratic, and respectful of human rights. There were no important human rights issues in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no politically motivated killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no disappearances, nor was there any evidence of people being abducted, secretly arrested, or clandestinely detained.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman or degrading punishment or other such treatment are forbidden by the Constitution, and there were no reported instances of such practices.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution contains safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, which are observed in practice. There is no exile, internal or external.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is assured by law and observed in practice. The Constitution provides that an accused person be informed of the nature of the offense with which he is charged and be provided adequate time and facilities to prepare a defense. The right to confront witnesses, present evidence, and appeal convictions is enshrined in law. Procedural safeguards are based on English common law and are generally similar to those in Western democracies. The judiciary is independent and free of governmental interference. There are no special courts for political or security offenses. Kiribati has no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The privacy of the home is protected in law and respected by the Government. There is no arbitrary intrusion by the State or political organizations into the private life of the individual. Membership in political organizations is entirely voluntary.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are provided for in the Constitution and observed in practice. Kiribati's radio station and sole newspaper are government owned. Churches in Kiribati also publish newsletters and other periodicals. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Kiribati's Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association, including the right to form or belong to associations for the advancement or protection of the group's interests. There are no significant restrictions in practice.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Complete freedom of religion prevails in Kiribati. There is no state or preferred religion. Missionaries are free to seek converts and actively do so.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Kiribati citizens are free to travel within the country and abroad. There are no restrictions on repatriation. Kiribati has no refugees or displaced persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Government is chosen by the people in free and open elections. Executive authority is exercised by the President, who is elected by the people. Three presidential candidates are nominated by the elected House of Assembly from its members. The current President has held that position since independence. The only political party is one formed to oppose some of his policies.

There have been no reported allegations of human rights violations by the Government and no known requests for investigations. There are no local nongovernmental organizations which concern themselves with human rights. The Government has not taken an active interest in international human rights matters. Kiribati is not a member of the United Nations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, creed, or national origin. The traditional culture, in which males are dominant, has been an impediment to women taking a more active role in the economy. This is slowly changing, and more women are finding work in unskilled and semiskilled occupations. Statistics on the participation of women in the work force and comparative wages are unavailable. Women have full rights of ownership and inheritance of property. No information is available on violence against women in this isolated, rural society. If wife beating exists, it has not become a notable public concern. There were no reports of discrimination in the provision of social services by the Government. Kiribati has no significant discrimination based on race, religion, language, or social status. Kiribati society, being fundamentally egalitarian, does not have the privileged chiefly class of some other Pacific island societies.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Kiribati workers are free to organize unions and choose their own representatives. The Government does not control or restrict the unions. Trade union members and properties are respected. The right to strike is provided for by law. However, strikes are rare, the last one having taken place in 1980.

Kiribati has a relatively strong and effective trade union movement. In 1982 the seven trade unions registered in Kiribati merged to form the Kiribati Trade Union Congress (KTUC). It has approximately 2,500 members, most of them drawn from the public service. The KTUC is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Kiribati does not belong to the International Labor Organization (ILO).

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is a guaranteed right. Negotiations are generally nonconfrontational, in keeping with Kiribati tradition. There have been no reports of antiunion discrimination. Mechanisms exist, however, for resolving any complaints of antiunion discrimination. Kiribati has no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor in Kiribati.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Kiribati law prohibits the employment of children under age 14. Children age 15 are prohibited from industrial employment and employment aboard ships. Children are rarely employed outside the traditional economy.

KIRIBATI

Although legislation authorizing the Government to set minimum wages exists, it has not yet been implemented. The Government has under consideration an ILO-funded study on procedures for establishing minimum wages. Employment laws also provide basic health and safety standards for the workplace.

Employers must, for example, provide an adequate supply of clean water for their workers and must ensure the existence of sanitary toilet facilities. Employers are liable for the expenses of workers injured on the job. The Government's ability to enforce employment laws is constrained by a lack of qualified enforcement personnel, a lack it is attempting to remedy by improvements in training of the relevant personnel. Women may not work at night except under specified circumstances (generally in service jobs such as hotel clerks). Women are provided up to 12 weeks of maternity leave and are entitled to not less than 25 percent of their regular salaries during such leave. Nursing women are allowed one-half hour twice a day during working hours to nurse a child.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA*

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), formed in 1948 during the Soviet administration of the northern half of the Korean peninsula, is a Communist dictatorship under the rule of the Korean Workers' Party (KWP). The party exercises absolute power on behalf of its leader, General Secretary Kim Il Sung, who is also President of the DPRK. Kim Il Sung, who has been in power for 41 years, has groomed his son, Kim Jong Il, as his successor. The younger Kim ranks second in the party and, like his father, is accorded deity-like status.

The North Korean regime subjects its people to rigid controls. For each person the regime establishes security ratings which determine access to employment, schools, medical facilities, and stores as well as admission to the KWP. Individual rights are subordinated to the rights of the State and the party.

In the DPRK's centralized economy, the State directs all significant economic activity. The type of economic reforms taking place in some other Communist states is absent. The people have a Spartan standard of living. Despite modest real growth in its gross national product, North Korea remains a less-developed country with serious distribution bottlenecks, nonproductive allocation of resources, and a worsening foreign debt.

In 1989 North Korea continued to deny its citizens the most fundamental human rights. The Government did open its first two Christian churches and allowed more foreign visitors. All religious organizations are controlled by the party, however, and only trusted cadres are allowed foreign contacts.

The Government imprisons persons who fail to conform to the dictates of the State and often exiles them along with their families to remote villages. The regime permits no independent press or associations, and little outside information reaches the general public except that which the Government approves and disseminates. There is no evidence that the Government has abandoned its intermittent use of state-sponsored terrorism.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

According to several defectors who are believed to be reliable, the regime has summarily executed some political prisoners and assassinated political opponents of Kim Il Sung and Kim Jong Il. For over 20 years North Korea has

*The United States does not have diplomatic relations with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. North Korea forbids representatives of governments that do have relations with it, as well as journalists and other invited visitors, the freedom of movement that would enable them to assess human rights conditions there. Most of this report, therefore, is based on information obtained over a period of time extending from well before 1989. While limited in scope and detail, the information is indicative of the human rights situation in North Korea today.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

intermittently directed terrorist attacks against South Korea, including the bombing of Korean Air Flight 858 off the coast of Burma in November 1987, which killed all 115 people on board, and the September 1983 bombing in Rangoon, Burma, which took the lives of 17 high-ranking South Korean officials.

b. Disappearance

There is no information available on disappearance within North Korea. There are several reports that over the past 10 years the DPRK has kidnaped South Koreans, Japanese, and other foreign citizens outside of its borders. According to a 1988 report by Asia Watch and the Minnesota Lawyers International Human Rights Committee (MLIHRC), these kidnappings were apparently carried out to enhance Pyongyang's technical and espionage capabilities and to provide "defectors" to testify to the advances of DPRK society.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

As noted in the Asia Watch/MLIHRC report, "all available evidence indicates that, at least through the early 1980's, North Korean prisoners were routinely tortured or ill-treated during interrogation and at times during later imprisonment." The report noted that many prisoners have died from torture, disease, starvation, or exposure. Little recent documentation is available. However, Korean film producer Shin Sang-Ok and his actress wife, Choi Un-Wui (hereinafter referred to as the Shins), who claimed to have been kidnaped by North Korean operatives overseas and who escaped from North Korea officials in Vienna in 1986, attested to hearing repeated stories of beatings during incarceration. Shin personally experienced many other forms of cruel and inhuman treatment, which he claimed sometimes amounted to torture. This treatment involved denial of sleep, starvation rations, and solitary confinement, as well as being required to sit motionless for long periods of time.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Little information is available on specific criminal justice procedures and practices in North Korea. North Korea has refused to permit outside observation of its legal system and practices.

North Korean law provides that prisoners may be held for interrogation for a period not to exceed 2 months. This period may be extended indefinitely, however, if the Interrogation Department obtains the approval of the Chief Prosecutor. There are reports of persons being detained for 12 months without trial or charge. Shin noted that it is very difficult for family members or other concerned persons to obtain information regarding charges being leveled against an accused person or even where an accused person is being detained. Habeas corpus or its equivalent does not exist in law or in practice.

North Korean defectors to South Korea in 1989 estimated that the regime holds at least 105,000 political prisoners and their family members in "concentration camps," where they are prohibited from marrying and required to grow their own food. Based on defector testimony and other sources, the Republic of Korea estimates North Korea detains about 150,000 political detainees and family members in maximum security camps in remote, isolated areas. North Korean officials deny the existence of such gulags or prisons but admit the existence of "education centers" for people who "commit crimes by mistake." The Asia Watch/MLIHRC report lists 12 such prison camps believed to exist in the DPRK. The camps include four thought to have been added in 1982 to accommodate between 6,000 and 15,000 new prisoners resulting from a campaign by Kim Jong Il to purge his critics and rivals. The report states that most maximum security prisoners allegedly have been confined without trial or formal charges. Visitors and any form of communication with detainees, although once allowed, are said to be prohibited.

In 1989 North Korea continued illegally to imprison two Japanese seamen, Isamu Beniko and Yoshio Kuriura. The DPRK detained them in October 1983 in retaliation for the defection of a DPRK army sergeant who stowed away on their ship, the Fujisan Maru, and sought refuge in Japan. North Korea announced that the 2 seamen were tried in December 1987 and sentenced to 15 years' "reformation through labor" for espionage and "abduction" of a North Korean citizen. North Korea said it would release the two seamen only if Japan "delivers" the defector, who was granted permanent resident status in 1987. North Korea has refused to allow family visits to the two seamen.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution states that courts are independent and that judicial proceedings are to be carried out in strict accordance with the law, which contains elaborate procedural guarantees. According to the Asia Watch/MLIHRC report, these safeguards are not followed in practice, and it appears the party exercises pervasive control over the criminal justice system. Article 138 of the Constitution states that "cases are heard in public, and the accused is guaranteed the right to defense; hearings may be closed to the public as stipulated by law." There are numerous reports, however, of the Public Security Ministry dispensing with trials in political cases and instead referring cases to the Ministry of State Security for imposition of punishment.

When trials are held, lawyers are apparently assigned by the Government. According to the Asia Watch/MLIHRC report, defense lawyers are not considered representatives of the accused, but rather independent parties who are "expected to help the court by persuading the accused to confess his guilt." The report adds, "The counsel must...only present facts to mitigate punishment."

The Shins noted a distinction between political and common criminals, asserting that the State affords trials only to the latter. North Korea equates "political criminals" with those who criticize the regime. Numerous other reports suggest that political offenses include such forms of lese majesty as sitting on newspapers bearing Kim Il Sung's picture.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The regime subjects the people to a pervasive program of indoctrination designed to shape and control individual consciousness. Preschool children are drilled in homage to

Kim Il Sung and his family while school age children are subjected daily to a half day of indoctrination. Youths and adults are required to participate in daily ideological training conducted during school or at places of employment. Government-organized neighborhood units also provide indoctrination for persons who neither work nor go to school. The daily indoctrination requires rote recitation of Party maxims and policies and strives for ideological purity. Multiple North Korean security organizations enforce these controls.

The Government prevents Japanese wives of Koreans repatriated from Japan since 1959 from visiting Japan. Because their letters are subject to strict censorship, many have lost contact with their families.

Although the Constitution states that "citizens are guaranteed the inviolability of person and residence and the privacy of correspondence," the practice is otherwise. The Government has developed a pervasive system of informers throughout the society and, according to the Shins and several defectors, electronic surveillance of residences is also pervasive. In school, the authorities encourage children to discuss what their parents have said at home. The Government conducts monthly "sanitation" inspections to check on household activities. Each house is required to display portraits of Kim Il Sung and Kim Jong Il. The Asia Watch/MLIHRC report concluded that "because of the surveillance and the attendant risk of consequences, fear appears to govern all social relationships."

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution states that "citizens have the freedoms of speech, the press, assembly, association, and demonstration," the regime permits such activities only in support of government objectives. Other articles of the Constitution that require citizens to follow the "Socialist norms of life" and to obey a "collective spirit" take precedence over individual political or civil liberties. Amnesty International's 1988 Report stated that the Government strictly curtails the rights of freedom of expression and association guaranteed under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which North Korea acceded in 1981. According to these sources, persons criticizing the President or his policies were liable to punishment by imprisonment or "corrective labor." A defector interviewed by Asia Watch/MLIHRC in 1986 reported that a scientist, whose home was bugged through his radio set, was arrested and executed for statements made at home critical of Kim Il Sung.

Foreign media are excluded, domestic media censorship is enforced, and no deviation from the official government line is tolerated. The regime prohibits listening to foreign media broadcasts except by high government officials, and violators reportedly are subject to severe punishment. Most urban households have radio and some have television, but reception is limited to domestic programming. The Government controls artistic and academic works, and visitors report that the primary function of plays, movies, operas, and books is to contribute to the cult of personality surrounding "the great leader," Kim Il Sung, and "the beloved leader," Kim Jong Il.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

No public meetings can be held without government authorization. There appear to be no organizations other than those created by the Government. The State even prohibits apolitical groups such as neighborhood or alumni organizations. Professional associations exist solely as another means of government control over the members of these organizations.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

Although the Constitution provides that "citizens have religious liberty and the freedom of antireligious propaganda," the regime, in fact, has severely persecuted Christians and Buddhists since the late 1940's and discriminates against persons whose family or relatives once had a strong religious involvement.

Despite these purges, the regime today uses government-sponsored religious organizations to proclaim the practice of religious freedom. The DPRK claims to have 10,000 Christians who worship in 500 home churches. A few Buddhist temples are in operation, and the country's first two Christian churches were built in late 1988. The churches are included in the fixed itinerary for many foreign visitors to Pyongyang. Some visitors attest to the authenticity of the church services and to the faith of the several dozen worshipers observed. Other visitors say the church activity appears staged. No North Korean religious official is ever known to have preached that there is any moral authority higher than that of Kim Il Sung. Worship of Kim, his family, and his juche (self-reliance) ideology is the only completely functioning religion in North Korea.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The DPRK regime strictly controls internal travel, requiring a travel pass for any movement outside one's home village; these passes are granted only for required official or certain personal travel. Personal travel is usually limited to attending the wedding or funeral of a close relative. Long delays in obtaining the necessary permit often result in denial of the right to travel even for these limited purposes. State control of internal travel is also ensured by a ration system that distributes coupons valid only in the region issued.

Reports, primarily from defectors, indicate that forced resettlement, particularly for those deemed politically unreliable, is common. Permission to reside in, or even enter Pyongyang, the capital, is strictly controlled.

Foreign travel is limited to officials and trusted artists, athletes, and academics. The regime does not allow emigration, and only 1,000 or so defectors have succeeded in fleeing the country. The regime retaliates against the relatives of those few persons who manage to escape.

In 1989, in a rare departure from isolationist controls, the DPRK sent students to a short seminar in Japan. Aside from this, the regime does not allow students to study outside of

Communist countries for any period. It tightened controls over DPRK students studying abroad when six defected from Eastern Europe in 1989.

From 1959 to 1982, 93,000 Korean residents of Japan, including 6,637 Japanese wives, voluntarily repatriated to North Korea in response to nationalistic appeals. Despite DPRK assurances that the wives, 1,828 of whom still had Japanese citizenship, would be allowed to go home to Japan every 2 or 3 years, none is known to have returned to Japan and most have never been heard of again. The Asia Watch/MLIHC report and other sources say most of the returnees and their families are categorized in the "wavering class," given poor food, clothing, and housing, subjected to hard labor, and treated with contempt. When reports of their harsh treatment became known overseas, voluntary repatriation dried up.

North Korea has permitted entry to several thousand overseas Korean residents in Japan, China, North America, and elsewhere to visit their relatives. Recently the regime has granted entry to greater numbers of other visitors, including journalists, tourists, and 15,000 foreign participants in the 13th World Festival of Youth and Students held in Pyongyang in July 1989. Visitors are closely monitored and itineraries are usually fixed, although some visitors reported they were allowed to walk freely around the vicinity of their hotels.

There is no mechanism by which the citizenry can effect transitions in leadership or changes in government. The political system is completely dominated by Kim Il Sung and heir-designate Kim Jong Il. The legislature, the Supreme People's Assembly, which meets only a few days a year, has never taken any action other than unanimous passage of resolutions presented to it by the leadership. In an effort to create an appearance of democracy, the DPRK has created several "minority parties." They exist only as rosters of officials who have token representation in the People's Assembly and completely support the government line.

Free elections do not exist in North Korea. Although elections to the Supreme People's Assembly were held in November 1986, and to provincial, city, and county assemblies in November 1989, in all cases the Government approved only one candidate in each electoral district. According to the government-controlled media, over 99 percent of the voters turned out to elect 100 percent of the approved candidates. Such "elections" are an exercise in which people are forced to participate and to approve the party's candidates. Despite the long and rigorous selection process for membership in the KWP, most party members have no voice in decisionmaking, serving only to carry out the decrees promulgated by party leader Kim Il Sung and his top subordinates.

No organizations exist within North Korea to report on or observe human rights violations. North Korea does not participate in any international or regional human rights organizations.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

The Government has not allowed Amnesty International (AI), Asia Watch, the MLIHRC, or any other international organization to visit North Korea to monitor human rights practices. A DPRK representative called a preliminary version of the Asia Watch/MLIHRC report "full of lies and fabrications," and warned that if it were published, the human rights organizations would "be held fully responsible for all the consequences arising therefrom."

When Scandinavian delegates to the World Festival of Youth and Students attempted to unfurl banners reading "Where is Amnesty?", they were attacked and temporarily detained by the police. DPRK officials later gave assurances that two AI representatives would be permitted to enter, but DPRK delays in processing the visa applications prevented the trip.

The Constitution states that "women hold equal social status and rights with men." However, few women have reached high levels of the party or the Government. Women are represented proportionally in the labor force, with the exception of small factories where the work force is predominantly female.

The regime discriminates against the physically handicapped. Handicapped persons, other than war veterans, are reportedly not allowed within the city limits of Pyongyang. According to the Asia Watch/MLIHRC report, authorities check for deformities in the capital city every 2 or 3 years and remove the disabled, some of the elderly, widows, and the sick to the countryside. The dwarf community has been banished to a remote mountain settlement.

Nothing is known about the extent to which violence against women is practiced or tolerated.

North Korea is a homogeneous country and is relatively devoid of minority groups.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Free labor unions do not exist in North Korea. Because the party by definition purports to represent the interests of labor, trade unions exist in form only. They do not have the right to strike.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers have no right to organize or to bargain collectively.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no prohibition on the use of forced or compulsory labor. The Government routinely uses military conscripts for forced labor. The Shins reported that conscripts are not told where they will serve or for how long. AI's 1987 Report cites reports that some "political prisoners" were allegedly sentenced to "corrective labor" which could be served at a person's normal workplace (working for some or no wages) or at farms or mines in areas where conditions are very harsh.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

No data are available on the minimum age for employment of children.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

No data are available on minimum wages or occupational safety and health. Wages are set by government ministries. The State assigns all jobs; ideological purity, rather than professional competence, is the primary standard used in deciding who receives a particular job. Laborers have no input into management decisions. Absence from work without a doctor's certificate results in a reduction in a worker's rations. The Constitution stipulates a workday limited to 8 hours, but several sources report that most laborers work 12 to 16 hours daily. The regime's propaganda euphemistically refers to these extra hours as "patriotic labor" done on a "voluntary" basis by the workers.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

The Republic of Korea (ROK) is moving away from its authoritarian past and has made great strides towards attaining full democracy. However, the process of consolidating democratic institutions and practices is still ongoing. In December 1987, Roh Tae Woo became Korea's first directly elected President since 1971, defeating three opposition candidates. In the April 1988 legislative elections, the three opposition parties together gained majority control of the National Assembly. Since that time, the power of the Presidency has been reduced and the role of the National Assembly greatly enhanced. The current National Assembly is more independent of the Executive than were previous assemblies.

Korea's powerful security services were noticeably less active during 1988 than they had been in the past. However, their activities increased again in 1989. From April through June, the Government temporarily grouped representatives of the security agencies into the Joint Security Investigations Headquarters (JSIH). During this period, several hundred people were arrested for alleged security law violations. The arrests continued after the JSIH was disbanded in June. While the police are relatively well trained and disciplined, there were credible reports of the use of excessive force in a number of instances.

After 3 years of unprecedented 12 percent annual GNP growth, Korea's export-driven economy slowed somewhat to a still healthy projected rate of 6 to 7 percent for 1989. Tensions in labor-management relations continued, while urban housing shortages, rural migration to the cities, and unbalanced regional development continued to pose problems. However, increasing domestic demand suggested continuing strong growth.

In 1988 President Roh released several hundred political prisoners and the overall human rights situation improved greatly. However, over the course of 1989, the National Security Law and the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations were used with increasing frequency against dissidents. Some prisoners held on security charges or for labor law violations were prevented from meeting with their lawyers. There were some credible allegations of torture. The National Assembly abolished the Social Safety Act but failed to amend the controversial National Security Law and the Law on the Agency for National Security Planning (NSP, formerly the KCIA). Nevertheless, on balance Korea remains a much more tolerant and open society than in the past. In particular, a boisterous free press that frequently criticizes the Government ensures that allegations of human rights violations are widely publicized.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no documented cases of political killings by the security forces in 1989. However, some dissident and student activists have raised questions about the suspicious deaths of two student leaders. In two cases, students were responsible for deaths in connection with their political activities. In May seven riot policemen were killed while trying to free colleagues being held hostage by students in Pusan. In October six student radicals beat to death a suspected student informer.

On the night of May 3, police in Kwangju stopped a taxi carrying wanted student activist Lee Chol Kyu. Lee allegedly escaped from the police in the area of a nearby reservoir. One week later his body was found floating in the reservoir. An autopsy resulted in a conclusion of death by accidental drowning. Some students and dissident activists claimed that Lee was actually tortured and murdered. However, they provided no persuasive evidence to back their claim. The activists' attempt to bring a U.S. specialist to do a second autopsy as requested by Lee's parents was initially approved by the Government. However, the Government later ordered the American doctor not to examine the body because to do so, the Government claimed, would have been a violation of the doctor's visa status.

In August the body of another student leader was found in the water off the southern coast. The government coroner ruled it the result of accidental drowning, but in October opposition members of the National Assembly raised questions about the circumstances of the death and demanded that the Government undertake a new investigation. By year's end, the Government had completed its new investigation, confirming the original conclusion of accidental death.

The seven policemen who were killed in Pusan in early May had been storming a university building in which student dissidents held five policemen hostage in a bid to have fellow students released from jail. When the police stormed the building, one student ignited a fire that resulted in the deaths of the seven policemen. Seventy-one students were tried; 35 received suspended sentences while the others received sentences up to life imprisonment. Students and supporters, angered by the sentences, stormed and occupied the university president's office for 3 days before retreating.

In mid-October, six students at Yonsei University abducted a student they accused of being an informer and beat him to death. The six eventually turned themselves in to the police and have been charged with murder. A trial was pending at year's end.

In separate incidents in June, two criminal suspects died shortly after being taken into police custody. Witnesses said that both men died after being beaten by the police. Nine people, including seven policemen, were arrested and charged in connection with these two deaths. The seven policemen and one civilian security guard were convicted. One policeman was sentenced to 5 years in prison; the other defendants were given 3-year sentences.

There were no documented cases of permanent disappearances during 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Some credible allegations of torture were made during the last half of 1989 by persons arrested under the National Security Law. They claimed that they were tortured while being interrogated by the NSP or the prosecutors. The alleged mistreatment reportedly included acute sleep deprivation, being forced to stand during long periods of questioning, verbal abuse, beatings, and the forced administration of drugs.

In convicting former National Assemblyman Suh Kyong Won of espionage in December, the court rejected Suh's claim that he was tortured into making a confession (Section 1.e). Suh's aide was also convicted of espionage. In the aide's case, the judges did not rule out the possibility that he was mistreated while in custody.

In late October, an official of the Ministry of Finance was acquitted on charges of taking a bribe when the judge determined that the official had been tortured into making false statements. The official had testified that prosecution investigators had repeatedly beat him in the face and head in order to make him confess.

Regarding a January 1987 police torture case, the Seoul District Civil Court in November ordered the Government and a number of police officials to pay about $194,000 in compensation to the father of student activist Park Chong Chol, who died during police interrogation.

The police apparently employed excessive force on some occasions throughout 1989. In August a group of teachers collecting signatures supporting their effort to form a union were reportedly dragged into a police bus and beaten with iron rods wrapped in newspaper. On August 20, several demonstrators were beaten, and four of them injured by police on the grounds of Chonju's Catholic Cathedral. The police asserted that they went onto the cathedral grounds because the demonstrators were throwing rocks at them. Throughout most of the year, student protesters threw rocks and firebombs at police in demonstrations, except for a 4-week period in May following the deaths of the seven Pusan policemen.

Conditions in Korean prisons have reportedly improved somewhat. However, a report of the Government's Board of Audit and Inspection revealed a serious shortage of medical personnel in the prison system. Moreover, human rights activists still claimed that political prisoners were sometimes subjected to sleep deprivation and psychological pressure.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Roh administration, Koreans are freer to criticize the Government than in the past. Nonetheless, over the course of 1989, the National Security Law was used with increasing frequency against people who expressed views the Government considered dangerous. From April through June, the JSIH investigated alleged security cases and arrested several hundred persons.

The Government acknowledges that 2,094 people were arrested on "security-related charges" from the beginning of President Roh's administration in February 1988 until the end of August 1989. More than half (1,315) were arrested since the beginning of 1989, including 284 for violating the National Security Law. This represents a substantial increase over the 779 similar arrests recorded in the 10 months of Roh's administration in 1988, none of which were for violations of the National Security Law.

According to the National Police, during the first 18 months of the Roh Government, 190 people were arrested for publishing or possessing books or articles originating in or praising Communist North Korea, 15 for seeking contact with North Koreans, and 37 for association with "antistate organizations." In addition, approximately 35 teachers were arrested in connection with attempts to form a teachers' union. Union organizers were arrested for trying to exercise the right of assembly. Allegedly, 150 to 200 trade unionists were arrested on various charges in 1989.

A major step forward in the human rights area in 1989 was the National Assembly's decision in May to abolish the Social Safety Act (also referred to as the Public Security Law), long opposed because of its broad authority to keep under surveillance or in custody persons who had completed their sentences for sedition, espionage, or other security violations. Disposition of cases under the Social Safety Act were administrative in nature, and the normal rules of criminal procedure did not apply; there were limited appeal rights. The 35 people held under the Act in the Chonju Preventive Detention Center were all released by the end of the year.

The Assembly also revised the Act for the Protection of Society, which allows for preventive detention of habitual criminals. The revised law more clearly defines those who may be kept in protective custody, leaves the decision on whether to impose a custody order in the hands of judges and not administrative authorities, and requires yearly review of each detention order. The Government announced that 1,200 of the 4,407 people held under this Act would be released by the end of 1989. (In fact, 225 people were released.)

Warrants are required by law in cases of arrest, detention, seizure, or search, unless a criminal is apprehended while in the act of committing a crime. However, lawyers state that warrants were not presented at the time of detention in many cases throughout 1989. In some political cases, suspects were detained for more than the legal limit of 48 hours without being formally arrested. (Student activist Im Su Kyong, who visited North Korea without government permission, was detained on August 15 and not charged until August 20.) In criminal cases indictments must be handed down within 30 days of arrest or 50 days in National Security Law cases. However, these requirements were not always observed.

The Constitution specifically provides the right to representation by an attorney, but attorneys are not allowed to be present during interrogation. Lawyers say that in National Security Law cases they are very rarely allowed to see their clients at all during the investigation phase, which can last up to 50 days. In 1989 lawyers for the first time sought court orders allowing them to see their clients. However, on at least three occasions in July and August, either the National Security Planning Agency or the prosecutor refused to respect court orders calling on them to allow prisoners arrested under the National Security Law to meet with their attorneys. On September 1, the Government proposed to the National Assembly an amendment to the National Security Law which would legalize the prosecutor's current de facto control over when, where, and for how long lawyers are allowed to see clients being investigated for security law violations. The National Assembly has not yet acted on this proposal.

There is a functioning system of bail in Korea. Late in the year bail was even granted in some National Security Law cases. In early November, a Seoul judge granted bail to a student activist who had been arrested for distributing "materials benefiting North Korea," without having received a bail request from the defendant. Later in the month three minor figures in the Suh Kyung Won case were also released on bail. The right to a judicial determination of the legality of a person's detention was deleted from the Code of Criminal Conduct in 1973, partially restored in 1980, and then fully restored in late 1987.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of a Fair Public Trial

The Constitution gives defendants a number of rights in criminal trials, including a presumption of innocence, protection against self-incrimination, freedom from ex-post facto laws and double jeopardy, and the right to a speedy trial. When a person is physically detained, his initial trial must be completed within 6 months of arrest. These rights are generally observed.

The Chief Justice and the other Justices of the Supreme Court are appointed by the President with the consent of the National Assembly. Lower court justices are appointed by the Chief Justice with the consent of the other Justices.

Trials are open to the public, but attendance is sometimes restricted. A large number of police are present at some trials; courtroom audiences sometimes create disturbances and disrupt the proceedings. Judges generally allow considerable scope for examination of witnesses by both the prosecution and defense counsel. The right to an attorney is respected in political cases once the initial investigation is completed. Political and criminal cases are tried by the same courts; military courts do not try civilians. Defendants have the right of appeal, and appeals can result in reduced sentences. Death sentences are automatically appealed.

Historically the executive branch exercised great influence on judicial decisions. However, there were some indications of increased judicial independence in 1989. In a number of cases the Constitutional Court, which began operations in September 1988, found that the Government had violated the constitutional rights of individuals. The Supreme Court invalidated the results of elections for two National Assembly seats due to election law violations by the victorious ruling party candidates. Meanwhile, lower courts convicted two brothers of former President Chun Doo Hwan and one of Chun's closest aides on corruption charges and sentenced them to prison. A Seoul court also acquitted a government official of bribery charges when the judge determined that prosecution investigators had beaten him in order to extract a confession. However, criticism that the judiciary is still subject to political influence in politically sensitive cases remains.

Human rights sources put the number of "political" prisoners at around 800 at the end of 1989. This figure includes persons who committed acts of violence such as firebomb attacks on government facilities. In some cases, it appears that the National Security Law was used to restrict the exercise of the basic rights of free speech and assembly. According to the Justice Ministry, 695 people were actually imprisoned for "security-related offenses" during the first 8 months of 1989. As of mid-September, 219 were already tried and convicted while the rest still awaited trial.

It is difficult to estimate accurately the number of political prisoners since many people are detained and then released without charges or charged and then released without being tried. It is particularly difficult to determine if someone is a political prisoner in cases involving the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations and the Labor Laws. In November the Government announced that 646 people were in custody for "National Security" reasons, including 342 charged under the National Security Law, 226 charged under the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations, and 91 charged under various laws for their participation in labor disputes. Without specific information on each case, it is impossible to tell if someone was arrested for exercising the right of free association or for violent acts during demonstrations. However, it is estimated that as of August 1989, the number of political prisoners by international human rights standards is in the low hundreds. This figure was not substantially changed by a Christmas amnesty under which 27 people whom the Government described as "radical leftists" were released from prison. The Government asserts there are no political prisoners.

The most highly publicized National Security Law cases of 1989 involved unauthorized travel to North Korea. The Government maintains that it must control all contact with North Korea, which it defines in the National Security Law as an "antistate organization." The Government approved the February visit to North Korea of the honorary chairman of Hyundai, a large industrial organization. However, subsequent visits by dissident pastor Moon Ik Hwan, student activist Im Su Kyong, and Catholic priest Mun Kyu Hyun were not authorized and the three were arrested under the National Security Law upon their return. The three were charged with visiting the North without authorization, making statements praising North Korea, and "supporting the northern line." In early October, Rev. Moon Ik Hwan was convicted and sentenced to 10 years imprisonment. Both the prosecution and the defense are appealing this decision.

The Government also charged former opposition National Assemblyman Suh Kyung Won with espionage after it was learned in June that he had visited North Korea without government permission. Suh admitted going to North Korea, but denied that he had spied for the North. In December a Seoul court rejected Suh's contention that he was forced to sign a false confession and convicted him of espionage. Suh was sentenced to 15 years in jail.

In addition, a number of people--including Kim Dae Jung, the leader of Korea's largest opposition party--were charged under the National Security Law for knowing about these unauthorized trips and failing to inform the authorities. No further legal action was taken against Kim Dae Jung. However, nine people tried on this charge in connection with the Suh case were convicted and given suspended sentences.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In general, the Government honors the right of personal privacy and the integrity of the home and family. However, many political and religious figures are still subjected to varying degrees of government surveillance. Opposition assemblymen have charged in the National Assembly that telephone tapping and the opening or interception of correspondence are prevalent. In August the chief of the Korean National Police (KNP) told the National Assembly that of some 53,116 people convicted of violating the National Security Law, some 10,000 are still under surveillance. In late July, police and agents of the NSP broke into the campaign headquarters of a dissident candidate running in a National Assembly by-election. The agents reportedly stole a document on campaign strategy.

Listening to North Korean radio is illegal if the authorities judge it is for the purpose of "benefiting the antistate organization" (i.e., North Korea). Reading or purveying books or other literature considered to be subversive, pro-Communist or pro-North Korean is also illegal. Beginning with Moon Ik Hwan's visit to North Korea in early 1989, an increasing number of people were arrested for these kinds of offenses.

The security presence in city centers, near university campuses, government buildings, ruling party offices, and media outlets is heavy. Citizens, particularly students and young people, are sometimes stopped, questioned, and searched. Government informants are known to be posted on and around university campuses.

Parental rights to educate children are broad. Persons thought to have politically suspect backgrounds, however, are still denied some forms of employment and advancement, particularly in government, the broadcast media, and education. Many human rights activists say that big corporations still retain an informal system of blacklisting "undesirables."

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government continues to apply the National Security Law against publishers, printers, and distributors who produce or sell "subversive, ideological" literature. Restrictions on the expression of ideas which the Government considers Communist or pro-North Korean remain severe, despite provisions in the Constitution guaranteeing freedom of speech. The Seoul district court in late September ruled in a civil case that the Culture and Information Ministry's policy of banning "antistate" and "antisociety" books was illegal. However, this did not prevent the Government from publishing an updated list of banned books in late November.

Overall, the expression of opposition views is far less restricted than under previous administrations, and debate is allowed on previously taboo subjects, such as criticism of the President and his family. The Government has allowed an increase in media coverage of North Korea, within its guidelines, producing a reaction by rightwing factions which hope to counter such leftist journalism with new publications of their own. The Government has also allowed somewhat wider public access to selected North Korean publications. Many newspapers and magazines, mostly leftwing and sharply critical of the Government, appeared in Korea after the 1987 press law took effect.

Although direct government control over the print media has virtually disappeared, some institutions such as the Defense Security Command, the NSP, and other government organizations with responsibility for North Korean or Communist affairs remain basically inaccessible to journalists.

The Government arrested editorial writer Lee Young Hee of the newspaper Hankyoreh Shinmun for planning unauthorized coverage of North Korea. Some see Lee's arrest as an effort to still his editorial voice, though there has been no censorship of the paper's scathing criticism of the Government. Lee was convicted and given a suspended sentence. Also, a Hankyoreh Shinmun reporter was charged with failing to report to authorities an interview with Assemblyman Suh Kyung Won concerning Suh's unauthorized trip to North Korea.

The move to unionize newspapers throughout the country, begun in 1988, continued to be a major source of conflict in Korean newspaper and broadcasting organizations. All major newspapers and broadcasting corporations in Seoul now have labor unions.

Despite indirect government ownership of the two Korean television networks, the electronic media moved toward a relatively neutral political stance while still remaining less independent than the print media. Behind this trend, in part, lies the increasing importance of labor unions in the broadcasting industry.

The Government continues to limit academic freedom, both directly and indirectly. Professors and university administrators are expected to play an active role in preventing campus demonstrations, a task many find objectionable. There is rising sentiment for greater university autonomy. There is also a threat to academic freedom from radical leftist students who physically attack the person or property of professors whose lectures or writings contradict the students' ideology.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Most peaceful, nonpolitical assemblies take place entirely without official supervision or restriction. However, the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations prohibits assemblies considered likely to "undermine" public order, and requires that demonstrations of all types, including political rallies, be reported in advance to the police. Violation of the law carries a maximum sentence of 7 years' imprisonment or a fine.

The Government continues to block many gatherings organized by dissidents and particularly students, arguing that they might incite "social unrest" and are therefore illegal. Police usually try to prevent student demonstrations from moving off campuses, and confrontations frequently ensue. These clashes often involve violence on both sides.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Korea. Full freedom prevails for proselytizing, doctrinal teaching, and conversion. Korea both sends and receives missionaries of various faiths, and many religious groups in Korea maintain active links with members of similar faiths in other countries. The Government and the public do not discriminate against minority sects. Adherence to a particular faith confers neither advantages nor disadvantages in civil, military, or official life.

Churches and religious groups are subject to most of the restrictions on political activities that apply to other institutions. Many of the most vocal and well-organized critics of the Government are religious in nature; these include Catholic, Protestant, and Buddhist groups. Church buildings and grounds are sometimes used as a refuge by leftwing rioters during clashes with police. While the police generally respect the principle of sanctuary, they entered the grounds of the Catholic cathedrals in Seoul and Chonju in 1989. Occasionally, police have entered church buildings in order to confront students, dissidents, or trade unionists.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is universal freedom of movement and freedom to change employment within the country. On January 1, the Government dropped all age limitations on foreign travel. Previously these restrictions had prevented most young and middle-aged people from going overseas. Travel to North Korea is allowed only with Government approval. Political opponents are sometimes banned from overseas travel even if they are not being sought by the authorities for the commission of a crime. For the first 8 months of 1989, the Government announced that 1,955 people were forbidden to go overseas. This figure includes those involved in criminal offenses, government and business figures under investigation in connection with Fifth Republic corruption, dissidents and student activists. Some students were barred from going abroad in late June to prevent their participation in Pyongyang's World Youth Festival. Other students were prohibited from foreign travel because they were suspected of organizing antigovernment demonstrations, trying to contact North Koreans, or attempting travel to North Korea.

A small number of Indochinese refugees sought first asylum in Korea in 1989. In midyear the Korean Government adopted a policy of refusing landing to boats of Indochinese asylum seekers. A group of 78 Vietnamese boat people set fire to their boat in June to avoid being driven back out to sea by the maritime police; they were eventually taken to the Korean resettlement camp in Pusan. In late August, a boat carrying about 150 Vietnamese boat people was not allowed to land. Korean authorities did not admit that they denied landing.

The Korean people have the right to freely and fairly choose their own government. In 1987 they chose their President in a free and fairly contested election. In 1988 legislative elections, they chose a majority of opposition party members to the National Assembly.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

The Constitution, as amended in 1987, provides for the direct election of the President and for a mixed system of direct and proportional election of legislators. The President serves a single 5-year term and cannot be reelected. The Assembly's term is 4 years. The new Constitution strips the President of his power to dissolve the Assembly. There is universal suffrage for all citizens age 20 or above, and elections are held by secret ballot.

Political power has traditionally been centered in the person of the president, strongly supported by the military and security agencies. The situation began to change, however, when the three opposition parties won a majority in the National Assembly in the April 1988 general election.

There is as yet no local autonomy in Korea, although the Assembly passed a law in December calling for local council elections in 1990 and local chief executive elections in 1991. The President and the members of the Assembly are the only elected officials in the country.

The National Assembly in 1989 continued its more independent role. In addition to abolishing the Social Safety Act and amending the Act for the Protection of Society, the Assembly also amended the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations. Because of the Assembly's more independent role, the President used his veto power on a number of occasions during the year. Nonetheless, the Assembly has been marked by differences of opinion, not only between the ruling and opposition camps, but also among the opposition parties themselves. These differences have prevented the Assembly from amending other laws remaining from former President Chun Doo Hwan's Fifth Republic which many Koreans consider to be undemocratic.

While the Republic of Korea does not welcome outside involvement with respect to human rights, government and ruling party officials have generally been willing to meet with international human rights groups, including a group from the Robert F. Kennedy Foundation that visited Korea in November. That group was confronted with protesters during its stay in Seoul, but the Government denied any involvement. In addition, foreign human rights groups have been allowed to observe elections, and the Government has regularly discussed human rights with foreign diplomats. In the case of student activist Lee Chol Kyu's death, the Government refused to allow an American doctor to perform a second autopsy as requested by the student's parents.

According to the Government, public prosecutors and the human rights division of the Ministry of Justice are responsible for protecting human rights and investigating violations. The Government points to President Roh's June 29, 1987 pledge of democratization and the developments that followed as proof of the current Government's full commitment to democratization and the safeguarding of basic human rights.

The Government justifies its broad security laws and the resulting restrictions by arguing that Korea is in a special situation. The Korean war ended with the signing of an armistice, not a peace treaty, and North Korea remains a formidable threat. The Government asserts that unauthorized attempts to contact North Korea threaten the Government's efforts to ensure peaceful reunification on the basis of democracy and respect for human rights.

The National Assembly and the major political parties all have committees concerned with various aspects of human rights. In addition, several nonaffiliated private organizations are active in promoting human rights. Chief among these groups are the Lawyers Group for a Democratic Society, the Human Rights Committee of the Korean National Council of Churches, the Catholic Priests' Committee for Justice and Peace, the Korean Bar Association, and the Korean Legal Aid Center for Family Relations. These groups publish reports on the human rights situation in Korea and make their views known both inside and outside the country.

The Republic of Korea is a densely populated and racially homogeneous country. There are no ethnic minorities of significant size. Nonetheless, regional rivalries exist in Korea. Many Koreans believe that persons from the southwestern region (North and South Cholla provinces) have traditionally faced discrimination and that successive governments led predominantly by figures from the southeastern region (North and South Kyongsang provinces) have neglected the economic development of the Cholla provinces.

Korea's conservative Confucian tradition has left women subordinate to men socially, economically, and legally. Some progress has been made since the founding of the Republic: women can vote, become government officials, and hold elected office. Women enjoy full access to educational opportunities.

The National Assembly enacted an Equal Employment Opportunity Law in 1988, which condemns sexual discrimination in hiring and wages and calls for improved work conditions for women (for example, no night work and limits on overtime). However, it contains no enforcement provisions and has had only limited practical effect so far.

Despite a constitutional guarantee of equal rights for men and women, traditional social customs are still reflected in the law, particularly in family law. Some forms of discrimination still remain in family, law and women's rights groups actively campaign for changes. For example, the father has final parental rights over the children in divorce cases. In December the National Assembly passed a revised family law which for the first time makes it possible for a woman to head a household and to inherit property upon the death of her husband. (Women can hold property in their own names.) The new law increases the wife's share of the estate to 50 percent upon her husband's death and divides the remainder equally among male and female children. The revised law also abolishes the household head's right to designate where the members will live, abolishes the requirement that a married couple move to the husband's place of residence, and expands the legally recognized family relationship to include the wife's relatives.

Korea experienced a jump in traditionally low rates of violent crime in 1989. Although violent crimes are directed against women, reliable data on their prevalence are not available. A number of cases have surfaced involving women being kidnapped and sold into prostitution. Wife beatings and other abuses of women are known to be a problem, but no reliable data on their extent are available. The Government has made crimes against women one of its top priorities in its law and order campaign and arrested and prosecuted suspects in several cases. However, a number of female kidnap victims have complained that the police were unhelpful or unsympathetic to their attempts to escape from their abductors.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution gives workers the right to free association. When a new union is formed, it must notify the Government. New unions continued to register in large numbers during 1989. As of February 1989, some 1.7 million workers, or 22 percent of the civilian work force, was unionized. Only one union is permitted at each place of work, and there is no minimum number of members required to form a union. Companies have taken advantage of this provision of the law to form small, company-controlled unions, which labor organizers have often found difficult to replace with more representative unions.

The majority of Korean trade unions are affiliated with the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU). The FKTU is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Most of its constituent unions maintain affiliations with international trade secretariats. Some 15 percent of unionized labor belongs to so-called "democratic unions," which are not affiliated with the FKTU. These unions are grouped into regional councils, but have no national organization. However, plans are underway for a new national organization called the National Council of Labor Unions. (In fact, the law prohibits the formation of a second national union structure.) The non-FKTU unions are not affiliated with international labor groups.

In the spring of 1989, the National Assembly passed several amendments to the Trade Union Law, which would have lifted the ban on union involvement in electoral politics and legalized some public sector unions. However, President Roh vetoed the bill. The President also vetoed amendments to the Labor Dispute Adjustment Act which would have modified the prohibition against third-parties--except for the Government and the FKTU--intervening in labor disputes. So far the Government and National Assembly have had little success agreeing on reforms that would improve the legal framework for labor-management relations, which basically remains unchanged from the Fifth Republic.

Korea is not a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO), but has sent observer delegations to the ILO annual conferences since 1982. Korea is interested in joining the ILO. In preparation for eventual membership, the Ministry of Labor has prepared an analysis of how well Korea's labor laws comply with ILO standards as well as proposals for closing most of the remaining gaps.

Strikes are prohibited in government agencies, state-run enterprises, and defense industries. Laws requiring that enterprises in public interest sectors such as public transportation, utilities, public health, banking, broadcasting, and communications submit to government-ordered arbitration restrict the ability of workers in these industries to strike. The Labor Dispute Adjustment Law requires that unions notify the Ministry of Labor of an intention to strike and mandates a 10-day "cooling-off period" before a strike can actually begin. (The cooling-off period is 15 days in public interest sectors.)

The Government began to take a more active role in labor-management disputes in 1989. Riot police broke up a number of illegal strikes, including those by Seoul subway workers, workers at Poongsan Metal (a major ammunition manufacturer), and a protracted strike at the Hyundai shipyards. The Government has also taken a hard line against attempts to form a teachers' union. Such a union is illegal under current law. As of early September, over 1,300 unionized teachers had been fired and more than 40 arrested.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Constitution and the Trade Union Law guarantees the autonomous right of workers to enjoy freedom of association, collective bargaining, and collective action. Extensive collective bargaining is practiced. Korea's labor laws do not extend the right to bargain collectively to government employees, including employees of state or public-run enterprises and defense industries. A 1985 law provides that workers in Export Processing Zones (EPZ's) are to receive the same right to bargain collectively as other workers. In practice, equal treatment in the two existing EPZ's began only in the summer of 1987. But in response to a law suit filed by a Japanese company operating in the Masan EPZ, the Ministry of Labor concluded in August that a 1970 law required the Government to treat companies operating in the EPZ's as public-interest enterprises. This designation will make it difficult for unions at EPZ companies to strike legally, because in cases of labor-management disputes in public sector enterprises, the parties can be required by the Government to accept mandatory arbitration. While arbitration decisions can be appealed in the courts, such disputes tend to be prolonged.

As part of its more active labor policy, the Government has also begun an extensive public relations campaign to convince workers that wage increases must be matched by similar increases in productivity. The effort is intended to hold wage increases in 1990 to under 10 percent.

There is no independent system of labor courts. The central and local labor committees form a semiautonomous agency of the Ministry of Labor that adjudicates disputes in accordance with the Labor Dispute Adjustment Law. Each labor committee is composed of equal representation from labor, management, and "the public interest." The local labor committees are empowered to decide on remedial measures in cases involving unfair labor practices and to mediate and arbitrate labor disputes.

Many major employers are strongly antiunion. In a number of cases, "save the company squads" have been hired to beat up union organizers and to intimidate workers. The authorities have not been effective in investigating such incidents. In one case, an employee of a striking Seoul taxi company was killed by fellow employees. The union claimed the assailants--who were arrested--were part of a "save the company squad." The authorities claimed otherwise, describing them as "anti-union workers." As in the past, there have been cases of violence against property by workers, often causing extensive damage. There have also been cases in which workers have held company executives against their will for brief periods of time.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution provides that no person shall be punished, placed under preventive restrictions, or subjected to involuntary labor except as provided by law and through lawful procedures (Art. 12, Sec. 1). Forced or compulsory labor is not condoned by the Government. The Government has investigated a number of incidents in which private persons sold women into prostitution and forced men to work involuntarily on fishing boats. The Government has also investigated a number of charges by workers that employers were demanding compulsory labor in the form of overtime work beyond the legal maximum.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Korean Labor Standards Law prohibits the employment of persons under the age of 13 without a special employment certificate from the Ministry of Labor. However, because there is compulsory education until the age of 13, few special employment certificates are issued for full-time employment. Some children are allowed to do part-time jobs such as selling newspapers. In order to gain employment, children under 18 must have written approval from their parents or guardian. Employers may require minors to work only a reduced number of overtime hours and are prohibited from employing them at night without special permission from the Ministry of Labor. Nevertheless, employers often treat employees under 18 as "regular" workers and do not accord them the legal protections to which they are entitled. A large proportion of production line workers in labor-intensive industries such as textiles, apparel, footwear and electronics are girls in their midteens. These girls often work in small, cramped, and sometimes dangerous workplaces.

Korea implemented a minimum wage law in 1988. The minimum wage level is reviewed annually and in 1989 was set at the equivalent of $215 per month. The law does not apply to all places of business. Small companies and companies in the service sector are exempt. Some exempted companies, particularly small ones, still pay below-minimum wages.

The FKTU continues to claim that the current minimum wage does not meet the minimum requirements of urban workers. According to government statistics, the money an average Korean blue-collar worker takes home in overtime and bonuses significantly raises the total compensation package. The National Bureau of Statistics announced that in the first quarter of 1989 the average monthly salary for an urban head of household was $891 (at won 671 per dollar), up 21.2 percent over the same period in 1988. According to the Bureau of Statistics, the average monthly income of an urban household was $1,110, up 21.5 percent (in won terms) from the first quarter 1988 figure. Pockets of urban poverty remain, but abject poverty has largely been eliminated. According to the Government's Economic Planning Board, 5.5 percent of the population lived below the poverty level in 1987.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

The Labor Standards and Industrial Safety and Health Law provide for a maximum 60-hour workweek. Amendments to the Labor Standards Law passed in March 1989 will bring the maximum regular workweek (excluding overtime) down from 48 hours to 46 and then to 44 hours over the next 2 years. According to the Government, the average Korean worker works 51.3 hours each week.

The Government sets health and safety standards, but the Ministry of Labor employs few inspectors, and the standards are not effectively enforced.

LAOS

The Lao People's Democratic Republic (LPDR) is a one-party, Communist state. The Lao People's Revolutionary Party (LPRP) is the source of all political authority in the country, and the party's leadership imposes broad and arbitrary controls on the population of approximately 3.9 million people.

The LPRP came to power in 1975 after a protracted civil war, during which it received strong support from North Vietnam. Vietnam continues to exert considerable influence over Laos, codified in the 25-year Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation signed in 1977. The number of Vietnamese troops and advisers in Laos, however, has been declining since late 1987. The total of 40,000 to 50,000 troops originally stationed in Laos under the terms of the treaty has been greatly reduced. There have been reports that all Vietnamese combat troops and most military advisers have been withdrawn. In the last 2 years the LPDR has been working to improve relations with the West and to attract more Western assistance. The U.S.S.R. is also very influential in Laos; it is the largest contributor of economic and military assistance. Laos has begun to accept Soviet concepts of perestroika (restructuring), although the LPDR is seeking its own Lao formulation appropriate to its highly underdeveloped conditions.

Established 14 years ago, the LPDR still has no constitution and no published code of law. However, elections were held in March for a national assembly to draft a constitution. All candidates in this election were approved by the LPRP, although a number of victorious candidates were not party members. A constitution is not expected before mid-1990 at the earliest.

Laos is one of the poorest countries in the world. The Government's harsh policies, particularly in its first 5 years, combined with difficult economic conditions in general, drove some 350,000 Lao into exile. Among those refugees were most of the educated elite. Laos accelerated its economic reform efforts in 1988 and 1989. These reforms are designed to stimulate domestic and foreign investment and to improve the efficiency of state-owned enterprises. Laos has also opened its economy to Thai and Western businessmen. Although the economy is improving as a result of these reforms and the ability of many citizens to participate in an emerging private or mixed state/private sector, the average standard of living remains extremely low.

Although difficult for outside observers to judge accurately, the human rights situation appeared to have improved in 1989. Freedom of movement within the country and travel abroad has increased, and the instruments of state control, principally the police and other elements of the Ministry of Interior, seemed to be less evident and perhaps less oppressive. Nevertheless, there continue to be severe limitations on freedom of speech and press and on freedom of assembly and association. Most reeducation camps have been closed and the bulk of the prisoners released. An unknown number of inmates, but at least 34, are entering their 14th year of incarceration, without benefit of judicial trial or legal review for release. Many former camp prisoners apparently have been able to obtain work; some of them now have responsible, professional positions both with the Government of Laos and with international organizations present in Vientiane. Some, however, appear to be blacklisted and able to find only menial positions. These persons seem to be able to obtain passports and visas as freely as any other Lao and have been able to travel overseas, despite the fact that some have not returned.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There are sporadic reports of shooting incidents involving organized groups leaving or entering Laos illegally. At least one group of Hmong tribesmen leaving Laos for Thailand was reported to have been pushed back and then suffered casualties from LPDR forces. In addition, in August the Government claimed to have intercepted and killed or captured in southern Laos over 60 armed Vietnamese hostile to the Hanoi Government who had intended to reenter Vietnam. There are occasional reports that government patrols have fatally shot persons leaving or entering Laos illegally. In those instances in which the Government confirms such incidents, it generally claims that the persons were smugglers or members of the resistance. An unknown but small number of people are killed annually in military operations against resistance forces. Many of the insurgents appear to be former Royal Lao Army troops and Hmong tribesmen. Both sides are reported to use brutal tactics, with antigovernment forces attempting assassination and ambush of government military and civilian personnel. There are also recurrent reports of attacks by bandit groups in isolated or interior areas on vehicles bearing government officials and on civilian buses. Official policy calls for the execution of resistance leaders, but no such executions were reported in 1989.

No disappearances were reported in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A relatively small number of "reeducation" prisoners continue to be held in harsh conditions but recent details are not available. The police do not appear to use torture or degrading or cruel treatment during arrest or detention, although prison conditions are stark.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government continues to maintain reeducation camps, or "seminar camps," in which persons who served the Royal Lao Government, or who have offended the current government, are imprisoned. Even rough estimates for the population of these camps are difficult to make, but range from a minimum of 34 political detainees left from the original population of Royal Lao Government officials to over 1,000. The higher number allegedly includes the original 34 plus many who were imprisoned during the late 1970's and the 1980's. Government officials continued to claim, as they had previously, that nearly all soldiers and officials sent to the camps in 1975-76 had been released and that very few remained. The accuracy of that statement cannot be verified. There were reports of releases of groups of up to 300 persons in 1988. There were reports of additional, substantial releases of camp prisoners in 1989, but firm numbers were not available. Since 1979 conditions in the remaining camps reportedly have improved, and the majority of the camps have been reported closed. The Government claims that all reeducation camps have been closed. However, this claim has not been verified.

Remaining detainees now live in a kind of internal exile in isolated provincial areas with severe restrictions on their freedom of movement. Many reportedly have been assigned to collective farms or construction units inside their former camps. Some are on probation or cannot obtain necessary travel documents. Others who have lost property and families are reported to have remained in areas near the camps to begin new lives.

Those accused of hostility to the regime or of what the Government calls "socially undesirable habits," such as prostitution, drug abuse, idleness, and "wrong thought," are sent to "rehabilitation" centers, usually without trial. Most of these persons have been allowed to return to their homes after periods ranging from a few months to several years of hard labor, political indoctrination, and admission of guilt.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A criminal code and laws establishing a judiciary were enacted in November 1989 by the Supreme People's Assembly, although they had not taken effect or been published by year's end. It is not known what changes these laws may make to Lao legal procedures. At present the courts are not independent and there is no guarantee of due process. Prior to the recently passed criminal code, the Government had promulgated interim rules and regulations for the arrest and trial of those accused of specific crimes, including armed resistance to the Government. Although the regulations allow an accused person to make a statement presenting his or her side of the case, they provide no real opportunity for the accused to defend himself and do not permit bail or use of a freely chosen attorney. Rather, the Government has issued instructions on how to investigate, prosecute, and punish wrongdoers. These instructions are applied capriciously and inconsistently. People can be arrested on unsupported accusations and without being informed of the charges or the accusers' identities. Investigations often take a long time unless family members and friends take a strong interest in the cases. Government officials and their families easily can influence judgments. There is some provision for appeal, although important political cases tried by "people's courts" are without an appeals process. Death sentences must be approved by the Council of Ministers. Regulations call for judgment to be given in public. This generally amounts to a public announcement of the sentence and not a true public trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There appears to have been some relaxation of state control by the police and security elements. Knowledgeable observers report seeing fewer obvious signs of monitoring and control of citizens. However, search and seizure continue to be authorized by the security bureaus themselves rather than by judicial authority, and government regulations, which are not always followed, provide little protection. International and domestic mail is selectively opened. Mail from China and non-Communist countries is particularly suspect. Telephone calls are frequently monitored. Privately owned land may not be sold but may be inherited. Inheritances cannot be passed on to relatives who have left the country as refugees and acquired other nationalities.

The Government continues to try to monitor some aspects of family and work life through a system of neighborhood and workplace informants.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Public expression of opposition to the Party and State is not permitted, and participants in such activity have been jailed. Newspapers and the state radio are instruments of the Government, reflecting only its views. Ordinary citizens may not import foreign newsmagazines or books; censorship is strict.

The Government makes no attempt to stop citizens from listening to foreign radio stations such as the Voice of America, nor from setting up antennas to receive Thai television.

Academic freedom does not exist.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government controls all meetings and, except for religious, athletic, and communal events, organizes them. Persons do not have the right to promote nonregime-sponsored activities nor to protest government policies. All associations--such as those for youth, women, workers, and a "peace organization"--are officially authorized to exercise government control and disseminate government policy. The LPRP organizes all professional groups, and their leadership is ordinarily drawn from party ranks. Associations are permitted to maintain relations with like-minded, politically acceptable organizations in other countries, particularly those in Communist countries. Ordinary Lao citizens are able to meet with foreigners only in unusual circumstances, usually involving their work. Nevertheless, contact with foreigners is increasing.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Nearly all Lao are Buddhists or, in the case of most highland groups, animists. In official statements, the Government has recognized the right to free exercise of religious belief as well as the contributions religion can make to the development of the country.

Many Lao believe, however, that the Government is engaged in a long-term effort to subvert religion because it considers the maintenance of temples and the activities of monks non-productive and because it objects to active groups with independent beliefs. This effort includes carefully controlling the education of young monks and compelling Buddhist clergy to propagate elements of Marxist-Leninist doctrine. Further, since 1975 the Government periodically has taken over Buddhist and Christian places of worship for use as schools, offices, and fire and police stations, as well as for political indoctrination centers and warehouses. Nonetheless, since the Third Party Congress in 1982, the Government has eased its stand on Buddhism. While it has not, so far as is known, contributed to the restoration of temples and religious institutions, it has not opposed efforts of the faithful to do so, and both restoration and new building are now widely evident.

Monks remain the only social group still entitled to special honorific terms of address, which even high party and government officials continue to use. Buddhist clergy are prominently featured at important state and party functions. Religious festivals are permitted without hindrance. The Government does not object to the Lao custom of young people entering religious orders for short periods.

Links may be maintained with coreligionists and religious associations in other countries, usually other Communist countries, only when approved by the Government. Most traditional links to Thai religious sects have been severed. Missionaries are not formally banned from entering Laos to proselytize, but in most cases they are denied permission. Despite the overall government attitude, many high party officials still participate in religious ceremonies.

Roman Catholics and Protestants are permitted to worship, but the activities of their churches are closely monitored. Vatican officials visited in 1987 to meet with the Bishop of Vientiane, as well as with local church and government officials. Attendance at Christian services continues to require discretion, although less so in 1989 than in 1988. The Government tries through the media and other means to persuade highland minority groups to abandon their "old-fashioned" animist beliefs.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens must obtain permission from the authorities for internal travel. Non-Lao residents in Vientiane must obtain permission to travel outside the city. Permission is now much easier to obtain than before, but is not necessarily automatic. Government officials have cited threats of "disorders" created by "reactionary elements" as the reason for the restrictions.

Foreign travel is increasingly permitted for officials, students, and others who have family abroad or access to foreign exchange. Most students continue to study in the Communist countries, but the number of students going to the West for higher education, although still small, has increased dramatically. Passports and exit visas have become much easier to obtain. The number of the relatively few travelers to the West and to the United States has increased sharply. Border crossing permits are available for those with business in Thailand. The number of permits increased in 1989, in keeping with the opening of additional border trade locations and the reduction in the number of items restricted by the Thai Government for trade with Laos. The permits are not, however, granted automatically and may be denied arbitrarily.

Legal emigration is rarely authorized for ethnic Lao. To guard against emigration, those permitted to travel must often leave their families behind as a guarantee of their return. Since 1975, 343,000 Lao citizens have registered as refugees in Thailand. An unknown number have crossed the border and simply settled with relatives or kindred ethnic groups. Some of those fleeing are fired upon and killed by border patrols as they attempt to cross the Mekong River. Government authorities have imprisoned many persons seeking to leave the country illegally.

Laos and Thailand have agreed to take back, on a case-by-case basis, those of their respective citizens who have illegally crossed into the other country and now wish to return home. Since May 1980, when agreement was reached with Thailand and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) on a voluntary repatriation program, over 4,675 persons have voluntarily returned to Laos under the auspices of the UNHCR. Those accepted for return receive several days of political indoctrination and then are released to return to their homes, where they are placed under the control of village authorities. The UNHCR provides basic necessities for the returnees and monitors their treatment and living conditions thereafter. There appears to be no official harassment or maltreatment of these voluntary returnees, and UNHCR officials have not been prevented from visiting them. In addition, perhaps as many as 10,000 persons have repatriated themselves without official involvement.

The Government has also agreed in principle to take back Lao citizens in Thailand whom the Thai have determined do not meet refugee status criteria. Procedures for the return of these persons were worked out between the two countries in late 1986, and since that time 164 have been returned. Those in Vientiane who follow refugee matters closely report that there is no perceptible difference in the way the Government treats those returnees who were screened out and those who returned voluntarily.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change their government. The LPRP fully controls the Government. The LPRP is run by a small elite who also occupy many of the principal government posts. There is neither freedom to participate in politics outside the party nor popular choice of policies. The new National Assembly elected in March includes a number of assemblymen who are not formally LPRP members, although their candidacies were approved by the party. Some 121 candidates ran for a total of 79 seats, and each electoral district had more candidates than seats. This election followed elections for district and provincial officials in 1988. No other parties were permitted to organize and voting was mandatory. These elections, the first held since the LPDR was formed in 1975, represent an effort by the LPRP to legitimize the Government and may represent some political liberalization. The new National Assembly is expected to finish writing a constitution in 1990 which may then be approved by a plebiscite. This new constitution would serve as a framework for the criminal code and laws establishing a judiciary and would also serve as a basis for additional laws.

LAOS

Laos generally does not cooperate with private international human rights organizations. However, it does occasionally permit visits by officials of international humanitarian organizations and has communicated with them by letters. No domestic human rights monitoring groups are permitted.

Approximately half of the population in Laos is ethnic Lao; also called "lowland Lao;" 20 percent are tribal Thai; 15 percent are Phouthoung (or Kha); and another 15 percent are other highland groups (Hmong, Yao, and others). The Government is attempting to integrate these groups through voluntary programs and to overcome traditional antagonisms between lowland Lao and minority groups. Although the LPRP and the Government are dominated by lowland Lao, efforts have been made to include minorities in the political and governmental elites. For instance, 43 of the 121 candidates for the National Assembly were from minority groups.

The Hmong are split along clan lines. During the years of insurgency, many were strongly anti-Communist; others sided with the Communist Pathet Lao and the Vietnamese. The Government represses all groups that fought against it, especially those continuing to resist its authority by force. The Hmong tried to defend some of their tribal areas after 1975, and some continue to support anti-LPDR resistance groups. Lao armed forces conduct operations against resistance groups.

The Government wants to resettle in the lowlands some ethnic minorities from mountainous areas. After resettlement they would be under closer government control and engage in settled agricultural production rather than the present slash-and-burn techniques. For this purpose, the Government has reportedly relied on a voluntary program based on material inducements and has begun several large-scale projects with foreign donors.

Local ethnic Chinese have encountered government suspicion and surveillance since 1979 when Sino-Lao relations deteriorated seriously. This has abated, however, since relations between Laos and the People's Republic of China were normalized in 1988. A majority of the Chinese community departed in the post-1975 period, largely for economic reasons. Those who remain have maintained government-approved Chinese schools in Vientiane and Savannakhet and Chinese associations in several provincial capitals.

Traditionally, women in Lao society have been subservient to men and often discouraged from obtaining an education. Today the active, government-controlled Lao Women's Federation has as one of its goals the achievement of equal rights for women. The Government claims that a higher percentage of women make up the school population now than before 1975, and that women are being encouraged to assume a greater role in economic and state-controlled political activity.

There is no pattern of widespread domestic or culturally approved violence against women. Both lowland Lao and hill tribes tend to hold women in lower esteem than men.

LAOS

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The overwhelming majority of workers are employed by the State, and they are very poorly paid. Labor laws do not exist. Labor unions exist but are small and have no right to strike. All unions are controlled by the Federation of Lao Trade Unions, which in turn is controlled by the LPRP. The Federation is a member of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

The LPDR is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO), but has not ratified ILO Conventions 87 on freedom of association, 98 on the right to organize and bargain collectively, or any other conventions related to the worker rights covered in this report. In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts cited the LPDR for failing to respond to its requests for information concerning pending complaints.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions play no discernible role in ameliorating the low salaries and wages, for instance, of public employees, the largest single category of employment. Under the foreign investment code published in 1988, some worker rights are guaranteed, such as the right to have job responsibilities defined, to be paid for that job and not another, to be paid more for overtime, and for overtime to be approved by the authorities as well as by the investor. There are no economic incentive zones or special industries where labor standards differ from those elsewhere in the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

While there is no published code of laws concerning protection from forced labor, there is no general pattern of forced labor in Laos. Prisoners in reeducation camps, or in prison camps (the former for "ideological" crimes, the latter for "economic" or "social" offenses) are expected to do hard labor. In addition, there are reports that some of these prisoners, when released, are restricted to the general area of the camp (always in rugged and mountainous terrain) and expected to work there on state enterprises.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no minimum age for employment of children. In practice children in this rural economy commonly assist in the work of their families.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Workplace conditions are not systematically exploitative, but they sometimes fail to protect workers adequately against sickness or accident. There is no specific system of laws or regulations relating to worker safety. Working hours do not exceed 48 hours a week, except during urgent roadbuilding or construction projects. It is unclear whether such urgent labor is compulsory. There is no minimum wage legislation; wages are low, particularly in the state sector and are, in fact, not sufficient to live on unless supplemented by other sources of income. Some workers receive paid 2-week vacations.

MALAYSIA

Malaysia has a parliamentary system of government based on free elections contested by several parties, almost all of which are racially based. Malaysia is a multiethnic society, with Malays comprising a little more than half of the population, and the remainder consisting of Chinese (about 33 percent), Indians (about 10 percent), and several other minorities. The ruling National Front (composed of three major and several minor parties) has won a two-thirds or better majority in the federal Parliament in all general elections since 1957, but opposition parties are active and vocal participants in the political system, and they occasionally control governments at the state level. Malaysia is a federation of 13 states, with state governments retaining power over several important areas, including land use and religion.

From the late 1940's until recently, the defense forces were directed primarily at containing a major Communist insurgency that began in 1948 and peaked in the 1950's. The Government states that because of the insurgency that still smolders in a few border areas, the intercommunal rioting in which several hundred persons died following the 1969 national elections, and the country's serious drug problem, classified by the Government as a threat to national security, internal security remains a concern. The Government cites all three factors as justification for laws allowing preventive detention, but human rights groups charge that they are primarily used to stifle dissent.

A strong free market economy, abundant natural resources, and a relatively small population have helped Malaysia become one of the most prosperous of the developing countries.

Detention without trial and restrictions on judicial review of detentions, as well as restrictions on freedom of association, and on freedom of the press, are the primary human rights concerns in Malaysia. In late 1987, the detention without trial of 106 persons under the Internal Security Act (ISA) became a major focus of attention. By June 1989, all those detainees had been released and restrictions on their movements and activities rescinded. Amendments to the ISA enacted by Parliament that same month, however, further restrict the judiciary's power to review detentions under the ISA, the Dangerous Drugs Act, and the Emergency Ordinance.

Restrictions on the independence of the Malaysian judiciary remain a key area of concern. Many legal and other observers see evidence that when hearing cases with political ramifications, the courts are increasingly reluctant to take positions which could be seen by the executive branch as challenging executive authority.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political or other extrajudicial killings by the Government or by any other political organization.

MALAYSIA

b. Disappearance

There was no evidence of abduction, secret arrests, or clandestine detention attributable to the Government or to nongovernmental or opposition forces. There have been reports that, in a number of cases, security authorities waited days after a detention before informing the detainee's family.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Allegations of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are rare, although several Malaysian citizens who were detained by the Government in October 1987 claim that they were mistreated by security authorities, especially during the initial stage of their detention. Their allegations included charges of sleep deprivation, threats and verbal abuse, and, in at least one case, beating. After their release from ISA detention, some former detainees stated that while there was no torture as such, treatment of detainees by the authorities varied, with some receiving harsher treatment than others.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government can detain suspects without benefit of judicial review under three laws: the 1960 Internal Security Act (ISA), the Emergency (Essential Powers) Ordinance of 1969, and the Dangerous Drugs Act of 1985.

The 1960 ISA, patterned after legislation instituted by the British colonial administration during the Communist insurgency of the 1950's, is aimed at controlling internal subversion. It empowers the police to hold for up to 60 days any person who may act "in a manner prejudicial to the security of Malaysia." Further detention (in renewable 2-year segments) must be authorized by the Minister of Home Affairs. The Minister must inform detainees of the charges against them and give them the opportunity to protest those charges to an advisory board. The advisory board reviews each case at least every 6 months. Advisory board decisions and recommendations are not, however, binding on the Minister, are never publicized, and are often not shown to the detainee. A number of the ISA detainees have refused to participate in the review process under these circumstances.

The Malaysian Government does not publish statistics or make regular public statements on ISA detentions. Authoritative information on the number of detainees is not available. In March 1989, however, the Deputy Home Affairs Minister told Parliament that 70 persons were under ISA detention at that time. Prior to the ISA detentions of October 1987, the number of long-term ISA detainees had dropped from nearly 500 in 1981 to about 25. In October and November 1987, however, Malaysian authorities, citing a danger of serious racial strife, detained another 106 persons, including government and opposition members of Parliament, social critics, academics, environmentalists, and religious activists. However, none were charged in court for any unlawful activity. By June 1989, all of these detainees had been released and restrictions on their movements rescinded. In 1988 the Government detained 11 Malaysians from Sarawak under the ISA; all were released by July 1989. Twenty-three from two northern states also were arrested in 1988 under the ISA as arson suspects. A spokesman for the opposition Islamic Party of Malaysia announced that several of those arrested were members of that party. The spokesman said the party would investigate to determine whether the arrests were political, without specifying when the determination would be made. Human rights observers claim that the detentions were unwarranted because the defendants could have been arrested and tried under criminal statutes proscribing arson.

In March 1988 the High Court ordered the release of a prominent lawyer and opposition leader detained under the ISA, on the grounds that his arrest was unlawful. Eight hours after his release he was rearrested under a new ISA detention order. In July 1988 and June 1989, Parliament amended the ISA to place additional limitations on judicial review of detentions. The 1988 amendments validate detention orders regardless of textual inaccuracies in place or fact, while the 1989 legislation restricts judicial review of government detention orders to procedural matters only. The Government defended the amendments by stating that court decisions should not be permitted to replace executive decisionmaking in national security matters. Opposition leaders and the Bar Council publicly protested the 1989 ISA amendments as a negation of the rule of law.

The Emergency (Essential Powers) Ordinance of 1969 stemmed from that year's intercommunal riots. The State of Emergency declared at that time has not been rescinded, although Parliament regained its legislative power in 1971. The Emergency Ordinance gives the Government the power to detain anyone "in the interests of the public safety or the defense of Malaysia." As under the ISA, detainees must be informed of the charges against them, and they can appeal to an advisory board. Since 1985 the Emergency Ordinance has been used in some serious criminal cases not related to narcotics.

The Dangerous Drugs (Special Preventive Measures) Act of 1985 was enacted by Parliament to give the Government specific power to detain suspected drug traffickers. Suspects can be held under this law for successive 2-year periods with periodic review by an advisory board. Unlike the ISA and Emergency Ordinance, in the case of the Dangerous Drugs Act the opinion of the advisory board is binding on the Minister. As of June 1989, there were about 1,200 drug suspects in detention under this statute. As with the other two security statutes, the Dangerous Drugs Act was amended in 1988 to validate detention orders with certain defects and, in 1989, to prohibit legal challenges to detention orders. Legal observers have voiced the same strong concerns about these amendments.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair trial is seriously restricted in security-related matters where the ISA is invoked. Ordinary civil and criminal cases, and some security-related cases, are tried under a fair and open judicial system derived from British jurisprudence. Charges must be levied against a defendant within 24 hours of arrest, and police must decide within 14 days whether to bring the case to court. Defendants have the right to counsel, and lawyers are able to represent clients without penalty to themselves. Bail is available, and strict rules of evidence apply in court. Defendants may appeal lower court decisions to the federal courts and, in criminal cases, may also appeal for clemency to the King or local state rulers, as appropriate.

Persons arrested and charged for firearms violations are normally charged under provisions of the Internal Security Act which carry a mandatory death sentence upon conviction. Other security-related crimes, whether or not capital crimes, can be tried under special procedures contained in the Essential (Security Cases) Regulations of 1975. The accused is allowed counsel but sometimes does not receive a statement of the evidence prior to the trial which is by a single judge without a jury; and witnesses may be examined in the absence of the accused. Admissible evidence includes hearsay and secondary evidence, testimony of children and spouses, self-incriminating statements to police, and information from seized records or communications. If the accused is found guilty, the judge must impose the maximum penalty. According to local legal sources, these special trial provisions are rarely, if ever, used.

The Malaysian judiciary has traditionally been regarded by the public and the legal community as committed to the rule of law. The judicial system has exhibited over the years an unusual degree of independence, not hesitating to rule against the Government in criminal, civil, or occasionally even major cases with political ramifications. An example of the latter was the High Court ruling in February 1988 that the dominant party in the Government coalition was illegally constituted.

However, in 1988 Parliament amended the Malaysian Constitution to delete the clause vesting judicial power in the courts and substitute a clause stating that the jurisdiction and power of the courts are "conferred by or under Federal law." Although the practical ramifications of this amendment remain unclear, some members of the legal community charge that it strips the judiciary of its constitutional basis of authority, making it wholly dependent upon specific legislation passed by Parliament.

In another development in 1988 affecting the judiciary, the Lord President of the Supreme Court was dismissed by the King on August 8 following the recommendation of a tribunal which heard the Government's charges against him. The charges included bias and prejudice in speeches critical of the Government and writing a letter to Malaysia's King raising objections to the Prime Minister's criticism of the judiciary, thereby creating misunderstanding between the Prime Minister and the hereditary rulers. Five Supreme Court Justices were suspended for their actions related to the case. A second tribunal appointed by the King ordered the immediate reinstatement of three of the Justices in October 1988, while the other two were dismissed from office. Most nongovernment observers believe the purpose of the dismissals was specifically to strengthen the Prime Minister's control of the judiciary.

The case against the previous Lord President continued to have ramifications in 1989. In March 1989, the Malaysian Bar Council filed a contempt of court motion against the current Lord President for his actions related to the dismissal of the previous Lord President. In April the Supreme Court rejected the Bar Council's contempt motion, and then in June agreed to consider a counter motion filed against the Bar Council Secretary by the Attorney General. The Government's contempt motion has not yet been heard. The Supreme Court's handling of the Bar Council's motion is cited by legal observers as evidence that the 1988 confrontation between the judiciary and the executive branches is causing reluctance by the courts to take positions in politically sensitive cases challenging the Government.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

These rights are, generally, protected by law. Under the security legislation described above, however, the police may enter and search without warrant the homes of persons suspected of threatening national security and confiscate evidence. Under this provision, police have searched homes and offices, seized books and papers, and taken people into custody without a warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite constitutional provisions for freedom of speech and press, there are some important limitations. For example, the Constitution provides that freedom of speech can be restricted by legislation "in the interest of security... (or) public order." Thus the Sedition Act Amendments of 1970 prohibit public comment on "sensitive" issues such as citizenship rights for non-Malays and the special position of Malays in society. Since 1970, however, the Government has brought only a few cases under the Sedition Act, and in the most recent incident in 1986 the defendant, the President of the Bar Council, was acquitted.

Press freedom is subject to important limitations under the Printing Presses and Publications Act of 1984, under which domestic and foreign publications must apply annually to the Government for a permit. In December 1987, Parliament amended this Act to make the publication of "malicious news" a punishable offense, to expand the Government's power to ban publications, and to prohibit court challenges to suspension or revocation of publication permits. An additional inhibiting factor is that the Government or the business arms of the leading political parties in the ruling coalition own almost all the major newspapers as well as all the radio and television stations.

At the time of the ISA detentions in October 1987, the Government revoked the publication permits of three newspapers. Although all three newspapers resumed publication in March 1988, the revocations and the legislative amendments described above have resulted in significant self-censorship by journalists and editors of the daily newspapers. Nevertheless, opposition parties, social action groups, and a number of private publications regularly provide detailed coverage of opposition political activities and print viewpoints strongly critical of the ruling coalition and its policies. A wide range of information is available to the Malaysian public in newspapers and magazines published in all of the country's four major languages, and major international and regional news publications circulate freely.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the rights of freedom of peaceful assembly and association, but there are significant restrictions. Those rights can be limited in the interest of security and public order, and the 1967 Police Act requires police permits for all public assemblies. In the aftermath of the intercommunal riots in 1969, the Government banned political rallies altogether. While the ban on political rallies has not been formally rescinded, both Government and opposition parties have been able to hold what they refer to as "discussion sessions" for electioneering during political campaigns. In the eight national and state special elections since August 1988, government and opposition candidates campaigned openly and with minimal police interference despite the existence of the Police Act and other restrictions; there were no public complaints concerning the enforcement of the Police Act. Some opposition politicians complained privately, however, that police issuance of permits for campaign events has not been as timely as they would have liked.

Other statutes limit the right of association, such as the Societies Act of 1966, under which the Government can refuse registration to organizations which comment unfavorably on political or public issues. The threat of deregistration under the Societies Act tends to inhibit political activism by public or special interest organizations, but it does not suppress such activity entirely. Another law affecting freedom of association is the Universities and University Colleges Act, which mandates government approval for student associations and prohibits such associations from engaging in political activity. In November 1988, police arrested 11 persons in Lake Garden Park who were participating in a peaceful candlelight protest against the detentions that took place in late 1987. Charged with illegal assembly under the Police Act, the charges were later dropped.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

The official religion of Malaysia is Islam, and ethnic Malays are legally bound in some civil matters, e.g., family relations and diet, by Islamic religious laws administered by state authorities. An Islamic religious establishment is supported with government funds, and it is official policy to "infuse Islamic values" into the administration of Malaysia. However, the Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and the Government has refused to accede to pressures for the imposition of Islamic religious law beyond the Muslim community. Religious minorities, which include large Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh, and Christian communities, practice their faith with minimal interference by the Government.

There are persistent allegations, however, that some state governments are slow in approving building permits for non-Muslim places of worship. The Government has limited the circulation of a popular translation of the Bible in Bahasa Malaysia, and some states restrict the use of Christian terms in Bahasa Malaysia. Conversion to religions other than Islam is permitted but not encouraged; proselytizing of Muslims is, and has long been, proscribed by law in some states and strongly discouraged in other parts of the country. Government attitudes on religious questions were evident in the October 1987 ISA detentions when several Muslim and Christian teachers and activists were detained.

MALAYSIA

In a development affecting the right of parents to teach religion to their children, the state of Selangor passed a bill in August 1989 which allows minors to convert to Islam without parental approval. Although this legislation has yet to be implemented and could be overturned at a later date, its passage in the Selangor State Assembly has caused some consternation among Malaysia's non-Muslim minorities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not generally restrict the right of individuals to travel within the country and live and work where they please, but it did place significant restrictions on the movement and activities of some ISA detainees after their release from detention. The restrictions on all former October 1987 ISA detainees were rescinded by June 1989. There are also no government restrictions on emigration. Since there are no known Malaysian refugees in other countries, there is no problem of repatriation. There have been some cases of Malaysian citizens being denied passports on security grounds, but Malaysians are generally free to travel abroad. There are restrictions on travel by Malaysians to Israel, South Africa, Cuba, China, Vietnam, and North Korea.

Malaysia has provided first asylum to more than 250,000 Vietnamese refugees since 1975. It has cooperated closely with international organizations and resettlement countries in facilitating the eventual movement of the refugees to third countries.

In June 1989, Malaysia chaired the second International Conference on Indochinese Refugees (ICIR). At the Conference, the resettlement countries and the countries of first asylum agreed to institute a comprehensive plan of action for granting asylum and resettlement to Indochinese asylum seekers. Boat people arriving in Malaysia after March 14, 1989 would be screened; only those determined to be genuine refugees would be eligible for first asylum and resettlement. Malaysia began to screen boat people on August 28. No determinations regarding refugee status had been made as of mid-November.

The yearly arrival rate for Vietnamese boat people to Malaysia remained high in comparison to the mid-80's: about 17,000 arrived during the year ending September 30, 1989. Resettlement did not keep pace with arrivals, and the camp population grew to 21,000, resulting in severe overcrowding at the principal camp of Pulau Bidong and concerns among relief workers for the asylum seekers' health. Domestic opposition to the Vietnamese presence prevented the expansion of camp facilities. The Government did not follow through on its 1988 announcement that it would close Pulau Bidong within the year.

Despite the commitments which it made at the ICIR, the Government began intermittently to deny first asylum to boat people beginning in late May, claiming it could not accept new boat arrivals indefinitely without some assurance all would eventually be removed from Malaysia. According to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), a total of 2,470 persons had been pushed off through the end of October 1989. In most cases the Malaysians repaired and reprovisioned the boats before returning them to sea. All such boats reaching Indonesia have been permitted to land. Nevertheless, one death reportedly occurred when a boat being towed to sea overturned, and four persons (including a pregnant woman) died of dehydration as a consequence of being pushed off.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Malaysia's parliamentary system is based on the British model. The Prime Minister and Cabinet are responsible to Parliament, from which they are drawn. National parliamentary elections, which the Constitution requires at least every 5 years, have been held regularly since independence in 1957 and have included opposition candidates actively contesting parliamentary seats. In addition, there are regular state and local multiparty elections. Most observers consider Malaysian elections to be generally free and fair, with votes cast secretly and recorded accurately. Opposition candidates won several hotly contested byelections in August 1988 and June 1989. Nevertheless, in several byelections in the last year, there were allegations that government supporters attempted to intimidate voters.

Through the United Malays National Organization (UMNO), Malays dominate the ruling National Front coalition of ethnic-based parties which has controlled Parliament since independence. Non-Malays fill a number of cabinet posts. In August 1986, the National Front won 148 of the 177 seats in the House of Representatives. Although the opposition regularly criticizes government policies within and outside Parliament, government views generally prevail. Since 1957 there has been a peaceful transfer of power in the office of Prime Minister three times.

Opposition parties, such as the Islamic Party of Malaysia (PAS), have occasionally gained control of state governments. Non-Malay parties have also controlled state governments; for example, the ruling party in the important state of Penang is largely Chinese-based, and in Sabah a predominantly Christian party is currently in power.

A new Malay political party called Semangat 46 (Spirit of 46) was registered in July 1989. This party is dominated by former UMNO leaders who challenged Prime Minister Mahathir for the UMNO leadership in 1987 and lost. There has also been some movement toward an opposition coalition led by Semangat 46 to challenge the ruling coalition in the next general election which must be held before October 1991. The new party and the informal coalition have actively campaigned in a series of national and state byelections since August 1988, winning twice and losing the other six times.

Eleven Members of Parliament, 10 from opposition parties and 1 from the government coalition, were included among the persons detained in October and November 1987. After their release, all regained their parliamentary seats and party leadership positions. Opposition leader and former detainee Lim Kit Siang continues to criticize government policy and has also directly challenged the Government in parliamentary sessions since his release.

The Government rejects criticism of its human rights record by international human rights organizations and foreign governments. Prime Minister Mahathir, in a speech at the

MALAYSIA

Non-Aligned Movement summit in September 1989, stated that developing countries cannot practice the Western liberal "brand of democracy and human rights" to the detriment of meeting basic human needs, such as food, shelter, and schools. Malaysian officials criticize local groups for "collaborating" with international human rights organizations in their studies of the human rights situation. Nevertheless, representatives of international human rights organizations have visited and traveled in Malaysia and have been able to meet with some relevant government officials. In 1989 representatives of the Committee on Human Rights of the New York City bar met with the Attorney General and other government officials. In 1988 the Government permitted delegations from the International Committee of the Red Cross and the Human Rights Commission of the International Parliamentary Union to meet with ISA detainees as well as with government officials. Foreign government officials have met in Malaysia with their Malaysian counterparts to discuss human rights.

In August 1989, a group of prominent Malaysians, including two former prime ministers, applied to the Registrar of Societies to establish a national human rights society. The Registrar had not by year's end ruled on the application, although in December 1988 the Deputy Prime Minister announced that the Government would not object. In addition, a number of organizations, including the Bar Council and various public interest groups, devote some time to human rights activities. The Government tolerates their activities but rarely responds to their inquiries or occasional press statements. The Government has not acceded to any of the international covenants on human rights, generally maintaining that such issues are internal matters.

The Government implements on an extensive scale programs designed to boost the economic position of the ethnic Malay majority which remains poorer, on average, than other Malaysians despite its political dominance. These Government programs and policies limit, in varying degrees, opportunities for non-Malays in higher education, government employment, business permits and licenses, and ownership of new homesteads.

The question of the rights of indigenous peoples in Malaysia received increasing attention in 1989. The focus of this attention has been the impact of logging on the indigenous peoples in the East Malaysian state of Sarawak. Between November 1988 and January 1989, 128 members of the semi-nomadic Penan group in Sarawak were arrested and charged with illegally blockading logging roads and bridges. Another 117 Penans were arrested under the State Forestry Ordinance in September for similarly blockading logging roads. While the Penan demonstrators have not yet been brought to trial, the prosecution dropped similar charges against another indigenous group--42 Kayans--in April.

There are no laws or regulations restricting the political and economic rights of women. The position of women in society is conditioned by the cultural and religious traditions of the country's major ethnic groups. With a general resurgence of Islamic piety among Malays, many Malay women have in recent years tended toward close conformity with Koranic stipulations on women's roles. Women's groups are active both within the governmental and private sectors. Two important umbrella organizations for women's rights are the National Advisory Council for the Integration of Women in Development in the Prime Minister's Department and the National Council of Women's Organizations.

Violence against women, including wife beating, has resulted in a number of steps to deal with the problem. According to government statistics, reported domestic violence cases increased from 279 in 1982 to 900 in 1988. There are currently no specific laws on domestic violence. Cases of wife beating or child abuse are tried under normal assault provisions of the Criminal Code, which carry penalties of 3 months to 1 year in prison and/or fines up to $750. A women's aid organization runs shelters for battered wives, and several women's groups led a successful effort in April to toughen the laws against rape, mandating jail sentences of at least 5 years (maximum of 20 years) and allowing the imposition of fines and/or whipping. Women's rights organizations also began promoting new legislation to curb domestic violence against women and children; an interagency group coordinated by the Welfare ministry was formed to draft the legislation.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Trade Unions Act of 1959 and the Industrial Relations Act of 1967 govern the right of workers to engage in trade union activity. Unions may organize workplaces, bargain collectively with an employer, form federations, and join international organizations. The Industrial Relations Act specifically prohibits any person from interfering with, restraining, or coercing a worker in the exercise of the right to form or participate in the lawful activities of a trade union.

The Trade Unions Act, which is administered by the Director General of Trade Unions (formerly the Registrar of Trade Unions), sets rules for the organization of unions, their recognition at the workplace, the content of their constitutions, election of their officers, and their financial reporting requirements. The Act's definition of a trade union restricts it to representing workers in a "particular trade, occupation, or industry or within any similar trades, occupations, or industries," contrary to guidelines of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labor Organization (ILO).

The Director General of Trade Unions may refuse to register a trade union on a variety of grounds. He also has the power, under certain circumstances, to withdraw the registration of a trade union. A trade union for which registration has been refused, withdrawn or canceled is considered an unlawful association.

Malaysia's electronic components industry, dominated by American and Japanese firms, has been the focus of unsuccessful union organizing efforts since the late 1970's. The Government has used its various powers to prevent the formation of a union in the industry other than strictly "in house" unions. In August 1989, the Director General of Trade Unions refused to register the National Electronics Workers Union on the grounds that it did not meet the definition of a "trade union" in the Trade Unions Act because its members work in the electrical and electronics industries, which the Labor Minister has determined are different industries. Union leaders have stated that they seek to represent only workers in the electronics industry. The Government has been repeatedly criticized by the ILO for continued failure to comply with ILO Convention 98 (right to organize and to bargain collectively).

Some critics of the Government's policy toward labor unions, notably the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) and Asia Watch, believe the arrest of V. David under the ISA in the government crackdown late in 1987 (see Section 1.d. above) demonstrated labor leaders' vulnerability to government pressures, which, critics assert, inhibit their carrying out legitimate trade union activities. Mr. David has declared publicly that questioning during his detention related only peripherally to his role in the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC) and the Transport Workers' Union (TWU). He continues as MTUC Secretary General, campaigned successfully for reelection to that position in December 1988, and has been allowed to travel abroad to trade union meetings.

Federations of trade unions may cover only a single trade or industry or similar trades or industries. The only labor federations currently registered are one for public servants, one for teachers, and one for state-based textile and garment workers' unions. The MTUC, the main labor body, is registered as a society under the Societies Act (rather than the Trade Unions Act). Previous MTUC efforts to register as a trade union federation under the Trade Unions Act were turned down because of its broad membership. In November 1988, however, Parliament approved legislation granting the MTUC the status and rights enjoyed by Malaysian trade unions, although it remains a society.

As of December 1988, there were 392 individual unions in Malaysia with over 616,626 members (10.4 percent of total employment).

Unions are independent both of the Government and of the political parties. While unions are not permitted to engage in political activity, individual trade union leaders have served in Parliament (V. David, the MTUC Secretary General, is currently a Member of Parliament for an opposition party) and individual union members belong to political parties. Malaysian trade unions are free to associate with the appropriate international trade secretariats, and a number of Malaysian labor leaders play major roles in international labor affairs. The MTUC is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). The Secretary General of the National Union of Plantation Workers is President of the ICFTU, and the MTUC Secretary General has actively participated in the ILO governing body.

While strikes are legal and do occasionally occur, critics claim that this right in practice is severely restricted. The Industrial Relations Act of 1967 requires the parties to notify the Ministry of Labor that a dispute exists before any industrial action may be taken. If government conciliation fails to achieve a settlement, the Minister has the power to refer the dispute to the Industrial Court, which effectively becomes compulsory arbitration. A strike is prohibited while the dispute is before the Industrial Court, and an award made by the Industrial Court cannot be appealed. Industrial Court awards are the exception rather than the rule, however, representing only about 18.5 percent of all collective agreements referred to the Industrial Court in 1988. The remaining agreements were reached through bargaining between management and labor.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is the norm in Malaysian industries where workers are organized. Malaysia's system of conciliation and arbitration seeks to promote negotiation and settlement of issues without strikes.

In a complaint to the ILO, the MTUC alleged that the 1980 amendments contain prohibitive and oppressive antiunion provisions which erode the basic rights of workers, restrict union activities, and result in government and employer interference in the internal administration of unions. In 1983 the ILO urged the Malaysian Government to amend these laws further to bring them into conformity with the ILO Convention on the right to organize and to bargain collectively. Despite subsequent amendments, the MTUC still believes the labor law to be deficient by ILO standards. Many union leaders also believe that creation of the Industrial Court to handle industrial disputes further weakened their collective bargaining rights.

Labor standards in free trade zones are the same as those in the rest of Malaysia. Workers at many companies located in the free trade zones are unionized, especially in the textile and electrical products plants. Enterprises granted "pioneer" status (whether or not located in a free trade zone) are protected from union demands for terms of employment exceeding those specified in the Employment Act of 1955 during the period of their pioneer status (normally 5 years). The restriction does not apply to wages or benefits not covered by the Employment Act (see Section 6.e. below).

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Malaysia is a party to ILO Convention 105 prohibiting forced or compulsory labor and it has effective legal sanctions against such abuses. The ILO has criticized Malaysia for requiring prisoners and ISA detainees to work. Malaysia defends the practice as part of its prisoner rehabilitation program.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Employment of children is covered by the Children and Young Persons (Employment) Act of 1966, which stipulates that no child under the age of 14 may be engaged in any employment except light work in a family enterprise, in public entertainment, work performed for the Government in a school or training institution, or employment as an approved apprentice. It is illegal for children to work more than 6 hours per day, more than 6 days per week, or at night. The law is effectively enforced through periodic inspections by the Ministry of Labor.

Malaysian wages are relatively high for its level of industrialization and higher than in all neighboring countries except Singapore. The Employment Act of 1955 sets working hours not to exceed 8 hours per day or 44 hours per week (5 1/2 days), sets overtime rates for hours in excess of those, and mandates public holidays, annual leave, sick leave, and maternity allowances for workers. Most such provisions are at least on a par with standards in industrialized countries. Minimum standards of occupational health and safety are set by law and enforced by a unit of the Ministry of Labor. Severance benefits are provided under the Employment (Termination and Lay-off Benefits) Regulations of 1980. The Employees Provident Fund (EPF) Ordinance of 1951 requires employers and employees to contribute to a fully funded retirement program. Some 90 percent of workers are covered by either the EPF or the Government's own pension plan for public servants. The Workmen's Compensation Act of 1952, and the Social Security Act provide disability and workman's compensation benefits.

There is no national minimum wage legislation, but certain classes of workers are covered by minimum wage laws: retail clerks, hotel and restaurant employees, cinema workers, and a few others, totaling approximately 140,000 workers. By local standards, and taking into account various worker benefits received by most workers, Malaysian wages provide a decent standard of living for workers and their families. The effective minimum wage for unskilled labor in the urban areas is about $90 per month. Plantation work is increasingly being done by contract workers, including numerous illegal immigrants from Indonesia, in part due to a shortage of Malaysians interested in such work. Working conditions for contract workers often are significantly below those of direct hire plantation workers, many of whom belong to the National Union of Plantation Workers. Additionally, many of the immigrant workers, particularly the illegal ones, may not have access to Malaysia's system of labor adjudication. In 1989 the Malaysian Government, at least in part to prevent the exploitation of these workers, moved to legalize large numbers of illegal immigrant workers, granting 290,000 work passes to Indonesian plantation workers in August.

THE MARSHALL ISLANDS

The Republic of the Marshall Islands is a nation of 31 low-lying coral atolls scattered over 750,000 square miles of the Central Pacific, comprising a total land area of about 70 square miles. The population, of Micronesian origin, is estimated at 43,000, two-thirds of which are concentrated on Majuro and Kwajalein atolls. The Marshall Islands constituted part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, administered by the United States from 1947 to 1986 pursuant to an agreement with the United Nations. In October 1986, the Republic of the Marshall Islands became a sovereign, self-governing nation under the Compact of Free Association with the United States.

Political legitimacy in the Marshall Islands rests on the popular will expressed by majority vote in accordance with a constitution uniquely blending American and British precepts. The executive branch of the Government consists of the President and his appointed Cabinet, all of whom are elected members of the legislature. The legislature consists of the Parliament, known as the Nitijela, and a Council of Chiefs (Iroij), the latter serving largely a consultative function. The Constitution established an independent judiciary. Under the Compact of Free Association, the United States is responsible for defense and national security. Consequently, the Marshall Islands has no security forces of its own aside from local police and other law enforcement officers, both of which are firmly under the control of the civil authorities.

The economy depends mainly on transfer payments from the United States, coconut oil and copra exports, limited tourism, and the fishing industry.

No human rights abuses were reported in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no politically motivated killings by the Government or by opposition political parties.

b. Disappearance

No politically motivated disappearances or abductions were reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment are expressly forbidden by the Constitution. There were no reported instances of such abuses.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution contains safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and no such incidents were reported.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

THE MARSHALL ISLANDS

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is expressly provided for in the Constitution and observed in practice. There were no reported denials of fair public trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The privacy of the home is protected by law and respected by the Government. There was no known instance of arbitrary intrusion by the State into the private life of the individual.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press. These are accorded in practice. There is one privately owned newspaper.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is provided for in the Constitution and observed in practice.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Free exercise of religion is provided for in the Constitution and observed in practice. There is no state religion. The majority of the population is Christian. Missionaries are free to seek converts and freely do so.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens are free to travel within the country and abroad. There are no restrictions on emigration or repatriation. There are no displaced persons other than those from Bikini atoll who left that atoll in 1946 because of scheduled nuclear testing on their islands. Pending further rehabilitation of the environment, the Bikinians remain resident elsewhere in the Marshall Islands.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Government of the Marshall Islands is chosen in free and open elections. There is no formal party system. Parties have informally coalesced around political issues, such as the form of the new Marshallese relationship with the United States, and then dissolved when the issue was resolved.

In 1988 a law was passed prohibiting political activity by aliens. An offending alien is subject to deportation on the decision of the Cabinet. Although the law has never been invoked, its invocation could result in deportation without due process.

THE MARSHALL ISLANDS

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There have been no reported allegations of human rights violations by the Government or any known requests for investigations. There are no local nongovernmental organizations which concern themselves with human rights. The Republic is not a member of the United Nations, and the Government has not taken an active interest in international human rights matters.

The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of gender, race, color, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, place of birth, family status, or descent.

Allegations of violence against women are rare and relate mainly to domestic conflict. Assault is a criminal offense, but in some cases women are reluctant to prosecute their spouses. Women's groups have begun holding meetings to publicize women's issues and to create a greater awareness of the rights of women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for the right of free association in general. This freedom of association is interpreted by the Attorney General of the Marshall Islands as allowing the existence of labor unions, although none have been formed yet. The Constitution is silent on the right to strike, and thus far the Government has not addressed this issue.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no legislation on collective bargaining or trade union organization. However, there are no bars to organization of trade unions or to collective bargaining. There are no special economic areas set aside, and labor standards and practices are the same throughout the islands.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution specifically prohibits involuntary servitude, and there is no evidence of its practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no legislation concerning minimum age of employment in this traditional society with its largely nonindustrial economy.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The minimum wage is $1.50 per hour, which is adequate to maintain a decent standard of living by local standards. There is no legislation concerning maximum hours or occupational safety and health.

FEDERATED STATES OF MICRONESIA

The Federated States of Micronesia (FSM) is a nation of 607 islands, mostly uninhabited, extending over 1 million square miles of ocean in the Central Pacific. Four states, Pohnpei, Truk, Yap, and Kosrae, comprise the federation. The four states were formerly part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, administered by the United States from 1947 to 1986 pursuant to an agreement with the United Nations. In November 1986, the FSM emerged as a sovereign, self-governing nation under the Compact of Free Association with the United States. The population, of Micronesian origin, is estimated to exceed 100,000.

Political legitimacy rests on the popular will expressed by a majority vote in accordance with the Constitution, which is based in large part on the U.S. model. There are three branches of government: a president as chief executive and head of state, a unicameral legislature elected from the four constituent states, and a judicial system which applies criminal and civil laws and procedures closely paralleling those in the United States. Under the Compact of Free Association, the United States is responsible for defense and national security. Consequently, the FSM has no security forces of its own aside from local police and other law enforcement officers, both of which are firmly under the control of the civil authorities. The economy depends heavily on transfer payments from the United States, fishing, tourism, and subsistence agriculture.

No human rights abuses were reported in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No political killings occurred.

b. Disappearance

There were no disappearances or abductions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of these practices.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Legal procedure follows U.S. law in its provisions for due process. These provisions are carefully observed. There is no exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Public trial is provided for in the Bill of Rights, and trials are conducted fairly. Juveniles may have closed hearings. The Chief Justice, currently a U.S. citizen, is appointed by the President.

THE FEDERATED STATES OF MICRONESIA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law prohibits such arbitrary interference, and in practice there is none.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These rights are constitutionally assured and faithfully observed. Each of the four state governments controls a radio station, broadcasting primarily in the local language. Yap also controls a small television station. The Federal Government and the governors of Kosrae and Truk publish newsletters. Several private and municipal newsletters in Truk and Pohnpei, however, do not hesitate to challenge governmental policies. Religious groups operate private radio stations in Pohnpei and Truk, and a commercial television station broadcasts 12 hours a day on Pohnpei. Nongovernmental media are expanding, albeit slowly.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These rights are also provided for in the Bill of Rights. During political campaigns, citizens often take advantage of them to question candidates at public meetings. Formal associations are uncommon in Micronesia. Nevertheless, student organizations and at least one lobbying group exist.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Federated States is extremely hospitable to diverse religions, and missionaries of many faiths work within the nation. The Bill of Rights forbids establishment of a state religion and governmental restrictions on freedom of religion. Most of the citizens are Christians.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions in any of these areas. The Compact of Free Association permits citizens to travel to, reside in, and work in the United States without having to obtain immigrant visas.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Congress is elected by popular vote from each state; Congress then chooses the President and Vice President from its ranks by majority vote. State governors, state legislators, and municipal governments are all elected by direct popular vote. Elections are conducted honestly, and political campaigning is unrestricted. Although there are no restrictions on the formation of political groups, to date there have been no efforts to form political parties.

THE FEDERATED STATES OF MICRONESIA

No violations have ever been alleged, nor are there any known requests for investigations. There are no local groups that concern themselves with human rights. The Federated States does not belong to the United Nations.

The Constitution provides explicit protection against discrimination based on race, sex, language, or religion. The various traditional cultures establish hierarchies of social status, and these traditional rankings can influence access to political office and education, even though such access is in principle open to all. Traditional culture is greatly respected by the peoples of the Federated States, and is protected by Article V of the Constitution. Although the traditional social orders are losing ground as westernization takes a greater hold upon young people, male dominance is a fact of life throughout Micronesia. Women are still at the early stages of finding jobs beyond the entry level, in both the public and private sectors. Allegations of violence against women are almost exclusively concerned with domestic conflict between husband and wife. Assault is a criminal offense, but in such cases wives are very reluctant to bring formal charges against their husbands. Local support groups are beginning to hold meetings in some of the state capitals to publicize domestic issues, including alcohol and drug abuse. These meetings serve to create a greater awareness of social problems, including the rights of all citizens.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

National government employees have the right, by law, to form associations to "present their views" to the Government. The Constitution states that "no law may deny or impair freedom of expression, peaceable assembly, association, or petition." These limits are observed by the Congress. There are as yet, however, no trade unions in this largely nonindustrial society.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no law dealing specifically with trade unions or with the right to collective bargaining. There are no special economic areas set aside, and labor standards and practices are the same throughout the islands.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution specifically prohibits involuntary servitude, and there is no evidence of its practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no law establishing a minimum age for employment of children.

THE FEDERATED STATES OF MICRONESIA

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The minimum wage for national government employees is $1.50 per hour. While there is no legally established minimum wage for other types of employment, wages for unskilled workers vary from $0.80 to $1.50 per hour under current customs and practices. These wages are sufficient to provide an acceptable standard of living under local conditions. There are no laws regulating hours of work or prescribing standards of occupational safety and health, but a federal regulation requires that employers provide a safe place of employment.

MONGOLIA

The Mongolian People's Republic (MPR) is a highly centralized Communist state, in which the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party (MPRP), the Communist party, is the only political party permitted to function. Since achieving power in the 1920's, the MPRP has continued Mongolia's long tradition of authoritarian rule, though there are recent signs that the top leadership is sanctioning movement toward reform of the party and government. The Politburo of the MPRP Central Committee, headed by Jambyn Batmonkh, rules. Nominally, the People's Great Hural, or National Assembly, enacts laws, but it faithfully carries out the policies of the MPRP leadership. However, the Great Hural has recently shown signs of movement toward increased openness in criticizing government practices. It meets for 3 days once a year. Between sessions, the Presidium and the Council of Ministers (Cabinet) issue decrees and executive orders.

The Mongolian State is modeled on the Soviet system, and the political influence of the U.S.S.R. is great. While two Soviet Army divisions were recently withdrawn, a significant military presence remains, as do thousands of civilian Soviet advisers and technicians. A Mongolian version of perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness) has begun; changes along these lines have been noted. Consistent with this policy, Chairman Batmonkh and other leaders have publicly criticized political abuses of the past and called for political and economic reform. Contact with and interest in the non-Socialist countries is increasing.

The Mongolian security apparatus functions under the direction of the Council of Ministers in accord with the Constitution. The primary body with responsibility for state and public security is the Ministry of Public Security (MPS). It oversees subordinate bodies, including the Central Militia Office and the network of local police departments. In addition, the MPS administers the State Security Administration, which is responsible for counterintelligence and internal political security. The MPS also oversees the Border and Internal Troop Administration, which performs customs and immigration control, and border security duties. In keeping with recent indications that a high-level political review is under way in the Government of past policies and practices, the MPS has stated publicly that it is reevaluating its responsibilities, which will now include "establishing reliable guarantees against permitting any kind of illegal encroachments on human rights in the future..." There is little information yet to assess MPS policy changes in this area.

Mongolian economic life is dominated by the U.S.S.R. and shaped by its trade, approximately 95 percent of which is conducted with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Soviet involvement in the economy primarily focuses on the mining of nonferrous metals that are subsequently shipped to the U.S.S.R. for processing. Mongolia is now making efforts to diversify international trade with non-Socialist nations. Despite increasing industrialization and urbanization, a majority of the population is engaged in agriculture, with an emphasis on livestock raising and associated light industry.

The United States and Mongolia established diplomatic relations on January 27, 1987, and the U.S. Embassy opened formally in September 1988. At this stage, the body of reliable information concerning government control or treatment of Mongolian citizens remains limited. Until recently, there were no known domestic opposition groups. However, on the eve of the Party's Seventh Plenum, a new group surfaced--the Mongolian Democratic Association, composed of students and intellectuals. Two demonstrations by this group which were critical of current and past government practices were permitted by the authorities; banners calling for multiparty elections, an end to bureaucratic privileges, and a more market-oriented economy were displayed.

Individual civil and political liberties are highly restricted. Though the numbers are increasing, few Mongolians are authorized to travel outside of Socialist countries. Emigres from Mongolia are few. Political opposition to the MPRP has recently been permitted, though the extent of the party's control over this opposition remains unknown. Freedoms promised under the Constitution, including speech, religion, demonstration, and assembly, have been severely restricted in the past, but there are now signs that the authorities are relaxing these policies. The Party's official daily recently published a lead editorial calling for guarantees of human rights, including elections, and "large-scale renewal" to ensure rights and freedoms.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There are no indications in recent years of political or extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There are no indications in recent years of disappearance due to political persecution.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Information is unavailable on this subject.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government recently acknowledged that political arrests and detention occurred in the 1930's and has published numerous official criticisms of those policies as violations of human rights. In keeping with recent signs of increased government openness in criticizing abuses of the 1930's and 1940's, the Minister of Public Security stated publicly that his ministry is now "directing its activities at rehabilitating honest citizens repressed during that period, at establishing reliable guarantees against permitting any kind of illegal encroachments on human rights in the future, and cooperating with corresponding organizations in this matter." The current extent of arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile is unknown. There is little information available yet on the practical effect of these new policy directives on the Ministry of Public Security apparatus.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

MONGOLIA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Current civil and criminal codes stipulate the right of the accused to judicial process, a legal defense, and public trial "except as stipulated by law." Closed proceedings are permitted in the case of crimes against the State. The civil code focuses on this category of crimes.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy of person, home, and correspondence is provided for in the Constitution, but little is known about the application of these rights by the authorities. Job and residence changes must be approved by the State. The State also plays a role in finding or assigning jobs.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms have been tightly circumscribed. The Constitution provides for freedom of speech but limits this freedom by specifying that the exercise of individual rights must be to "develop and consolidate the state system of the MPR." Actions deemed by the MPRP to fall outside this guideline may result in arrest and detention. Various party and government organizations, including the Ministry of Public Security and the local militia, control political and social conduct. Citizen volunteer committees work with the militia to monitor social and political conduct at the neighborhood level.

Prior to the institution of Mongolian-style glasnost and perestroika, fundamental public criticism of the Government was not permitted. In late 1988, however, for the first time a limited amount of direct criticism of past and present party and government leaders, and of the Soviet Union, was carried in public media. Letters published in the official press are a form of managed criticism permitted by the Government. The government-approved press serves largely as a propaganda tool. Recent practice indicates that representatives of non-Communist foreign media are able to travel to Mongolia. Academic and artistic life also is controlled in accordance with government policy. Information flow is tightly monitored. Mongolian citizens have little access to books, periodicals, or newspapers not printed in Communist countries, but there are signs the Government is permitting more exposure to some Western plays and literature.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of demonstration and assembly are provided for in the Constitution, but, until recently, only government-authorized organizations were permitted. Demonstrations are generally carefully orchestrated by government authorities, but the extent of government involvement in two demonstrations by the new Mongolian Democratic Association in December 1989 is unknown. Demonstrators--mostly students and intellectuals--expressed criticism of past and current government practices, called for plural elections, a more market-oriented economy, intensification of perestroika and glasnost, and an end to special privileges for government officials.

MONGOLIA

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government controls religious activity through the Office of Religious Affairs attached to the Council of Ministers. This office works in close consultation with the showcase Gandan monastery--the only monastery permitted to function. The monastery houses approximately 200 monks. All other monasteries have been closed since the 1930's. As a result, Lamaist Buddhism, a central force in Mongolian life prior to the establishment of the Communist Government, no longer plays a significant part in the lives of most Mongolians. However, rural people reportedly retain many Buddhist beliefs privately. Vestiges of shamanism also remain.

In addition to the 200 monks at Gandan monastery, there are reports of 100 itinerant monks--loosely affiliated with Gandan. Gandan also runs a nominal religious school on a small scale. Mongolians who regularly visit the Gandan Monastery for worship are mostly of the older generation, but there are signs of resurgent interest in religion among Mongolian youth. Two other monasteries are being restored as museums. During 1989 the traditional Mongolian script, long suppressed in favor of Cyrillic, has been revived and is taught in schools and on television. The destruction of lamaseries in the 1930's has been criticized for excessive brutality. Lunar New Year celebrations, carrying Buddhist associations, were permitted in the cities in 1989 for the first time in decades. Such developments appear to evidence a modestly increased toleration of Buddhist and other traditional practices. There are no mosques for the traditionally Islamic Kazakh minority of 80,000 in western Mongolia. This group has been permitted to retain cultural customs, such as dress, based on religious background.

Travel within the country does not appear to be as restricted as in the past, but residence changes must be approved by the authorities. All Mongolians over age 16 must have internal passports and must obtain permission from the Security Bureau in order to travel within the country. Changes of residence or employment must be approved by the Security Bureau and must accord with central planning goals.

In general, few Mongolians have traveled abroad, even to the Soviet Union. In recent years, however, as many as several thousand Mongolian youths have gone to various places in the Soviet Union yearly for specialized programs. There has also been an increase in the number of senior scholars pursuing extended study abroad. Most foreign travel remains restricted to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Though overall figures remain small, increasing numbers of Mongolians are permitted travel to the West for official, academic, or cultural purposes. There is no known routine emigration from Mongolia, but there are also no indications that many people wish to emigrate.

Although the 1960 Constitution assures the right "to reside in the territory of the MPR" to foreign citizens, the Government in 1983 began a systematic expulsion of the 6,000 to 7,000 ethnic Chinese. With the improvement of Sino-Mongolian relations in recent years, Mongolia stopped expelling ethnic Chinese in 1985; today the Chinese population numbers less than 2,000. Increasingly, Mongolians are permitted to visit and be visited by ethnic Mongolian relatives whose homes are in China. A bilateral consular treaty regarding treatment of their nationals was signed by Mongolia and China in July 1986.

Citizens do not have the right to change their government. The Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party (MPRP) has a monopoly on political power, and there is no established mechanism by which the citizenry as a whole can effect transitions in leadership or changes in government. The MPRP is established on the Soviet model with a narrow pyramid of power topped by Party General Secretary Batmonkh. Lower ranking members of the MPRP have had very limited ability to influence the decisions of their superiors, but recent signs indicate that the top leadership has sanctioned movement toward decentralization of decisionmaking within the party. People's Great Hural delegates, for example, are becoming more outspoken on party policies. During a December 1989 session, Great Hural delegates called for accelerated economic reform and criticized "bureaucratism" in the Government and the special privileges of high officials.

Elections are held at regular intervals, but only one candidate has been listed for each office, so the choice has been to vote for the candidate or cross the name out. Many elections reportedly result in a 99.9 percent turnout, and the sole candidate regularly receives the entire vote. However, reforms announced in December 1988 called for the institution of some elections with multiple candidates at all levels.

No organization dedicated to the protection of human rights in Mongolia is known to exist. There has been no known request by an international human rights group to investigate alleged human rights violations in Mongolia.

There appears to be little discrimination in education on the basis of race, sex, or religion.

Government policy is to promote equal rights for women. According to government statistics, the percentage of women in the work force rose from 30 to 48.5 percent between 1960 and 1984. Women constitute about 30 percent of the MPRP membership and 49.8 percent of trade union membership, and some hold high professional positions in institutions such as schools, research centers, and hospitals.

At present, there is no information to indicate a significant incidence of societal violence against women. The extent to which family violence, including wife beating, may occur is unknown. Article 84 of the Constitution expressly calls for equal rights for women in all sociopolitical spheres and prohibits the "impairment of women's equality in any form whatsoever." In particular, the law provides for specific protections for women with children and special assistance for women during pregnancy and after childbirth. Because Mongolia remains an underpopulated country with just over 2 million inhabitants, official desire to increase the population is strong.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers do not have the right to form and join unions of their own choosing. The right to organize professional associations and trade unions is provided for in the Constitution, but these are government controlled and directed. It is not known how such organizations work in practice, whether trade unions have a right to strike, and whether any strikes took place in 1989. All worker committees are reportedly extensions of the MPRP. However, there have been confirmed cases of direct elections of plant or factory directors, and reports of labor resistance to overbearing party interference in technical matters of production. In the opinion of the International Labor Organization (ILO), constitutional provisions imply that no mass organizations, particularly trade unions, have any possibility of working outside the party framework. The ILO also notes that the Labor Code effectively prevents the formation of any independent trade union organizations. All unions are grouped in the Central Council of Mongolian Trade Unions (CCMTU), which itself is an extension of the MPRP. The CCMTU is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no specific provision for collective bargaining in the labor law. However, local worker committees and people's courts are empowered by the law to form "Commissions for Labor Disputes" to settle grievances. Trade union council representatives and enterprise managers are represented equally on these commissions. It is not known how these commissions function in actual practice. Information whether export processing zones exist is not available.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

It is not known if forced or compulsory labor is practiced or prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The law proscribes work for children under age 16, although those aged 15 may work if allowed to by the local trade union committee. Those under 18 are statutorily prohibited from doing arduous work or from working in dangerous areas such as mining.

The Mongolian Labor Law sets maximum work hours for all workers and exhorts state enterprises to observe work safety requirements. The workday is prescribed as 8 hours for adults, 7 hours for those aged 16 to 18, and 6 hours for those aged 15. The Labor Law provides that "the monthly earnings of a worker or employee may not be lower than the minimum amount of earnings established by the State." No information is available on the implementation of labor law in this area or of the effectiveness of health and safety standards set by the Government.

NAURU

The Republic of Nauru, an 8.22 square mile Pacific island with about 9,000 inhabitants, gained independence in 1968, at which time it adopted a modified Westminster form of parliamentary democracy. Previously, Australia, acting on behalf of the United Kingdom and New Zealand, administered the island, first as a League of Nations mandate and later as a United Nations trust territory.

Nauru has two levels of government, the unicameral Parliament and the Nauru Local Government Council (NLGC), both popularly elected bodies. Parliamentary elections must be held at least once every 3 years. The Parliament consists of 18 members from 8 constituencies and is responsible for national and international matters. The President, who is both head of state and head of government, is elected by Parliament from among its members. The NLGC acts as the local government and is responsible for public services. The judiciary is independent.

Nauru has no armed forces, though it does maintain a police force, now numbering 72 officers, under civilian control.

The economy depends almost entirely on the country's rich phosphate deposits which are mined by the government-owned Nauru Phosphate Corporation (NPC). Its profits are the primary source of revenue for the Government; Nauru has no consumption or income taxes. A large percentage of the NPC's earnings are placed by the Government in long-term investments, meant to support the Nauruans after the phosphate reserves have been exhausted.

Fundamental human rights are accorded by the Constitution and generally respected in practice, although hard data and systematic records are lacking. There were no formal reports of human rights abuses during 1989, but concerns have been expressed about discriminatory treatment of women.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no political disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits these practices, and this prohibition is respected.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The constitutional prohibition of arbitrary arrest and detention is honored. The police may hold a person for no more than 24 hours without a hearing before a magistrate. Exile is not practiced, though persons found to be "mentally disordered" either by two medical examiners or, in the case of a finding of not guilty due to mental incapacity, by a court may be sent to appropriate medical facilities in Australia. Once treatment is completed such persons may return to Nauru.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Nauru maintains an independent judiciary, and constitutional provisions for both a fair hearing and a public trial are respected. Defendants may have legal counsel, and a representative will be appointed where required "in the interest of justice." Nauru has only two trained lawyers, and many people are represented in court by "pleaders," trained paralegals certified by the Government. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution generally provides protection from these abuses. Searches not sanctioned by court order are prohibited, and there is no surveillance of individuals or of private communications. However, Nauruan males must have permission from the Government to marry a non-Nauruan; such permission has not always been granted, though there were no reports of any refusals in 1989. Nauruan females are prohibited from marrying foreigners. Birth control measures are not readily available (see Section 5).

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of expression is provided for in the Constitution, but the island's one radio station and one newspaper (a weekly) are owned and operated by the Government. While the parliamentary opposition, private groups, and individual persons may voice opposition to the Government, their statements may not receive local media coverage. However, Nauru's small population allows news and opinion to circulate freely, rapidly, and widely by word of mouth. A small independent newsletter appearing every 3 or 4 weeks provides an alternative to the state-owned media. Nauru has no prohibitions against other newspapers, but, with a market of only 528 households, the economic viability of independent media is precarious. Foreign publications are freely available.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The constitutionally granted right of peaceful assembly and association is honored. No limitations exist on private associations, and no permits need be obtained for public meetings.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is protected by the Constitution, and no official religion is recognized by the Government. Several different Christian denominations are established in Nauru. Missionaries, foreign clergy, and religious publishing are all permitted. Adherence to a particular faith results in no advantage or disadvantage in any secular pursuit.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Nauruans are free to move and travel both domestically and internationally. Domestic travel is particularly accessible, since any place on the island is within a 3-hour walk. Foreign workers must apply to their employers for permission to leave during the period of their contracts. They may break the contract and leave without permission but would lose their positions as a result. In most cases foreign employees whose contracts are terminated by their employers must leave Nauru within 60 days.

Nauru does not revoke citizenship for political reasons; citizens who have left the country have the right to return, and repatriates receive the same treatment as other citizens. No restrictions on emigration exist.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government

Citizens have, and exercise, this right. Though Nauru has no organized political parties, persons with diverse points of view run for and are elected to Parliament and to the NLGC. Though one man held power much of the time since independence, shifting parliamentary groupings, many reflecting family and clan loyalties, have often resulted in changes in leadership. In August 1989, Parliament elected a new president. This was followed 4 months later by the regularly scheduled election which resulted in two new members being chosen for Parliament and the naming of the third president to lead Nauru within the year. Nauru has also had changes in presidential leadership on four occasions prior to 1989. Power has always been transferred peacefully and in accordance with the Constitution. Voting by secret ballot is compulsory for all citizens over age 20 for parliamentary elections and for all over age 21 for NLGC elections. All parliamentary seats have been contested during recent elections. The only significant non-Nauruan group in the nation, the 3,000 guest workers, have no voice in political decisions.

There have been no allegations by outside organizations of human rights violations in Nauru, nor any requests for investigations.

The Constitution contains provisions assuring women the same freedoms and protections as men. They are provided equal opportunities by the Government in education and employment and are free to own property and pursue private interests except, as noted above, they are prohibited from marrying foreigners.

Nauru's population has almost been eliminated on several occasions, first by disease, and then during World War II as a result of massive removals by the Japanese. The Government therefore went to great lengths to encourage large families. Birth control has been available to women only after they have five children, and then it is often difficult to obtain. The island has no gynecological specialists and no women doctors. Nauruan women complain that the emphasis on their reproductive role limits their opportunities. Serious problems with alcoholism are generally blamed for the physical abuse of women in Nauru. During the tenure of former President DeRoburt, such abuse, like other issues involving women, received no attention from the Government, and no statistics about the prevalence of such abuse exist.

Foreign contract laborers and their families live only in very crowded conditions and suffer disproportionately from the rationing imposed during times of water shortages. Additionally, while regulations allow those from Kiribati, Tuvalu, and other Pacific islands to bring spouses and two children under age 18 to Nauru, this privilege is denied to Filipino guest workers.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Trade unions do not exist in Nauru, and efforts to form unions are officially discouraged. Pilots employed by Air Nauru went on strike during 1988 partly in order to gain recognition as a legal union. The DeRoburt Government refused to grant union status to the airline pilots, denounced the strike as interrupting a vital service, and dismissed the pilots. Replacement pilots have not attempted to form a union. The transient nature of the mostly foreign work force and the relative prosperity of the Nauruans have tended to hamper efforts to organize the labor force. No strikes took place in 1989. Nauru is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There are no laws discriminating against unions or their members. There are no export processing zones on Nauru.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is forbidden by the Constitution, and there were no instances of either.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Nauruan law sets 17 as the minimum age of employment for children. This is enforced, except where children under age 17 work in the few small businesses owned by their families.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Nauruan wages provide a decent, if Spartan, living for all workers, but the actual compensation varies widely. In 1989 Nauruans had a minimum wage of $3.88 per hour and a 35-hour workweek. Foreign contract workers had a similar workweek, but earned only $2.77 per day, except for skilled tradesmen, who earned $7.70. Overtime rates of time and a half, with double time for Sundays and holidays, considerably supplement foreign workers' incomes. Also, free housing and food is provided for foreign workers and their families.

NAURU

The Government sets health and safety standards. NPC, the island's major employer, has an excellent safety program that includes worker education and the use of safety helmets, safety shoes, respirators for dusty conditions, and other safety measures. During 1989 NPC had only 1 serious worker accident and about 10 minor accidents in its work force of 1,200.

NEW ZEALAND

New Zealand is a parliamentary democracy, with executive authority vested in a 20-member cabinet led by a prime minister. The 97 members of the unicameral legislature include 4 elected by those members of the native Maori minority who wish to be included on a separate electoral roll.

Maori comprise approximately 9 percent of New Zealand's population of 3,372,000, while other Pacific islanders total about 3 percent. The rights of the native Maori minority have been the subject of increasing public attention in recent years, particularly as the country prepares to commemorate 150 years of European settlement in 1990. The Department of Maori Affairs is being phased out in favor of the Iwi Transition Agency, charged with overseeing the devolution of responsibility for Maori interests to Iwi (tribal) authorities.

Niue and the Cook Islands are self-governing countries in free association with New Zealand. The island group of Tokelau is administered by New Zealand with limited but growing self-government. Inhabitants of all three hold local and New Zealand citizenship, and local law is compatible with New Zealand and British common law.

The police and defense forces are responsible to and firmly controlled by civilian officials.

Real annual economic growth has been low or negative in recent years. However, the free enterprise economy affords the opportunity for a reasonable standard of living for most New Zealanders. Education is freely available to all.

New Zealand continued its excellent record in human rights during 1989. New Zealanders enjoy personal freedom, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, universal suffrage, and the rule of law. Respect for minority rights, concern for the economically deprived, and the humane treatment of prisoners are established in principle and in practice.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Such killings do not occur.

b. Disappearance

There have been no instances of politically motivated disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other forms of mistreatment are prohibited by law, and these prohibitions are respected in practice.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

New Zealanders enjoy freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention, and exile. New Zealand law provides for the writ of habeas corpus, and persons arrested in New Zealand are charged promptly. Legal aid is provided by the court to those who cannot afford to pay for a private attorney. Preventive detention is prohibited.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

New Zealand law assures a prompt, public trial. The rights of the accused are carefully observed and subject to public scrutiny. The judiciary operates independently of executive or legislative influence.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy is assured by law. The Government does not violate a person's privacy, the sanctity of the home, or the integrity of correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are assured by law and respected in practice. More than 150 newspapers and 600 magazines are published throughout the country, reflecting a wide spectrum of political and social thought. The Government makes no attempt to censor the press, and opposition viewpoints are freely expressed.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Rights to peaceful assembly and association are recognized and respected.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

New Zealand enjoys a long tradition of religious tolerance. All faiths are given equal treatment under the law.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

New Zealanders are not subject to limitations on internal movement or resettlement. Foreign travel is unrestricted, and the right to return is assured. To the extent of its resources, New Zealand accepts and resettles refugees and asylum seekers.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The people freely elect their government. Two major parties, Labour and National, dominate the political scene and have formed governments chosen in triennial elections for more than 50 years. Smaller parties and groups are usually of little consequence in the national electoral process. New Zealand law provides for universal suffrage; citizens are eligible to vote at age 18. No restrictions based upon race, sex, creed, or national origin limit participation in the political process. Women and Maoris, as well as other minorities, regularly serve in Parliament and the Cabinet albeit in numbers well below their proportion of the population. Voting rates are high, and participation in political groups is common. Opposition groups freely voice their views.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

New Zealand's commitment to human rights is clearly demonstrated by the active efforts of local, national, and international bodies organized to protect human rights and prevent discrimination. The official New Zealand Human Rights Commission and the New Zealand Council for Civil Liberties are joined by such nongovernmental human rights organizations as the Citizens Association for Racial Equality, the New Zealand chapter of the International Commission of Jurists, the Race Relations Conciliator, Amnesty International, and the National Organization of Women. In May 1989, the Government sponsored an international human rights conference in Wellington which, while noting New Zealand's excellent human rights record, urged the Government to do more to promote the rights of the Maori and Pacific island minorities within the country.

Despite the historical absence of overt discrimination and the achievements and status of many successful Maori in government and public life, some of the indigenous population remain marginally educated and economically disadvantaged. Increasing urbanization (approximately 90 percent of young Maori live in cities) and continued assimilation with New Zealanders of European descent have created social stress which is reflected in social indicators. A relatively high percentage of Maori are unemployed and receive state assistance. They figure disproportionately in crime statistics and among the prison population.

Maori activists continue to press for the return of government-held land and assets to Maori tribes in accordance with the terms of the 1840 Treaty of Waitangi. Legislation reallocating fishing quotas to Maori tribes in accordance with the Treaty underwent several revisions in 1989. At year's end that legislation was before a parliamentary select committee. Numerous other claims are currently under investigation, and sales of several state assets have been held up pending a review of the effect of the sales on Maori rights and interests. Some Maori activists have called for a boycott of ceremonies commemorating the sesquicentennial of the Treaty on the grounds that the Government has not honored its terms.

The Government established a Ministry of Women's Affairs in 1985 and has ratified the U.N. Convention for the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women. A Human Rights Commission established in 1977 hears complaints about sex discrimination, most frequently concerning wage inequities. The Government has promised that "comparable worth" legislation will be introduced during the current term of Parliament. The Government has funded shelters and other assistance for victims of domestic violence and has prosecuted offenders.

Violence against women has received increased public and governmental attention in recent years. The Crimes Amendment

NEW ZEALAND

Act of 1986 eliminated the crime of rape, replacing it with the crimes of sexual violation and unlawful sexual connection. The new law also increased protection for the victim during trial by allowing suppression of the victim's name and other details, and eliminated the exemption for spousal rape. In 1987 the police changed their policy on family violence, requiring that arrests be made instead of attempting mediation at the scene by police officers not trained for that role. Women have become increasingly cognizant of their legal rights as evidenced by the number of claims to the Accident Compensation Corporation for "loss of the capacity for enjoyment of life." In 1981 there were three such claims based on sexual abuse. In 1988 there were 1,500. Services for victims are rapidly increasing as well; in 1987-88, 76 rape and sexual abuse counseling organizations were funded by the Department of Social Welfare, up from 48 the year before.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

New Zealand workers have unrestricted rights to establish and join organizations of their own choosing and to affiliate those organizations with other unions and international organizations. Their unions are protected from interference, suspension, and dissolution by the Government and, in fact, have considerable influence on legislation and government policy. Unions have the right to strike. Public sector unions, however, are precluded from striking if work stoppages pose a threat to public safety. Unions freely maintain relations with international bodies and participate in bilateral exchanges.

For the past 2 years, the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) of the International Labor Organization has examined a complaint from the New Zealand Employers' Federation that the 1987 Labor Relations Act restricts freedom of association by requiring that unions must have 1,000 members to be officially registered. Noting that although unregistered unions are legal, official unions have broader rights, the CFA has requested the Government to reexamine the system established under the 1987 Act.

The right of labor unions to organize and bargain collectively is provided by law. Unions actively recruit members and engage in collective bargaining. Sixty-four percent of wage earners are represented by unions. New Zealand unions operate under a closed shop system where union membership is compulsory if the majority of workers in a workplace vote in favor of union coverage.

Mediation and arbitration procedures are independent of government control. A system of labor courts hears cases arising from disputes over interpretation of labor laws. In addition, the Arbitration Commission and the Mediation Service are available to handle wage disputes and assist in maintaining effective labor relations. Labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

All New Zealand workers are protected from forced or compulsory labor by law and in practice.

NEW ZEALAND

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children under the age of 16 may not be employed without special government approval and must not work between the hours of 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. These laws are effectively enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

New Zealand enforces a 40-hour workweek, a minimum of 3 weeks' annual paid vacation for all employees, and observance of 11 paid public holidays. The hourly minimum wage of $3.50 is adequate to provide a decent standard of living. In most cases, minimum wage recipients also receive a variety of welfare payments. Most workers earn more than the minimum wage.

New Zealand has an extensive body of law and regulations governing health and safety issues. Rules are enforced by Department of Labor inspectors who have the power to shut down equipment if necessary, and unions may file safety complaints on behalf of workers.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Papua New Guinea is the largest of the South Pacific island nations with some 1,000 different tribes and 869 languages. It covers half of the second largest island in the world and many outlying islands, constituting the largest part of Melanesia. It has a federal, parliamentary form of government based on the consent of a majority of the votes of all adult citizens. The Constitution resembles those in other English-speaking parliamentary democracies, with the traditional culture emphasizing respect for landholding and individual rights. A civilian government controls the military, police, and intelligence organizations. The four transfers of power since independence in 1975 have been peaceful and in keeping with the Constitution.

The economic structure comprises a modern free-enterprise system combining private, largely foreign, investment, government-owned enterprises, and a traditional subsistence farming economy that supports 80 percent of the population. The private sector generates most of the wealth and contributes 80 percent of state revenue. Most of the remainder is aid from Australia. The country has rich mineral, timber, hydroelectric, and petroleum resources now under development.

There were reports of human rights violations in Papua New Guinea in 1989 as the society came under severe new strains. The Government had to deal with an insurgency and a growing problem of law and order, while intertribal conflict continued as a serious problem in the highlands. The Government also showed growing concern over mistreatment of women. In general, however, the country's network of democratic, social, and political institutions sustained a continued respect for human rights. These institutions included a responsive parliament, an independent judiciary, and a free press. The country continued to host, with the cooperation of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), some 10,000 Melanesians who have illegally crossed the border from Irian Jaya, Indonesia.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Government did not resort to political killings. In North Solomons Province, however, a small group of armed insurgents reportedly killed at least 10 noncombatants, and counter operations by security forces also claimed several civilian lives. (See Section 1.g.)

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other cruel or degrading treatment or punishment are forbidden by the Constitution. An unusually high crime rate has created what is proportionally one of the world's highest convict populations. Treatment of prisoners is monitored by the press and clergy, both highly sensitive to allegations of police misconduct. Allegations of misconduct are actively investigated by an Ombudsman Commission, and its recommendations are enforced by the courts. Such actions resulted in awards of civil damages and punishment of offending police officials. Police in the highlands reportedly have beaten villagers, a traditional law-and-order practice, in their efforts to quell tribal fighting and other violence there. There have been periodic reports from Bougainville in recent months that captured militants were tortured.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No cases of politically motivated arrests occurred. The courts strongly enforce constitutional protections against arbitrary arrest and detention. Exile is not practiced, and warrants are required for arrests. Suspects have free access to legal counsel. Both in law and practice, accused persons are informed of charges and their arrest is subject to judicial review. They have the right of bail except in cases where judges rule that risk of flight or further violence requires continued confinement.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There were no cases of denial of fair public trial. The court system is similar to those in other countries with English common law traditions. The law guarantees a public trial, with observance of due process rights guaranteed in the Constitution. Defendants have the right to an attorney, and counsel is provided to poor defendants at government expense in felony cases involving violence. The defendant and his or her attorney can confront witnesses, present evidence, and appeal convictions. In a police and judicial system short of resources and confronted with a high crime rate, periods between arrest and trial can be long. Such detention is subject to judicial review, however, and a prisoner may not be held without trial for more than 6 months. The courts are independent of executive, political, or military authorities, and there are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Authorities generally respected the sanctity of the home and family and the privacy of correspondence. There were reports, however, that security forces burned village homes in efforts to quell tribal disturbances in the highlands and in operations under the state of emergency on Bougainville.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Attacks on the Bougainville copper mine in the North Solomons Province by militant landowners forced closure of the mine on May 15. That led to a declaration of a state of emergency in the province. The destruction of mine facilities and the killing and wounding of at least 10 mine personnel by the armed insurgents thwarted government efforts to reestablish security or to conclude a new compensation package that would permit the mine to reopen. The insurgents were also suspected in the assassination of a local government minister who was assisting in negotiating a compensation settlement with the local landowners. The posture of security forces on the island was generally defensive, aimed at protecting the mine and its workers. The Government adopted a conciliatory attitude, and there was no effort to deny the population essential supplies. The security forces had several lapses of discipline, however, which included burning of village houses and mistreatment of persons. The provincial Premier, suspected of carrying information to the leader of the insurgency, was beaten. An aide who tried to defend him lost an eye as a result of his injuries. Persons in areas directly affected by the conflict were resettled in government-funded camps.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. The Government imposed a ban on travel to the troubled North Solomons Province by diplomats and foreign journalists but lifted it after several weeks. State-owned radio and television give significant coverage to statements of opposition politicians and investigate public issues. Pornography is prohibited. Films are censored for suitability and classified according to sexual explicitness and degree of violence. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Demonstrations require legal permits, but these are almost always granted. The rare denial or limit of a demonstration that does occur comes in the general context of high local tensions and not because of the particular cause itself. An unsanctioned demonstration took place in February when soldiers demonstrated at Parliament over postponement of a pay raise.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is assured by law. There are no restrictions on the practice of religion and no religious discrimination. A wide variety of indigenous and Christian denominations flourish. There are also small Buddhist and Muslim minorities. Missionaries are allowed to work freely in the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within and outside the country is not restricted by law. Foreign citizens who reside in Papua New Guinea may become naturalized citizens by satisfying a residency requirement and obtaining sponsorship of a village. Acquired citizenship is revocable only for fraud.

The Government continued to observe a humanitarian policy toward the approximately 10,000 persons from Irian Jaya living in camps along the border and toward the related Irian Jaya separatist movement, Organisasi Papua Merdeka (Free Papua Movement or OPM). The Government also continued to cooperate with the UNHCR to determine which persons qualify as refugees.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

At the same time it worked with Indonesian authorities to encourage voluntary repatriation of those--probably the majority--who do not fear persecution should they return. The Government has repeatedly reaffirmed its policy to consider the effects of repatriation on a case by case basis (with the help of the UNHCR) and not to repatriate by force anyone judged to be a refugee. It also continued to resettle the border crossers from several camps to one large settlement farther from the border, and to express concern over OPM activities. The Government has repeatedly emphasized that it will not permit Papua New Guinea territory to be used as a base for OPM guerrilla operations against Indonesia. In September the Government expelled a Swiss citizen, a supporter of the OPM who had illegally flown into Irian Jaya from Australia and then crossed the border into Papua New Guinea. The Government remains sensitive to arguments that Papua New Guinea has a moral obligation to provide permanent asylum to refugees from Irian Jaya or to help them find asylum in a third country.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens freely exercise their right to change their government through direct elections with a secret ballot and adult suffrage. The voters elect a unicameral parliament made up of 109 members from all 19 provinces and the Port Moresby national capital district. Any citizen can stand for election, and several foreign-born members sit in Parliament. With a multiplicity of parties, the coalition that can command a majority forms the government. However, the weak development of parties and the shifting coalitions they produce has led to instability such that no government yet has survived enough no-confidence votes to fulfill its 5-year mandate.

It is believed that the Government would cooperate with any proposed international or nongovernmental investigations of alleged violations. However, as there have been no requests for investigations by international or nongovernmental agencies of human rights violations in Papua New Guinea the question has not arisen. The press and concerned politicians quickly publicize, and the Ombudsman Commission and the courts investigate and take remedial action in, cases of alleged government abuses.

With its extreme ethnic diversity, Papua New Guinea is not dominated by any ethnic group or geographic area. The democratically elected Government, relying precariously on loose coalitions, cannot afford to display ethnic favoritism. The democratic system has extensive provisions for women's rights. The achievements of women in the modern sector are considerable, given the inherent tribal discrimination. They serve as doctors, lawyers, business executives, and in government.

Accurate statistics on women in the paid labor force are not available, but the Department of Labor estimates this at 10 percent. Family law and marriage and property rights of women are guaranteed in a legal system based on English common law, although the majority of women still live according to the older traditions.

Violence against women is widespread. Some tribal cultures emphasize antagonism between the sexes. While women are protected by their family and clan, attacks on women remain common in intertribal warfare. In addition, "pack rapes" against women occur frequently and are often reported by the press. Both public organizations and the Government are working to bridge time and gender gaps and to upgrade the status of women. Several women's rights groups, most notably the National Women's Association, actively promote the evolution of the role of women and run campaigns against crimes such as rape and wife beating. In March the Government launched a new campaign against domestic violence with the release of a video film produced by the Law Reform Commission and the Women and Law Committee. This is reportedly the first video program on this subject produced by a developing nation, and copies were requested by the United Nations, the Pacific Commission, and the Commonwealth Secretariat. In introducing the film, the Minister of Justice noted that a happy and stable family life is founded on mutual love and respect, not on force or fear, and called on parents to show their children a good example of how to settle arguments without fighting and hurting each other. The film's first showing on television was introduced by the Prime Minister and his wife, and the Governor General and his wife participated in a panel discussion of it.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Labor unions are protected by law and are active and important in the country's economic and political life. Over 50 trade unions exist, among which the most significant are the Public Employees Association and the two mineworkers' unions. Both public and private sector unions have the right to strike. Although civil servants have never struck, private sector unions do on occasion. In September they pressured the Government to approve recommended increases in the minimum wage. The Papua New Guinea Trade Union Congress is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Constitution ensures workers the right to engage in collective bargaining, to join industrial organizations, and to seek employment. These rights are freely exercised, although for the past several years the Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has criticized the Government's power to reject, at its discretion, arbitration awards or agreements concerning wages. The Committee, again in 1989, strongly urged the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with ILO Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining, which Papua New Guinea has ratified. There are no export processing zones in Papua New Guinea.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution forbids slavery and all forms of forced or compulsory labor, and no reports of their practice have been received except when the latter is imposed as a condition or sentence after due process of law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum working age is 15. However, children between the ages of 11 and 16 may be employed in family-related work provided they have parental permission, a medical clearance, and a work permit from a labor office. Such employment is rare except in subsistence agriculture.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Working hour limitations, rest periods, holidays, leave, wages, and compensation are regulated by the Employment Act of 1978. Minimum wages are established by the Minimum Wages Board. These vary by industry and types of work, and whether or not work is performed in an urban or rural area. They provide a barely adequate living within the local context.

Standard hours of work are regulated as well and, although variable for some occupations, may not exceed 42 hours per week in an urban area or 44 hours in a rural environment. The provision of housing or a housing allowance is a precondition for most employment.

The Department of Labor is responsible for the enforcement of laws and regulations concerning safety, health, and working conditions. Enforcement of health and safety codes is an important focus of organized labor activity. While the Industrial and Welfare Act states that there should be regular inspections conducted in all workplaces, the Department of Manpower does not have the personnel to fulfill the Act's requirements. There are only two inspectors covering the whole country. Inspections are carried out only when a specific request is made by an industry.

THE PHILIPPINES

The Philippines has a republican form of government with a democratically elected President and a bicameral legislature. President Corazon C. Aquino was sworn into office in 1986 after a popular and nearly bloodless uprising ended the 20-year rule of Ferdinand Marcos. A new Constitution was ratified in 1987, followed by Congressional elections the same year, local and provincial elections in 1988, and village elections in 1989.

The Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP), which now number some 166,000 personnel, continued to be engaged against a Communist insurgency active in many of the country's 73 provinces. The army, with 68,000 and the Philippine Constabulary (PC) with 42,000, are the largest elements of the AFP. The Integrated National Police numbers 40,000. The AFP has established local militia units called Citizens Armed Forces Geographical Units (CAFGU's), with 52,000 men. In early December, elements of the armed forces identified with the "Reform the Armed Forces Movement" (RAM) joined with Marcos loyalists to launch a week-long coup attempt which resulted in over 100 deaths, mostly civilians caught in the crossfire. The Aquino Government was able to quell this threat from the right, and trials of senior officers involved are scheduled for early 1990.

During the year, the Communist Party of the Philippines (CPP) and its armed wing, the New People's Army (NPA), escalated campaigns of urban terrorism, political assassination, kidnaping, and extortion, resulting in widespread human rights abuses. In Mindanao the Muslim secessionist movement stepped up its violent activities after a lull of several years. Elements of the Army and the PC have also been involved in human rights violations.

The Aquino Government has made relief of the endemic poverty of the Philippines one of its highest priorities. In 1986 government statistics showed that 59 percent of Filipinos lived below the poverty level. Facilitated by an upturn in the economy--estimated at 5.5 percent real growth for 1989--the number of people living below the poverty level has declined to 46 percent, according to government statistics. The Philippines has a population growth rate estimated at 2.4 percent, the highest in the region.

The dominant factors in the human rights situation in the Philippines are the continuing CPP/NPA insurgency with its campaign of terrorism (including assassination and kidnaping), and the reaction to it by elements of the security forces and CAFGUs that the Government has rarely been able to control or effectively try and punish. New evidence indicates, however, that some disappearances attributed to the security forces were in fact murders carried out by Communist guerrillas.

The Aquino Government continued to express firm opposition to human rights abuses and devoted increased attention to human rights training programs, better discipline, and improved civil-military relations. While the incidence of extrajudicial killings and other acts of violence, as measured by local human rights groups, appeared to decline in absolute numbers from 1988, violence remained at a high level.

The principal human rights concerns in 1989 included extrajudicial killings, great difficulties in trying and punishing those responsible for human rights abuses, and displacement of civilians caused by military operations against rebel groups. Other areas of human rights abridgments included brutal treatment of prisoners and arbitrary detentions. The Aquino Government has restored freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, the right of citizens to change their government by democratic means and workers' rights--all of which were either denied or sharply abridged under the Marcos regime.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The number of political killings reported in the Philippines declined notably in 1989, according to information from governmental and nongovernmental sources, although extrajudicial killings still occur frequently throughout the country. In addition, it is estimated that more than a thousand people lost their lives in 1989 due to the insurgency and counterinsurgency, although no definitive figures are available. In many of the cases of extrajudicial killing, the identity and motivation of the perpetrators are subject to dispute. In some incidents, there is evidence linking AFP personnel or police to the killing, either during counterinsurgency operations or in unauthorized or individual criminal activities. The Government's pronouncements against such abuses are clear, but convictions of persons accused of unauthorized actions are rare. In other cases, the killings are attributed to Communist insurgents engaged in a continuing campaign of political assassinations of government officials, including provincial leaders, military officers, and police. The NPA has also acknowledged responsibility for several "massacres" of civilians. The discovery of mass graves gave substance to reports of an internal purge of suspected "deep penetration agents" in the CPP organization. In other instances, the evidence suggests that private vendettas and criminal activities resulting in murder are sometimes incorrectly attributed to political assassins of the left or right.

The official fact-gathering human rights institution in the Philippines is the constitutionally mandated Commission on Human Rights (CHR). Charged with investigating all alleged violations of human rights within the country, CHR has been criticized by some for being an apologist for the Aquino administration. Partially in answer to those charges and to produce more complete figures, CHR revamped its statistical compilation procedures in 1989 and revised its statistics for 1988. Several private groups, of which Task Force Detainees (TFD) is the best known, also record complaints of human rights abuses. TFD reports only on abuses allegedly committed by government forces and not by those of the NPA. Its acceptance of sometimes poorly substantiated reports and its close association with the CPP have led to charges that it overstates the case against the Government. As a result, quantifications of human rights abuses in the Philippines, including political killings, are difficult to verify and are subject to ideological manipulation.

Nevertheless, trends in the statistics from both CHR and TFD clearly indicate that the number of political killings decreased substantially during 1989. In the first 6 months of 1989, the CHR central office received complaints regarding 292 victims of political killings (including multiple, individual, and attempted killings), compared to 856 in 1988. TFD reported 141 summary executions by government forces and an additional 132 persons killed in massacres (politically motivated killing of groups) from January 1 to November 14, compared to 445 victims in 1988.

During 1989 the extent and seriousness of the NPA's violations of human rights received greater attention and publicity in the Philippine media. Earlier reports of an internal purge in which several hundred people were detained, tortured, and killed were given credence by the discovery of mass graves in Quezon, Albay, Laguna, Bataan, and Zamboanga del Sur provinces, tagged by the press as the "killing fields." A former NPA member testified that about 150 CPP/NPA members were killed between April and December 1988 in southern Luzon. Documents seized from the NPA describe arbitrary detention, torture, trial in kangaroo courts, and execution. Although most of the bodies remain unidentified, preliminary evidence indicates that the graves contain some persons whose disappearances had earlier been attributed by TFD and others to government forces or rightwing vigilante groups. In one instance, of the 27 bodies identified 11 were civilians.

In June the NPA admitted attacking a United Church of Christ Philippines (UCCP) mission in Davao Del Sur, Mindanao, killing 40 civilian churchgoers. Two of the victims were beheaded. In another case, an NPA unit reportedly killed seven members of a family and wounded five others in Zamboanga Del Norte. The NPA has also reportedly killed a number of people who refused to pay "revolutionary taxes." For example, the widow of a sugarcane planter in Negros Occidental said the NPA abducted her husband after he refused to pay a monthly tax of about $140. His body, showing signs of torture, was found in a field 2 days later.

The NPA also targeted government personnel for assassination, particularly security officials and police, by its "sparrow" hit teams. NPA units are believed responsible for the assassination of at least 80 constabulary and police officers in metropolitan Manila alone in 1989. Among those killed by NPA units were four members of the Philippine Presidential Security Group and three Americans: U.S. Army Colonel James Rowe of the Joint United States Military Assistance Group (JUSMAG) in April, and two civilian employees of a defense electronics contractor in September. The NPA said it killed Rowe because of his alleged involvement in counterinsurgency operations. Although no one has yet claimed responsibility for the September killings, which coincided with the visit of Vice President Quayle, the NPA subsequently promised additional strikes against Americans.

Muslim opposition groups stepped up their violent activities in an attempt to disrupt the November plebiscite on the Muslim Autonomous Act. They are believed responsible for a cargo truck ambush that killed six people, a grenade attack on a house that left seven dead, two casualties from shooting a passenger bus, an ambush of National Power Corporation vehicles that killed two Austrian consultants, and a bomb at the Commission on Elections headquarters that killed one person.

There continued to be credible reports of killings by the military and CAFGU's in the field as well as a few by private vigilante groups. The Government has acknowledged that in some cases the rules of engagement have not provided sufficient protection for innocent civilians. For example, an exchange of fire between Philippine Marines and NPA insurgents in Bulacan province in April resulted in the deaths of one Marine and nine others, all but one presumed to be noncombatants. Presidential and military investigating committees found no evidence of an intentional massacre, but recommended that the military examine its operational rules to ensure the safety of civilians. NPA ambushes or military-NPA encounters often occur in populated areas, and civilians are periodically caught in the crossfire. The NPA has been known to mingle with civilians when engaging the AFP. There is credible evidence that military units in the field torture and abuse suspected NPA sympathizers during interrogation, sometimes leading to the death or execution and secret burial of the victim.

The Government has repeatedly affirmed its commitment to the rule of law and issued instructions that the human rights of all Filipinos be respected. However, many cases have been reported in which soldiers or policemen have carried out murders, kidnappings, or other serious offenses, sometimes due to personal vendettas or criminal activity. In other cases, a commander of a small unit may lead his men in committing abuses. There is little evidence in such cases that more senior military officials act to halt the abuses. Few of the alleged offenders are disciplined or dismissed, and even fewer have faced judicial proceedings. According to the Department of National Defense (DND), only 27 complaints were filed in the first half of 1989 against individual members of the military/police/CAFGU for alleged human rights violations. Of these, 3 were referred to civil courts, 6 were dropped, 13 were still under investigation, and 2 resulted in dismissal.

The CAFGU's were established in 1987 to increase the Government's control over the local militia. Local officials are responsible for screening volunteers, and the AFP trains and leads the units through an officer (usually a lieutenant) and several enlisted men. A total of 909 CAFGU companies have been organized with 52,000 authorized personnel. A number of human rights violations by the CAFGU's have been reported, and private funding of some units by landowners or businessmen has raised concern about the Government's ability to control the units. Most notorious was an August grenade-throwing incident in which nine people were killed.

In other extrajudicial killings in 1989, it was often difficult to determine whether the motive was political, personal, or criminal. The July stabbing of Wenefredo Oton in Davao Del Sur may have been committed by an anti-Communist group which suspected him of Communist sympathies, or by the NPA because of his role in leading a fact-finding group to the scene of the June UCCP massacre by the NPA.

A number of persons were killed during the March barangay elections, including an incumbent barangay captain and six candidates. (The barangay is the Philippines' smallest administrative unit, equivalent to a village or city neighborhood. See Section 3 for more information on the barangay elections.) The timing hints at some political motivation and the murders remain unsolved. At least 17 labor leaders were killed in the first 8 months of 1989. Jose Eduardo Oca of the Port Workers Union and Meliton Roxas, president of the local union at the Nestle Philippines plant, were prominent among those killed. Credible reports indicate that management, rival unionists, the NPA, or rightwing vigilantes were involved in various unsolved cases. The Government apprehended and tried suspected killers of labor unionists in several cases in 1989. By year's end, none of these trials had been completed.

Church people were among the victims of killings. UCCP Pastor Visminda Gran, a former candidate of the leftist Partido Ng Bayan political party, and her husband Lovino Gran were killed in their home in Biliango, Misamis Occidental, in May by unidentified gunmen who stole numerous valuable articles; CHR is investigating. In another case, Catholic priest Dionisio Malalay and lay person Rufino Rivera were shot in April in Tabina, Zamboanga del Sur, allegedly by a former PC member and his cousin; the case is being tried in a civilian court in Zamboanga del Sur.

During 1989 only one prominent case of politically motivated killing resulted in conviction. Alan Climaco, who shot human rights attorney Alfonso A. Surigao in Cebu in June 1988, was convicted of murder in March, sentenced to life imprisonment, and is currently serving the sentence. The Justice Secretary in October ordered that murder charges be filed against Major Rico Palcuto, a constabulary officer identified by Climaco as the mastermind of the killing.

In a prominent case that underlines the great difficulties of the Government in convicting offenders, a military court in July claimed insufficient evidence in acquitting the nearly two dozen soldiers accused of murder in a widely publicized 1987 incident in Lupao, Nueva Ecija, in which Philippine Army soldiers shot 17 civilians following a reported NPA ambush. Survivors identified four of the accused, but the military court gave greater weight to the testimony of two defendants who claimed that soldiers from a reinforcement unit (not among the defendants) killed the civilians. In 1987 the Government had said this case would be the first test of Philippine justice under the new administration. Two military prosecutors reportedly protested the court's decision to the AFP Chief of Staff. Military investigation of the incident continues.

Philippine law permits holding suspects in serious cases for up to 36 hours without formal charges. In some cases, citizens have been taken into custody by government authorities and held incommunicado for several days before being released or charged.

Although some Philippine human rights groups continue to claim that disappearances are increasing, both CHR and TFD statistics show that fewer disappearances were reported in 1989 than in 1988. Between January and June 1989, the CHR central office received complaints concerning 41 missing persons, compared to 80 complaints in 1988. According to TFD, 60 persons were reported missing from January 1 to November 14, 1989, compared with 141 complaints in 1988. TFD believes that military officers or anti-Communist groups were responsible for these incidents, and that the missing persons may have been killed.

There is credible evidence that rightwing groups, possibly with collusion by some military personnel, have been involved in a number of disappearances. For example, two social workers, Nona Santa Clara and Angelina Llenaresas of the Ecumenical Council for Research and Development, were abducted in April in Naga City, Camarines Sur, and taken away in a military-type jeep. The whereabouts of the women are unknown.

The discovery of mass NPA graves in Laguna, Albay, Quezon, Bataan, and Zamboanga del Sur, combined with reported internal NPA purges, challenged the assumption that all disappearances of leftist political personalities were the work of rightwing vigilantes or rogue military or police personnel. For example, the disappearances of Lilian Mercado and Efren Bonagua of the Bagong Alyansang Makabayan (Bayan) and Pearl Abaya of the Philippine Alliance of Human Rights Advocates (PAHRA) in November 1988 were originally blamed on the military. Indications now are that the three were taken into custody by the NPA for interrogation on suspicion of being government spies. Abaya and Bonagua are reportedly alive but in hiding, while Mercado's status is unknown.

The Government has strongly condemned politically motivated disappearances. President Aquino in December 1988 designated city and provincial government prosecutors as "human rights coordinators" who are to assist families in searching for missing relatives in military camps and detention centers.

Hostage-taking by rebels and armed criminal gangs for ransom and/or publicity is fairly common. According to newspaper accounts, a barangay captain and a constabulary soldier in Oriental Mindoro were abducted in January and held 59 days by the NPA before being "acquitted" by a kangaroo court. A ransom of $46,000 was asked for 10 nuns and church workers abducted in February in Lanao del Sur, but negotiations led to their release without ransom. A constabulary soldier was detained by rebels in Camarines Sur for 40 days before his release was negotiated in April. Also in April, the NPA captured a group of hikers in Mindanao and released most of them immediately, but held four of the group captive for 9 days. An Iloilo radio station owner kidnaped in September was freed more than 2 months later after his family reportedly paid a ransom of $552,000. In October in Lanao del Sur, Muslim rebels held hostage the President of Dansalan University, his wife and grandchild, and 12 national power corporation executives. In October government forces seized a 1987 document allegedly written by CPP/NPA leader Jose Maria Sison, in which he suggested that each of the 59 guerrilla fronts abduct and indefinitely detain 10 political leaders and military officers, to compel recognition of the movement.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and makes evidence obtained thereby inadmissible in court, but reports that torture is employed persist. Guidelines issued by CHR in May 1988 direct all law enforcement agencies and military elements to avoid unnecessary force in investigation, arrest, detention, interrogation, and other related activities.

The CHR central office received complaints of torture or maltreatment of 44 people from January to June 1989. TFD claimed to have documented 312 cases of torture from January 1 to November 14, 1989, compared to 784 cases in 1988. For TFD to accept a complaint, a complainant need only assert that government investigators used some coercion, such as the threat of violence.

Juanito Itaas, an NPA member, allegedly involved in the April killing of Colonel Rowe, claimed in September that the military extracted his confession through torture; government officials deny the charge. Michael Tupas claimed he was tortured while detained in Bacolod, Negros Occidental in June, but CHR's investigation is stymied by his inability to identify his captors. Cornelio Salway, a former NPA member who voluntarily surrendered in February to military forces in South Cotabato, claims he was maltreated while in protective custody; the military investigation found no basis for the claim. American citizen Glen Doughty said in October that he was beaten and had water poured into his nose after the PC arrested him in Oriental Mindoro. Authorities stated that they suspect Doughty is the NPA hitman who killed two policemen in Metro Manila in 1985. (Doughty's claim of U.S. citizenship was originally doubted by the PC since he has a Filipino mother and speaks English with a Filipino accent.)

There have also been reports of torture by the NPA, in many cases associated with the 1988-89 internal purge described earlier. Three NPA members testified in June before a congressional committee that they were dragged in chains, deprived of food, and beaten for months because their comrades suspected them of being government infiltrators. Other abuses, including suspension by the wrists and suffocation, have also been reported, although in these cases, too, conclusive proof is lacking.

Although physical punishment is prohibited by law in the Philippine penal system, it occurs frequently in jails and prisons. Prison conditions are harsh, charges of brutality are commonplace, and violence often flares. Inmates at the Davao Penal Colony took prison visitors hostage in April and August to demand transfer to a more humane facility. Sixteen prisoners and five hostages, including an Australian missionary, were killed by the inmates or by security forces that stormed the prison. The AFP, CHR, and committees of the Philippine Congress have been investigating the Davao Penal Colony killings and examining allegations that police used excessive force.

CHR in 1989 began a Visitorial Service Program to respond to complaints of torture or mistreatment of prisoners and to monitor prison conditions. CHR visited 305 jails nationwide in the first 10 months of 1989 and reported that some remedial actions had already been taken in response to its efforts.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The 1987 Constitution requires a judicial determination of probable cause before issuance of an arrest warrant and also prohibits holding prisoners incommunicado or in secret places of detention. Nonetheless, there continue to be abuses. Detainees have the right to a judicial review of the legality of detention and, except for offenses punishable by a life sentence, to bail.

CHR prescribed guidelines in 1988 on visitation rights of detainees and on the conduct of investigations, arrests, detentions, and related operations by government authorities. The guidelines direct all law enforcement agencies, commanders, and all units under their command to avoid unnecessary force and to follow the rules of court and National Police Commission policies on arrests and investigations. However, human rights groups continue to receive complaints of abuses. The CHR central office received complaints that 54 people were illegally arrested or detained in the first half of 1989. CHR actively investigated these reports and assisted in the release of 48 persons during the same period. TFD claims 1,739 persons were improperly arrested from January 1 to November 14, 1989. Many were detained for a few hours as the result of mass arrests during army sweeps of areas harboring suspected rebels, and most of these were released within the time limits prescribed by law. Statistics from both CHR and TFD on illegal arrest and detention in 1989 show a decline of approximately 30 percent from the comparable period in 1988.

In one incident, Catholic Priest Benjamin Alforque was detained for several hours on the evening of April 25 as part of the investigation of Col. Rowe's murder. The military reportedly questioned Alforque about his visit to a CPP safehouse, but Alforque claims that he was detained because of an article he wrote criticizing the military.

The military has been criticized for not fully complying with the law when handling suspected insurgents. Suspected Communist insurgents sometimes are held and interrogated for several days without legal proceedings. When CPP/NPA leaders Satur Ocampo and Carolina Malay were arrested in July, they were charged initially with firearms possession in furtherance of rebellion, a nonbailable offense, and were allowed visitation and lawyers. The Government does not recommend bail for senior CPP/NPA members on the grounds that release would be a clear and present danger to the community and that bail would not be adequate to ensure their appearance at trial.

In order better to abide by constitutional and legal prerequisites, the AFP has sought to file charges against known CPP/NPA leaders in advance so that they can be held legally if caught. These charges include murder, kidnapping, physical injury, robbery, extortion, grave threats, and arson. The AFP has offered monetary rewards for the capture of rebels against whom it has filed charges.

Philippine authorities rarely use internal or foreign exile for political purposes. However, former President Marcos (now deceased), his immediate family, and some of his associates were barred from return. The Government suspects these persons of conspiring with political and military opposition elements within the Philippines to destabilize the country. In a September 15 decision, the Supreme Court upheld the Marcoses' exile, citing the duty of the President to balance the general welfare against the exercise of individual rights.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution calls for an independent judiciary and provides that those accused of crimes shall be informed of charges against them and shall have the right to counsel. Trials in the Philippines are public; defendants are presumed innocent and have the right to confront witnesses against them, to present evidence, and to appeal their convictions. The right of defendants to a lawyer is generally respected in the larger metropolitan areas, but less frequently honored in the provinces, where lawyers are often unavailable.

THE PHILIPPINES

The weakest link in the prevention of human rights abuses is the failure to prosecute and convict those accused of violations. A major element of that failure is the strong imperative of the military to protect its own members. Under the authority of a Marcos-era presidential decree, military courts continue to have jurisdiction over servicemen accused of human rights violations. Some human rights groups charge that military courts protect servicemen rather than render an impartial verdict. President Aquino has waived military jurisdiction in only a few cases. A bill to remove nonservice-related offenses from court-martial jurisdiction was approved by Congress and sent to the President shortly before the December coup attempt. Following the attempted coup and on the advice of military leaders, the President vetoed the bill.

Ethical and legal lapses in the administration of justice are common, ranging from attorneys' use of dilatory tactics to corruption among some judges and prosecutors. Defendants routinely pay off police and court officials. The conviction rate for criminal offenses is very low. For example, only 3 to 5 percent of drug cases in civilian courts result in convictions, a fact attributed by informed sources to bribery of police and judicial officials and to the use of political influence.

Prosecution is often stymied by witnesses who are unwilling to testify because they fear reprisals. To address the problem, CHR has a limited witness protection program in place, and Congress is considering legislation to establish a more comprehensive program.

Delays in completing trials present another serious problem. Traditionally, trials have been noncontinuous, generally scheduled at monthly intervals, and often last for years. Those charged with crimes who cannot afford bail languish in jail until their trials are completed. Of 14,245 inmates held nationwide in June, 12,552 had not yet been convicted or sentenced, according to press reports of prison statistics. A prominent example of delay of justice is the Benigno Aquino murder trial, which began in February 1987 and will likely continue into 1991. Now nearly 3 years into the trial, the defense has yet to begin its case.

President Aquino has made reform of the justice system a key goal of her administration. In recent speeches, she has frequently criticized the slow delivery of justice and the unequal treatment of rich and poor. In August she took the extraordinary step of placing top officials in the Department of Justice on probation for failing to address the problems in the criminal justice system. A test program for completing trials within 90 days was extended to 1,200 of the nation's 1,600 courts. Prosecutors are now required to complete pretrial investigations of crimes within 120 days. Prosecutors who do not meet these time standards have had their pay withheld. In the first half of 1989, prosecutors reportedly received 25,000 new complaints while disposing of 38,000 cases. Despite this positive trend, a backlog of tens of thousands of cases exists. The Government has disciplined several inept or corrupt prosecutors. Judicial vacancies are now being filled more promptly, with the exception of lower level trial courts in the outlying regions which fail to attract qualified candidates.

THE PHILIPPINES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the Constitution, search warrants may be issued by a judge on a finding of probable cause. Restrictions on search and seizure are generally observed. The Government does not interfere in family life or the right of parents to raise their children. The Government does not interfere with free personal use of the mails or other public communication systems, except upon issuance of a court order during the course of an investigation.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

AFP efforts during 1989 to counter Communist insurgent activities (ambushes, extortion, etc.) had a major impact on civilian populations. In an effort to "dismantle" NPA political bases at the barangay level, the AFP has displaced large numbers of civilians in several provinces of Mindanao and on the Visayan island of Negros. The Government made efforts to provide food and medical supplies, but sanitation conditions were often poor and the dislocations compounded the already severe health problems among the poverty-stricken civilians. The Government's Department of Social Welfare and Development (DSWD) reported 188,000 affected persons from January 1 to December 27 and an additional 30,000 affected by the December coup attempt. DSWD provided relief services to 187,000 people during the year. The Ecumenical Movement for Justice and Peace (EMJP) reported that 130,000 people were displaced from January to September 1989. Information from DSWD and EMJP shows that more than half of the people displaced were in Mindanao.

In Southern Negros, an estimated 35,000 civilians were evacuated from their homes in the spring and moved to temporary refugee shelters. The Philippine National Red Cross (PNRC) ran the shelters, and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was allowed free access. More than 90 children, already weakened by malnutrition and the process of evacuation, reportedly died of measles, pneumonia, and other causes while at the refugee shelters.

In Aklan on the island of Panay, TFD and EMJP sponsored a factfinding mission in August. They reported that 215 families left 9 villages due to military or NPA orders or fear for personal safety. The report also stated that curfews were in effect, that the military restricted food shipments based on the number of family members to deny food to the NPA, and that local citizens were required to carry residence certificates signed by the military commander.

There were occasional reports of indiscriminate strafing of civilians in villages suspected of supporting the rebels. In one incident in Quezon early in the year, 142 families reportedly left their homes after they were strafed. Allegedly, the AFP suspected they were supplying food to the rebels. The AFP lacked adequate medical resources to treat its own casualties, and wounded rebels were generally treated after wounded soldiers. There was no evidence, however, that they were systematically denied medical care when supplies were available. The Philippines is a party to Protocol II of the Geneva Convention, which governs the conduct of forces in an internal conflict.

THE PHILIPPINES

The provision of medical care in rebel-controlled areas was a contentious issue in 1989. The Medical Action Group (MAG), a private organization which seeks to provide health care to victims of human rights violations and the urban and rural poor and which is alleged to be closely associated with the CPP, protested Executive Order (E.O.) 212 which required that treatment of rebels be reported to the Government's Department of Health. MAG reported that in September Dr. Antonio Principe was arrested in Davao City for violating E.O. 212, and 11 health workers, including two Dutch nurses, were briefly detained in Samar. The military suspected the health workers of treating NPA rebels.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Restrictions on freedom of expression were virtually all lifted in February 1986. The daily press which emerged is lively and highly competitive. There are some 30 daily newspapers in Manila and many more in the provinces. In all, about 1.4 million newspapers are sold each day around the country. Newspapers cover the political spectrum and do not hesitate to criticize the Government. CPP publications are illegal but circulate clandestinely, and Communist views are expressed in other media. Journalists have been able without penalty to meet and interview antigovernment rebels, including military mutineers and Communists. During the early December coup attempt, the Government closed three radio stations for broadcasting rebel propaganda.

Radio and television are important news sources in the Philippines. There are 338 licensed radio stations. An estimated 82 percent of all households have radios. Four million television sets bring programming to 40 percent of Philippine families. In Metropolitan Manila, approximately 90 percent of the households have radios or televisions. Most provincial television stations are affiliates of the five Manila channels. Like the press, radio and television stations report views across a wide political spectrum.

Radio station owners and managers have complained about NPA efforts to intimidate them into broadcasting Communist propaganda. Several radio facilities and transmitters have been damaged by insurgents. In some areas, military personnel are stationed at transmitter sites to protect them. Stations that have broadcast material provided by the NPA have been warned informally by local military authorities that they face the risk of being closed down if they continue. Nonetheless, during 1989 no newspapers, radios, or television stations were closed by the Government for publishing or broadcasting Communist propaganda. Although the Government sequestered assets of some media organizations owned or controlled by close associates of the late President Marcos, there is no evidence in those cases of intent to control opinion, as opposed to monetary assets.

Publications from abroad are not censored. Foreign journalists are able to report freely and generally move about the country, even in areas under rebel control. Major foreign newspapers and television networks have bureaus in Manila. Human rights groups have registered a few complaints about harassment of journalists. For example, in an incident at a funeral in March for an alleged Communist rebel, the military roughly handled and briefly detained 10 newsmen. In May a journalist in Masbate claimed that the provincial commander forced him to eat a page of his newspaper after he had written a critical article. Such harassment is not frequent or systematic.

Libel suits may discourage some journalists from commenting on sensitive topics, but the judiciary generally favors the press in such cases. When the Far Eastern Economic Review (FEER) was sued in February for describing a businessman's activities as environmentally destructive, the judge made an unusual decision impounding copies of the review but reversed himself within a few days. The lawsuit was decided in FEER's favor.

Critics have charged that the Movie and Television Classification Board (MTCB), whose mandate is to monitor films and television programs for pornographic content, has occasionally stifled political expression. However, no complaints were registered in 1989. The mandate of the MTCB is questioned by many as a violation of free speech and freedom of artistic expression, but it is likely to remain unchanged because of strong public support for its role in controlling distribution of pornography.

Academic freedom is respected in theory and practice. Approximately 1.5 million students are enrolled in the nation's 78 state colleges and universities and 1,000 private schools and colleges. The Government does not censor subject matter in classes, university publications, or conferences.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Permits from local authorities are required for outdoor demonstrations in public places and are routinely issued. Nevertheless, rallies and marches are often held without permits. Manila area police were reportedly ordered in July not to disperse peaceful rallies as long as they do not disturb public order. Occasionally, however, police dispersed crowds which had assembled without having first secured permits and arrested demonstrators for illegal assembly or public disturbance. Typically, those arrested were quickly released and not brought to trial. Exceptions to the record of generally peaceful demonstrations have been recent protests in front of the U.S. Embassy by student and labor organizations with ties to the CPP. In September police used tear gas to disperse over a thousand demonstrators and briefly detained a number of people during the visit of Vice President Quayle.

A broad range of private, professional, religious, social, charitable, and political organizations flourishes in the Philippines. Organizations are permitted to affiliate with recognized international bodies in their fields. The Communist Party of the Philippines is outlawed because it advocates the violent overthrow of the Government, but nonviolent Marxist parties are legal.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion. Freedom of religion is fully respected, and no official discrimination is practiced against any religious group or its members. Although over 80 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, the country's sizable Muslim minority, Protestant churches, indigenous Iglesia Ni

Kristo, Aglipay Church, and other sects enjoy full religious freedom. Foreign clergymen and missionaries of many faiths practice their profession freely.

Religious minorities are represented among the leadership and rank and file of broad-based political parties. Government service is open to all on a nondiscriminatory basis, and there are senior civil and military officials who belong to minority religious groups.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Filipinos enjoy unhampered freedom to change their place of residence and employment within the Philippines. They regularly travel and work abroad. Movement within the country is generally unimpeded, although the military and rebel groups sometimes erect roadblocks in areas where they are conducting operations. Routine constabulary checkpoints were discontinued during the year.

The right to emigrate from the Philippines is unrestricted. Citizens also have the right to return, although there have been a few exceptions in cases which the Government said affected national security. In 1988 the Government revoked the passport of Jose Maria Sison, the founder of the outlawed CPP, while he was living in Europe raising funds for the Communist movement. As noted in Section 1.d., the Government prevented the return to the Philippines of the late President Marcos, his immediate family, and some of his associates.

Although the Philippine Government does not accept refugees for internal resettlement, it has made a significant contribution by providing first asylum for 9,200 Indochinese boat people in Palawan and permitting the United Nations to operate a major processing center for 16,000 refugees in Bataan Province. Approximately 25,000 refugees passed through these facilities in 1989.

The Constitution ratified in 1987 returned the Philippines to the presidential system of government similar to that which was in existence from 1946 to 1972. The Constitution establishes a bicameral legislature and an independent judiciary as checks on executive power. Presidential authority to declare martial law is curtailed. The Constitution calls for the creation of autonomous regions for Muslims in the southern Philippines and for minority groups in the Cordillera (mountainous region) of northern Luzon.

The Philippines has a multiparty political system, based on secret ballots and free elections. Filipinos are free to organize political parties as long as they do not seek to overthrow the Government by force. Political parties have traditionally been weak, nonideological alliances of convenience. President Aquino herself has refused to join a political party. Democratic opposition to the Government is widely tolerated. In the House of Representatives, a single progovernment party enjoys a 75-percent majority. The 23-member Senate is divided among 4 different parties and independents. Most legislation is initiated by members of Congress themselves, and debate is lively. Government-sponsored legislation is often criticized, amended, or defeated. The majority of provincial and city officials, elected in 1988, are members of progovernment political parties. Presidential, congressional, provincial, and municipal elections are scheduled for 1992.

The Aquino Government took the final step toward full restoration of elected officials at all levels in March when it held elections for leaders in all but a handful of the country's 41,000 barangays. An electorate of 29 million chose nearly 287,000 Barangay officials from among 1 million candidates. Relatively limited preelection violence and a few reported isolated clashes with NPA elements in scattered parts of the country occurred during the campaign. The new barangay officials will serve until 1994.

The voting age in the Philippines is 18. There are few restrictions on suffrage.

Representatives of international human rights groups are free to travel in the Philippines and investigate alleged abuses. Resident delegates of the ICRC monitor prison conditions and assist persons displaced by conflict. Government representatives discuss human rights problems with outside governmental and nongovernmental organizations, and President Aquino and CHR routinely meet with those who visit. CHR held meetings with seven international delegations in the first 10 months of 1989.

The Philippine Government welcomes international sponsorship of human rights programs. The U.N. Center for Human Rights, along with CHR and other Philippine groups, sponsored a 3-day national seminar-workshop on human rights training in August. The ICRC, together with CHR and Department of National Defense/AFP, held a course for military trainers (interrupted by the coup attempt but completed afterward) on human rights and international humanitarian law.

CHR considers human rights violations based on international inquiries and referrals from nongovernmental organizations as well as complaints filed locally by or on behalf of victims. CHR has a total staff of 600, including a "quick reaction" team in Manila, branch offices in each of the country's 12 regions, and provincial offices in areas where reports of human rights violations warrant. When a complaint is filed, CHR conducts an investigation, gathering evidence and testimony from the complainant and the accused. In the first 10 months of 1989, CHR completed investigation of 874 cases, and provided financial assistance to 174 individual victims or their families and to 30,000 evacuees from one community. If CHR determines that a prima facie case has been made, it refers the case to the appropriate agency for prosecution and monitors the results. CHR lawyers would gain prosecutory powers under legislation now being considered in Congress. CHR referred 70 cases for prosecution and 28 for administrative action in the first 10 months of 1989. CHR representatives regularly participate in fact-finding missions and jail visits with nongovernmental organizations (NGO's) and other governmental agencies.

Philippine NGO's are active in the human rights field. These groups are generally unhindered in conducting investigations around the country and are routinely able to obtain safe-conduct letters from DND. Local military and civilian officials have reportedly been uncooperative in some instances. According to the Government, investigations by these NGO's frequently do not produce enough evidence to make the necessary prima facie case.

The best known local human rights NGO is TFD, established by the Association of Major Religious Superiors in the Philippines in 1974. Headquartered in Manila with branch offices throughout the Philippines, TFD collects information on alleged human rights violations and publishes statistics on a quarterly basis of abuses it attributes to government forces. TFD is an outspoken critic of the Government's response to human rights violations, and some allege that it is strongly influenced by the CPP. There is little cooperation between TFD and CHR.

Women enjoy most of the same legal rights as men. However, Philippine law and custom continue to discriminate against women. This includes a limitation on their right to buy and sell property. The House of Representatives approved legislation in September allowing a woman to enter into contracts without her husband's consent; the bill is now under consideration in the Senate.

Women are prominent in Philippine society and well represented in Government, business and professions, such as law, medicine, education, and journalism. Women in the bottom 30 percent of society suffer particular hardship. Many of the women have no opportunities except work as low-paid domestic employees or prostitutes. Violence against women such as wife beating is occasionally reported. There are no reliable statistics on the extent to which this occurs, but women are often reluctant to report and police to "interfere" in what many see as a domestic matter. Criminal law prohibits violence against women. To address the problems of women, the Government is implementing its 1989-92 Philippine Development Plan for Women. As part of this plan, President Aquino signed legislation in May to strengthen measures prohibiting discrimination against women workers with respect to promotion, training, study, and remuneration for work of equal value.

Muslim Filipinos on the southern island of Mindanao and the adjacent Sulu archipelago constitute 5 percent of the Filipino population. They comprise several tribes such as the Tausugs, Maranao, and Maguindanao, each with its own language and customs. They hold public office at the local and national levels and are employed in government positions. Two of the 23 senators and several Congressmen are Muslims, and several Muslims serve as ambassadors. However, informal discrimination against Filipino Muslims persists. Philippine culture--with its emphasis on tribal and regional loyalties--creates informal barriers when access to jobs or resources is provided first to those of one's own group. Another factor is that many Muslims prefer to educate their children in Muslim schools, which has deprived them of the skills required to advance in some occupations. One observer estimated that only 10 Muslims graduate from the Philippine Military Academy annually, and noted that only 1 Muslim has reached general or flag officer rank.

THE PHILIPPINES

President Aquino is committed to a peaceful resolution of the long-simmering Muslim rebellion and to redressing the historical neglect of the south. In August she signed legislation allowing 9 cities and 13 provinces in the south to join an autonomous region through a plebiscite. The law respects Muslim rights to ancestral lands, requires the establishment of Muslim Shari'a laws and court system, and decentralizes government authority in several different areas. A wing of the Moro National Liberation Front objects to the establishment of an autonomous region on any basis other than the 1976 Tripoli Agreement. In the plebiscite held November 19, only 4 out of 13 provinces and none of the 9 cities voted to become part of the autonomous region.

Several million Filipinos belong to other non-Christian and non-Muslim groups. They are most numerous in the Cordillera of northern Luzon and in Mindanao. Modernization has reduced their traditional isolation. Logging and mining have damaged many of the ancestral lands of these tribal groups, and lowland farmers have expanded into their areas. The cultural minorities have not always been afforded equal legal protection. The Government's offices of Northern and Southern Cultural Communities are responsible for protecting the interests of these groups. Members of tribal groups have been elected to the Congress and local government offices. Congress passed legislation in 1989 authorizing the creation of an autonomous region in the Cordillera of northern Luzon. A plebiscite will be held in early 1990.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of workers, including public employees, to join trade unions is assured by the Constitution and legislation, and is freely practiced without government interference. About 10 percent of the nation's employed work force of approximately 23 million workers is organized into over 3,700 trade unions, not including the 2.8 million workers who are members of the National Congress of Farmers Organization (NCFO). Most of the trade unions belong to relatively small federations which are members of two larger trade union groupings, the largest of which is the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines (TUCP), an affiliate of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

The second largest trade union grouping is the leftist KMU (Kilusang Mayo Uno, or May First Movement) which is heavily infiltrated and influenced by the CPP. Three much smaller trade union groupings are affiliates of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). The Federation of Free Workers (FFW) is a member of the World Confederation of Labor (WCL).

Strikes are legal, including in Export Processing Zones (EPZ's), and they take place frequently. The rate of unionization, the number of collective bargaining agreements, and the legal minimum wage in the EPZ's is akin to that prevailing in the rest of the country. The Aquino administration pursues legal efforts to resolve disputes and has rejected calls for "no-strike laws" despite the disincentive that strikes pose to needed investment. On the local level, there have been several cases of violence provoked by unions or management. Sometimes the police or military have been called in to break up illegal strike barricades, and on several occasions their attempts to enforce the law have resulted in violent clashes with strikers. (See Section 1.a. regarding reported killings of labor leaders.)

The 1987 Constitution and E.O. 180 guarantee government employees the right to form unions and bargain collectively. E.O. 180 provides for a disputes settlement body. The right to strike and the status of employees in government-owned industries, however, have not yet been clarified. As of December 1989, there were 121 unions in the public sector with 66,000 members. An extensive strike action carried out in July-August by public sector workers and teachers was not suppressed by the Government.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Labor's right to organize and bargain collectively is provided for in law and strongly supported by the Government. These rights were expanded and strengthened by the passage of the Labor Law Reform Act of 1989, which balances the need for greater stability in labor relations with full respect for worker rights. Since President Aquino took office, the number of collective bargaining agreements in force has increased from 3,112 to 3,941. In the same period, the number of registered unions increased by 7.8 percent.

It is an unfair labor practice to dismiss a union official or a worker who is trying to organize a union. Nevertheless, employers sometimes attempt to intimidate workers by threats of firing or closure. There is a history of industrial relations violence in the Philippines which has worsened as a consequence of the insurgency and counterinsurgency. Politicized unionists have been threatened, beaten, and killed. The CPP/NPA, rival unionists, and hired gunmen have all been implicated in such violence, as have civilian defense groups and elements of the military.

In February and November 1989, the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labor Organization (ILO) considered "serious allegations" of military or paramilitary repression of members of the National Federation of Sugar Workers (a KMU-member union which is affiliated with the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Association or IUF) in Negros Occidental province between 1986 and 1989. The allegations include violent murders (including those of a member of the KMU's national executive committee in Davao in 1988 and of a Nestle plant union leader in 1989), woundings, disappearances, torture, arbitrary arrests, and detentions, general repression of the KMU, and also include charges that the 1989 Labor Law Reform Act was intended to "contain labor militancy." The allegations were contained in complaints presented in one case by the IUF, and, jointly by the KMU and the WFTU in another case. The Government responded that some of the allegations of human rights violations were still being investigated and described the machinery for accomplishing this, indicated that one arrest cited in the complaint was for seditious activity, and cited some cases where the killings are believed to be the result of interunion rivalry. The Committee deplored antiunion violence, urged the Philippine Government to do all in its power to curb criminality by members of the police and armed forces and to dismantle the vigilante groups, and asked the Government to respond to the allegations which it had not yet answered. It was left to the ILO's Committee of Experts to consider in 1990 whether the new Philippine labor law remedied previous defects.

CHR has also examined the alleged repression of NFSW workers and leaders, but there has been no prosecution due to insufficient evidence.

The Government is actively encouraging dialogue among the military, labor, and community leaders on the worker rights/human rights situation. CHR, together with the Asian-American Free Labor Institute under a special grant from the U.S. Agency for International Development, is sponsoring a series of conferences/workshops on trade unions and human rights. The objective is to establish local human rights committees composed of unionists from every labor center plus the independents and representatives of government, military, police, and the community. The participants focus on methods of resolving problems and improving communications among themselves. Four such conferences were held in various regions of the country in 1989. A fifth conference planned for Manila was postponed until early 1990 as a result of the coup attempt. KMU has so far chosen not to participate in the workshops.

The Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE), through the National Labor Relations Commission, has a quasi-judicial system of hearing and adjudicating workers' claims. It is usually slow, but no slower than other elements of the courts and the bureaucracy. With DOLE's emphasis on mediation and conciliation, the National Conciliation and Mediation Board has helped reduce the high number of illegal work stoppages.

Labor legislation is applied uniformly throughout the country, including in the export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Compulsory or Forced Labor

The Philippines has ratified ILO Convention 105 which prohibits forced labor. This Convention has the full force of law in the Philippines. There are no reports of forced labor being practiced.

The Constitution prohibits employment of children below age 15, except under the responsibility of parents or guardians and then only if the work does not interfere with schooling. It allows employment for those between the ages of 15 and 18 for such hours and periods of the day as are determined by the Secretary of Labor, but provides that in no case may persons under 18 years of age be employed in hazardous or deleterious work.

The most serious violations of child labor laws occur in piecework or contracting out of embroidery and other garment-related production. Congressional and public attention has focused on the use of children in an ecologically damaging and dangerous form of fishing. The Aquino administration has made a serious effort to investigate and reduce violations of child labor laws outside of the agricultural sector, but these efforts are hampered by the limited resources of the Department of Labor and Employment.

The minimum wage in nonagricultural enterprises is $4.22 per day. The agribusiness minimum is $3.75 per day. Despite the minimum wage laws, substantial numbers of workers (mostly laborers, janitors, messengers, drivers, and clerk-typists) earn less than the law stipulates. The average wage of workers in large cities is close to the minimum wage, and in the industrial sector the average wage is considerably above it. In rural areas, wages often fall below the minimum wage. The minimum wage works out to a monthly equivalent that is below the poverty threshold figure established by the Government, which is based on the minimum income required by a family of six persons. By this measure, while there has been improvement since 1985 when 59 percent of families were below the poverty level, the situation remains serious. In 1988 nearly one-half of all families were still below the poverty line.

The standard workweek is 48 hours. The law mandates a full day of rest weekly. Employees with more than 1 year on the job are entitled to 5 days of paid leave.

A comprehensive set of occupational safety and health standards is in effect, and the standards for protecting workers against hazards of the workplace and harmful substances are relatively advanced. However, enforcement of minimum wage and health and safety regulations is severely hampered by having too few professional labor inspectors. Nonetheless, compliance with health and safety rules is an official priority, and regular inspections take place.

SINGAPORE

Singapore, a city-state of about 2.6 million people, has a republican form of government based on the Westminster parliamentary system. The majority (75 percent) of the population is ethnic Chinese, with Malays (15 percent) and Indians (7 percent) constituting substantial minorities.

Politics have been dominated by the People's Action Party (PAP), headed by Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, which has held power since Singapore gained autonomy from Great Britain in 1959. Thirty years of political stability and economic success have provided a continuing source of popular political support to the PAP. In the September 1988 general election, the PAP received 61.9 percent of the popular vote and won 80 of the 81 parliamentary seats.

The Government maintains active internal security and military forces to counter perceived threats to the nation's security. The Internal Security Department (ISD) is responsible for enforcement of the Internal Security Act (ISA), including its provisions for detention without trial.

Singapore's economic system is one of the most open in the world and it is marked by impressive economic gains--gross domestic product (GDP) grew by 9.1 percent in the first half of 1989. Singaporeans enjoy the third highest per capita income in Asia (after Japan and oil-rich Brunei).

The major human rights issues in Singapore continue to be detentions without trial under the ISA, mistreatment of detainees, and restrictions on press freedom. Through the ISA and other laws, the Government has broad powers to interfere with privacy and to restrict freedom of assembly and of movement. In practice, however, it rarely invokes its draconian authority.

In January Parliament amended both the Constitution and the ISA so as virtually to eliminate both judicial review of detention orders and appeals of ISA cases to the Privy Council (a panel of senior jurists in London which hears cases on appeal from many Commonwealth countries). These amendments were designed to reassert the interpretation of the law accepted until a December 1988 ruling by the Singapore Appeals Court which ordered the release of four ISA detainees. Over the course of 1989, six ISA detainees, including one who had been held for more than 22 years, were released subject to restrictive conditions on their movements and associations. Two persons are still detained under that law.

The Appeals Court upheld in June a government restriction on the circulation of a foreign journal for "engaging in domestic politics," and in January a prominent government opponent was disqualified from holding a "nonconstituency" seat in Parliament as a result of his conviction in absentia on tax evasion charges.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known instances of politically motivated killing.

SINGAPORE

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence of abduction, secret arrests, or of clandestine detentions that were not subsequently acknowledged by the Government. Opposition elements did not engage in such activities.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture is prohibited by law under sections 330 and 331 of the Penal Code and government leaders have stated that they oppose its use, credible reports of mistreatment continued to surface.

Vincent Cheng, a detainee held under the ISA, stated in an affidavit made for a September habeas corpus hearing that following his detention in May 1987 he had been placed in an extremely cold room, deprived of sleep, subjected to prolonged interrogation, and physically assaulted by an ISD officer. His affidavit also said that statements he signed for the ISD at that time were written under coercion and intimidation. The Government in turn provided affidavits from the accused SD officers denying that Cheng had been assaulted or forced to sign any statement.

The allegations are similar to those made in 1988 by nine others detained in May 1987 and later released. Eight of the nine were redetained in April 1988 after they made a public statement alleging that they were mistreated and denying allegations of involvement in a Marxist conspiracy. A week later the Government released sworn statements made by five of those redetained which stated that they had not been mistreated at any time while in detention. Human rights groups contend that these statements were also written under duress and coercion.

The Government continued to assert that torture is not practiced in Singapore, but one Cabinet Minister publicly acknowledged that "psychological pressure" is used. The Government has answered charges of mistreatment by noting that persons have the right to bring charges against those in the Government who are alleged to have committed such criminal acts. Human rights groups note, however, that few persons would be willing to accept the possible risks of reprisal involved in lodging such complaints. A complaint was filed with the police in April 1988 alleging mistreatment of one detainee during the 1987 detention. To date there has been no public record of any investigation into this complaint.

The Penal Code mandates caning in addition to imprisonment as punishment for certain offenses, including rape, theft, robbery, extortion, housebreaking, and vehicle theft. The courts routinely order caning for convictions for these offenses. As of March, illegal aliens are subject to the same punishment (see Section 6.e.).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrest without warrant and detention without trial are legally permitted in some instances. Arrest without warrant is authorized under section 43 of the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act and sections 8 and 65 of the ISA. Detention without trial is authorized under sections 8 and 74 of the ISA. The Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act is used almost exclusively in cases involving narcotics and secret criminal societies. Central Narcotics Bureau (CNB) officers and customs officials may arrest without warrant any person suspected of manufacturing, importing, exporting, possessing, consuming, or trafficking in controlled drugs under the Misuse of Drugs Act. The Director of the CNB can commit suspected drug users to a 6-month term in a drug rehabilitation center in cases of positive urinalysis tests. Suspects have a legal right to challenge the finding through the court system. There is a functioning system of bail for criminal cases, and those charged in both criminal and security cases are entitled to legal counsel.

Section 8 of the ISA permits the Minister of Home Affairs to order detention if the President determines that the person poses a threat to national security. The President may authorize detention for up to 2 years. After 2 years, the President must redetermine whether the detainee should be held, and may so order for up to 2 more years. There is no limitation on the number of times a detention order may be renewed. A detainee's case is reviewed periodically by an advisory board, to which the detainee may make representations. The board can make nonbinding recommendations that a detainee be released prior to expiration of the detention order. According to the Government, persons are released when the Minister for Law and Home Affairs determines they no longer pose a threat to national security and are unlikely to resume subversive activity. The Minister may also revoke the order of release. Under section 74 of the ISA, police may detain a person for up to 48 hours; the Minister of Home Affairs can then order the detainee to be held for up to 28 days longer. ISA detainees are normally allowed access to lawyers and visits by relatives once initial interrogation has been completed (after 7 and 10 days respectively in the cases of the 1987 and 1988 ISA detainees).

On January 16 Parliament approved amendments to both the Constitution and the ISA which eliminated any judicial review of the objective grounds for detentions made under the ISA. These amendments came in response to a December 1988 ruling of the Appeals Court ordering the release of four ISA detainees, in which a judge opined that preventive detention was not a subjective matter resting solely upon the judgment of the executive and accordingly was open to judicial review.

The constitutional amendment prevents the courts from reviewing the constitutionality of any law passed by Parliament to prevent subversion and allows such statutes to restrict, or even eliminate, judicial review in cases of alleged subversion. This amendment became valid retroactively, making it applicable to the detainees who benefited from the December 1988 ruling. Using the power bestowed by the constitutional amendment, the amendment to the ISA stated that "there shall be no judicial review in any court of any act done or decision made by the President under the provisions of this act save in regard to any question relating to compliance with any procedural requirement of this act."

These amendments subordinate the fundamental liberties provided for by the Singapore Constitution to the actions taken by the executive in national security cases. Critics argue that the amendments are outside the rule of law inherent in any constitution based on the Westminster model. A high court judge rejected this latter argument on April 25 in ruling on a motion for writ of habeas corpus for Teo Soh Lung.

Six ISA detainees were released in 1989, leaving only Vincent Cheng and Teo Soh Lung in preventive detention. Those released have had restrictions placed on their right to travel, to make public statements, and to associate with former detainees.

Three of those redetained in April 1988 were released on March 11, 1989. Eight days earlier they had withdrawn motions for writs of habeas corpus, just days before the motions were to be heard in the high court. In Parliament, it was suggested that this indicates the Government offered to release them sooner if they dropped their legal cases. The Minister for Law and Home Affairs responded saying this suggestion was totally untrue. Teo Soh Lung, who filed for a writ together with the other three and did not withdraw the motion, is still being held (the lone police complaint alleging ill-treatment was filed in her case). In his September 1989 habeas corpus hearing, Vincent Cheng stated in his affidavit that he was told in May 1987 he would be held for only a year but "was repeatedly threatened with prolonged detention should any representations be made or legal proceedings be commenced," and that after he filed to start proceedings in March 1989 an ISD officer asked him whether he intended to show by this that he was not rehabilitated.

The Government denies that it pressures detainees by threatening to prolong their imprisonment. But when asked in court if some detainees have been punished not for what they have done, but for what others might do in the future, Singapore's Prime Minister said that the way in which the Government responds "to pressure either by habeas corpus proceedings, or by human rights groups, or by demonstrators, or by church agitation decides whether or not others might follow in the footsteps of those already detained."

Chia Thye Poh, a former Member of Parliament (M.P.) who had been in preventive detention under the ISA since 1966, was conditionally released on May 17. He was sent to a small island adjacent to Singapore, from which he cannot leave without permission from the ISD. The Government said that the Communist Party of Malaya (CPM) organization with which Chia was allegedly linked, allegations which the Government never attempted to prove in court, "has now been weakened and disrupted enough that his release . . . will not be a security problem." Chia has consistently denied any ties to the CPM.

According to the Government, 1,228 persons were in detention under the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act as of August 15. Sixty percent of these were being held on narcotics-related charges; the remaining 40 percent are held on secret society and other criminal charges.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Singapore judiciary system is based on the British model. There are two levels of courts: the Supreme Court, which includes the High Court and the Appellate Courts, and the subordinate courts. In normal cases, the Criminal Procedures Code provides that a charge against a defendant must be read and explained to him as soon as it is framed by the magistrate. The accused has the right to be represented by an attorney (advocate). Trial is by judge rather than by jury.

Persons detained under the ISA and the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act are not entitled to a public trial, which is accorded in all other cases. Currently two persons are imprisoned under the ISA (see Section 1.d.).

At the discretion of the courts, Commonwealth Queen's Counsels (QC) are allowed to argue cases in Singapore. Following a habeas corpus hearing in March, however, the Government barred the QC who had been representing ISA detainee Teo Soh Lung from further appearances in local courts. The Government contended that he had involved himself in Singapore's domestic politics by championing his client's cause outside of the courtroom. It focused on comments he had made to a closed seminar in London. The QC charged that the Government's action gave "a clear message to the local legal profession to keep off the grass." Commenting on the Government's action, the British Government said it would have a negative impact on Singapore's reputation for respect of the law.

In April Parliament greatly restricted appeals to the judicial committee of the Privy Council in London. This made Singapore's appellate courts the final courts of appeal in most cases. Critics point out that this reduces the value of an appeal, since a group of only nine justices man both the High Court and the Appellate Courts. An independent Court of Appeals has been proposed, but opponents argue that there is insufficient legal talent in Singapore to staff such a court.

Judges are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Prime Minister in consultation with the Chief Justice. Subordinate court judges (magistrates) and public prosecutors are civil servants and can be transferred from the judiciary to government service. In Parliament the Minister for Law and Home Affairs has admitted that an unscrupulous government could "pack the courts" to pursue political ends. In arguing that judicial review was not an effective way to prevent abuse of the Government's discretionary powers, he pointed out that "under our system there is no limit to the number of judges who can be appointed."

The Government uses its wide discretionary powers when it believes that the security of the nation is threatened. In most cases, search warrants are required for intrusion into the home. Law enforcement officers may, however, search a person, home, or property without a warrant if they decide there are grounds to do so. In ISA cases, warrantless searches are common. Warrantless searches can also be made under the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act, which is said mostly to deal with drug- and secret society-related offenses. Judicial review of such searches can be undertaken by the courts at the request of the defendant but is not automatic. Divisions of the Government's law enforcement agencies, including the Internal Security Department and the Corrupt Practices Investigation Board (CPIB), have wide networks for gathering information. There are credible allegations that the authorities monitor telephone and other private conversations.

SINGAPORE

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution permits official restrictions on the freedom of expression. In practice, freedom of speech and press is circumscribed, and the Government forbids statements which it thinks might arouse tensions among the various races or might threaten national security or public order. Inflammatory discussion of race, religion, and language is officially forbidden.

Newspapers are published by private firms with close ties to the national leadership. While there is no direct censorship of the press, editors have acknowledged there are restraints, such as the Newspaper and Printing Presses Act. A leading Singapore journalist, in a November public statement, described the local press as one working in tandem with the Government. "Newspapers," he wrote, "pedal along with the Government in the direction set by the political leadership."

The Government brought charges in 1988 against Chiam See Tong, an opposition M.P., alleging that his party printed unauthorized editions of the party's newspaper. He was acquitted but the judge gave the prosecution the option of amending the charges. On October 21 the Government relented and told the court it would not proceed with the case.

A wide range of international magazines and newspapers can be purchased uncensored in Singapore, although newspapers printed in Malaysia are not circulated. Under the Newspaper and Printing Press Act, the Government may restrict the sales and distribution of foreign publications deemed to have "engaged" in Singapore's domestic politics. The Government interprets the statute as giving it the right to impose such restrictions whenever a foreign publication fails to publish in full any government reply to the publication's coverage of Singapore.

The Government has restricted the circulation of the Asian Wall Street Journal (AWSJ) and the Far Eastern Economic Review (FEER) since 1987. The former did not comply with the requirement to publish government letters in full, while the Government accused the latter of a negative slant in its reporting on Singapore. On November 30, a High Court judge held that FEER had libeled the Prime Minister in a December 1987 article and awarded him $115,000 in damages. In December the Government applied for a contempt of court citation against the AWSJ because of its report on this verdict. On June 1, the Appeals Court dismissed an AWSJ lawsuit against the Government which asserted that the circulation restriction was illegal. In its decision giving a definition of "engaging in domestic politics," the Court said, "it is simply involving oneself in some matter, in this case the domestic politics of Singapore, where such involvement is neither solicited nor welcomed by those who are concerned with or affected by such matters." The judges added that domestic politics included "the political, social, and economic policies of the Government."

The Government has not allowed the FEER or the AWSJ to post correspondents in Singapore since 1987. It refused to grant visas to FEER and AWSJ correspondents to come to Singapore to cover Vice President Quayle's visit in May and to a FEER correspondent coming to cover the libel suit in September. In October and November, the Government refused to extend the work permit of the Associated Press/Dow Jones correspondent, and refused to issue a visa to a new correspondent. Dow Jones is the parent company of FEER and AWSJ.

The government-owned Singapore Broadcasting Corporation (SBC) has a monopoly on domestic radio and television broadcasting and follows government guidelines similar to those pertaining to local print media. Television broadcasts from Malaysia and radio broadcasts from Malaysia and Indonesia can be received uncensored in Singapore; the British Broadcasting Corporation World Service also broadcasts locally on the FM band. An official board of film censors approves motion pictures, as well as video cassettes, and television programs. Other government bodies censor other media; such censorship is aimed at material which the Government believes would undermine morals, advocate excessive permissiveness, promote drug abuse, or increase social tension. Literature and films featuring explicit sexual or drug-related themes are banned.

The members of the faculties at Singapore institutions of higher education are government employees. A number of university lecturers are concurrently PAP M.P.'s. Oral and written criticism of government policies occasionally occurs on campus, but criticism of government leaders and alleged authoritarian tendencies is infrequent.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Assemblies of more than five people in public, including political meetings and rallies, must have police permission. However, the Government does not stop social gatherings regardless of the number present.

Associations, societies, clubs, churches, and other organizations with more than 10 members must be registered with the Government under the Societies Act. The Government denies registration to societies believed likely to be used for unlawful purposes or for purposes prejudicial to public peace, welfare, or public order. (See Section 3 regarding criticism by opposition groups of the Government's discretionary power in this area.)

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the Constitution and usually respected in practice. However, all religious groups are subject to government scrutiny and must be legally registered. The Government restricts some religious sects by application of the Societies Act and has banned others. A Presidential Council on Minority Rights exists to ensure that legislation does not infringe upon the rights of ethnic or religious minorities. There is no state religion. The Government has provided financial assistance to build and maintain mosques. There is no religious test for employment with the Government or for membership in the PAP. Missionaries are permitted to work and to publish religious texts.

The Government draws a sharp distinction between purely religious activities and social activism flowing from religious beliefs. Both remaining ISA detainees were arrested in part because of alleged political activities while serving on Catholic social work committees. The Government announced in October that it will introduce legislation to penalize religious groups which engage in political activity.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Significant limitations on freedom of movement within the country may be imposed under the ISA. The ISA allows the Minister for Law and Home Affairs to suspend or revoke a detention order or impose restrictions on activities, place of residence, and travel outside of Singapore. All Singapore residents over the age of 13 are required to register with the Government, receive and carry an identification card, and report changes of address within 14 days. A person may be denied a passport at the Government's discretion, although in practice this applies only to those convicted of a serious crime. Males approaching the age of 18 (when national service is generally performed) must obtain an exit permit from the Ministry of Defense before traveling abroad. Each recipient of government-financed higher educational benefits must sign a bond obligation to serve the Government for a fixed period and may not cease employment or emigrate within the prescribed period without paying the balance of his or her bond.

The right of voluntary repatriation is extended to holders of Singaporean passports. In 1985 Parliament provided for the loss of citizenship by Singaporeans who reside outside Singapore for more than 10 years consecutively. Action under this law is discretionary and has been taken in at least one case involving a well-known government opponent.

Singapore does not offer first asylum to refugees. Government policy permits Vietnamese refugees rescued at sea to disembark and remain for up to 90 days only if Singapore is the rescuing vessel's next scheduled port of call and if a resettlement country provides a resettlement guarantee. The Government has agreed, in principle, to permit the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to screen such persons in accordance with the Comprehensive Plan of Action adopted in Geneva at the June 1989 International Conference on Indochinese Refugees. However, refugees must still depart Singapore within 90 days. To date, no screening has taken place because no country has agreed to accept those who would be screened out.

Singaporeans have the ability peacefully to change their government, but the Government has used its extensive powers to place formidable obstacles in the path of would-be opponents. Voting is compulsory. Parliamentary elections are held at least every 5 years. It is generally accepted that the voting and vote-counting system is fair, accurate, and free from tampering. While the mechanics of elections have been honest and devoid of manipulation, human rights groups contend that the overall election process has not been free and fair.

Lee Kuan Yew has served as Prime Minister since 1959. Lee heads the PAP, a broadly based institution and the dominant political party in Singapore. It includes representatives from all racial communities in Singapore and is rooted in neighborhood, youth, and labor associations. The PAP currently holds 80 of the 81 popularly elected seats in Parliament, with the Singapore Democratic Party (SDP) holding the remaining seat. Two Worker's Party (WP) candidates, the highest vote-getters among losing opposition candidates in the September 1988 elections, accepted "Non-Constituency M.P." (NCMP) seats which allow them to participate in debate but not to vote on many issues.

While opposition parties have contested every election, none has been able seriously to challenge the PAP since the late 1960's. A variety of reasons are given for this. One reason is performance. Under the leadership of the PAP, Singapore has achieved rapid economic growth, enabling the Government to provide a wide array of public services. Political parties, while legally free to organize, are subject to strict regulations on party constitution, fund raising, and accountability. The PAP attributes the lack of effective opposition to disorganization, lack of leadership, and lack of alternative policy programs. However, critics add that the Government's exercise of broad discretionary powers through arbitrary detentions and criminal prosecutions, control of the media, and restrictions on the right of assembly have vitiated opposition efforts by hindering the formation of associations or organizations that could provide a basis of support for opposition parties.

Francis Seow, one of the two candidates who accepted an NCMP position, lost his seat before Parliament's first session as a result of a December 1988 conviction for tax evasion. At the time of his conviction, Seow was in the United States, undergoing medical treatment. He was not represented in court by legal counsel when the court convicted him on five of six charges. The sixth charge, which involves a possible prison sentence, has been adjourned pending his arrest. On February 15, the prosecution revealed to the court that government-hired investigators had followed Seow in the United States for more than 7 weeks, and contended that Seow was deceiving the court about his medical condition. On May 22, a district judge issued an arrest warrant on the grounds that Seow had deliberately stayed away from his tax evasion trial. Seow has accepted a fellowship at Yale University and has not returned to Singapore.

Pointing to the extraordinary measures taken by the Government to prosecute Seow, the case against the SDP M.P. (see Section 2.a.), and the controversial 1986 conviction which cost a former Worker's Party M.P. his seat in Parliament--a result described as "a grievous injustice" by the Privy Council in November 1988--critics charge that the Government uses judicial process to harass opposition politicians. The Government denies that its criminal investigations are politically motivated.

Governmental bodies, such as the presidentially appointed Minority Rights Council, monitor alleged violations of minority rights, primarily any concerning the Malay minority. There are, however, no nongovernmental organizations which actively and openly monitor alleged human rights violations, a situation that human rights observers attribute to fear of government retaliation, a fear fueled by the jailing in 1988 of those who publicly claimed mistreatment and of lawyers who represented them. Amnesty International is not allowed to operate in Singapore. Observers from foreign human rights groups have attended the habeas corpus hearings of ISA detainees.

Because of Singapore's history of intercommunal tension, the Government takes affirmative measures to ensure racial, ethnic, religious, and cultural nondiscrimination. Social, economic, and cultural facilities are available to all citizens regardless of race, religion, or sex. Minorities are constitutionally afforded equal rights and actively participate in the political process. The Singapore Constitution acknowledges the "special position" of Malays as the indigenous people of Singapore, and charges the Government to support and promote their "political, educational, religious, economic, social, and cultural interests." While precise statistics are not readily available, government officials acknowledge that Malay Singaporeans are represented disproportionately in the bottom quarter of Singapore's economy.

Women have the same rights as men in employment, education, childcare and custody, and in the running of a household, but do not have equal rights with men in the transmission of citizenship to their children or in the right to residence of a foreign spouse in Singapore. Muslim women's rights are protected by the provisions of the 1957 administration of Muslim law, which permits Muslim women to apply for divorce and to hold and dispose of property. Women can vote and hold any public office.

There is no evidence of any widespread practice of violence or abuse against women. Singapore's laws protect women against domestic violence and against sexual or physical harassment. Domestic violence can be dealt with under either the penal code or the women's charter. Through the latter, a battered wife can obtain court orders barring the spouse from the home until the court is satisfied that he will stop his aggressive behavior. The penal code prescribes mandatory caning and a minimum imprisonment of 2 years from conviction on a charge of outraging modesty so as to cause the victim fear of death or injury. Commenting on these laws, a local women's group has stated that this "legislative recognition of the problem of domestic violence and the need to protect battered women is important in that it reinforces the principle of the husband-wife relationship and seeks to restore the respect and dignity to the victim of violence in the home."

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Singapore's Constitution gives all citizens the right to form associations, including trade unions. Parliament may, however, impose restrictions based on security, public order, or morality. The right of association is delimited by the Societies Act and labor and education laws and regulations. In practice, Communist labor unions are not permitted. The Trades Union Act authorizes the formation of unions with broad rights, albeit with some narrow restrictions--such as prohibitions on the unionization of uniformed employees and the holding of union office by persons with criminal records.

SINGAPORE

The National Trades Union Congress (NTUC) is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU); the Asian and Pacific Regional Organization (APRO) of the ICFTU has its headquarters in Singapore. Singapore is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) and has ratified ILO Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively but has not ratified Convention 87 on Freedom of Association.

The national work force comprises about 1.2 million workers, of whom some 210,000 are organized into 89 trade unions. Some 70 of these, which represent about 98 percent of the unionized workers, are affiliated with the NTUC, an umbrella organization, which has a close relationship to the Government. Several unions have been founded outside of the NTUC, including ones for the catering staff and pilots of Singapore Airlines and for Chinese-language teachers.

The Second Deputy Prime Minister, a PAP member, serves as NTUC Secretary General, and several PAP M.P.'s are NTUC officials. These close ties have led to charges that the NTUC defends the interests of the Government and of the PAP just as much as the interests of the workers. NTUC policy, for example, prohibits unionists who actively support opposition parties from holding office in affiliated unions. NTUC officials maintain that the two organizations are separate but share the same ideology, and that workers benefit from the close ties.

Workers have the legal right to strike but rarely do so--the most recent strike took place in 1986. Reasons given include a cultural aversion to confrontation and concern about maintaining Singapore's reputation with investors.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is a normal part of management-labor relations particularly in the manufacturing sector. On the average, collective bargaining agreements are renewed every 2 to 3 years.

A National Wages Council (NWC) brings business, labor, and government representatives together to establish guidelines for annual wage packages. Those who argue that the NWC fairly accommodates the interests of all concerned parties note that wage increases in the 1980's have exceeded gross domestic product growth. Collective agreements negotiated between labor and management generally follow the wage guidelines issued annually by the NWC. In 1988, for the first time, the NWC issued its guidelines in the form of qualitative recommendations rather than the quantitative form used before. The NWC found that both employers and workers reacted favorably to a more flexible approach which allows management to reward workers for performance and sacrifices made during bad times, yet allows those in sectors experiencing downturns to let wages reflect the circumstances.

In 1989 the ILO's Committee of Experts (COE) recognized that a 1988 law removed a previously existing prohibition on the negotiation of annual wage supplements but retained this restriction under certain circumstances. The COE also noted certain issues, such as promotion and transfer, and dismissal without notice of employees, are excluded by law from collective bargaining, and that the Industrial Arbitration Court has the power to refuse to register the collective agreements of newly established enterprises when the conditions of employment they afford are more favorable than those set forth by law. The Government countered that the Court has never refused to register a collective agreement.

Section 80 of the Industrial Relations Act makes it an offense to discriminate against anyone who "is or proposes" to become a member or an officer of a trade union. The offense is punishable by a $1,000 fine and/or a 12-month prison sentence.

Labor laws and regulations are enforced uniformly. There are no export processing zones in Singapore.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Singapore law forbids the use of forced or compulsory labor, and such labor is not found in Singapore.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Government enforces the Employment Act which sets the minimum age for the employment of children at age 12. Children under age 14 are not allowed to work in any "industrial undertaking." Industrial employers must notify the Ministry of Labor within 30 days of hiring a child between the ages of 14 to 16. Ministry of Labor regulations prohibit night employment of children and restrict industrial work to no more than 7 hours a day. Children cannot work on commercial vessels, with any live electrical apparatus lacking effective insulation, or in any underground job.

The Singapore labor market offers relatively high wages and working conditions consistent with accepted international standards. Singapore, however, has no minimum wage or unemployment compensation. Because of a continuing labor shortage, wages have generally stayed high, and unemployment below 3 percent. In 1989 the Government continued implementation of a flexible wage program wherein labor and management in private firms agree to set bonuses based on a company's annual performance. Because of Singapore's booming economy in 1989 and the consequent high demand for labor, the "flexi wage" system has not resulted in a loss of real income for workers. The standard legal workweek under the Employment Act (Section 38) is 44 hours.

The Government enforces comprehensive occupational safety and health laws. Enforcement procedures, coupled with the promotion of educational and training programs, have reduced the frequency of job-related accidents by a third over the past decade. The average severity of occupational accidents has also been reduced.

Because of the domestic labor shortage, more than 150,000 foreign workers are employed legally in Singapore. Most are unskilled laborers and household servants. The Government controls the numbers of foreign workers directly through immigration regulations and indirectly through levies on firms hiring foreign workers. Social insurance and safety regulations are applied without discrimination against foreign workers. Foreign workers face no legal wage discrimination; however, they are concentrated in low-wage, low-skill jobs. Some foreign workers are members of labor unions, particularly NTUC shipbuilding and construction unions.

SINGAPORE

The Government acknowledged the problem of illegal aliens working in Singapore by passing a law in March imposing a caning penalty on aliens who overstay in Singapore by more than 90 days. Parliament has passed a law to impose a caning sentence on businessmen who employ more than 5 workers illegally. An estimated 12,000 illegal aliens took advantage of an amnesty period offered by the Government to leave the country before the bill began to be enforced. The Government has not yet executed the punishment prescribed under the new law.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

Over 300,000 people occupy Solomon Islands, an archipelago stretching over 840 miles in the South Pacific and the second largest (after Papua New Guinea) of the Melanesian countries. Its government is based on a modified Westminster parliamentary system consisting of a single-chamber legislative assembly of 38 members. This system, adopted when the country became independent in 1978, accords with both Solomon Islands' experience and the Melanesian tradition of leadership based upon individual achievement and political consensus. Political legitimacy rests on direct election by secret ballot.

A police force of around 500 men is under civilian control. There are no other armed forces. The courts are independent and vigorously protect individual rights. There have been three general elections since independence; the most recent one in February 1989 resulted in the first one-party government since independence.

Agriculture is the mainstay of the economy. About 85 percent of the population engages to some extent in subsistence production, obtaining food by root-gardening and fishing, and has little involvement in the cash economy. In 1989 Solomon Islands still faced a long-term decline in the terms of trade, substantial domestic and external deficits, an increasing foreign trade imbalance, and higher debt service costs. Poor economic performance was exacerbated by a population growth rate of about 3.5 percent, which ensured continued pressures on public and private resources.

All basic individual rights are provided for in the Constitution, implemented by the authorities, and defended by the courts. There is a constitutionally provided Ombudsman to look into and provide protection against improper or unlawful administrative treatment. No human rights abuses were reported in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political and other extrajudicial killing has not occurred.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of political disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law and not practiced.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no evidence of politically motivated arrests. Exile is not practiced.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is a blend of British and traditional systems. There is a high court plus magistrates' courts. Accused persons are entitled to counsel. Provision is made for writs of habeas corpus under the law. Coerced statements are illegal. Violations of civil liberties are punishable by fines and jail sentences.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In addition to legal provisions, the traditional culture provides strong protection against these types of abuses.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional provisions, an independent press, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. There are two private weekly newspapers, weekly and monthly national government newsletters, and one provincial government weekly. The state-owned radio gives significant coverage to statements of opposition politicians. The new Prime Minister conducted press conferences with local journalists on a weekly basis.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of association is provided for in the Constitution and freely exercised. Demonstrators must obtain a permit, but permits have never been denied on political grounds.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by law, there are no controls on the practice of religion, and there is no religious discrimination. Although Christianity is the predominant religion and a wide variety of Christian denominations are represented, indigenous beliefs also continue to be practiced without restriction. Missionaries work without restrictions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no legal or administrative restrictions on freedom of movement of Solomon Islands' citizens within or out of the country. Natural-born citizens may not be deprived of citizenship on any grounds.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since independence, Solomon Islands has had three parliamentary elections (the most recent in early 1989), and several elections for provincial and local councils. Besides the general elections, three additional changes of government were accomplished by votes of Parliament. Suffrage is universal over the age of 18.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

There were no allegations by outside organizations of human rights violations in Solomon Islands nor any request for investigations. There are no local organizations that monitor and report on human rights.

There is no discrimination on the basis of race, religion, language, or social status. Following his election in 1989, the new Prime Minister announced a policy prohibiting the employment of Freemasons in the Civil Service. Indigenous Solomon Islanders are favored over naturalized citizens in the matter of land ownership.

The law accords women equal legal rights, but the traditional society, where males are dominant and women are seen in customary family roles, has hampered them from taking more active roles in economic and political life. A shortage of employment opportunities throughout the country has inhibited the entry of women into the work force.

While actual statistical data are scarce, incidents of wife beating and abuse appear to be common. In the rare cases that are reported, charges are often dropped by the women before their court appearance. Police are reluctant to interfere in what they perceive as domestic disputes. In addition, many of the laws benefiting women are in the British tradition and are viewed by many Solomon Islanders as "foreign laws" not reflective of the customs and traditions of Solomon Islands. The magistrate courts deal with physical abuse of women on the basis of inherent common law powers and deal with it as they would any other assault.

The government-supported National Council of Women is actively involved in trying to improve the position of women in society. Among other things, the Council is working to familiarize women with a proposed amendment to the Affiliation, Maintenance, and Separation Law which would guarantee that women who bring cases to court be protected against harassment from husbands or members of their husbands' families, both at home and in places of employment, and would guarantee women's right to child support and compensation. In 1989 the Council also undertook workshops and programs to train women in various skills, to enhance their self-confidence, and to strengthen their participation in the political and economic life of Solomon Islands.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Solomon Islands' law recognizes the right of workers to organize, to choose their own representatives, to determine and pursue their own views and policies, and to engage in political activities. Only private sector unions have the right to strike--a right which has often been exercised. However, a 4-month strike by publicly paid teachers was successful in gaining wage concessions. The small percentage of workers actually involved in the wage economy means that there is an ample supply of replacement workers for employers to draw on if disputes are not resolved quickly.

Solomon Islands joined the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1984, but has not yet ratified ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize or Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining. Solomon Islands' unions are free to affiliate internationally and the largest trade union, the Solomon Islands National Union of Workers, is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Solomon Islands' National Union of Workers and other smaller unions freely organize workers. Unions exist and are active in both the public and private sector. The Trade Disputes Council exists to arbitrate between unions and employers. Workers are protected against antiunion activity, and there are no areas where union activity is officially discouraged. There are no economic incentive zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by law, except as part of a court sentence or order, and this prohibition is observed.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Solomon Islands has comprehensive laws on worker rights. Child labor is forbidden for children under the age of 12 except in the company of parents in light agricultural or domestic work. Children under 15 are barred from work in industry or on ships; those under 18 cannot work underground or in mines.

Power to set minimum wages lies with the provincial governments. At the present time, in Honiara and provincial government stations, it is about 32 cents per hour. While small, this provides an adequate standard of living within the local context when supplemented by the subsistence farming and fishing practiced by most families. As noted above, most of the population is engaged in subsistence labor, and as there is high unemployment and underemployment, workers are readily available at this wage.

Labor laws regulate premium pay, sick leave, the right to paid vacations, and other conditions of service. The standard workweek is 45 hours and limited to 6 days weekly. There are provisions for premium pay for overtime and holiday work as well as provisions for maternity leaves. Both an active labor movement and an independent judiciary ensure widespread enforcement of labor laws in major state and private enterprises. The extent to which the law is enforced in smaller establishments and in the subsistence sector is unclear. The Workmen's Compensation Act and subsidiary legislation make provisions for compensation to workmen injured at work. No data are available about health and safety standards.

THAILAND

Thailand is a constitutional monarchy with a strong executive branch, an elected house of representatives, and an appointed senate. The civilian bureaucracy and the military play strong roles in political life. The monarch exerts strong informal influence. The Prime Minister and members of his Cabinet are subject to votes of confidence by the House, but need not be elected members of Parliament. The present Government, a six-party coalition headed by General (retired) Chatichai Choonhavan, an elected member of Parliament, took office following free national elections in July 1988.

Thailand's security services operate within a constitutional framework reflecting the strong executive branch orientation of the Government. They have wide-ranging powers which they sometimes utilize in an uneven way. The Government does not sanction human rights abuses by the security services and has taken steps to ameliorate those abuses that do occur. Residual Communist insurgent and Muslim separatist groups use terrorism to advance their respective aims. The Government has made notable progress in reducing the influence of these groups, but sporadic low-level violence continues in the south.

An emerging, middle-income, developing country, Thailand has a free enterprise economic system. Individual economic interests and the right to hold private property are strongly protected. While the industrial sector is expanding rapidly, over 60 percent of the Thai people still live in the countryside, and agriculture remains the main source of livelihood.

Thailand's citizens enjoy a wide range of civil and political liberties. Autonomous political parties, gatherings, and associations are allowed. The domestic press practices self-censorship, particularly in regard to the monarchy and military, and occasionally receives official warnings about reports unfavorable to the Government. Issues of the international press are sometimes banned. Despite this, there remains a wide measure of press freedom. Human rights activists in Thailand are able to bring issues to the attention of the Government and public, and they lobby successfully for corrective action.

Over the years, Thailand has provided first asylum to over a million persons fleeing the Indo-Chinese states. In 1989 it recommitted itself to providing temporary refuge to all Vietnamese and Lao asylum seekers. The Government also agreed to initiate refugee screening for Vietnamese asylum seekers which would ensure the integrity and fairness of final decisions on the refugee status of each person. It also agreed to permit the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) early access to all new arrivals and continued access following the determination of their status. Thailand undertook these commitments in June 1989 when it endorsed the Comprehensive Plan of Action (CPA) for Indo-Chinese refugees in Geneva. Thailand also continues to cooperate fully with the international community in providing assistance to the more than 300,000 displaced Cambodians located in camps along the Thai-Cambodian border.

THAILAND

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Allegations of government involvement in political killings are rare. In predominantly Muslim areas of south Thailand where separatist groups are active, however, security forces sometimes shoot first and ask questions later. On December 31, 1988, a contingent of Thai Marines mistakenly opened fire on a group of Thai Muslim defense force volunteers in a village in Narathiwat province, killing four of the volunteers. The Government promised to discipline the Marines if an investigation showed they had acted improperly. but by year's end no results had been announced. While the results of the investigation were not made public, members of the Muslim community professed satisfaction with the Government's response.

Communist insurgents and ethnic separatists continued to use violence, including murder, in pursuit of their objectives. Their targets have included low-level officials, as well as police and security forces. In 1989 Muslim separatists primarily attacked civilians, targeting places of entertainment and businesses, often in support of extortion efforts.

The number of journalists killed in rural areas has diminished sharply in recent years. Nevertheless, a journalist was slain in Samut Sakhon province in June. The press reported that police believed the journalist may have been killed because of his reporting on local business. In previous years, some murdered journalists had exposed corruption or illegal activity. Others apparently had engaged in blackmail or extortion and were killed in retaliation.

In previous years, senior Thai officials have been quoted in the press as acknowledging that police executions of habitual, serious, criminal offenders without due process occasionally occurs, particularly in southern Thailand, the area with the nation's highest crime rate.

There were no reports of abduction or kidnaping attributed to government forces in 1989. Communist insurgents and Muslim separatists sometimes use abduction of civilians and government officials as a political weapon. In October a Muslim separatist group kidnaped a public school teacher in Yala province and held her until the Government released the arrested wife of a separatist leader.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Thailand's criminal code forbids the use of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, and the Government maintains that it is opposed to such treatment or punishment. However, there also continued to be many credible reports of police beatings of prisoners and detainees. A Thai human rights organization announced in August that it had compiled at least 132 instances of injury and 27 deaths between 1983 and 1988 as a result of police brutality, most often during interrogations. In July the Bangkok police commissioner set up a committee to investigate charges that two officers of the juvenile welfare division had beaten a 14-year-old boy arrested for sniffing paint thinner. Also in July, a man filed a complaint alleging six policemen tortured him with an electric baton following his arrest on fraud charges. In August a Bangkok policeman was photographed by journalists standing on the chest of a deranged man who had attempted suicide by jumping off a house. The police suspended the officer and launched an investigation into the conduct of two others who were on the scene. Witnesses alleged the three officers had been drinking before the incident.

Human rights advocates charge that offending policemen often try to cover up abuses by offering payoffs to victims or their families. Nevertheless, charges of police misconduct appear freely in the press, and victims, often assisted by human rights activists, have successfully won redress for documented abuses in the courts. However, few police or security officials are ever convicted for such abuses, and even when convictions occur penalties are so light that they do not serve as an effective deterrent.

In recent years, international attention has focused on reports of torture, murder, and rape of Khmer residing in displaced persons camps by Thai paramilitary forces charged with providing security for the camps. Since the formation of the Displaced Persons Protective Unit (DPPU) by the Government in June 1988, violent incidents and abuse by security forces have been "virtually eliminated" according to the International Committee of the Red Cross.

The major complaints by camp residents about degrading and abusive treatment now concern acts committed by Khmer against other Khmer. The principal camp where such violations have been reported is Site Two, where more than 140,000 Khmer reside at close quarters. Up to 90 incidents of violence were reported monthly in the Khmer camps in 1989, resulting in fewer than 10 deaths per month. Suicide attempts also remain relatively high.

The civilian population in camps controlled by the forces of Democratic Kampuchea (DK) are another area of concern. While conditions in the U.N.-assisted camps under DK control are not markedly worse than those in other U.N.-assisted camps along the border, thousands of civilians live in areas inaccessible to the international community. Forced movement of the population is relatively frequent, often resulting in exposure to military risks such as shelling and land mines. Discipline in Khmer Rouge camps is alleged to be harsh and excessive by many voluntary and international agencies who have interviewed former camp residents.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Thailand's criminal and civil codes follow Western European models, and the rights of suspects are similar to those in Western Europe. Except in cases of crimes in progress, arrest warrants generally are required, and specific charges must be brought against those detained within a limited time period. There is a functioning bail system. Reports of arbitrary arrest are infrequent.

A small number of Communist insurgents and Muslim separatists remain detained without trial by order of the Prime Minister under martial law provisions. Although these provisions were eased significantly in 1984 and most of those originally detained under these provisions have since been released, some 20 remain in detention. Currently, the only legal basis for arrest and detention without specific charges for long periods (up to 480 days) is the Anti-Communist Activities Act. No arrests under this Act were made in 1989, and the Cabinet voted to consider repealing the Act and replacing it with a new internal security law. Additionally, the Government dropped 3 cases involving 12 persons arrested in 1984, 1986, and 1987 under the provisions of an amnesty law passed by the Parliament in July.

Thailand does not use exile for political control. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution grants citizens the presumption of innocence and access to courts or administrative bodies to seek redress. Suspects can be denied the right to legal counsel during the pretrial or investigative period of their cases, but before trial they have access to a lawyer of their own choosing.

The legal system provides for trial by judges rather than jury. Cases are heard by a panel of judges on the basis of specific charges, usually well documented. Persons tried in both military and ordinary criminal courts enjoy a broad range of legal rights, including the right to counsel both in the trial and appellate stages, but a serious flaw in providing due process rights is the lack of appeal from decisions of a military court. Since 1984, the jurisdiction of military courts has been limited to cases involving military personnel. Most prisoners benefit from periodic amnesties reducing the length of sentences, and any prisoner may apply for a royal pardon. The courts are relatively independent of external pressures. There have been allegations, however, of government and private influence on certain cases, often those involving narcotics. A pilot government program to provide free legal advice to the poor continues. Most free legal aid, however, comes from private groups, including the Lawyer's Association and the Women Lawyers' Association.

In 1988 eight persons, allegedly involved in printing and/or distributing defamatory leaflets, were arrested for defaming the royal family (lese majeste). Three of the eight were convicted and sentenced in November 1988; two to 3 1/2 years and one to 4 1/2 years. As the trials were held in camera, details are not available. No arrests for defaming the monarchy occurred in 1989.

Twenty to 30 persons originally detained under the Anti-Communist Activities Act but later convicted of criminal offenses did not come under the terms of the 1989 amnesty and remain imprisoned. The Government disputes human rights advocates' categorization of all of these persons as political prisoners, pointing out that some were convicted of such charges as robbery and murder. Human rights groups maintain that at least some of these prisoners were tried on trumped up charges. Eighteen to 20 Muslim separatists remained imprisoned in 1989 on charges including extortion, unlawful weapons possession, and murder. Some of them face consecutive sentences totaling 200 to 300 years. Human rights advocates note that such long sentences violate Thai legal norms.

THAILAND

Fourteen members of a self-styled "revolutionary council" were arrested in 1989 under sedition charges after they published documents announcing the dissolution of the Parliament and the establishment of a "revolutionary" regime. At preliminary hearings in July, all 14 pleaded not guilty. Only two of the members of the group succeeded in raising funds for bail. As of December, the other 10 remained in jail.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Thai society is essentially an open one where membership in political organizations is voluntary, and the police function is seldom abused for security or political purposes. The unmonitored exchange of ideas generally is permitted, although those espousing leftist or controversial views are probably watched by the security services. Thai law requires that police possess a search warrant prior to entering a home without the owner's consent. There are allegations that officers sometimes endorse warrants in advance and then allow their noncommissioned subordinates to apply them as needed. Sections of the Anti-Communist Activities Act allow officials involved in specifically designated "Communist suppression operations" to conduct searches without warrants, but these powers have been used sparingly.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution affirms citizens' rights to free speech and a free press, but there are laws which restrict those rights. The principal legal restrictions on these freedoms are prohibitions against insulting or defaming the King, Queen, heir apparent, or Regent (lese majeste), advocating a Communist system of government, or publishing materials which threaten national security or insult religion. Thai citizens enjoy substantial freedom of speech in other respects, and the Government permits criticism of its policies. However, criticism is not entirely without risks, and prominent critics occasionally have been the targets of violence by mysterious assailants.

Television and radio stations are licensed by the Government and operated by the Government, the army, and private entities as commercial enterprises. Although the Government's Broadcasting Directing Board in theory reviews all television programs prior to broadcast, in practice most programs are not prescreened, and stations present a range of viewpoints. In September 1989, however, the Board decided not to allow broadcast of a feature program on the Vietnam war on the grounds that the program supported the ideology of the Communist Vietnamese Government and would be beneficial for Thai Communists. Radio stations are required to carry a government-produced newscast four times daily but are free to originate other news and commentary. Opinions critical of government positions have been broadcast but, in general, controversial issues are treated cautiously, if at all.

While international publications generally circulated freely, in November the Government briefly banned sale and distribution of "The Asian Wall Street Journal" for having published an article deemed insulting to Thailand's senior Buddhist monk. The ban, which was lifted following an appeal by the Journal's editor, came under the 1941 Press Law empowering the chief of police to prohibit the import of printed matter dangerous to public order and morals. Earlier, the Government used the same law to ban temporarily import of the South China Morning Post for reporting an alleged coup plot. The police also considered but in the end rejected taking action against the Hong Kong based weekly magazine The Far Eastern Economic Review for an article allegedly implicating government tourism officials in promoting prostitution. The privately owned Thai press presented a wide range of political and social commentary. Technical publications and pamphlets, including those of academics, circulate freely, and the latter present viewpoints ranging from the non-Communist left to the ultraright. Foreign and domestic books normally are not censored, unless they are critical of the royal family or the monarchy. However, in March the police special branch announced it would take steps to halt the sale of the controversial novel "The Satanic Verses," following rallies by Thai Muslims demanding such a ban. The police later raided several bookstores and arrested the owner of a store found selling the book. Similarly, the Interior Ministry ordered the seizure of the August edition of Bangkok magazine which bore a cover photograph satirizing a Buddhist monk. The police warned the publisher not to publish anything insulting to religion or he would face legal action. Additionally, some 219 publications, many of them treatises on Chinese communism, remained banned under an executive order dating from the martial law period.

The press continues to operate under the restrictions imposed by the Press Law of 1941 and remnants of past martial law orders. It practices self-censorship and is particularly cautious about criticism of the military or monarchy. Current legislation permits the Government to close newspapers and revoke the licenses of editors of newspapers which publish stories deemed to be libelous or contrary to national security interests. In 1987 the Government closed one newspaper, which resumed publication within a few weeks; in 1988 and 1989 none were closed. Nevertheless, on several occasions in 1989, the police warned the press not to print stories on controversial subjects. Additionally, the army and some cabinet members more frequently invoked existing restrictive laws to issue warnings to publications printing critical articles.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution ensures the rights of assembly and association. In practice, these rights are exercised freely by politicians, students, labor, and other interest groups without government interference. All associations, including labor unions, must be registered by the Government. The Government, however, does not use the withholding of registration to inhibit freedom of association for any groups. Permits are not required for assembly.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is generally practiced throughout Thailand and protected by law and custom. Theravada Buddhism, the de facto state religion, has had an abiding and profound influence on Thai culture and history, and most Thai practice it. The King is required by the Constitution to profess the Buddhist faith and practice Buddhism. Nonetheless, Thailand is a secular society with church and state clearly separate. There are no restrictions on religious ceremonies, the teaching of religion, or conversion from one religion to another, but controversies occasionally arise.

In 1989 the Government moved against Santi Asoke, a nonconformist Buddhist sect. Police arrested the founder of the order, Rak Rakphong, also known as Photirak, in June, for failing to comply with the Buddhist Sangha Supreme Council's order to leave the monkhood. The charge against Photirak under the Sangha Act, which sets forth the regulations of the Buddhist hierarchy, carries a penalty of 6 months in jail or a $40 fine. At year's end, hearings in the case were continuing in a Bangkok court, although press coverage of the proceedings was limited under a gag order.

In August Photirak was also charged with 79 counts of inciting his followers to violate Article 208 of the Criminal Code by representing themselves falsely as monks even though they were not legally ordained. The 79 followers were also detained for falsely dressing as monks before being released on bail. This offense is punishable by a maximum of 1 year in jail or an $80 fine. On September 8, in a preliminary hearing, public prosecutors deemed the evidence insufficient to sustain the charge.

Under applicable regulations, missionaries are permitted to live and proselytize in Thailand, as has been the case for more than a century. Thailand does restrict the number of missionaries and places limited restrictions on their activities, but foreign clergy in the country are permitted to preach freely. There is no legal or organized discrimination against, or persecution of, those affiliated with minority religions, such as Christianity or Islam. Religious publishing, regardless of faith, is allowed. As with private associations, religious institutions are registered by the Government. Most senior Thai officials and political leaders are at least nominally Buddhist. Muslims living in the four southern provinces, which have majority Muslim populations, have the right to have civil law cases decided by Muslim judges under Koranic law.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Longstanding restrictions on the travel and place of residence of Chinese and Vietnamese aliens living in Thailand remained in place in 1989. The right of citizens to change their residence or workplace was unabridged. The only limitations on travel of persons other than aliens and refugees were restrictions on entry into certain rural areas believed by the Government to be used as bases by Communist insurgents. Apart from prohibiting direct travel between Thailand and Cambodia, the Government did not restrict emigration or foreign travel, except by government officials. Passport applications by single Thai women and children under the age of 14 must be approved by the Department of Public Welfare. In addition, a 1985 statute criticized by some women's rights advocates requires that female passport applicants under age 36 sit through a series of interviews regarding their employment records and finances. These provisions are intended to prevent the export of children for sale and women for purposes of prostitution. The Government has not revoked citizenship for political reasons.

THAILAND

Thailand is not a party to international legal instruments regarding refugees and their basic rights. However, it has acted in the spirit of those agreements by providing first asylum to approximately 710,000 refugees from Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam since 1975, and by permitting the temporary relocation of 350,000 Khmer, classed as displaced persons, on its side of the Thai-Cambodian border.

In 1988 the Government severely restricted first asylum and began to push off boats carrying Vietnamese asylum seekers. The push-off policy, which was never uniformly enforced, ended in April 1989 after the Government committed itself to restore first asylum at the preparatory conference on Indo-Chinese refugees in Kuala Lumpur, and then at the UN International Conference on Indo-China refugees in Geneva in June. There were no confirmed reports of Thai Government pushoffs between April and the end of December.

Attacks on Vietnamese asylum seekers by Thai pirates in the Gulf of Thailand resulted in a dramatic upsurge in the number of deaths, rapes, abductions, and missing persons in 1989. The Government arrested 14 suspected pirates in 1989. By year's end, two had been convicted and sentenced to long prison terms.

Following the civil disorders in Rangoon in 1988, 3,000 to 4,000 Burmese students fled to the Thai-Burma border area. Although most students reside in camps on the Burmese side of the border, some live on the Thai side and in Bangkok on a permanent basis. Thailand's official policy is to consider undocumented Burmese as illegal immigrants subject to deportation.

In practice, the Government usually has provided refuge to the students when they have crossed the border fleeing military hostilities or probable persecution. The Government has on occasion arrested students and workers as illegal immigrants, taken them to the border, and directed them to return to Burma. These repatriations generally have been only to areas in Burma controlled by ethnic minority insurgent groups hostile to the Rangoon regime. There have been no confirmed reports of forced repatriation into the hands of the Burmese military or civil authorities. Those repatriated often return to Thailand once there is no longer a Thai government presence in the border area.

In late 1988 and early 1989, the Government initiated a program to repatriate voluntarily Burmese students. Approximately 160 students returned to Rangoon under Thai military auspices. Some groups, including Amnesty International and the ICRC, allege the returns were "less than voluntary" and that the Government had pressured the students to return to Rangoon. Some have alleged that a number of the students who returned have disappeared and others have been subject to human rights violations.

Lao asylum seekers in Thailand are screened by the UNHCR to determine their eligibility for refugee status. The screening program was revised following the 1989 International Conference on Indo-Chinese refugees. Although there were isolated reports of pushbacks of Lao asylum seekers by the Government in 1989, there were fewer than in previous years. Thailand is cooperating with UNHCR in a trilateral program with Laos for the return of certain Lao asylum seekers.

THAILAND

The Constitution provides a means for citizens peacefully to change their government, and the political system has become more open in the past 10 years. However, in practice there are still impediments. The traditional military-bureaucratic elite retains considerable influence and remains a significant, possibly decisive, factor in determining who governs Thailand. Constitutional processes are shallowly rooted. Most politicians and political parties have little contact with the population at the grass roots except during election campaigns, and critics charge they more closely reflect private business interests than the popular will. Many Thais assume that the military, rather than abjuring intervention in the political process, has simply chosen to exert its influence from behind the scenes. In 1989 the Government continued to exercise caution regarding policies and actions of which the military would strongly disapprove.

Prime Minister Chatichai, himself a Member of Parliament and the leader of the party which won the largest number of seats in July 1988, is supported by parties holding roughly three-fifths of the seats in the House. The appointed Senate has limited legislative powers and is composed largely of active duty and retired military and government officials. In the 1988 national elections for the House, which were open and free, 16 political parties fielded a record number of candidates. The election resulted in the formation of a six-party coalition Government. Opposition parties regularly present opposing views both within the National Assembly and in the mass media. The National Assembly almost invariably has dissenting votes on legislation and procedural decisions.

Elections are based on universal suffrage for adults over the age of 20, and are required by the Constitution at least once every 4 years. The Government encourages voter turnout but does not use either direct or indirect pressure to compel voting. Voter turnout for both national and local elections generally exceeds 50 percent, and in the 1988 Parliamentary election reached a record 64 percent.

The Government has responded to specific inquiries on human rights matters from Amnesty International and the International Commission of Jurists. With occasional exceptions, it is generally willing to discuss human rights problems with both domestic and international human rights organizations. Also, human rights organizations of all kinds are generally permitted to visit Thailand, meet with appropriate government officials, and lobby for corrective action.

Thai human rights organizations have had significant success in recent years. They have, for example, successfully encouraged the Government to tighten the discipline of police and paramilitary forces fighting the Communist insurgency and have brought pressure to alleviate widespread abuses in child labor practices and in prisons. The number of nongovernmental human rights organizations has increased. Local civil and women's rights groups, active on a wide range of issues, including combating prostitution and seeking improved enforcement of labor laws, have devoted most of their efforts to the promotion of women's rights and identifying and correcting human rights violations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

Thailand has made considerable progress, particularly considering its limited resources, in accomplishing the integration of its minorities. In 1988 the Government began a comprehensive new plan for improving the living conditions of hill tribes and providing more of them with the opportunity to obtain citizenship and otherwise integrate into the mainstream. Although much of the plan appears to move toward integrating the hill tribes into Thai society while leaving them physically in place, there are provisions for resettling those living in restricted areas such as national forests. Thai officials have stated that any such relocations would be accomplished by persuasion rather than by force.

Ethnic Chinese, found throughout Thailand, with a concentration in Bangkok, are relatively well assimilated, but there is a tradition of popular resentment directed against their trading and financial activities. This resentment has never provoked violent persecution and is dissipating as the Chinese are assimilated into Thai society.

Muslims are a significant minority and represent a majority in Thailand's southernmost provinces bordering Malaysia. The Government has put much effort into regionally targeted development efforts and the creation of educational opportunities in order to integrate Thai Muslims into Thai society. However, Muslims continue to be underrepresented in government service, the professions, and in higher education.

The community of Vietnamese which fled Indochina in the 1940's and 1950's to northeastern Thailand lives under a set of laws and regulations restricting their movements, residences, education, and occupation. Persons who travel illegally can be imprisoned. Since 1980 these Vietnamese have been forbidden to buy new cars. While some of these restrictions are laxly enforced, the approximately 40,000 Vietnamese in this category remain worried that their situation could change for the worse. Those born in Vietnam have no chance of obtaining Thai citizenship under existing laws, although their children born in Thailand can do so in some cases if they pass a background investigation. In December 1988, Prime Minister Chatichai directed relevant government agencies to draft a law providing for the naturalization of long-resident aliens and their children. No draft has emerged to date, however, and the law is likely to make slow progress through the bureaucracy and Parliament. In the meantime, the continuation of restrictions represents, in part, a conscious Thai policy to discourage further emigration from Vietnam, and in part a reaction to the belief that the Vietnamese represent a kind of "fifth column" within Thailand, as it is widely believed that many of these Vietnamese owe allegiance to the Communist Government in Hanoi.

The status and role of women have improved steadily over the past several years. With few exceptions, women have equal legal rights, with specific guarantees of property and divorce rights, and there are no allegations that these rights are denied. Thai law, however, denies Thai nationality to children born of alien fathers and Thai mothers, regardless of place of birth. In March Prime Minister Chatichai approved the establishment of a new body to promote women's rights, the National Commission for the Promotion and Coordination of Women's Affairs.

Thai law contains prohibitions on both wife beating and child abuse, and the Government has enunciated a policy emphasizing ending physical abuse of women and children. Enforcement is uneven, however. Human rights advocates point out that the Thai legal system lacks any means to intervene short of criminal prosecution of the abusive spouse or parent. Rules of evidence often make prosecuting these cases difficult, especially when the victims are children. For a combination of these reasons and ingrained cultural attitudes, police are frequently reluctant to pursue such cases. Women's and children's rights groups actively and effectively assist victims of abuse who come to their attention in pursuing legal action. Reliable data on the extent of abuse of women and children are not available. However, some critics believe that wife beating is common.

Prostitution is a significant social problem in Thailand, driven by a combination of longstanding cultural attitudes, rural poverty, and the profits derived from the sex-based component of the modern tourism industry. Despite periodic well-publicized raids on brothels, overall enforcement of laws prohibiting prostitution is lax, in part due to petty police corruption. Children's rights advocates and the Government differ on the number of minors engaged in prostitution, but the official estimate is 30,000. Estimates of the total number of women engaged in prostitution range up to 800,000. Studies have shown that the majority of women engaged in prostitution come from impoverished rural areas. In the case of minors, the majority have been "sold" by their parents to procurers or owners of brothels. Research by human rights groups also suggests that most adults and minors engaged in prostitution are not held against their will (although there are such cases) and view the activity as a legitimate means of improving the financial lot of their families. The social stigma attached to money earned through prostitution has decreased markedly in rural areas. Human rights advocates also report that women engaged in prostitution are rarely subjected to beatings or other violent mistreatment.

Women are well represented in the labor force and becoming increasingly so in professional positions, particularly in the commercial sector. According to the latest available Thai government statistics, women accounted for almost 54 percent of employment in trade, 47 percent in agriculture, 44 percent in services, and 39 percent in industry. In general, women are not barred legally from positions traditionally held by men. However, women continue to be concentrated in traditionally lower paid jobs, and there is a significant gap in average salaries. No accurate statistics are available on this gap, which appears to be narrowing. In rural areas, sex stereotypes are more pronounced with respect to social roles. These barriers are being modified as mass communications bring different role models to even the most remote communities.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Labor Relations Act of 1975 affirmed the rights of employees to form and join unions or employee associations of their own choosing; decide on the constitutions and rules of their associations and unions; formulate their views without government or employer interference; confederate with other unions; be protected against discrimination, dissolution, suspension, or termination by any outside authority because of union activities; and have employee representation in direct negotiations with employers. No Thai law, including the 1975 Act, however, explicitly protects workers from discrimination due to their participation in organizing new unions which have not yet been registered.

The 1975 Act specifically withholds union rights from government workers. Civil servants, therefore, may not unionize, though they may and do form "employee associations," which are influential in determining salary scales, benefits, and conditions of employment. All state enterprise workers may unionize, except those at the Bank of Thailand and the airports authority. The state enterprise sector is the backbone of the labor movement in terms of the number of union members and of the relative strength of its unions.

In addition to a prohibition on strikes in "essential services" (defined to include ports, education, transportation, fuel and energy, telecommunications, hospitals, and waterworks), the right to strike is denied all state enterprise workers. Nevertheless, strikes do occur in the public sector and are usually tolerated by the Government. In 1989 industrial peace prevailed in the state enterprise sector, except for the ports, which saw work stoppages in August and September to resist proposed privatization of a new deep-sea port near Bangkok. Though such strikes are prohibited, no action was taken against the port unions. Another stoppage took place in June at the Electricity Generating Authority of Thailand, in protest of a proposed change of board membership that also had strong privatization implications. That stoppage ended when the Government reconstituted the board of directors.

In most of the private sector, 24-hour notice to management is the only legally mandated prerequisite to a strike. However, the Government has the authority "to restrict the right to strike whenever a strike would affect national security or cause severe negative repercussions for the population at large." The Government used this provision to end one strike in the banking sector in 1989. It was also used to end lockouts in two large manufacturing enterprises, which in both cases had been precipitated by failed strikes protesting working conditions. This in fact represented a pattern for industrial disputes in the private sector: strikes leading to lockouts terminated by government intervention, often then leading to labor court cases filed by labor demanding an award of severance pay to those workers who cease their employment in the affected enterprise.

Thai labor has organized slowly since basic worker rights were affirmed. In 1989 about 12 percent of the industrial work force (defined by the Government as those working in "enterprises," which represents less than 10 percent of the total labor force) was unionized. Union membership and power is heavily concentrated in the state enterprise sector. A cultural factor in the slow growth of organized labor is the historically benign and paternalistic relationship of employers to employees. A provision of Thai labor law permitting the formation of labor unions with as few as 10 members also contributed to a high degree of fractionalization at both the union and confederation levels. This manifested itself in a steady increase in the number of registered unions to almost 600, while overall union membership remained virtually constant at around 300,000. Critics believe that this promotes the company unions beholden to management and thus is an infringement of the right of association.

The law effectively guarantees unionists security of their person and protection of their property, and there were no allegations that Thai unionists were particularly subject to violent incidents related to their union activities.

Thai unions generally operate independently of the Government and other outside organizations. However, unionists, along with employers, are represented in a variety of tripartite committees charged with formulating and implementing national labor policy. Despite a history of voluntary association and common cause between unionists and military elements, the importance of such connections continues to decline as the relative political strength and independence of unions rose. Leaders of the main labor federations recognized that fractionalization weakened their impact and continued to coordinate on such national issues as minimum wage, privatization, social security, "temporary" labor abuse, and health and safety issues. Thai unions have tended to be apolitical, in part because the 1975 Act withholds certain protections in cases of "political" activity.

Continuing an effort begun in 1988 when the Chatichai Government came to power, unionists frequently express their views to the Government on key issues. Increases in the minimum wage and salary levels for civil servants and state enterprise workers went into effect in early 1989 after extensive union lobbying late in 1988. Strongly supported by labor, Thailand's Social Security Law passed the House of Representatives in July, and awaits Senate consideration in the spring of 1990. A legislative initiative to create a labor ministry failed to be introduced into the Parliament in 1989 due to disagreement about its eventual scope. Two more prominent unionists were appointed to the Senate in 1989, but no unionists serve in the more influential House of Representatives.

Unions have maintained relations freely with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Asean Trade Union Congress, and various national labor bodies, including those of the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, and Israel. Thai unionists have also participated in meetings and seminars sponsored by the World Federation of Trade Unions.

The American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) repeatedly has alleged the existence of severe limitations on the right of association in Thailand. Among these have been restrictions on the right to strike in the private sector, the prohibition of unionization by civil servants, the prohibition of strikes in state enterprises, the inadequate legal protection of union activists against dismissal from their jobs, and the requirement that union leaders also be full-time workers in the plants or industries which they represent. The AFL-CIO has also cited alleged widespread abuse of "temporary" labor and reported abuses of child labor. The U.S. Government has found that a basis for many of these allegations exists and accordingly in 1989 continued to encourage the Thai Government to improve worker rights.

THAILAND

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

All Thai workers are guaranteed the right of collective bargaining. The law prescribes procedures to ensure employee participation in the determination of working conditions, wages, and benefits. In recent years, such bargaining has focused more on benefit packages and working conditions than on wages. There were no instances of industrywide collective bargaining agreements. Both labor and management usually seek to resolve potential differences informally before turning to formal collective bargaining. The 1975 Labor Relations Act defined the mechanisms for such negotiations and for conciliation and arbitration under government auspices in cases under dispute. The conciliation and arbitration procedures are mandatory for state enterprises.

A system of labor courts implemented in 1980 exercises judicial review over most aspects of labor law. Workers may also seek redress for their grievances from a tripartite labor relations committee under the Ministry of Interior. The law does not fully protect workers against antiunion discrimination and retribution. The law requiring union leaders also to work full time in the plants or industries which they represent tends to make them vulnerable to employer action in cases of conflict, especially as they have no explicit protection against dismissal for union activities prior to the formal registration of their union. The Thai Court Law of 1980 prohibits "unfair dismissal," but Thai courts have not been uniform in their interpretation of this law.

Employers continued to have at their disposal significant means to prevent the unionization of their enterprises. Employees who were determined to have been dismissed "unfairly" by the labor court were seldom reinstated. Instead, there was a widespread reliance on severance pay as compensation to resolve labor disputes. Additionally, the common use of "temporary" or contract labor was also an effective means of discouraging or preventing unionization. An Interior Ministry announcement on temporary employment issued in October sought to enhance labor protection and to improve benefits for temporary workers by eliminating the legal distinction between temporary and permanent workers. By year's end, however, it was unclear what practical effect the announcement would have, and many unionist were highly critical of the change.

There are several special export processing zones (EPZ's) in Thailand, with many more planned to stimulate further the growth of export-oriented industry. No separate labor legislation is applicable within the export processing zones, where wages and working conditions in fact usually exceed national norms. There are trade unions and collective bargaining in Thai EPZ's.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor except in the case of national emergency, war, or martial law. There were no allegations of forced or compulsory labor in 1989.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Child labor continued to be a source of considerable domestic and foreign criticism in 1989, including from the AFL-CIO.

THAILAND

Foreign interest groups have focused heavily on the exploitation of working children. Thai law prohibits the employment of children under age 12, and limits their employment between the ages of 12 and 15 to "light work." Employment of children at night (10 p.m. to 6 a.m.) is prohibited. Complaints against Thailand alleged that Thai standards are low and that their enforcement is inadequate. There was no substantial new evidence of the employment of children under age 12 in 1989. However, there continued to be strong anecdotal indications that children over age 12 were employed in dangerous, unhealthful, or otherwise harmful circumstances. Occasional fires or accidents involving children working or living in factories and construction sites have concentrated public attention on deficiencies. Thai efforts to correct these problems again were hampered in 1989 by inadequate budget resources for inspection and enforcement, and by low penalties and fines which did not sufficiently deter potential violators. The Cabinet, acknowledging the seriousness of child labor problems, approved a threefold increase in manpower for the Department of Labor division responsible for child labor issues. Implementation of the increase began in late 1989. Additionally, large increases in manpower for general labor inspection were also approved and funded. The Cabinet in June also approved increasing the level of compulsory education from 6 to 9 years, though implementation of this decision had not begun by year's end.

A revision of Thai labor protection regulations applicable to working children in the nonagricultural sector, approved in principle by the Cabinet and expected in 1988, was still pending in 1989. The key feature of the proposed revision was an immediate increase in the minimum age to 13 and a long-term increase to 15. In addition to improved inspection and enforcement expected from the manpower increases noted above and the increase in the level of compulsory education, the Government, led personally by Prime Minister Chatichai, initiated a broad campaign to sensitize the public to the problems of child labor.

Working conditions vary widely in Thailand. Medium and large factories, which produce most of Thailand's export goods, generally work 8-hour shifts under conditions which meet international standards. Health and safety standards are maintained voluntarily, minimum wages usually are exceeded, children are not employed, and employees enjoy various additional benefits. However, in Thailand's large informal sector, which is susceptible to minimal inspection, enforcement, and educational efforts by the Government, internationally recognized health and safety standards are generally little understood or upheld. As government health and safety initiatives take firmer hold in larger enterprises, the Government will need to develop special outreach programs to bring both education and enforcement into the informal and small enterprise sector. Government programs for industrial safety have relied primarily on informational campaigns and voluntary compliance. While the programs themselves have been praised as among the best in the region, more resources are required to meet health and safety challenges posed by rapid industrialization. The national force of labor inspectors, even after the increase approved in 1989 is fully implemented, will remain inadequate to the task of investigating and pursuing all potential violations under Thai law, especially in the absence of complaints. Another impediment is the fact that many businesses in violation of the law are often unregistered, evade taxes, and operate outside the sphere of government inspection and regulation. The cooperative rather than coercive nature of Thai labor inspection and enforcement practices is criticized by some observers as being ineffectual.

Unskilled laborers who pour into Bangkok from the far poorer countryside often are willing to work at less than the minimum wage ($3 per day in the Bangkok area, less in most other provinces). In rural Thailand too, many workers are also willing to work for less than the minimum wage. The established minimum wage levels are adequate to provide workers and their families a decent standard of living, given Thailand's level of economic development. Government officials continued to report that large groups of laborers--estimated at about one-third of the total--received less than the legal minimum wage, and to exhort labor inspectors to enforce prescribed rates more effectively.

The Government has yet to give full legal effect to the 48-hour workweek. Commercial employees are not permitted to exceed 54 hours per week; employees in industry 48 hours per week; those in "dangerous" work 42 hours per week. Transportation workers are restricted to no more than 8 hours per day.

TONGA

The Kingdom of Tonga comprises 169 islands scattered over an area of 360,000 square kilometers of the South Pacific. All but a handful of the approximately 108,000 inhabitants are Polynesian. Tonga is a constitutional monarchy, with political life dominated by the King, the nobility, and a few prominent commoners. In 1900 it became a protectorate of Great Britain. In 1970 it became fully independent again and a member of the Commonwealth of Nations.

The security apparatus is responsive to and controlled by the Minister of Police, a senior member of the nobility.

Tonga's economy is based almost exclusively on the cultivation of tropical and semitropical crops. An increasing demand for imported manufactured goods and products unavailable locally has led to a substantial trade deficit. This has largely been offset by remittances from Tongans employed abroad, overseas aid, and, to a lesser degree, tourism.

Despite its autocratic nature, the Government respects and defends basic human rights. There were no significant human rights issues reported during the year.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No such killings occurred.

b. Disappearance

There were no disappearances, and no evidence of people being abducted, secretly arrested, or clandestinely detained.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman or degrading punishment or other such treatment are forbidden by the Constitution, and there were no reported instances of such practices.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The right to judicial determination of the legality of arrest is enshrined in the Constitution and observed in practice. There is no preventive detention and no exile, internal or external.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The court system is organized on the British model. The senior resident judge is appointed from overseas, usually from Great Britain. The right to a fair public trial is provided for by law and honored in practice. No one may be summoned before any court without first having received a written indictment clearly stating the offense with which that person is charged. Defendants are entitled to counsel, and lawyers have free access to defendants. The judiciary is free of government interference, and there are no special courts for political or security offenses. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

By law no one may enter or search the home of another, or remove any item of property unless in possession of a warrant issued by a magistrate. There is no arbitrary intrusion by the State or political organizations into a person's private life.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is provided for in the Constitution. The one radio station and the country's largest circulation newspaper are government owned. Other components of the media are privately owned. There were no known instances of censorship. The Minister of Police has inveighed and threatened action against the independent media in one or two cases, but no action has ever been taken.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Peaceful assembly and association are provided for by law. There are no significant restrictions.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution and observed in practice. Missionaries may proselytize without impediment.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Tongan citizens are free to travel anywhere within the Kingdom and abroad. There are no restrictions on repatriation. There are no displaced persons in Tonga.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the ability to change their leaders or the system of government. The King and a small group of hereditary nobles dominate political life in Tonga. They assert authority largely through their control of substantial landholdings. The Constitution allows the monarch broad powers, many of which do not require the endorsement of the legislative branch. The King appoints and presides over the Privy Council, which makes major policy decisions. (When the King is not presiding, the Privy Council is called the Cabinet). The King also selects the prime minister and other cabinet ministers, who hold office at his pleasure. Tonga's unicameral legislature, the Legislative Assembly, consists of 9 cabinet ministers, 9 nobles elected by their peers (33 noble titles are recognized by the Constitution), and 9 people's representatives elected by all literate, tax-paying males and all literate females. Those above 21 years of age are eligible to vote. The King appoints a speaker from among the nobles' representatives. Government ministers and nobles' representatives generally vote as a bloc. People's representatives sometimes vote against the Government. Elections are held every 3 years. There are no political parties.

There have been no reports of human rights violations. There are no local nongovernmental organizations which concern themselves with human rights. Tonga is not represented at the United Nations. The Government has not taken an active interest in international human rights matters.

Social, cultural, and economic facilities are available to all citizens regardless of race, religion, or sex. However, members of the hereditary nobility have substantial advantages in Tongan society. These include control over most of the land and a generally privileged status. Nonetheless, it is possible for commoners to rise to cabinet positions in government and to accumulate great wealth and status in the private sector.

While the strong Polynesian cultural tradition has not encouraged the rise of women to positions of leadership, some have become members of the legislature and served in responsible positions in skilled and semiskilled occupations. No statistics are available on the employment of women in professional occupations or on women's wages compared to men. Little information is available on the incidence of domestic violence in Tonga. The authorities generally do not take an active role in such cases. Wife beating is generally settled in traditional ways between the families and village chiefs; abused wives sometimes return to their families if mediation fails.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to form unions. Tonga passed a trade union act in 1964, but to date no unions have been formed. Tonga is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Since no unions have been formed in Tonga, collective bargaining is not a widespread practice, but it does occur informally. Labor laws and regulations are uniformly enforced in all sectors of the economy, including in export enhancement zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by law and not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

No information is available on current Tongan child labor legislation. In practice, child labor is not used in Tonga.

TONGA

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

By regulation the workweek in Tonga is limited to 40 hours. A panel chaired by the Minister of Labor, Commerce, and Industry has been empowered to set minimum wage guidelines but by year's end had not done so. Although Tonga still does not have a minimum wage law, it has for some years set minimum daily wages for such sectors of the economy as manufacturing and tourism. Workers are protected to a degree by the ease with which they can return to their villages and live without a cash income if wages offered are inadequate. Worker rights legislation covering such matters as safety standards, conditions of employment, and child labor is pending in the Legislative Assembly. Industrial accidents are rare as few industries exist that would expose workers to significant danger. Legislation for the provision of social security benefits to the work force has been under consideration by the Government since 1983.

VANUATU

Vanuatu is a South Pacific island nation with an estimated population of 150,000. It became independent in 1980, following more than 70 years of joint British-French rule. It has a parliamentary system of government with a prime minister and a 46-member parliament. Independence was accompanied by temporary political turbulence which left a legacy of suspicion towards outside interference. Most of the internal strains from the 1980 secessionist rebellion have now subsided, although island and regional loyalties remain strong. The civilian authorities control the police and the paramilitary mobile forces.

Political legitimacy in Vanuatu is based on majority rule, supported by both Melanesian and Western tradition. Following free and fair elections in 1983 and 1987, Vanuatu underwent a period of domestic turmoil beginning in May 1988.

The Vanuatu economy is dependent on international trade and therefore vulnerable to shifts in world market prices. Prior to the political turbulence, tourism earned more foreign exchange than all other exports combined. The downward trends in tourism and foreign investment, started by cyclone Uma in early 1987 and exacerbated by the violence in 1988 and subsequent political uncertainty, continued into early 1989. Tourism, however, picked up considerably after the establishment of Air Vanuatu's direct weekend flights to Australia in mid-1989.

Despite the political turbulence, human rights remained generally unrestricted, although concerns have been raised about restrictions on freedom of speech and press.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Neither the Government nor any organized group has resorted to political or other extrajudicial killing.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Constitutional guarantees against torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment are observed in practice and enforced by the courts. Prisoners also have recourse to an Ombudsman. In 1988 four members of the Vanuatu Mobile Force were convicted by a local magistrate court on charges that they beat a prisoner.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were no reports of arbitrary arrests in Vanuatu. Arrest is by warrant. There is no exile. During the period of political turmoil, opposition figures charged that the Government tried to interfere with their access to counsel by revoking the residency permit of an expatriate lawyer who had been a prominent advisor to the opposition. However, all of the "interim government" defendants had outside counsel available to them in their trial and in the subsequent (successful) appeal. The constitutional provision is observed that suspects will be informed of charges and given a speedy hearing before a judge.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The courts uphold constitutional provisions for a fair public trial, presumption of innocence until guilt is proven, prohibition against double jeopardy, the right of habeas corpus, and appeal to the Supreme Court. The courts are free of military or executive interference. Throughout the constitutional turmoil of December 1988 and the subsequent trial of the members of the "interim government," the courts functioned freely and their authority was upheld without question. The Government acquiesced without complaint in the appellate court's ultimate dismissal of charges against the four convicted members of the "interim government." There were no reports of arbitrary or unfair exercise of judicial authority in 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is no arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of expression, the Government publishes and controls the country's only national newspaper and manages the national radio station. There is no independent newspaper or radio. During the December 1988 "interim government" crisis and the subsequent trial of the participants, the opposition alleged that its members and their views were denied free access to the government-run media. A statement by the then-president which was critical of the Government was not aired, but the criticism was subsequently broadcast live over the radio as part of his speech at the opening of Parliament. One Australian broadcast journalist, whose reports of the "interim government" crisis were deemed inaccurate by the Government, was ordered out of the country. Vanuatu citizens are not allowed to buy television satellite dishes.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no restrictions on the formation of political parties or other groups in Vanuatu. There are two main political parties and several smaller ones. The out-of-power politicians who have left or been ejected from the ruling Vanua'aku party have formed their own political parties and are actively canvassing for support.

VANUATU

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is protected by law and respected in practice. Missionaries of various Christian denominations work without restriction.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

All Vanuatu citizens are free to travel internally and externally and to return from abroad without restrictions.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Vanuatu is a multiparty democracy. Numerous candidates competed in the parliamentary elections in 1983 and 1987; both the campaign and voting were considered by outside observers to have been fair. Elections to provincial and local councils have also been freely contested and fair.

Beginning with a violent protest march by antigovernment demonstrators in May 1988, Vanuatu underwent a period of domestic turmoil. Subsequent ejections and resignations of antigovernment members from Parliament led the President to attempt to sack the Vanua'aku Party Government, install a caretaker "interim government," and call for a new general election. After the Vanuatu Supreme Court declared the President's action illegal, the Government arrested the President and his five-man "interim government" on charges of sedition, incitement to mutiny, unlawful assembly, and conspiracy to overthrow the Government. They were tried in February 1989, and four of the six were convicted; however, all were freed in April by the Appeals Court.

Major opposition parties remained outside of Parliament for all of 1989, their members having resigned or been expelled. They continued to demand general elections, and boycotted by-elections held to fill the vacant seats.

To an extent unusual among Pacific Island states, the ruling Vanua'aku Party is the primary policymaking body and its decisions are implemented by the Government. The Vanua'aku Party has in the past used government power to restrict opposition political activity, for example, by denying other parties the use of the government-owned radio and press. There have been reports in the past of harassment against individual communities suspected of having supported opposition candidates. There also have been complaints that the Government arbitrarily revoked residency permits of foreigners who displeased the party or government leaders.

There were no allegations by outside organizations of human rights violations in Vanuatu. There are no local nongovernmental human rights organizations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Most of the population is comprised of Melanesians whose ancestors probably migrated from New Guinea. The small minorities of Chinese, Fijians, Vietnamese, Tongans, and Europeans, generally concentrated in the two towns and on a few plantations, experience discrimination with regard to land ownership. Although there have been allegations of corrupt practices by members of the ruling Vanua'aku party, there is no evidence to suggest a pattern of discrimination in the Government's provision of basic services.

While women have equal rights under the law, they are only slowly emerging from a traditional culture characterized by male dominance, a general reluctance to educate women, and a widespread belief that women should devote themselves primarily to childrearing. Nevertheless, an increasing number of women are finding work in the unskilled, semi-skilled, and service occupations.

While no accurate data are available, violence against women, particularly wife beating, is reportedly common and often alcohol related. Several severe cases have been reported where victims have died. While there are no specific laws against spouse beating, the courts have dealt severely with such cases, using common law assault as a basis for imposing punishment. On those islands where bride price is paid, there is often a feeling that the bride is the property of the husband and to be dealt with as he chooses. Very few cases of wife beating are brought to the attention of the authorities, and even fewer are actually prosecuted. Usually the cases are dropped by the women involved before going to court. The police are reluctant to intervene in what are considered purely domestic matters. The National Council of Women is working to educate women about their rights and to urge establishment of legal protection for women against abuse and neglect.

Section 6 Worker Rights

Vanuatu's workers have the right to organize unions, choose their own representatives, and to strike, but strikes have seldom occurred, due in part to high rates of unemployment. Unions may not affiliate with international labor federations without the permission of the Government. The fundamental legislation establishing the right of workers to organize into unions, setting out the scope of union activity, and providing for the arbitration and conciliation of labor disputes consists of the Trade Union Act of 1983 and the Trade Disputes Act of 1983. There are some 20 trade unions, grouped under an umbrella organization, the Vanuatu Trade Union Congress, which is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The trade unions are independent of the Government. Vanuatu is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

An American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations official who had been working with Vanuatu labor leaders on a continuing basis to strengthen union activities was declared a prohibited immigrant in late 1988, reportedly because of allegations that he participated in or encouraged the May 1988 demonstrations.

VANUATU

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions in Vanuatu have and use the right to organize and bargain collectively. The high percentage of the population still engaged in subsistence agriculture and fishing, however, serves as a deterrent to extensive union activity. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law, and there have been no reports that either is practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children under 12 years of age are not permitted to work outside of family-owned agriculture, where many children do assist their parents. Employment of children 12 to 18 years of age is restricted by occupational category and conditions of labor--such as shipping and nighttime employment. In general, however, the high level of adult unemployment discourages any resort to child labor.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

In comparison with other Pacific island countries, wages and salaries are relatively high. Minimum wage legislation has recently been introduced. The minimum wage is about 50 cents per hour for nonagricultural workers, and about 45 cents per hour for agricultural workers. Most workers are not in the wage economy and are thus outside the scope of the minimum wage law. For the remainder, these minimums provide an adequate standard of living within the local context. There are laws to regulate the rights to sick leave, annual vacations, and other conditions of service. Information on health and safety standards, legal workweek, and enforcement of labor standards is not available.

VIETNAM

The Socialist Republic of Vietnam (SRV) proclaims itself a proletarian dictatorship in its 1980 Constitution. It is an authoritarian state ruled by the Vietnamese Communist Party (VCP) through a 13-member Politburo and a Communist Party Central Committee of approximately 173 members nominally elected by a party congress held every 5 years. Government policies, carried out under the Council of Ministers, reflect guidelines--if not specific directives--laid down by the VCP Politburo.

Strong nationalism has characterized Vietnam's history and culture for more than 1,000 years. Resistance against Chinese encroachment from the north and expansion at the expense of declining civilizations (the Cham and Khmer) to the south and west have resulted in cultural and political differences between southern and northern Vietnamese. Most of the political leadership comes from northern Vietnam. The northern, Communist core views other regional, religious, and ethnic groups with suspicion. The northern Vietnamese political leadership has also long considered Indochina as a single strategic unit in terms of military security.

The security apparatus consists of civil and military elements under the control of the Government and Communist Party. Police and nonmilitary law enforcement officers are controlled both by the Government (Ministry of Interior) and the Party. Both Interior Ministry and police officials generally are responsive to Communist Party directives and influence, the Minister himself being a member of the Politburo. The military security apparatus is subject to a similar system of party and governmental control. The Ministry of the Interior, through its various agencies, has a decisive influence on government employment, business licensing, and travel. Although it is now easier for average Vietnamese to open a business or hold private property, the Government continues to regulate private enterprise through complicated bureaucratic procedures.

Abuses of human rights include brutal treatment of persons, arbitrary detentions, absence of fair trials, denial of privacy, and severe restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, movement, worker rights, and the right of citizens to change their government. Restrictions on travel abroad were further relaxed in 1989 and, during the first half of the year, there was some greater freedom of expression in literature and the press, but there were signs of a more restrictive policy in the second half. In July the Government agreed to permit emigration of the vast majority of former reeducation center detainees and their families. Vietnam claims it withdrew its remaining troops from Cambodia in September after a decade of occupation but continued to obstruct efforts to achieve a comprehensive solution to the Cambodia problem, effectively denying Cambodian political rights. Also, there were few new releases of political prisoners during 1989; the Government has stated it will not discuss the release of the last 127 inmates incarcerated since 1975 in its reeducation centers.

VIETNAM

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Relatives of reeducation camp detainees as well as inmates released in 1988 have reported that guards sometimes shot to death those attempting to escape. Other prisoners reportedly have died of malnutrition, exhaustion, and other effects of extreme prison conditions. Statistics on the number of deaths of political prisoners in reeducation camps are not available.

b. Disappearance

There is no recent evidence of political abductions by government security organizations and no reports of disappearances or hostage-taking by forces resisting government authorities.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are credible and consistent reports from refugees concerning the severity of conditions in reeducation camps and prisons. The authorities have attempted to produce conformity among detainees through confinement, hard labor, self-criticism, and indoctrination. Detainees face substandard nutrition, poor or nonexistent medical care, and severe and often arbitrary punishment for minor infractions of camp rules.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although the Vietnamese legal system ostensibly contains procedural safeguards for citizens against arbitrary government behavior, in fact, they are meaningless. Public security officials are required to obtain warrants to arrest a person for a major crime, including alleged political offenses, but the officials are not required to show these warrants to those they apprehend. Officials can hold suspects for an indefinite period. Refugees have reported that authorities sometimes wait several months before notifying relatives of those arrested of the charges and location of the detainee.

According to refugees, since 1979 the normal practice has been to conduct summary trials of those apprehended on political charges, imprison them for several months, and then move them to reeducation camps. Reports indicate that inmates considered particularly recalcitrant are sent to penal rather than reeducation camps. The Government has said it incarcerated some 100,000 persons in reeducation centers following the Communist victory in 1975. The Government draws a distinction between reeducation centers (trung tam) for those associated with the former regime in the South, and reeducation camps (trai) for those detained after consolidation of VCP power throughout the country. In 1988 the Government declared that all of the center inmates and their families would be released and permitted to emigrate. As of mid-1989, the Government stated that only 127 persons, mostly former high-ranking South Vietnamese military officers and government officials, remain in reeducation centers and will not be released until they are reformed. The Government has announced numerous amnesties over the past 13 years, but none during 1989.

For criminal acts, a suspect may be apprehended on a warrant which stipulates the nature of the crime and which authorizes detention for 2 months prior to trial. A 2-month extension of the detention period may be obtained on application. There is no provision for bail or legal counsel prior to trial.

Some former prisoners have reported that they were kept incommunicado for relatively short periods of time, but there is no evidence that any prisoners have been detained incommunicado throughout their confinement. Exile is not used as a matter of public control.

In December 1988, Vietnam signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) which included a pledge to waive prosecution and punitive measures for persons who departed the country illegally and who return under the UNHCR voluntary repatriation program.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Vietnamese court system consists of the local people's courts, military tribunals, and the Supreme Court, which can review cases from either of the lower courts. In addition, the National Assembly or Council of State may decide to establish special tribunals, which may be superior to the Supreme Court, if the National Assembly so chooses. In addition, local mass organizations are empowered by the Constitution to deal with minor breaches of law or disputes. Although technically judges in all regular courts are elected, candidates for election as judges are selected by the Party organization and are therefore not independent. At present, Vietnam has a penal code and family law but no labor or civil law codes.

Trials are generally public, with legal counsel provided to defendants. Acting for the Government, "people's assessors" present the evidence against the accused. Defense counsel is supposed to ensure that proper legal procedures are followed, in accordance with the defendant's rights under the Constitution, and to explain the proceedings to the defendant. However, the defense counsel is not an advocate for the defendant.

Sentencing is highly arbitrary, despite existing sentencing guidelines. For example, according to various reports, the sentences for former South Vietnamese officials--though never formally tried--correlated directly to rank and position held. Former intelligence and psychological warfare officers were given longer than normal sentences. Court officials take bribes to reduce sentences.

There are no reliable statistics on the number of political prisoners. In addition to the 127 inmates who the Government admits remain in reeducation centers, there are certainly many others detained for political reasons.

VIETNAM

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In 1989 the Government continued to operate a nationwide system of surveillance and control through household registration and party-appointed block wardens who use informants to keep track of each person's activities. It works imperfectly in southern Vietnam, however, partly because of a shortage of trusted party workers. In the recent past, the security apparatus has reduced overt control efforts, particularly over persons who have no ties to the previous southern regime and who express no opposition to the current Government. In addition, according to refugees, the population is increasingly able to circumvent security restrictions through bribery of party and government officials. To enhance public control, the Government established "People's Security Units" in some localities during 1989.

There have been reports of official and nonofficial security wardens conducting searches of homes, sometimes with warrants issued by the authorities. There continue to be reliable reports that Ministry of the Interior officials inspect and sometimes confiscate mail and packages sent to Vietnam, particularly those sent to politically suspect persons. Some of the outgoing mail is subject to inspection and censorship. Vietnamese are prohibited from receiving many publications from abroad; nevertheless, they are widely available on the black market.

Nearly all Vietnamese are obliged to belong to one or more mass organizations. There are mass organizations for villages and city districts, for school or work (trade union), for youth, women, etc. These mass organizations disseminate propaganda and policy guidelines, support party-sanctioned activities, and play an active watchdog role. Not only is membership virtually compulsory, but attendance at meetings is advisable to prevent either being singled out for criticism or to protect family members from criticism. Membership in the Communist Party is essential for advancement in the state sector. No opposition political activity is tolerated. Communist Party General Secretary Linh attacked proponents of a multiparty system at the Seventh Central Committee Plenum in August 1989 and vowed that opposition political parties would never be permitted in Vietnam.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Vietnamese Constitution theoretically provides for freedom of speech and of the press; but in practice such freedoms are severely limited. Some visitors to Vietnam in 1989 reported that persons they met were more willing to express critical views--even in the presence of others--than in previous years, but public criticism of government and party rule is not tolerated.

The Government owns and operates broadcast media and does not permit airing of opposing views. The Government prohibits persons from importing or viewing many foreign films. However, continuing a trend of the past 3 years, foreign films were widely available in VCR format on the black market, especially in the south.

VIETNAM

The Ministry of Culture and Information and Communist Party organs control all newspapers, books, and other publications, as well as all cultural exhibitions. In many Vietnamese publications, criticism of the Party and the Government is allowed only within limits set by the authorities, highlighting alleged cases of government corruption, for example. During the past 2 years, Saigon Giai Phong, a Party daily newspaper in the south, and Tuoi Tre, the publication of the Youth Union of Ho Chi Minh City, had increasingly criticized government officials and policy. The editors of both newspapers were suddenly replaced in August 1989. Observers agree that since mid-1989 press news reports and commentary have been more restricted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly is restricted in law and in practice. Persons wishing to gather in a group are required to apply for a permit. Permits are issued by local authorities, who often do not follow uniform procedure. According to refugees, in some localities citizens must obtain permission for gatherings of over three people.

Nongovernmental organizations, such as church groups, are permitted but they can meet only for approved and narrowly defined objectives, such as religious services. Religious organizations were permitted to maintain affiliation with coreligionists in foreign countries. Opposition political parties or organizations are not permitted.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Continuing a trend of the past 2 years, the Government continued to ease previous restrictions on religious activities. There were no reports of arrests or trials of religious figures in 1989. Persons are permitted to attend religious services, although there are reports that government officials are present to observe who attends the services. Seminaries and other places of religious instruction continued to operate. Travel abroad for religious reasons or to meet with coreligionists was eased considerably for most persons. Foreign religious figures could travel freely to Vietnam during 1989. However, the Government continues to prohibit proselytizing and restrict the movement of some clerics.

The Government has been concerned that religious groups could become seedbeds of subversion and political opposition. It has consistently attempted to divide and control religious groups, in part by establishing government-controlled policymaking bodies such as the Catholic Patriotic Association. The Government has attempted to prevent the growth of religious groups by inhibiting the publication of religious materials and the training of new clergy. The New Testament is available and several American nongovernmental organizations were allowed to import small numbers of Bibles in 1989.

Buddhism is the dominant religion in the country. According to some estimates nearly half of the population of Vietnam is Buddhist. The Government has claimed that only 6 million Vietnamese are practicing Buddhists. Up to another 6 million of the population (9 percent) reportedly are Catholic.

VIETNAM

Adherence to a religion is not compatible with membership in the Communist Party, which espouses atheism. Nevertheless, visitors to Vietnam report that attendance at religious services seemed to grow in 1989. They reported that even government officials, who in previous years feared losing their jobs if it was known that they attended religious services, show no such inhibitions now.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel was freer within the country in 1989, continuing a trend of the past 2 years. Vietnamese are required to obtain permission to change their residence, but most reports concur that this was less difficult during 1989.

In early 1988, the Government announced that it would authorize private travel abroad for education, tourism, medical treatment, and visits to close relatives. Such travel would be restricted to 3 months, except in the case of travel for education or medical treatment, and violators would be barred from further travel for 3 to 5 years. Observers report that the Government still restricts temporary travel abroad, but made exit permits available to a large number of passport holders during 1989.

The Government continued to permit emigration for family reunification and of Amerasian Vietnamese and their close family members. Vietnamese who emigrate are generally free to return to Vietnam. In mid-1987 Vietnam relaxed its restrictions on tourist permits for those who had fled the country clandestinely, prompted in part by the need to earn foreign exchange. Now, only those who allegedly committed "serious crimes" are not allowed to visit. There is no evidence of mistreatment of repatriates. In late 1988 Vietnam signed a Memorandum of Understanding with UNHCR to increase acceptance of voluntary repatriates, provided there was financial assistance. In June 1989, Vietnam joined in the adoption of the Comprehensive Plan of Action (CPA) at the International Conference on Indochinese Refugees in Geneva. Under the CPA, the Vietnamese agreed to encourage volunteers to return from first-asylum camps throughout the region. Nearly 1,000 volunteers from Hong Kong were expected to return by the end of 1989. UNHCR has reported no sanctions against the voluntary returnees. In September 1989, five Vietnamese volunteers who returned from Malaysia were detained for 2 days upon arrival in their home village. Local authorities had not been informed of their planned return and jailed the repatriates before central authorities intervened. These returnees are now fully integrated and freely exercising their trade as fishermen.

In a significant positive development, in July 1989 the Vietnamese agreed in bilateral talks with the U.S. Government to permit emigration of former reeducation center detainees and their families. Interviews of former detainees by U.S. consular and immigration officers began in October in Ho Chi Minh City. The first departures for the United States were scheduled to occur in January 1990.

Sixty-five percent more Vietnamese refugees left Vietnam clandestinely during 1989 than in the previous year. Many people continued to use the established land routes through Cambodia and passage by boat across the Gulf of Thailand to various Southeast Asian first-asylum destinations. Others traveled overland through China or made their way in small boats along the Chinese coast to Hong Kong, which experienced an 87-percent increase in its arrival rate. Poor economic conditions, especially in the north, exacerbated the outflow.

Since the occupation of Cambodia by Vietnam, large numbers of Vietnamese have settled in Cambodia. Although some of these persons are former residents who fled during the period of the Lon Nol Government (1970-75) and later during the rule of the Khmer Rouge (1975-78), others are first-time settlers.

In June 1988, Vietnam adopted a new nationality law. It stated that those who wished to divest themselves of Vietnamese citizenship could renounce it formally but that the Government would need to approve the request.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens are not free to change their Communist-dominated government. All authority and political power is vested in the Vietnamese Communist Party. Political opposition is not tolerated, nor are there any other political parties. The Politburo of the Central Committee of the Vietnam Communist Party is the supreme decisionmaking body in the nation. The Politburo's powerful Secretariat oversees day-to-day implementation of directives.

Debate of government policies or criticism of the role of the Party is not permitted. Citizens may vote for members of the National Assembly, ostensibly the chief legislative body, but in fact subordinate to the Party. From the single list presented to them, voters may only strike out the names of candidates for whom they do not wish to vote. In several cases during the most recent elections for the National Assembly, however, no candidate received sufficient votes and it was necessary to hold follow-up elections with new candidates. These were held in November and the vacant seats filled.

The Vietnamese Party hierarchy expressed alarm over the disintegration of party rule in Eastern Europe and implicitly has criticized Moscow's reaction. The leadership clearly is worried about the ramifications for its control of a populace long disillusioned with the VCP's rule. As a result, there has been a more marked doctrinaire approach in opposition to political reform, even though the economic renovation policy remains in vogue.

The Government does not cooperate with international human rights groups and strongly resents criticism of its human rights policies.

Foreign delegations and journalists who have been allowed to visit reeducation camps (no visits in 1989) have been shown only model camps. Former detainees have described extensive preparations to beautify camps prior to visits, temporary removal of most detainees during visits, and careful briefing of the remaining detainees by Communist Party cadres on what to tell delegation members. The Government does not permit the existence of private human rights groups in Vietnam.

VIETNAM

Vietnam generally does not participate in international human rights activities and prohibits such contact by private citizens. For example, in late 1988 two brothers were convicted and imprisoned for disseminating information on political prisoners to overseas human rights organizations. In 1988, however, the Government permitted the Vietnamese Red Cross to participate in international meetings and, in a meeting with a senior U.S. Government official in July 1989, the Vietnamese Red Cross proposed expanded cooperation with its U.S. counterpart in assisting persons seeking missing relatives, including those in reeducation centers.

Gradual assimilation and cooption appear to be the Government's long-term strategy for most minorities. The Government has created special schools in the Hanoi area to train minority cadres to be the "eyes and ears" of the Party among their own people. Highland minorities in central Vietnam are subject to repression if suspected of ties with resistance groups. Officially programmed resettlement of ethnic Vietnamese into the highlands is designed in part to increase government control over minority groups. Minorities in the south, such as the Chinese and the Indians, have been encouraged to leave the country. Since the adoption of economic reforms, however, the Government has valued the entrepreneurial skills of the Chinese population and has allowed a limited renaissance of private enterprise in Cholon, Ho Chi Minh City's Chinatown. It has also permitted the reopening of private Chinese-language schools.

People released from reeducation camps face considerable discrimination, according to refugees. They do not regain their citizenship rights until 1 year after leaving the camps, if then. In addition, their children generally are not allowed to attend college.

According to a Western academic specialist on Vietnam, the passing grade needed on entrance examinations is lower for children of party officials. It is arbitrarily set high enough to keep the children of suspect background (e.g., officials of the former South Vietnamese Government), out of university. Study abroad is also restricted to politically acceptable persons.

Women do not appear to face discrimination in general employment. No statistics are available on the percentage of women in the work force, or on women's occupations.

There are no statistics available on the frequency of violence against women within the home. However, in 1987 Premier Do Muoi issued a decree banning spouse beating.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Vietnamese workers are not free to form or join unions of their own choosing. All workers automatically become members of the "union" in their workplace, and dues are deducted from their pay. These groups are organized by the Government and belong to the government-controlled Federation of Vietnamese Workers which is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. Strikes are considered unpatriotic and officially forbidden; none are known to have taken place in 1989. Vietnam is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Vietnamese workers do not have the right to organize unions of their own choosing or to bargain collectively. No law protects against antiunion discrimination by employers against union members and organizers; in the context of mandatory union membership the concept is meaningless. In Vietnam, if one refuses to participate in the workplace union activities, one risks punishment. There are no export processing zones in Vietnam.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is permitted by the Constitution, which states in Article 58 that "people fit for work must work as provided by law." Refugees report that every Vietnamese is required by law to contribute 15 days of work per year to the State or to pay a fee. In addition, unemployed persons, especially unemployed young people, are compelled to work in exchange for small wages and food. A number of government projects have used forced labor provided by reeducation camp prisoners.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

According to existing regulations inherited from the former French colonial administration, the minimum age for workers in Vietnam is 17. Refugees report that children under age 15 are exempt from compulsory labor requirements.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Government inherited from the former French colonial administration a system of regulations pertaining to working conditions, including a minimum wage, a maximum workweek of 8 hours per day, 6 days per week, and safety standards. However, except for some safety standards, these regulations have not been updated since at least 1975, nor are existing standards enforced universally, if at all. As a result, for example, the minimum wage is so low as to be meaningless. Pay is generally low in Vietnam, inadequate to provide the vast majority of workers and their families a decent living. Moreover, wages frequently are paid late, sometimes by as much as several months. According to reports from refugees, nearly all workers experience delayed paydays in their workplace. Observers agree that doctors, nurses, and teachers are most often the victims of delayed paydays. Possibly as a result, many are reportedly leaving these professions, and there is currently an acute shortage of teachers.

Such safety standards as exist are developed jointly between the Ministry of Labor and worker organizations at individual workplaces. Enforcement of the standards is uneven at best.

WESTERN SAMOA

Western Samoa, a small Pacific island country with a population of around 169,000, is located approximately 1,600 miles northeast of New Zealand, the country from which it became independent in 1962 and to which it still looks as a model for governmental and educational systems. The Constitution adopted at independence proclaimed the nation an independent and sovereign state based on "Christian principles and Samoan customs and tradition" and established a parliamentary democracy on the Westminster model but with certain concessions to Samoan cultural practices. It provides for a Samoan head of state, a unicameral legislature elected by the matai (the family heads), an independent judiciary, protection of Samoan land and traditional titles, and guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms. Executive authority is vested in the Head of State, with the Government administered by a Cabinet, consisting of the Prime Minister and eight ministers chosen by the Prime Minister. All legislation passed by the Legislative Assembly needs the approval of the Head of State before it becomes law. The present Head of State, Malietoa Tanumafili II, holds the position for life. His successors will be elected by the Legislative Assembly for 5-year terms.

The culture of Western Samoa is essentially Polynesian but uniquely Samoan. Traditional authority is vested in the matai (leader of an extended family). Each extended family, or aiga, has at least one matai, who is appointed by a consensus of the aiga or by other traditional means. Ownership of land is legally vested in the matai. It is the matai's responsibility to direct the economic, social, and political affairs of the aiga. There are 362 villages in Western Samoa with a total of over 20,000 matai. Each village is governed by a Fono or council of matai, which can fine or otherwise punish offenses against village rules. Western Samoa does not have any defense force. The small national police force is firmly under the control of the Government but has little impact beyond the capital city.

The economy is primarily agricultural, with limited potential for development. It is susceptible to shifts in world prices for its export commodities, such as coconut oil. Western Samoa is heavily dependent on foreign aid, particularly from New Zealand, and on remittances sent to family members by the approximately 300,000 Samoans living abroad in Australia, New Zealand, and the United States.

Western Samoan society is based on a collective value system where obligations and responsibilities to the extended family (aiga) are often given precedence over individual rights. The rule of law is tenuous outside the capital, Apia, and most disagreements are settled by traditional means (which can include corporal punishment, banishment, and destruction of houses). Within this context there were no significant human rights problems in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Such killings do not occur.

WESTERN SAMOA

b. Disappearance

There have been no instances of politically motivated disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by law, and there have been no reports of such practices by police or other government authorities. However, villages are controlled by customary law and beatings, stonings, the burning of houses, and other traditional punishments are meted out by the village council on occasion.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The law contains safeguards against arbitrary arrest and preventive detention, and these are observed. Some villages have banished members who fail to comply with the rules of the matai, the family head. This is one of the harshest forms of punishment in this collective society.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Western Samoan law assures the right to a fair public trial, and this right is honored. All charges are stated formally and clearly. Defendants are entitled to counsel. There are no special courts to deal with political or security offenses, and the judiciary is independent of government interference or influence. Decisions of village matai about customary law are not subject to judicial review; however, the Government is trying to curb the excesses of some village leaders. The Government has a case pending against a group of village curfew guards who stoned a government worker driving through their village during prayers, a serious offense according to local values.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government respects the privacy of its citizenry and does not permit arbitrary interference with the family, home, or correspondence. Samoan law provides for protection from invasion of the home or seizure of property without substantive and procedural safeguards, including search warrants. Practically, there is little or no privacy in the village. Village officials by law may not enter homes without permission, but there can be substantial social pressure to grant such permission.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and of the press are fundamental parts of the Constitution. They are respected in law and practice. The press is independent of the Government.

WESTERN SAMOA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right of peaceful assembly and the right to form associations. There are no significant restrictions.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is provided for in the Constitution, along with freedom of thought and conscience. There is no government-favored religion. Nearly 100 percent of the population is Christian. While the Constitution grants each person the right to change religion or belief and to worship or teach religion alone or with others, in practice the matai, the extended family leader, often chooses the religious denomination of the aiga, the family. There is strong societal pressure to support church leaders and projects financially with contributions often totaling more than 30 percent of income. Younger Samoans have begun to resist these enforced payments.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no controls upon citizens of Western Samoa regarding internal movement or resettlement. Emigration is actively supported by the Government as a social "safety valve" which allows the departure of disenfranchised, frustrated, and potentially rebellious youths and because it increases foreign income through remittances. Foreign travel is generally unrestricted, but there is an exit permit requirement which can only be denied because of pending court cases or outstanding debts to the Government. The right to return is guaranteed. There are no refugees from Western Samoa.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Samoan citizens do not have the right to change the government through direct, multiparty election with universal adult suffrage. Power in Western Samoa is vested in the Prime Minister and the Legislative Assembly. Under the Constitution, the Assembly is elected every 3 years. Forty-five of its members are elected by the approximately 20,000 village chiefs (matai), and the other 2 seats are filled by elections among those citizens who are not Samoan by heritage. Although there is increasing pressure for popular elections, this concept is seen by many as conflicting with "Fa'a Samoa" (the Samoan way). Political leaders have blocked calls for a referendum on universal suffrage. Many Samoans view the existing political structure as democratic, in that the matai traditionally consult with their extended families before making decisions such as selecting candidates for the Assembly. The matai system is conservative but does allow for change. While Samoans must show respect and obedience to their matai in family and communal affairs, the matai have well-defined responsibilities which, if not met, can result in their removal.

Western Samoa has only rudimentary political parties. The first one, founded in 1982, was the Human Rights Protection Party (HRPP); its leader, Tofilau Eti, is currently Prime Minister. Although a second party, the Samoan National Development Party (SNDP), was formed during 1988, replacing the previous Christian Democratic Party founded in 1985, the political process in Western Samoa remains very much a function of personality rather than party. As a result, several previous elected governments fell before the end of their prescribed 3-year terms when supporters defected to the opposition.

WESTERN SAMOA

There are no reports of any international or nongovernmental investigations of alleged violations of human rights. There are no official or private human rights organizations in Western Samoa.

Samoa is a homogeneous society with no significant ethnic minorities. Samoan politics and culture are the product of a heritage of chiefly privilege and power, and persons of good family have some advantages. There is clear discrimination based on social status and sex, and women traditionally occupy a subordinate role.

Abuse of women, including wife beating, is believed to be a problem, but no reliable data about the extent of it is available. As noted above, traditional punishments sometimes involve beatings; this is generally directed more at men than women. While abuse of women is prohibited by law, it does occur and is often unreported or ignored. Some view wife beating as a male prerogative. There are many cases of rape that go unreported. The few convictions generally result in light punishment.

The Constitution makes special provision to preserve the political rights of non-Samoans. Persons of mixed ancestry who are culturally Samoan are fully accepted and can attain positions of considerable wealth and influence. Thirty percent of the members of Parliament are of mixed ancestry.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Western Samoan workers have complete and unrestricted rights to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. While trade unions have not emerged in the private sector, the Government does not restrict efforts to develop them. A public service association representing government workers, an increasingly important sector of the work force, does exist. The Supreme Court has upheld the right of government workers to strike, subject to certain restrictions imposed principally for reasons of public safety. The Public Service Association freely maintains relations with international bodies and participates in bilateral exchanges. Western Samoa does not belong to the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

While workers have the right to engage in collective bargaining, there is little practice of this right because of the absence of unions in the private sector. However, the Public Service Association engages in collective bargaining on behalf of government workers. Arbitration and mediation procedures are in place to resolve labor disputes, although these rarely arise. Labor law and practice are uniform throughout the country, including in the one export processing zone.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

While the Government does not demand compulsory labor and it is prohibited by law, in this collective society people are frequently called upon to work for their villages. Most people do so willingly, but, if not, they are compelled to do so by the matai.

d. Minimum Age of Employment of Children

Under the terms of the Labor and Employment Act of 1972 and Regulations of 1973, it is illegal to employ children under 15 years of age except in "safe and light work." The law does not apply to service rendered to the matai, some of whom require children to work at what might be considered child labor, primarily on village farms.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Labor and Employment Act of 1972 and Regulations of 1973 established for the private sector a 40-hour workweek and a minimum wage of $0.35 an hour. This low minimum wage suffices for a minimum standard of living when supplemented by the subsistence farming and fishing in which most families engage. The law also establishes certain rudimentary safety and health standards. Independent observers report, however, that the safety laws are not strictly enforced except when accidents highlight noncompliance. In addition, many agricultural workers, among others, are inadequately protected from pesticides and other dangerous conditions because of limited employer awareness of the hazards. Government education programs are addressing these concerns. The law does not apply to service rendered to the matai. Government employees are covered under different, more stringent regulations, which are adequately enforced.

EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA

ALBANIA*

Albania, which proclaims itself a People's Socialist Republic, is a one-party state ruled by a Marxist-Leninist dictatorship. Ramiz Alia, who came to power in 1985, exercises personal leadership through the Communist party known as the Albanian Party of Labor (APL). Internationally, he has pursued a policy of cautiously expanding diplomatic, cultural, and commercial links abroad, especially with Balkan and Western European states.

A large, effective security service, the Sigurimi, assists the APL in maintaining repressive controls over the Albanian people, who are permitted only very limited civil and political rights.

Albania has a centrally controlled economy under which the State owns the means of production, and the Government directs all significant economic activity. Within a strategy of economic self-reliance, the Government emphasizes a policy of rapid industrialization and development. In recent years, however, the rate of economic growth has declined. Refugees have reported increased shortages of basic foodstuffs.

Information on internal conditions within Albania is limited. Although the Albanian population continues to be shielded from foreign influences, the Government now tacitly allows citizens to receive foreign broadcasts from Italy, Greece, and Yugoslavia. The Government has liberalized visa issuance for tourists from most Western countries and allowed a limited number of its own citizens to visit neighboring countries in tour groups. In other areas, significant human rights violations, corroborated by private international organizations and refugees, continue to occur. The Government has repeatedly refused to cooperate with any international organization which investigates human rights complaints. In 1989 the United Nations Human Rights Commission publicly censured Albania for its human rights record and for its failure to cooperate with the Commission.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No evidence came to light of political killings by the authorities during 1989.

b. Disappearance

There is no recent information available on whether disappearances occur.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The criminal code prohibits and provides punishment for the use of physical or psychological force during investigations.

*Because the United States has not had diplomatic relations with Albania since 1939, it is difficult to comment authoritatively on conditions in Albania.

ALBANIA

Nevertheless, former political prisoners have often reported that they were beaten or otherwise ill-treated during investigative proceedings to force them to make confessions. Although some of the worst abuses of the past may have ended, there continue to be allegations that Albanian investigators resort to threats and beatings to obtain confessions or collaboration. In the absence of independent means of investigation, it is difficult to corroborate such reports.

In the past, private international humanitarian organizations have reported harsh prison conditions in Albania, including a severe hard-labor regime with inadequate food and clothing, long-term solitary confinement, cramped cells without room to lie down, and unheated, unfurnished cells lacking any sanitary facilities. The Burrel prison and Spac, Ballsh, and Qafe e Barit labor camps, in particular, have been noted for their harsh conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that no one may be arrested without court or prosecutorial approval or be sentenced to jail without a court verdict or for an act which is not a crime. The criminal code, however, is explicitly ideological and officially characterized as a "weapon in the class struggle." Its provisions defining political offenses are loosely formulated, allowing the courts to interpret them broadly to punish whomever the regime desires.

The criminal code lists 34 crimes, 12 of which are political offenses, for which the death sentence may be imposed. Among these capital offenses are such nonviolent political offenses as: unauthorized departure or "flight" from the State, agitation and propaganda against the State, creation of a counterrevolutionary organization or participation therein, concealment of a person who commits a crime against the State, activity against the revolutionary movement of the working class, and refusal to carry out a duty or coercing others to refuse to do so.

The criminal code also provides that banishment (generally to a state farm or enterprise) or internment may be imposed administratively, without trial, for up to 5 years on persons whom the authorities consider a threat to the Communist system and on the families of fugitives. In 1988 a new decree (No. 7071) was officially reported concerning "internment and exile as administrative measures." However, the text of the decree was not published, and it is not known how this decree differs from Decree No. 5912 of 1979.

There are numerous reports that families of escapees from Albania have been imprisoned or interned as a deterrent to other potential illegal emigrants. Amnesty International (AI) has reported a number of such cases in recent years, but another source claimed that close relatives of recent escapees are no longer interned.

AI reports that political detainees lack adequate legal safeguards during pretrial investigations. It also notes that political prisoners awaiting trial are not guaranteed visits from relatives during the investigation or access to a legal advisor unless the court "deemed it necessary." By law, investigations into crimes against the State must be completed within 3 months, but extensions are easily obtained, and no effective maximum period of investigation is enforced. Most investigations into political offenses are completed within 4 months, but AI has charged that some investigations have dragged on for more than a year.

Political detainees have been held in solitary confinement for up to 6 months during pretrial investigations without access to lawyers or relatives. The criminal code provides that accused persons must be informed when investigation of their cases is concluded and allowed to examine all the evidence to be brought against them. Usually, however, they are not allowed to examine all the materials and are shown only a copy of the indictment. While investigators are theoretically bound by rules of procedure, and the accused may appeal to higher authority against investigators who violate proper procedures, these controls do not appear to be effective.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system includes the Supreme Court and regional and district courts. Like all organs of the Government, the judicial system is under the total control of the APL. Courts may not render an independent verdict in conflict with the wishes or policies of the regime.

AI reports that persons accused of political crimes lack adequate legal safeguards during their trials. Defendants at political trials have usually been denied defense counsel and have had to conduct their own defense. Major important trials of state officials are closed when it suits the purposes of the regime, but most political trials of ordinary citizens are held in open court. Most such trials last no more than 1 day, and there have been no known acquittals.

The number of persons in prison is unknown; they include 300 members of the pre-World War II elite, as well as pro-Soviet, pro-Chinese, and other political prisoners. Many persons are serving sentences for expressing dissatisfaction with conditions in Albania or for trying to flee the country. Former political prisoners report about 1,200 political prisoners each were being held in the Ballsh and Spac labor camps during the early 1980's. Some 300 more were imprisoned at Burrel, and others were held in Tarovic, Kosove, and Tirana prisons.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution proclaims the inviolability of the home and the privacy of correspondence, but at the same time it provides that these and other civil rights are subordinate to the general interest and may not be exercised in opposition to the Socialist order. Observers generally believe that the authorities can, and do, violate the privacy of the home when and as necessary to achieve their ends. The Government uses its pervasive informer network to report on, among other things, the private lives of its citizens.

Contact with the outside world is carefully monitored. Albanian citizens are required to report to the police any contact with foreigners, but many welcome casual contact with foreign tourists. Refugees have reported difficulties they had while in Albania in receiving telephone calls from relatives living in the United States. Sometimes packages of food, medicine, and clothing sent to them were returned by the Albanian authorities. After 1986 it became significantly easier to receive letters and packages from relatives abroad. Though it is technically illegal to receive television or radio broadcasts from neighboring Italy, Yugoslavia, and Greece, the Government tacitly allows its citizens to do so.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution states that citizens enjoy these freedoms but may not exercise them in opposition to the Socialist order. Any citizen who publicly criticizes the Government is subject to swift and severe reprisals under an article of the Constitution which forbids anti-State agitation and propaganda. AI states in its 1989 report that the majority of political prisoners were imprisoned for attempting to exercise their rights to freedom of expression and freedom of movement.

All news media are government controlled and never criticize the state and party leadership or their policies. However, there are indications that media criticism of some aspects of Albanian society, such as the pervasive problem of corruption, has increased. As weapons of revolutionary change, art and literature are subject to rigid state control and censorship. The authorities also manipulate scholarly inquiry and publications for political purposes, particularly in such fields as linguistics, literature, economics, history, geography, folklore, and ethnology.

Although there are restrictions on contacts with foreigners, such restrictions have been relaxed lately. Western visitors report that Albanian citizens are increasingly bold in talking to Western visitors and tourists. Tirana's participation in Balkan cooperation should increase Albania's exposure to external influences.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The security police deal severely with group activities that do not have government sanction or that appear to be in opposition to the leadership. There are no independent associations or organizations.

Western news services reported demonstrations took place in the northern Albanian city of Shkoder and in some other locations at the end of December. Some reports say that the demonstrations were violently repressed by the Government. Other reports indicate that four young ethnic Greek men, identified as Costas, George, Takis, and Odysseas Prassos, were brutally punished by the Albanian authorities. Two allegedly died after being dragged by tractors through several villages. Some accounts indicate they were punished to forestall demonstrations in the area; others say they were caught attempting to leave the country. The Government has denied both the reports of demonstrations and of the deaths.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious activity in Albania is expressly prohibited by the Constitution and by government policy. Historically, about 70 percent of all Albanians were Muslim, nearly 20 percent were Orthodox, and a little more than 10 percent were Roman Catholic. Estimates of the number of Jews in Albania range from 500 to 2,500.

In 1967 the Government proclaimed Albania the first atheist State in the world, abrogated all laws dealing with church-state relations, and began actively to eradicate all vestiges of religion. More than 2,100 mosques, churches, monasteries, and other institutions were closed, their fixed assets were seized by the authorities without compensation, and many religious leaders were persecuted, imprisoned, or even executed for continuing their religious functions. All religious literature was banned, as were any personal manifestations of religious belief or practice. In 1975 a Legislative Decree stipulated that names for newborns were to be chosen from a list of "appropriate" names (that is, names without religious overtones). At the same time, a number of geographical names with religious significance were changed. While a few outstanding historic churches and their religious art are being restored as museums, most churches and mosques have been converted to other uses.

The regime continues to suppress religious activity by threatening harsh penalties for believers who practice their faith and by obliging citizens to inform on believers. Refugees have said that people who were known to practice religion in their homes were publicly ridiculed, summoned by the authorities for interrogation, and threatened. Despite years of antireligious pressure, it is clear that some Albanians have continued to practice their faith in their own homes, particularly in villages and in more remote mountainous areas. Tourists have reported seeing Muslims praying along roadsides with apparent impunity. There have been some signs that the regime, eager to improve its relations with Western European countries as well as with its Balkan neighbors, is quietly toning down its antireligious campaign and even permitting some private expressions of religion. In March the United Nations Human Rights Commission voted to censure Albania for its failure to comply with the U.N. Charter's provisions protecting human rights. The Government responded that there was genuine freedom of conscience in Albania. It said that no one can force people to believe in God or to perform religious rites and that, ultimately, religious belief was a personal and family matter.

This is the first public statement by the Government which seems to concede, at least in principle, the right of its citizens to religious belief. Another positive development was the official decision in 1988 to permit the visit of an Orthodox priest and an Islamic imam of Albanian descent to visit Albania. A Jesuit priest who left Albania in 1940 was also permitted to visit his family. In 1989 Mother Theresa, who is of Albanian descent, was permitted to visit Albania. Although her visit was given prominent coverage in the local press, she was not identified as a Roman Catholic nun but only as a "well-known Albanian charity worker."

In 1989 several Roman Catholic priests were reportedly released from prison. The single surviving Roman Catholic prelate, Bishop Nikoll Mehill Troshani, who had been imprisoned during the 1940's and 1950's and again arrested in 1974 after holding religious services, was reportedly released from a forced labor camp in 1988. It was confirmed that Father Pjeter Mashkalla died in the Ballsh labor camp on July 28, 1988. He had been imprisoned from 1946 to 1971 and from 1973 to 1983, and was again arrested in 1985 after celebrating Christmas eve Mass. No new information is available about the fate of another imprisoned Roman Catholic priest, Ndoc Luli.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution does not guarantee freedom of movement. Movement within the country and travel abroad are controlled very strictly, and transgressors against the laws have been severely punished in the past. The criminal code states that flight from the State or refusal to return to the fatherland by a person sent abroad on service or allowed to leave the State is considered treason and punishable by imprisonment for not less than 10 years or by death. AI stated in its 1989 report that many prisoners apparently had been imprisoned for trying to leave Albania illegally. Until recently, Albanians were allowed to leave the country legally only on official business or, very rarely, for family reasons. In 1988 organized groups of Albanian tourists visited Yugoslavia and Western European countries. Albania has publicly stated that it wishes to increase the number of its university students on exchange programs in Western countries. Neither Albanian law nor practice allows the right to emigrate.

No such right exists in theory or in practice. The system of government is a Communist dictatorship, headed by Ramiz Alia in his capacity as First Secretary of the APL and Chairman of the Presidium of the People's Assembly. The Constitution establishes the APL as the sole political entity and Marxism-Leninism as the only political ideology. The APL is governed internally by the principle of "democratic centralism," under which decisionmaking power is concentrated in the hands of a small elite.

The Constitution provides that the People's Assembly (a unicameral parliament) is the supreme organ of national government in Albania; similar bodies, called people's councils, exist at the local level. Candidates for these assemblies are first designated by a mass organization known as the Democratic Front, which is controlled by the APL. They are then "elected" without opposition by universal suffrage.

The Government denies violating human rights and refuses to cooperate with any investigation of allegations to the contrary, including confidential investigations by the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Greeks are the largest ethnic minority, but smaller numbers of Serbs, Macedonians, Vlachs, Gypsies, and Jews also live in Albania. Estimates of the size of the Greek population vary from 40,000 (from an official Albanian census) to as high as 400,000 (from groups promoting the interests of ethnic Greeks in Albania). Neutral organizations have estimated that the ethnic Greek population is 50,000.

The Constitution grants national minorities "guaranteed protection and development of their culture and popular traditions, the use of their mother tongue, and its teaching in the schools, and equal development in all fields of social life." While there are differences of opinion over the extent to which minorities may exercise their cultural, educational, and linguistic rights, they are clearly restricted. While Greeks and Macedonians may be educated in their mother tongues through the primary level, there are no radio or television programs in these languages. A Greek-language newspaper, Laiko Vima, is published in the southern town of Argyrokastro. Cross-border ties between Albania and Greece increased significantly after the November 1987 visit to Albania of the Greek Foreign Minister, and relatives and friends of the Greek minority in Albania are being permitted to send remittances to Albania.

Several reports indicate persecution, harassment, and discrimination against minorities solely because of their ethnic status. There have even been reports of mass removals of segments of the Greek population out of traditionally Greek lands in the south to areas more distant from the Albanian-Greek border. Furthermore, insofar as the ban on religious practice has removed the Greek Orthodox church from Greek communities in Albania, an important part of that ethnic group's community life and links to Greece has been eliminated. The leadership of both the APL and the Government are overwhelmingly ethnic Albanians of Muslim background. The Chairman of the People's Assembly, a Greek woman, is one notable exception, however.

Scholars of the Albanian language have noted that northern Albanians, who historically spoke the Gheg dialect of their language, have been educationally disadvantaged by the adoption of "unified literary Albanian," basically a version of the Tosk dialect, spoken in southern Albania. Most members of the leadership of the Albanian Party of Labor are Tosk speakers.

The Constitution states that women shall enjoy "equal rights with men in work, pay, holidays, social security, education, in all social-political activity, as well as in the family." Information on the extent to which these rights are exercised is not available, but the regime appears to have advanced the status of women. Women are said to participate equally in obligatory labor and military service programs. No information is available on the extent to which violence against women is practiced or what, if anything, the regime has done on the issue.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers do not have the right to associate freely and to strike. Nearly all Albanians belong to trade unions that are part of the United Trade Unions of Albania (UTUA), an arm of the APL. These unions have no significant independent voice in the field of labor relations, but they play a key role in indoctrinating and propagandizing the workers, in maintaining labor discipline, and in organizing the periods of so-called voluntary manual labor in which all Albanians are expected to take part. There is a seat reserved for the UTUA as an affiliate of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions, but the Albanians have not participated in this Soviet labor front organization since the mid-1960's. Albania withdrew from the International Labor Organization in 1967.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers do not have the right to organize freely and to bargain collectively. There are no special economic zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Little information on forced labor is available. It is believed that one form of punishment is internal banishment to a labor camp. The prisoners do not have a choice of work but are paid for their labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

According to the Labor Code of 1980, amended in 1981, the minimum age for employment of children is 15. Those under 16 years of age may not work more than 6 hours per day. Information on enforcement of this law is unavailable.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

According to the Labor Code, the workweek is 48 hours. Pregnant women, children under 16 years of age, and persons with a doctor's certificate may not work between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. Women, young persons under 18 years of age, and those with a doctor's certificate are prohibited from working underground. Workers in arduous and dangerous jobs are provided appropriate protective clothing and special food rations. The Labor Code contains regulations pertaining to occupational health and safety, but there is no available information on the effectiveness of enforcement. Minimum wage information is not available.

AUSTRIA

Austria is a constitutional, parliamentary democracy. The coalition government (Socialist Party and People's Party), formed after the November 1986 national election, continued in office in 1989. The loosely united Green Party and the liberal/nationalist Freedom Party constituted the opposition.

The police and security organs are effectively subordinated to the executive and judicial authorities.

Austria has a developed economy, and Austrians enjoy a high standard of living.

Since World War II, Austria has served as a country of first asylum for approximately 2 million refugees from Eastern Europe. Austria continued in this role during 1989.

Human rights are highly respected in Austria, and individual rights and political freedoms are constitutionally guaranteed.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings either by government authorities or opposition groups. On July 13, three Iranian Kurdish activists were murdered in Vienna, almost certainly by non-Austrians.

b. Disappearance

There were no political abductions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is banned by Article II of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which is incorporated into the Austrian Constitution, and is not practiced.

In 1989 a leading Green parliamentarian called for reform of the procedures used in handling citizen complaints against the police. He cited government records showing that during the years 1986-88 there had been 844 citizen complaints alleging unnecessary use of force by police. Judgments against the police were forthcoming in only six cases.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary detention or exile. In criminal cases the law provides for investigative or pretrial detention for up to 48 hours, by which time an investigative judge must decide on the legality of extending the period of detention. Provided the investigative judge agrees, the accused may be held pending completion of an investigation for a maximum of 2 years. Grounds for investigative detention are enumerated in the law, as are conditions for release on bail. Domestic critics of the use made of pretrial detention continue to point to a study which showed that of those so detained in Vienna, for example, only 57 percent were eventually found guilty of crimes justifying prison sentences. In recent years, the number of those in investigative detention and in jail serving prison sentences declined. On September 1, the total number of those in custody was 5,771, of whom 1,646 were in investigative detention. During 1989 work continued on a comprehensive reform of the law on detention for infractions of administrative law.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is independent of the executive and legislative branches of government. Trials are public. Judges are appointed for life and may not, in principle, be removed from office. Jury trials are prescribed for major offenses, and those convicted have the right of appeal. Written charges must be presented to the accused, who has the right to be represented by a lawyer.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The law provides for the protection of personal data collected, processed, or transmitted by government agencies, public institutions, and private entities. Constitutional provisions also protect the secrecy of the mail and telephone.

The privacy of family life is respected. There is no effort by the Government to monitor or control family life.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Austria has a free, independent, and multifaceted press, ranging from conservative to Communist.

Publications may be removed from circulation if they violate legal provisions concerning morality or public security. As a matter of practice, such cases are extremely rare. Opposition viewpoints are given wide attention in Austrian publications. Freedom of academic expression is respected. Austria's well-established democratic political system, its active and independent press, and its effective judiciary combine to assure continued freedom of speech and press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association. Public demonstrations require a permit from the police authorities, who may consider only the public safety aspect of the proposed demonstration and not its political purpose. Permits are routinely issued.

The Austrian State Treaty of 1955 makes an exception to freedom of association in the case of Nazi organizations and activities. The Constitutional Law of 1945, as amended in 1947, also prohibits Nazi organizations and activities. The law on the formation of associations stipulates that permission to form an association may be denied if it is apparent that the organization will pursue the illegal activities of a prohibited organization.

AUSTRIA

c. Freedom of Religion

This right is provided for in the Constitution, although the Treaty of St. Germain, which also is a constitutional provision, restricts this freedom to the practice of religions which are compatible with public safety and morality. In order to qualify as a recognized religious organization under Austrian law, a religious group must register with the Government. Although 88 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, most of the world's major religions are represented.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions concerning freedom of movement within the country or the right to change residence or workplace. Austrian residents are free to travel abroad and to emigrate. Citizens who have left the country have the right to return.

Austria serves as a country of first asylum for refugees from Eastern Europe and as a transit point for Soviet Jewish emigrants on their way to Israel or other countries. A mass exodus of East Germans from Hungary through Austria on their way to the Federal Republic of Germany began on September 1 with the permission of Hungarian authorities. In 1989 more than 50,000 East Germans transited Austria.

During 1989 the Interior Ministry reported that approximately 21,800 persons applied for asylum in Austria. At year's end, 18,252 asylum applicants were being cared for by Austrian authorities.

Austrian authorities have been using an accelerated procedure for distinguishing between genuine political asylum seekers and "economically motivated" immigrants. Those arriving from Poland and Hungary are informed that they have very little chance of receiving asylum. In August 1988, 25 percent of applicants were granted asylum. This decreased to 15 percent in July 1989 and to 5 percent in August. Those denied Austrian asylum under this procedure generally have been allowed to remain in Austria but without any official financial support. Austria's legal guest worker population stood at 174,266 in November, not including resident dependents.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Austria is governed through a democratic parliamentary system. Under the Constitution, national elections must be held at least every 4 years. Elections are free and regularly draw high levels of participation. There is universal suffrage for those over 19 years of age. The most recent national elections (1986) resulted in a change of government. No party won an absolute majority. The Socialist Party, which won 80 seats in Parliament, went into a coalition with the People's Party, which won 77 seats. As for the two other parties represented in Parliament, the liberal/nationalist Freedom Party won 18 seats, and the Greens won 8. Several small parties participated in the elections, including the Communist Party, which did not receive sufficient support to elect candidates to the Parliament.

AUSTRIA

Allegations of improper activities on the part of the authorities are discussed and investigated by the press, public groups, and private persons without government hindrance. Both international and local human rights groups operate freely.

Austria recognizes the competence of the European Commission of Human Rights in Strasbourg for implementing the European Human Rights Convention. Austria concerns itself extensively with international human rights matters, especially the human rights situation in Eastern Europe.

Austria has an extensive public welfare system, the benefits of which are available to all citizens on a nondiscriminatory basis. In employment and in other areas, there is extensive legal protection against discrimination because of race, sex, religion, language, or social status. In practice, there is no pattern of such discrimination.

The commemorative events and media analyses associated with the 50th anniversaries of the annexation of Austria by Germany in March 1938, the Kristallnacht pogrom in November 1938, and the outbreak of World War II in September 1939 included many examinations of anti-Semitism in Austrian history and contemporary Austria. The public discourse on the issue during this period was unprecedented in the postwar era.

Opinion surveys indicate the continued existence of anti-Semitic sentiments among some Austrians. The Government has condemned this phenomenon in very strong terms and has recommitted the country to combating all its manifestations.

Legal restrictions on women's rights have long been abolished. Women are entering the work force in increasing numbers and have made substantial progress toward economic equality in the postwar era. Nevertheless, in practice inequality still exists in political, economic, and social fields, despite legislation enacted in 1977 and 1979 to reform family law.

The issue of violence against women was addressed by the Government in 1989 as the coalition parties reached general agreement on several legal reforms. These would make spousal rape criminal and provide an expedited procedure for barring husbands from their homes when they had threatened their wives with violence. The latter procedure would be available even in the absence of a divorce action, a significant change in existing law.

The human rights of Austrian minorities are fully respected. However, in 1989 the Slovenian-speaking minority in the province of Carinthia remained concerned about the future of instruction in the Slovenian language in local elementary schools. The Slovenes feared that changes in the province's bilingual education system, advocated by some German-speaking groups, might curtail the use of Slovenian in many provincial elementary schools. A 1988 compromise plan to retain Slovenian/German bilingual education in a majority of instances has yet to take concrete form. In 1989 Slovene access to the government-owned television broadcasts increased. The Government also pledged to construct a new secondary school for the Slovene community. Slovene leaders ended their 10-year boycott of participation in a federal advisory committee on Slovene issues.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to strike. Their right to join trade unions and to engage in activities in pursuit of trade union aims is protected under general constitutional guarantees of freedom of association. In practice, Austrian trade unions have an important and independent voice in the political, social, and economic life of the country.

More than 60 percent of the work force is organized in 15 national unions, each of which is a member of the Austrian Trade Union Federation (ATUF). This organization has a strong, centralized leadership structure. Individual unions and the federation are independent of government or political party control, although there are formal factions within these organizations that are closely allied with political parties.

Strikes in the postwar period have been comparatively few and usually of short duration. High on the list of reasons for Austria's record of labor peace is the system of "social partnership"--Austria's nearly unique unofficial forum for cooperation among labor, management, and government. At the center of the system is a parity commission for wages and prices, chaired normally by the Federal Chancellor, which has an important voice on major economic questions.

The ATUF is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the European Trade Union Confederation. However, the ATUF's Christian faction is also affiliated to the World Confederation of Labor, while the left-wing faction is affiliated to the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions have the right to organize and bargain collectively. The labor movement enjoys widespread acceptance and almost all large companies, private and state owned, are strong and well organized. Workers councils representing all of the workers in a unit operate at the enterprise level, and workers are entitled by law to elect one-third of the members of the boards of major companies. Collective agreements are negotiated by the ATUF on behalf of its member unions with the National Chamber of Economics and its associations representing the employers within a framework of wage-price policy guidelines set by the Joint Parity Commission. A 1973 law imposes on employers the obligation to prove that job dismissals are not motivated by antiunion discrimination. In 1989 the International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations asked the Government to apply these protections also to enterprises with fewer than five employees.

Workers are further protected by membership in the Austrian Chambers of Labor--compulsory for all employees except civil servants. These chambers fulfill several functions that are handled by trade unions in other countries, such as carrying out studies and preparing legislative proposals, but the ATUF is exclusively responsible for collective bargaining. The leaderships of both the chambers and the ATUF are elected democratically.

Austria has no export processing zones. Labor law and practice are uniform throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced labor in Austria. It is prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum legal working age is 15. The law is effectively enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no national minimum wage in Austria, but a worker whose annual income falls below a poverty line (approximately $381 per family member per month at the current exchange rate) is eligible to receive social welfare benefits. In addition, nationwide collective bargaining agreements set minimum wage rates by job classification for each industry. The average Austrian has a high standard of living by any international comparison, and most of the least well-paid workers still enjoy a decent minimum standard.

Although the legal workweek has been established at 40 hours since 1975, more than 50 percent of the labor force enjoys collective bargaining agreements setting a maximum workweek at 38 or 38.5 hours.

Legislation under which a labor inspectorate attached to the Ministry of Social Affairs conducts inspections of occupational health and safety conditions ensures the effective protection of workers in these areas.

BELGIUM

Belgium is a longstanding parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarch. The constitutional role of King Baudouin I is largely ceremonial. The Council of Ministers (the Cabinet), led by the Prime Minister, is responsible for government decisions. The Cabinet holds office as long as it retains the confidence of the democratically elected bicameral Parliament.

National, municipal, and judicial police forces bear the primary responsibility for domestic security in Belgium. The armed forces play no role in domestic law enforcement.

Belgium is a highly industrialized state with a mixed, free-market economy. A vigorous private sector, government participation in certain industries, and an extensive social welfare system combine to support a relatively high standard of living for most Belgians.

Respect for human rights is provided for in the Constitution and laws and observed in practice. The Government is sensitive to allegations of human rights violations and in 1989 took steps to adjust national policies criticized by the European Court of Human Rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

Abductions, secret arrests, and clandestine detentions did not occur.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government does not practice or condone torture or inhuman treatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment is provided for by law. Arrested persons must be brought before a judge within 24 hours. Thereafter, pretrial confinement is allowed only under certain legally specified circumstances. The premise for such confinement is subject to monthly review by a panel of judges.

Bail exists in principle under Belgian law but is rarely granted in practice. There is no limit on the length of time an accused may be held prior to coming to trial. In 1988 the European Court of Human Rights criticized Belgium for placing juveniles in prisons until accommodations could be found in special juvenile correction institutions. Since that time, several legislative amendments have been proposed in the Parliament to put an end to this practice. Exile of Belgian citizens is not permitted by law.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

BELGIUM

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A fair public trial, including the right to counsel, is assured by law and honored in practice. A suspect is charged, if the evidence so warrants, once a preliminary judicial investigatory phase is completed. Charges are clearly and formally stated, and defendants enjoy the right of appeal. Imprisonment for political beliefs is prohibited.

In March the European Court of Human Rights criticized Belgium for withholding evidence from defense attorneys for as long as 1 month after detainees had been arrested. In response, the Ministry of Justice has proposed legislation which would bring Belgian law in this area into compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Freedom from arbitrary interference with privacy by the State is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Search warrants issued by a judge are required unless the residents of a domicile agree to a search. Monitoring of telephones and interference with mail are strictly prohibited.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are assured by law and respected in practice. Varying political, religious, philosophical, and artistic views are permitted free public expression, subject only to slander and libel laws. There is no political censorship of the media. Statutes protect citizens' rights to reply to media criticism. Publications and productions held to undermine "public order" (e.g., explicit pornography and incitement to violence) are prohibited, however, and civil servants are restricted from criticizing government policy. Academic freedom is respected.

The Government operates several radio and television networks but does not control program content. Programs are supervised by boards of directors which represent the main political, linguistic, and opinion groups. A government representative sits on each board but has no veto power. Private radio and television stations operate with government licenses. Most urban homes have access by cable to television from other European countries.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public assembly is subject to regulations concerning public order, but is otherwise unrestricted. Groups protesting government policies or actions are free from harassment and persecution. Permits are required for open-air assemblies, but are granted routinely. Belgians are free to form organizations and to establish ties to international bodies.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Belgium has a long tradition of religious tolerance. The Christian, Jewish, and Muslim religions are accorded a "recognized" status in law, and granted a government subsidy. Minority "nonrecognized" religions enjoy full freedom to practice and are not subject to harassment or persecution.

BELGIUM

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Belgians are completely free to travel both within Belgium and internationally, and may return to Belgium at any time. Citizens are free to choose their places of work and residence. The Government does not force refugees to return to countries where they face persecution.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Participation in the political system is open to all adult citizens. Direct popular elections for parliamentary seats (excluding 76 of the 182 Senate seats apportioned by other means) are held at least every 4 years under a system of universal, secret, and compulsory suffrage for all adults (age 18 and over). Unweighted voting (one person/one vote) has been in effect since 1919 for men, and since 1949 for women. Under law and practice, opposition parties are free to operate without constraints or repression. Seventeen political parties, representing the full range of the political spectrum, competed in the last general elections in December 1987.

The existence of Dutch- and French-speaking regions poses significant problems for the State. All major institutions, including political parties, are divided along linguistic lines. There are special provisions for Dutch-, French-, and German-speaking councils at the regional level. Regional and linguistic needs are taken into account in national political and economic decisions.

No requests have been made for outside investigation of the human rights situation in Belgium. Several active independent human rights groups exist. All consider the Government open to discussion of any human rights question. The Ministry of Justice and other governmental agencies are sensitive to allegations of human rights abuses and take steps to correct perceived shortcomings in national legislation. The Government is a party to various international human rights treaties and has been active in the United Nations and other international forums in promoting human rights. It has also promoted independent investigation of alleged human rights violations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Religion, Sex, Language, or Social Status

Belgium is a culturally vibrant, pluralistic society in which individual differences in general are respected, and linguistic rights in particular are protected. Some 57 percent of Belgians are native Dutch speakers living primarily in the northern provinces that constitute Flanders. The 42 percent of the population who are French speakers live mostly in the capital, Brussels, and the southern provinces called Wallonia. A small minority of German speakers lives along the eastern border. Language differences have been the subject of hundreds of laws over the last century, leading to a fairly rigid structure designed to protect each language group from cultural, economic, or political dominance by the others.

Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all residents regardless of race, sex, religion, language, social status, or ethnic background. Some 27 percent of the residents of Brussels, the nation's largest city, are foreigners. Many of these are north African and Turkish immigrants. Encouraging the further assimilation of the immigrant population--generally poorer, less skilled, and less educated than average--is increasingly the focus of public debate.

Belgium is a leading advocate of women's rights both within the country and in international meetings on the subject. A number of commissions have been established to ensure that women's rights are protected and to oversee women's education and working conditions. To show the importance attached by the Government to promoting women's rights internationally, a Consultative Commission for the Condition of Women was established within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Physical abuse of women is punishable by law both in theory and in practice. Until recently, however, little factual evidence was available concerning the extent of abuse. According to a 1988 government study, 25 percent of Belgian women had encountered some form of physical abuse, while 13 percent had suffered "moderately serious" physical abuse, and 3 percent "very serious" abuse. In reaction to the study, the Government improved coordination among the various institutions involved in combating the abuse of women, provided better training to police on domestic and sexual violence, and organized an extensive publicity campaign designed to raise national awareness about the abuse of women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to strike. With 75 percent of its labor force organized, Belgium is one of the most unionized countries in the world and has a long tradition of democratic trade union elections. Labor unions striking or protesting government policies or actions are free from harassment and persecution.

Labor unions are strong and independent of the Government but have important informal links with and influence on many of the major political parties. Unions in Belgium are affiliated with the major international bodies representing labor, such as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labor.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is recognized and exercised freely. The right to due process and judicial review are guaranteed for all protected activity. In the first instance, the Labor Court reviews matters relating to collective bargaining. Parties then have the right of judicial review by the regular courts. Effective mechanisms exist for adjudicating disputes between labor and management.

BELGIUM

There are no export processing zones, and labor legislation and practice are uniform throughout Belgium.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not occur in Belgium.

d. Minimum age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment of children is 16, and it is observed in practice.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Belgian working hours, mandated by law and through collective bargaining agreements, are among the shortest in Europe, averaging about 38 hours a week. There are provisions for a minimum wage, currently $880 per month for full-time workers over age 21. This provides an adequate minimum standard of living. Workers typically receive at least 4 weeks of vacation and a bonus equal to 1 month's wages each year. Unemployment benefits are also guaranteed. Government policies to promote employment and an extensive system of unemployment compensation and other social benefits have served to minimize serious individual financial hardship. Health and safety legislation exists, supplemented by collective bargaining agreements. Health and safety committees are mandated by law in companies with more than 50 employees. The Labor Court monitors compliance with national laws and standards.

BULGARIA

After 35 years as leader of the Bulgarian Communist Party (BCP), Todor Zhivkov, who was also Chief of State, was ousted on November 10 by a group of Politburo colleagues headed by Foreign Minister Petur Mladenov. Under the new leadership of Mladenov, the BCP renounced its leading role in the State guaranteed by the Constitution and opened the door to political pluralism and democratic elections. The Government, with Prime Minister Georgi Atanasov still in charge, agreed to hold talks with the opposition on the country's future.

While the Ministry of the Interior maintained strict domestic control through the militia, state security officers, internal security troops, border guards, special purpose forces, and informants, one of the new leadership's first acts was to disband the Ministry's department which monitored the political activities of citizens. It is not yet clear, however, whether its functions have actually been abolished or merely transferred to other institutions.

Mladenov and his colleagues have espoused economic restructuring and have pledged that the country will adopt a free market economy. At year's end, however, they continued to rely on a centrally planned economy in which almost all production and commercial facilities are state owned. State controls continue to hamper the limited sector of small-scale private agricultural plots and small businesses.

Under Zhivkov's rule, the human rights situation continued to be characterized by harsh repression. The exercise of such basic human rights as freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and religion in a manner the Communist Party deemed unacceptable was prohibited and punished. The authorities pursued their forcible assimilation campaign directed at the ethnic Turkish minority (about 10 percent of the population), which began in 1984. Hunger strikes and demonstrations by ethnic Turks in dozens of communities in May and again by Pomaks (Bulgarian Muslims) in September led to clashes with security forces and resulted in a number of deaths. The regime used a new passport law adopted in May 1989 to expel several thousands of ethnic Turkish activists. Other ethnic Turks began to stream across the border in an exodus which reached 310,000 by mid-August, when the Turkish Government reinstituted a strict visa regime. Meanwhile, Bulgarian dissidents and Pomaks were usually denied the right to travel.

After November 10, the new leadership took tentative steps to redress many human rights abuses. Bulgarians began to enjoy the freedoms of speech, assembly, and association. Many dissidents received passports and permission to travel abroad. In a major decision, the Government on December 29 condemned the forced assimilation policy and pledged to take measures to guarantee the freedom of citizens to follow their religious and traditional customs and to reassume their Muslim names, forcibly changed at the beginning of the assimilation campaign. If implemented fully, this decision should effectively end the assimilation policies directed against ethnic Turks and Pomaks.

In addition, the National Assembly amended the penal code, deleting many political offenses and amnestying those convicted of those offenses. It also promised liberal laws on assembly and association. The media, although still controlled by the Government, began to report objectively on opposition views.

BULGARIA

The following report primarily describes the human rights situation as it existed before the ouster of Zhivkov on November 10. Some of the institutions and practices that led to widespread human rights abuses apparently were being changed at year's end, and the next annual report is likely to include a significantly different assessment of human rights practices.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings, but a number of peaceful demonstrators were killed by internal security troops in May and September (see Section 1.g.). There were reports of prison deaths caused by torture and beatings.

b. Disappearance

Despite reports that many people were missing for periods of a month or more following May and July demonstrations by ethnic Turks and Pomaks, there were no known permanent disappearances at the hands of security forces.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture does not appear to be practiced systematically in Bulgaria, many ethnic Turks who fled to Turkey recounted tales of beatings and torture during the May 1989 demonstrations. Most people reported beatings by members of the police and security forces who used their fists and chairs and kicked people, causing broken ribs and other injuries. Beatings with a wooden truncheon covered with rubber were reportedly frequent both in Razvigor, a pretrial detention center in Sofia run by the state security service, and regular prisons. Prisoners were thereafter immersed in a trough of cold water to minimize marks from the beatings. Some persons recounted tales of drugs in their food, psychological torture, electric shocks, cigarette burns, and attacks by dogs. Some state they were beaten repeatedly; a few reportedly died from their beatings.

Since 1977, prisons have been under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Internal Affairs. Conditions are Spartan. During Zhivkov's regime, political prisoners in many cases were quartered with common criminals, at whose hands they suffered abuse. Other reports indicated that guards routinely beat prisoners or arbitrarily punished them with solitary confinement. Nikola Chamurliski, who was sentenced to 20 years in 1974 for "economic espionage," reportedly refused to work and thus suffered regular beatings and received little food; he is said to be extremely ill in Pleven prison. One ethnic Turk recounted spending 3 months at Belene prison in 1984 in cells with no heat at temperatures of -30 degrees C. Prisoners were allowed little daily exercise; family visits were infrequent and depended on the "strictness" of the prison regime to which the prisoner had been sentenced. In Razvigor detention center, cells are reportedly 2.5 by 1.5 meters, without any windows. Lights are kept burning continuously. People are held individually and are not permitted to speak to or even see other detainees. Toilet facilities consist of a bucket in the corner; bathing is permitted once a week, and detainees are shaved by a guard twice a week.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although Bulgarian law provides for a judicial determination of the legality of a person's detention, the judiciary under Zhivkov was not independent of executive power and was unable to provide any effective check on executive actions. Persons were detained arbitrarily, without public notice, although the public prosecutor had to be informed within 24 hours of such detention. Human rights activists Dr. Konstantin Trenchev, Anton Zapryanov, Todor Galalov, Nikolai Kolev, Khristofor Subev, and Anton Nikolov were detained in May; their friends and families learned of their whereabouts only after several days, when they inquired of the authorities. Newly appointed leader Mladenov promised a "rule of law" but at year's end extensive reform of the legal system had not yet been announced.

Preliminary detention is limited theoretically to 10 days. Under Zhivkov's rule, the preliminary investigation could take 2 months, during which time detainees could be held in custody if "major state interests impose it." Bulgarian law permits detention for up to 6 months following arraignment and prior to an indictment. Dr. Trenchev and other activists were detained incommunicado and without charges for more than 3 months. They were allowed access to a lawyer only after 2 months, when the preliminary investigation had been completed. They were ultimately released on bail of about $105 each, under obligation to appear at a hearing when called. Under the criminal code, the accused must be informed of the charges against him, but this requirement was not always observed.

During Zhivkov's rule, persons could also be subjected to a system of administrative control short of imprisonment, whereby they were detained at their place of residence and required to appear frequently at the local police station. Under the law, the militia is authorized to place under administrative control or house arrest not only those who have engaged in criminal activities, but also those who have protested "against organs of power" or shown "antisocial manifestations." Poet Petur Manolov, then secretary of the Independent Society for the Protection of Human Rights in Bulgaria, was confined to Plovdiv in early 1989 on these grounds.

Another form of punishment and control is compulsory domicile or internal exile. During Zhivkov's rule, this was a frequently used tool to isolate political activists from their friends and prevent their being in touch with Western media or foreign embassy representatives. If such persons left despite these prohibitions, they faced possible imprisonment. Ethnic Turk Dzhemil Mekhmedov, arrested in 1985 after protesting the then compulsory name-change campaign, was taken from his family and home village of Ezerovo and placed under compulsory domicile in ethnically Bulgarian villages in the northeast. In June he was allowed to leave for Turkey with his family. Activist Nikolai Ganchev Kolev, accused of not performing "socially useful labor," was detained in March, appeared before a local magistrate, and was sent, without any trial or access to a lawyer, to Bobov Dol for compulsory domicile and labor for a year and a half. Kolev was allowed to return to

Stara Zagora in April following hunger strikes in his defense and was detained again in May.

Exile or expulsion was utilized as a means of political control from late 1988 until Zhivkov's ouster. Independent Society member Eduard Genov and his family were the first to be expelled in October 1988. Ekaterina Markova and Kristo Svatovski followed him in November, along with Grigor Simov Bozhilov who was turned back at the Austrian border. Tseko Tsekov left Bulgaria in December. Dimitur and Diana Boyadzhiev, of the independent trade union "Podkrepa" (Support), reached Vienna in March 1989, as did Orthodox priest Blagoy Topuzliev. Rumen Tsankov Dimitrov of the "Green Mass" left Bulgaria in April; the group's chairman, Stefan Cholakov, left in May. Petur Manolov, despite his strong desire to remain in Bulgaria, was expelled in May following months of sustained, intensive pressure and harassment, including threatening telephone calls, physical intimidation, isolation, and other forms of abuse. Independent Society activist Vladimir Krustev was expelled in August.

It is not possible to estimate reliably the number of persons subject to arbitrary arrests, other forms of detention, or summary exile up to November 10, 1989. The exact number of Turkish detainees who may still be incarcerated or in internal exile as a result of the 1984-1985 name-change campaign is unknown, although some were expelled and/or allowed to leave the country between June and August 1989, and others were released from prison after the change of leadership in November and the subsequent amnesties.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Bulgarian law and general practice provide for public trial in criminal cases. Defendants are entitled to legal counsel, but only after the preliminary investigation and indictment. During Zhivkov's regime, when defense attorneys were provided, they often cooperated with the prosecution. As a result, one human rights activist in 1989 refused to retain an attorney and chose to defend himself. Lawyer Angel Sokolarsky, who had been disbarred for his overly energetic defense of a client prosecuted for political reasons in 1987, was reportedly reinstated in April 1989. Some defense attorneys enjoy reputations for courage and honesty, despite pressures by the security apparatus.

Special court procedures apply in cases involving state security. Article 262 of the penal procedural code declares that a closed trial may be held when necessary "for the preservation of a state secret or of socialist morality." There is also a system of military courts and a military division of the Supreme Court, in which crimes committed by military personnel and employees of the Ministry of Internal Affairs are tried.

During Zhivkov's regime, the judicial system generally sought to appear to be observing legal norms, but the courts sometimes applied statutes retroactively or extended them to cases of dubious applicability. The penal laws were codified and published, but their circulation was severely circumscribed. Many Bulgarians are unaware of the provisions of their Constitution, which was among the documents confiscated from Petur Manolov in January and dissident priest

Blagoy Topuzliev when he left Bulgaria in March. There are also separate and sometimes unpublished laws affecting, for example, the military, the people's militia, religious sects, and telephone communications. In addition, there are extensive ministry regulations and generally "understood" administrative measures that remain unpublished. Under Zhivkov, such regulations were frequently invoked in judicial proceedings, and the defendant had little opportunity to question their validity or applicability. Defendants have the right to produce "proofs," as well as the right to appeal a sentence, within 7 days. Of the 21,956 persons sentenced in 1988, however, only 301 were subsequently acquitted.

Political prisoners in Bulgaria include those captured while trying to escape across the borders and ethnic Turks detained for opposition to the name-change campaign begun in 1984. The number of such detainees is unknown. Credible reports, including those documented by Amnesty International (AI) and Helsinki Watch, indicate that many ethnic Turks remained in prison or exile during 1989. Bulgarian human rights activists noted that there were approximately 250 political prisoners in 1989 prior to Zhivkov's overthrow. The amnesties announced in November and December 1989 are believed to have led to the release of many, perhaps most, of these prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Before November, the authorities interfered in the private lives of citizens in many ways. In November, however, the Government announced that the arm of the internal security forces which monitored the "ideological" activities of citizens had been abolished. No announcement has yet been made about the other functions of the security forces, which have directed an elaborate system of informers in virtually all workplaces, residential areas, and social organizations to monitor the daily lives of Bulgarians for signs of dissent.

The Constitution charges parents with the "obligation" of attending to their children's Communist education, which was also considered the purview of the State alone. In Kurdzhali in 1988, Turkish children aged 3 to 6 were reportedly required to live in nursery schools during the week and go home only on weekends as part of an official effort to "Bulgarianize" them. The Islamic rite of male circumcision was effectively banned during most of 1989, although the announced end to the campaign to assimilate the Turkish minority should lead to the lifting of that ban. Citizens who did not become members of Communist-dominated mass organizations were denied advancement at work and other benefits.

The monitoring of private telephone conversations and/or correspondence was also common. When one dissident protested to state authorities about the monitoring and cutting off of his telephone conversations, he was told in a letter of reply that his line was "in order" and his complaints were "illegal and unfounded," and he was warned that such violations of the law would be punished. Four of the five human rights activists invited to the Paris Conference on the Human Dimension in May did not receive their invitations because of Bulgarian postal interference.

Sanctity of the home is nominally safeguarded by law, and police may not legally search property without prior permission from a court or prosecutor. However, searches may be undertaken in situations the police deem urgent before judicial permission is given. Dissident Petur Manolov's home was searched in January 1989, no warrant was presented, and many documents, including his personal telephone directory and a Bulgarian translation of the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, were confiscated. Following a lengthy hunger strike and resultant international publicity, all of his documents were returned. The homes of Dr. Konstantin Trenchev and his parents were searched on May 27, and he was given a lengthy itemized receipt for the documents that were taken. To date none of Dr. Trenchev's papers have been released by the authorities.

Bulgaria ceased jamming Radio Free Europe broadcasts in December 1988. The British Broadcasting Corporation's World Service, Deutsche Welle, and Voice of America broadcasts are also heard without interference. The availability of Western publications remains tightly controlled; only Western Communist party newspapers, such as L'Unita and the Morning Star, are regularly sold at newsstands.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Numerous reports indicated that Bulgarian security forces utilized excessive force in putting down mass demonstrations by ethnic Turks in May, just as they had in 1984-1985. Apparently prompted by independent human rights groups, Bulgaria's signing of the Vienna Concluding Document of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Paris Conference on the Human Dimension, and the passage of the new passport law (all widely reported on Western radio stations), hundreds of ethnic Turks began hunger strikes in May to demand the restoration of their Turkish names and their human rights: freedom to speak their language, practice their religion, and maintain their cultural traditions. The hunger strikes were followed by nonviolent marches and demonstrations.

Up to 5,000 internal security troops using tanks and helicopters were called in to quell the demonstrations which took place in many northeastern and southern towns and villages. Although the Government acknowledged that 7 had been killed and 28 wounded, outside conservative estimates run to approximately 30 people killed and 100 wounded.

In a televised speech in May, then chairman Todor Zhivkov declared that every Bulgarian citizen could exercise his right to travel and called upon Turkey to open its frontier to all Bulgarian Muslims. The Government organized mass public demonstrations in May and June denouncing Turkey.

Following the initial expulsion of perhaps 3,000 ethnic Turkish activists, some of whom were suddenly taken from prison or internal exile, thousands of ethnic Turks began to apply for their passports under the new passport law (see Section 2.d.), remove their savings from the banks, and pack up all they could carry. From June through August, until the Turkish Government reinstituted a strict visa regime to control the massive flow of immigrants, more than 310,000 Bulgarian Turks streamed across the border in cars, pulling hand carts, and on foot. (Over 70,000 of these subsequently returned to Bulgaria.) In September Pomaks (ethnic Bulgarian Muslims) in many villages peacefully demonstrated for similar reasons, including the right to travel. Again, Bulgarian authorities used force to end the demonstrations, killing up to 10 persons and injuring scores. In December the new regime responded to a peaceful demonstration by Muslims in Sofia by agreeing to repudiate the assimilation policy.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, other laws provide severe punishment for the voicing of any belief or conviction which is contrary to official policy or critical of the State. Under Zhivkov's rule, Bulgarians were detained, tried, imprisoned, and exiled for criticism and actions which were political in nature. The penal code provides punishment for "crimes against the People's Republic," "antistate agitation and propaganda," slander against the State, spreading untrue allegations about the Government, and committing acts that create distrust toward the Government. In November the National Assembly repealed some of these articles and released those who had been convicted under them.

The unauthorized disclosure of information, particularly unpublished economic or demographic statistics, is illegal. Reportedly, a law specifying what constitutes an official secret is being drafted, and a new press law is being considered. Many press articles before November endorsed the practice of "responsible" glasnost (openness), i.e., freedom of speech with self-imposed limits for the good of society. After the removal of Zhivkov, the press became much more open, even reporting objectively on some of the actions of dissident groups.

Bulgaria's radio, television, and press remain state owned and state controlled. Although censorship officially did not exist, the media, as well as writers, artists, and those in academic life, operated within implicit party and government guidelines and practiced self-censorship. Before November, forbidden topics typically included unauthorized criticism of party and state leaders, of Communist ideology, and of other Communist countries. Ordinary citizens could express criticism and send complaints to newspapers as well as to National Assembly deputies, but only those on approved topics, such as inadequate service by public agencies and housing shortages, were publicized. Authorized criticism rarely extended beyond specific shortcomings or failures of lower level administrative officials. When television commentator Kevork Kevorkian, moderator of the popular show "Every Sunday," questioned a visiting Soviet official on the continuing need for such slogans as "Proletarians of the World, Unite!," he was temporarily removed from the air. Following his further public complaints in July that he was not being allowed to broadcast what he wished, the show was canceled. The show was brought back in November, allegedly after Mladenov's personal intervention.

Bulgaria began to move toward Soviet-style glasnost late in 1989, but the country's record was generally checkered. In January the official press viciously attacked the country's first independent human rights organization while ignoring the arrest of its members. An article criticizing the National Assembly as a "rubber stamp" was published in July, as was increased criticism on the lack of glasnost in various government branches and enterprises.

BULGARIA

Until Mladenov's ascendancy, there was no unofficial publishing in Bulgaria. One Bulgarian produced an independent newsletter, "The Alternative," in July on a computer; the first issue included the text of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, an editorial on the paper's intent and function in a "totalitarian Communist system," the Intellectual Club's May declaration on glasnost, and Blaga Dimitrova's hitherto unpublished speech at the March Congress of Writers on the misuse of language in Bulgarian society.

Dissatisfied intellectuals had formed a group in late 1988 calling for increased glasnost and more rapid perestroika (restructuring). Several members of this "Independent Discussion Club in Support of Glasnost and Preustroistvo" were subsequently expelled from the BCP as a result of their activities. In May they circulated an appeal to the National Assembly for greater glasnost, including the right of citizens to express their opinions and to receive and circulate all kinds of information. Although this appeal was broadcast on Radio Free Europe, it was never acknowledged or officially published in Bulgaria.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association, but in practice during the Zhivkov regime only public demonstrations of support for the Government or party were allowed, and the party decided which social and political organizations could exist. New, more liberal legislation governing assembly and association was being considered by the National Assembly at year's end.

Under Zhivkov, all authorized associations were government controlled, and the law provided punishment for anyone founding an illegal organization. Seven Bulgarians founded the country's first independent human rights organization, the "Independent Society for the Protection of Human Rights in Bulgaria," in January 1988. In June of that year, the Government founded a "Committee for Human Rights," which has refused to assist members of independent organizations on the grounds they were not legal. Independent groups have proliferated since that time: in November 1988, the "Independent Discussion Club for the Support of Glasnost and Preustroistvo" (intellectuals), the "Democratic League for the Defense of Human Rights" (a primarily ethnic Turkish group), and the "Party of the Green Masses" (an alternative political party); in January 1989 the "Association to Support Vienna '89" (another ethnic Turkish group); in February the independent trade union for scientific, technical, cultural, and educational professionals "Podkrepa" (Support); in March the "Committee for Religious Rights, Freedom of Conscience, and Spiritual Values"; in April the "Moslem Initiative Group" and "Eco-glasnost" (an environmental group); in the spring the "Citizens' Initiative" (an autonomous branch of the "Independent Society" in Ruse); and in July "Committee 273," to support all those detained under Article 273 of the Constitution for antigovernment propaganda.

Most of these groups applied for registration in order to receive the status of a juridical person, which is the only way to have a bank account and own property. The Government refused registration to all and deemed all of them illegal, until, in December, a Sofia court ordered that Eco-glasnost be permitted to register. The Government also refused to allow any of the independent groups the use of restaurants or public halls for their meetings. It prevented the party conference of the Green Masses in both April and June and broke up an outdoor assembly of Eco-glasnost in July. Members of Eco-glasnost were beaten by police and forcibly removed from one Sofia park to another while they were collecting signatures for a petition during the October meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe on the environment. In December the National Assembly passed a resolution condemning the police action and calling for an investigation and compensation for the victims.

c. Freedom of Religion

The new leadership has not yet addressed church-state relations. Although the Constitution provides for freedom of worship, the authorities under the old regime espoused atheism and discouraged religion. Openly expressed religious conviction was incompatible with party membership or attainment of responsible government or other positions.

Church-state relations are regulated by a division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Before November, it reviewed all clerical appointments and had imposed clergy on local congregations over the opposition of parishioners. No church buildings could be constructed without official permission, and the committee determined whether or not existing numbers of churches for various denominations were adequate. Religious and prayer groups could be organized and services conducted privately, according to officials. No religious groups could engage in open proselytizing, and foreign missionary activity was banned. Authorities confiscated imported religious materials. No parochial schools could exist.

A number of faiths are recognized or tolerated. The Bulgarian Orthodox Church, which was the established church before the Communists took power, is the largest, with a reported following of 6 million nominal adherents out of a population of 9 million. Functioning as a quasi-official church, it receives government financial support and echoes government propaganda. The church is allowed to print a newspaper, although the last Bulgarian-language Bible, only 2,000 copies of which were published, appeared in 1982; no Bibles may be imported. In 1989, for the first time since 1946, the Patriarch was permitted to present Christmas greetings on television and radio. The Orthodox Church is allowed to distill and market some alcoholic beverages and sell some religious articles, such as candles and small jewelry crosses. There is a seminary for Orthodox priests whose curriculum is approved by the State.

The independent "Committee for Religious Rights, Freedom of Conscience, and Spiritual Values," founded by Orthodox priest Father Khristofor Subev, was repudiated and denounced by the official Orthodox church hierarchy. Father Subev was sent into internal exile in January after having led illegal processions of believers, carrying icons, through the streets of Veliko Turnovo. His group called for an end to political interference in church affairs and religious life, for freedom of conscience, freedom of religious information, legalization of religious charitable work, and religious tolerance. In December his group demonstrated in Sofia without repercussions.

Approximately 60,000 Roman Catholics are divided between followers of the Latin and Uniate rites. Bulgaria reportedly has only 32 Catholic priests now, as opposed to about 200 when the Communists took power. Importation of the French newspaper La Croix has been forbidden, but selected priests have been able to travel to Rome and to receive the Vatican's official paper, L'Osservatore Romano. The Government in 1988 made grants to the three Catholic dioceses of Sofia, Plovdiv, and Ruse.

Other religious denominations in Bulgaria have few adherents. There are 10 Armenian churches in the country, and the Armenian community publishes a biweekly newspaper. Various Protestant groups, including Baptists, Pentecostalists, Methodists, and Seventh-Day Adventists, reportedly suffer continuing problems with the authorities. In February government officials characterized Pavel Ignatov and his Church of God congregation as schismatics and dismissed allegations of repressive measures against the group. In May a member of Ignatov's congregation reported that, following the Easter visit of an American pastor, Timothy Kornet, the man who had interpreted for Kornet was thrown out into the street with his pregnant wife, and pastor Ignatov lost his job. In April a group of evangelical Protestants primarily from Denmark called "Pilgrims of Jerusalem" traveled around Bulgaria holding religious services. The Government expelled them after 2 months.

Although some reports indicated that the Dunovist sect, an indigenous movement which flourished in pre-Communist Bulgaria, is outlawed, government officials claimed that Dunovists are legal. The Ba'hai faith is outlawed.

The Jewish minority numbers approximately 3,000 people. It receives some financial support from the Government and publishes a biweekly paper stressing Communist themes. A Jewish social, cultural, and educational organization exists, but it is atheistic and political in orientation. Visits between the Bulgarian Jewish community and Israeli Jews of Bulgarian origin are frequent, although subject to government control. The cantor of Sofia's synagogue went to New York in 1988 and 1989 for cantorial training. No kosher meat is available, but Jews are permitted to bake and distribute matzoh without hindrance.

Ethnic Turks (approximately 1 million) comprise the majority of Bulgaria's Muslims, the remainder being Slavic Pomaks (about 200,000) and Gypsies. On December 29, the Government announced that it condemned the actions taken since 1984 to assimilate the minority and pledged to take measures to ensure that true freedom of faith, voluntary choice of name, and the right to speak languages other than Bulgarian in everyday communications would be guaranteed. There has been some popular opposition to this announcement, and some local officials reportedly have refused to comply. The effects of this assimilation policy were far-reaching: most mosques were closed, and many were used for storerooms or nursery schools. Those that remained open usually operated only for Friday noon prayers rather than the mandatory five times a day. Chief Mufti Nedyo Gendzhev, elected in November 1988, reportedly instructed local imams to keep people under 60 years of age out of those mosques that remain functioning.

As part of the Government's campaign to eradicate the cultural identity of the Turkish community, many Muslim rites were forbidden. Muslim wedding ceremonies were not permitted, and Turkish weddings could not take place in the streets, as is the tradition; they had to be conducted in closed halls, and the singing and playing of Turkish songs was forbidden. Many Muslim cemeteries were destroyed or defiled, and separate Muslim cemeteries were reportedly abolished. Muslim funerals were generally not permitted, although there were credible reports that Muslim funerals, or at least burials in non-Christian places, were again permitted beginning in September. Sermons had to be delivered in Bulgarian, and the Chief Mufti's office records had to be kept in Bulgarian. Public use of the Turkish language was forbidden, as was the wearing of traditional forms of dress. Violators were subject to substantial fines. Circumcision, which some newspaper articles have derided as "unhygienic," is hypothetically permitted only in hospitals, without the religious ceremony which accompanies it. In practice, it was forbidden.

In defense of its treatment of the Muslim minority, the Government prominently publicized the amount of money spent to restore Shumen's Tombul mosques, and there were claims that three more mosques are to be restored and two new ones built. After years of refusing permission, the Government allowed six Bulgarian students studying at the Higher Islamic Institute in Tashkent to make the hajj in 1988. Five Bulgarians made the hajj in 1989; one, the Imam Kurdzhali, later sought asylum in the Turkish Consulate in Jeddah. A school for imams has operated in Sofia since 1986, although its 6-month course includes heavy political content. Copies of the Koran cannot be found in Bulgarian bookstores. In February the Chief Mufti claimed work was in progress on a third Bulgarian translation of the Koran, but by year's end there was no indication when, or if, it would be published.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government controls where people live, work, and travel. Citizens are required at all times to carry with them personal identity cards stating their legal place of residence and work. Without this card they cannot register at a hotel, purchase domestic airline tickets, or seek any kind of social service such as medical assistance. Changing one's place of residence or work is a complicated process unless it is at the Government's initiative or convenience. Moves to Sofia and other major cities from smaller settlements are especially difficult, and in some cases prohibited, because of the authorities' desire to control urban growth. This concern gave rise to the practice of "zhitelstvo," or the right of residency. A newspaper article in 1989 criticized existing restrictions, and quoted an advisor to the Council of Ministers as saying that limitations on residence "run counter to the legally established human rights and to the Constitution."

Bulgarians may travel within the country without restriction except in border zones, which are heavily patrolled by armed guards where the country adjoins Greece and Turkey. In August 1988, the Government announced a 75-percent reduction in the permanently restricted area, encompassing regions closed to foreigners. Although some of the newly opened areas included those with large ethnic Turkish populations, a significant area along the Turkish and Greek borders remains closed. During and subsequent to the demonstrations in May, diplomatic travellers were turned away from areas clearly within the unrestricted zone.

BULGARIA

A Bulgarian citizen needs both a passport for external travel and an exit visa specifying the destination for each trip. In May the National Assembly passed the long-promised passport law mandating the issuance of 5-year passports for all citizens. Although according to the law passport applications may be refused only in specific circumstances, these include "the protection of national security," which is susceptible to broad interpretation. Since November, many dissidents and members of independent groups have been given passports and permission to travel. At year's end, however, many Pomaks had still not been issued the passports they had requested.

Exit visas, which under Zhivkov's rule were still required for all non-Communist countries, could also be refused for a variety of reasons. According to other legal changes, Bulgarians who traveled abroad and did not return by the time specified were no longer subject to criminal penalties and possible imprisonment but only to administrative measures and fines ($210 for overstaying 1 month and upwards). Those who overstayed abroad prior to September 1, 1989, were not subject to the fines or criminal penalties.

The Government also substantially reduced the number of unsettled divided family cases involving the United States and Western Europe. Thousands of divided family cases remain between Bulgaria and Turkey, however. This already severe problem was exacerbated in 1989 when the Government decided selectively to apply the new passport law before it went into effect officially on September 1. Between June and August, more than 310,000 Bulgarian Turks crossed the border into Turkey. In most of these cases, however, family members were left behind--persons required for the harvest, young men of military age, or others kept behind for arbitrary reasons.

In theory, all Bulgarians now have the right to leave their country and to return. Changes in the citizenship law passed in May ensured that a Bulgarian could only be stripped of his citizenship while abroad, and then only for committing "a severe crime" against Bulgaria. The law now allows dual citizenship as well.

Those who return to Bulgaria are said to retain all their rights. Some reports, however, indicated that returning ethnic Turks may not return to their home villages but are resettled and dispersed throughout the country.

It is Bulgarian policy to return to their home countries potential refugees from other Warsaw Pact states who try to cross the Bulgarian border into Turkey, Yugoslavia, or Greece. A Romanian who sought political asylum from the U.S. Embassy in Sofia and who was then caught trying to cross the Bulgarian border to Yugoslavia was forcibly returned to Romania, where he faced imprisonment. In September 1988, 13 Magyar Romanians sought refuge in the Hungarian Embassy in Sofia; that situation was resolved in February 1989 when they were permitted, through the auspices of the International Red Cross, to leave Bulgaria for a third country, from which they then traveled to Hungary.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In December the BCP proposed that the guarantee of its leading role in the State be removed from the Constitution. The National Assembly voted in support of this change and will take the formal vote to amend the Constitution in January 1990. The Assembly also called for a new election law leading to "free, democratic elections" by May 1990. Meanwhile, the BCP leadership effectively governs Bulgaria, although the National Assembly has begun to exert some influence.

Political pluralism and free participation in the political process did not exist under Zhivkov's regime. In November 1988, two Bulgarians, Stefan Cholakov and Rumen Tsankov-Dimitrov, founded the Party of the Green Masses, a social democratic organization. They applied for registration and legalization; Cholakov was detained on January 6, 1989, and Tsankov-Dimitrov on December 26, 1988. Both men were held without charges for 2 months. In an announcement on April 2, the two founders noted that up to that time they had received no answer "other than our detention." Both subsequently left Bulgaria.

The former regime pretended to a form of pluralism through the participation of a second political party, the Bulgarian National Agrarian Union, in the Government and National Assembly. However, the Agrarian Union professed no differences of view with the BCP on any issue. Since November, there has been a change in the leadership of the Agrarian Union, and some members of the Union have called for it to assume a more independent position. Still, Agrarian Union officials have not strayed far from the BCP on any issues yet. The Communist and Agrarian Parties, together with labor, youth, and other groups, comprise a mass organization known as the Fatherland Front, which is wholly controlled by the BCP. The Fatherland Front has been the only organization permitted to present candidates for election. Following constitutional changes in 1987, so-called multicandidate elections were held on the local level in February 1988. Less than 20 percent of these elections involved more than one candidate; all candidates were prescreened by election commissions and all supported the BCP. There have been no elections since that time.

Through most of 1989, the National Assembly functioned as a rubber stamp, approving party policies and proposals. A newspaper article in July criticized the legislative body for its invariable unanimity. While the Assembly, since November, has begun to assert its right to function as a genuine legislature, it has not so far opposed any measure proposed by the new leadership. It took the initiative, however, to call for an investigation into the October 20 police action against members of Eco-glasnost.

Under Zhivkov's regime, the Government dismissed any criticism of its human rights record as part of an "anti-Bulgarian campaign" and/or interference in its internal affairs. Bulgaria signed the Vienna Concluding Document of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe but did not change its traditional response to charges of human rights abuses. Bulgarian officials noted that, although they were obliged to respond to requests for information, no specific time period was spelled out. In some individual cases, however, in which Western government or private groups have pressed for a response, the Government has provided information. The Government responded to a March U.S.

BULGARIA

demarche on Iliya Minev, chairman of the Independent Society, who was then on a hunger strike. Western publicity and criticism on the eve of the London Information Forum led to the release in April of Nikolai Ganchev Kolev, who had been sent into internal exile. Authorities did not respond to an August demarche on Dr. Trenchev and the other five activists detained along with him. The six detainees were released on September 4, presumably in response to intense outside interest. The new leadership has repeatedly emphasized its determination to bring Bulgarian law and practice into line with its commitments to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and has taken some initial steps in this direction.

In March a Bulgarian official unsuccessfully tried to prevent condemnation by the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) of Bulgaria's treatment of its ethnic Turkish minority. He reiterated the standard government line that there are no Turks in Bulgaria and that the OIC's accusations were interference in Bulgarian internal affairs.

Bulgaria's treatment of its ethnic Turkish minority prompted many international inquiries in 1989. A Council of Europe delegation visited Bulgaria in July to analyze the situation. The United States Congress passed a resolution, also in July, condemning Bulgaria's "expulsion" of thousands of ethnic Turks. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization in August issued a statement critical of Bulgaria's policy. The Government allowed a visit by a World Health Organization (WHO) team in August to investigate Turkish allegations of harmful vaccinations given to Bulgarian ethnic Turkish emigres. The WHO reported that its commission found that no injections containing harmful substances had been administered to the Turkish-speaking population.

In September 1988, AI representatives visited Bulgaria (having sought permission since 1985) and met with Bulgarian officials responsible for human rights matters. They also met with Konstantin Tellalov, chairman of the government-sponsored Committee for Human Rights. Members of Helsinki Watch visited Bulgaria in October and spoke to both government officials and private citizens. Bulgaria is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

The Constitution prohibits discrimination based on these criteria. In recent years, the Government under Zhivkov denied the existence of any minority ethnic groups and hence even the possibility of discrimination. Census reports, which in the early 1960's noted the existence of significant numbers of Gypsies, Macedonians, and ethnic Turks, more recently reported an almost totally homogeneous Bulgarian populace. The Zhivkov regime admitted the existence of differing religious groups, such as "Bulgarian Muslims," but rejected the possibility of any religious intolerance or discrimination against them. It did not publicly distinguish between those Muslims who are of ethnic Turkish origin and those who are ethnically Bulgarian (Pomaks), although credible reports indicated that the latter are still not being permitted to emigrate to Turkey.

During Zhivkov's rule, ethnic Turks, comprising at least 10 percent of the population, were subject to severe restrictions and discrimination in a systematic effort to destroy their cultural identity (see Section 2.c.). During the forced assimilation campaign of 1984-85, all Turks were assigned new Bulgarian given and family names. Only these names appeared on their new identity cards, issued from January to March 1985. Because no adult Bulgarians received new identity cards during this period, the date of issuance effectively functioned as a code, signaling to the authorities that its bearer is an ethnic Turk. Pomak names were "Bulgarianized" in 1974; one Pomak claimed his name was changed three times: in 1972, 1974, and 1975. Gypsies' names were changed to Bulgarian names in the 1970's.

In the army, Gypsies, ethnic Turks, and soldiers imprisoned for various crimes, who must complete their military service after completing their sentences, are reportedly assigned only to "black" work in labor brigades in the interior of Bulgaria; they are not allowed to bear arms.

There is pervasive social discrimination against the small Gypsy population, which generally lives in shantytowns and occupies the lowest rung of the socioeconomic ladder. There are no reliable estimates as to their numbers; some officials have claimed as few as 40,000, and some dissidents have claimed as many as 1 million.

The Constitution declares that "women and men enjoy equal rights," and there does not appear to be overt discrimination as regards educational and professional opportunities. There is no evidence of systematic violence against women or of widespread wife beating. According to the Ministry of the Interior, of the more than 68,000 crimes committed in Bulgaria in 1988, less than 2 percent were "violent" or "premeditated," including murder and rape.

Section 6 Worker rights

a. The Right of Association

The Communist Party organizes and totally controls all trade unions, which are grouped together in the Central Council of Bulgarian Trade Unions (CCTU). The unions' role is to promote government and party objectives. Workers have not been permitted to organize outside the official union structure, nor allowed to strike. In November the CCTU declared that it was now completely independent of the BCP and the state organs, and that it would devote itself to promoting the rights and economic interests of workers.

The country's first independent trade union was founded in February. Dr. Konstantin Trenchev founded an "independent association of the scientific-technical, humanitarian, and creative-artistic intelligentsia in Bulgaria." Called "Podkrepa" (Support), the union has gathered significant support, especially in November and December; it now reportedly has 70,000 members. Although the group has no official recognition as a trade union, the Bulgarian media after November reported objectively on its activities. Podkrepa has engaged in dialog with the official unions on several occasions.

The CCTU is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

BULGARIA

In its 1989 report, the ILO's Committee of Experts again criticized the monopoly on organizing workers that Bulgarian law grants to the official unions, as well as the subservience of the official unions to the BCP. The Committee called on the Government to indicate measures taken or contemplated which would recognize the right of workers to organize independent unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no collective bargaining in Bulgaria. A new labor code, in force since January 1987, and a "restructuring" of unions in the spring of 1987 were intended to shift the focus of union decisionmaking from the apex to its base. Despite the much heralded arrival of "self-management," there is no indication, thus far, that the role of the official unions has changed substantially.

Bulgaria has one functioning duty-free zone in Ruse, and plans to establish three more in the future. Workers in these zones are subject to the same laws and regulations as other workers in Bulgaria.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution declares that "every able-bodied citizen is obliged to do socially useful work." Those who do not work may be charged with "vagrancy" or social parasitism; Article 39 of the Statutes of the People's Militia authorizes the imposition of "administrative measures," such as house arrest, on "people who lead nomad lives or beg as opposed to doing social labor." Compulsory labor may be required of prisoners or those in internal exile. Political detainees in 1989 reported that they had worked in various capacities while in detention and that those who refused to work were beaten and given less food. Human rights activist Eduard Genov, interned in the village of Mikhalkovo prior to being exiled, reportedly worked in a mine. During Zhivkov's regime, the Government also abused compulsory military service obligations by utilizing ethnic Turks, Gypsies, former prisoners, and others who were not fully trusted in labor brigades.

As a result of the exodus of thousands of ethnic Turks which caused serious dislocations in the Bulgarian economy, the Government in July enacted a labor mobilization decree which authorized the State to send people wherever their labor was needed. Students were sent to factories to fill the vacancies left by ethnic Turks, in addition to performing the usual harvest work assigned them in the late summer and fall.

d. Minimum Wage for Employment of Children

The Labor Code adopted in 1986 stipulated 16 years as the minimum age for all but certain light work. Persons from 16 to 18 years of age may not be assigned work designated as heavy, harmful, or dangerous; their workweek is either five 7-hour days or six 6-hour days. These restrictions are effectively enforced. Seven years of compulsory education for children begin either at age 6 or 7.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The minimum wage, as of September 1, 1988, was $82 per month at the official commercial exchange rate. The average monthly wage is the local currency equivalent of $140 at the commercial rate of exchange. The minimum wage is not sufficient for a single wage earner to provide a decent standard of living for a family. In families with two working spouses, the average wage provides, at best, a modest standard of living.

The workweek for adults is 42.5 hours (5 days of 8.5 hours) in most professions and occupations. The civil mobilization decree of July 1989, however, provided for compulsory 6-day workweeks and 9-hour days in many professions. Paid vacations range from 14 workdays annually for those who have worked less than 10 years to 18 workdays annually for those who have worked more than 15 years. Additional paid vacation is granted those in certain difficult or dangerous occupations. Bulgarian practice appears generally to conform to these guidelines, although participation in unpaid supplementary "brigades" can lengthen working hours on various occasions during the year.

Bulgaria has a national labor safety program, and the official trade unions are assigned a role in promoting job safety. Standards of enforcement vary greatly, however, and questions of worker health and safety are not satisfactorily resolved.

CANADA

Canada is a constitutional monarchy with a federal parliamentary form of government. Representatives in the multiparty political system are elected by universal suffrage at local, Provincial, and Federal levels. The national Constitution defines government responsibilities and is subject to interpretation by an independent judiciary. Federal and Provincial election mandates last a maximum of 5 years. Elections are completely free and often result in a changeover of power to opposition parties.

Federal, Provincial, and municipal police forces are responsible for national and local law enforcement. An elected civilian government controls the armed forces, which have no role in domestic law enforcement except in strictly defined national emergencies.

Canada has an open economic system that encourages private ownership, investment, and entrepreneurship.

Canada's human rights performance in 1989 was exemplary. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, added to Canada's revised Constitution in 1982, provides fundamental rights and freedoms to everyone. Government and private organizations try to ensure that these rights are respected in practice at all levels of society. Canada actively promotes respect for human rights around the world.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no politically motivated killings. However, Canadian authorities and the general public are concerned about the potential for terrorist activity by Sikhs and members of other resident ethnic groups with active ties to troubled homelands. United Kingdom authorities have approved the extradition to Canada of a Sikh, formerly resident in British Columbia, who stands accused of having placed a bomb on a Canadian airplane in 1985 that killed two baggage handlers in Tokyo's Narita Airport.

b. Disappearance

Secret arrest, clandestine detention, and politically motivated disappearances did not occur.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

These abuses are prohibited by law, and none was reported.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Canadian law prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and this prohibition is respected in practice.

In January 1989, a law came into effect which strengthened the authority of the Federal Government to detain claimants to refugee status and swiftly deport those found inadmissible.

CANADA

A 1988 law authorizes the Federal Government to take special measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies. The intent of the law is to define the kinds of emergencies under which the Government may assume extraordinary powers, including the suspension of basic civil liberties. This law replaced the older and more loosely defined War Measures Act. The 1939 Official Secrets Act prohibits the private possession, distribution, and publication of information deemed prejudicial to the interests of the State and provides that persons under suspicion may be arrested without a warrant.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is based on English common law on the Federal level and in most Provinces. In the Province of Quebec, the judicial system is based on the Napoleonic Code. Judges in Canada are appointed. In criminal trials, Canadian law provides for a presumption of innocence of the defendant until proven guilty, as well as the right to a public trial and to counsel. Free counsel is provided to indigents.

The Official Secrets Act provides that trials concerning national security be held in secret with certain presumptions in favor of the State. Prosecutions under this statute are extremely rare, and convictions hard to sustain on appeal. There are no political prisoners in Canada.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Federal and Provincial governments do not interfere with a person's basic rights. Obtrusive searches may only be carried out when there is a reasonable basis for assuming that the person is involved in criminal activity. Police officials face the possibility of judicial penalties if they invade a person's privacy without first obtaining a search warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is provided for by the Constitution and respected in practice. Laws prohibiting certain forms of hate literature and pornography, restrictive decisions by provincial film censorship boards, and legislation which specifically protects language and cultural rights are the sole exceptions to these freedoms. The Canadian Human Rights Act makes it illegal to make repeated communications by telephone that expose persons to hatred or contempt. In July 1989, the Human Rights Tribunal, created by mandate of the Canadian Human Rights Act, ordered a white supremacist group in Alberta to stop playing an anti-Jewish taped message over the telephone.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed. Permits are not required for meetings.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to trade unions, see Section 6.a.

CANADA

c. Freedom of Religion

There is complete freedom of religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within or outside Canada, including the rights of emigration and repatriation. Canada continues to be a haven for many refugees and displaced persons. Widespread concern that many economic refugees have taken advantage of Canada's generous refugee law and made spurious requests for asylum led to the passage of a new refugee law, which went into effect on January 1, 1989. By successfully discouraging claimants from such countries as Portugal and Trinidad, where the conditions that generate valid claims for refugee status are generally lacking, this law brought about a 50-percent reduction in asylum applications. As of August, 78 percent of applications processed since the beginning of the year had been accepted. The backlog of refugee applications prior to 1989 is being processed under separate procedures.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Canada is governed by Federal and Provincial governments that are freely elected by the Canadian people through universal suffrage. Legislative elections must be held at least every 5 years, and voter participation rates are high. The Governor General is the Queen's representative as Head of State. In practice, power is exercised by the Prime Minister and the Cabinet, who usually are elected members of the 295-seat House of Commons. Three main parties are represented in the Commons, and several others function at the Provincial level. All Provinces and territories have similar freely elected legislatures.

Canada actively promotes human rights in international forums, and the Federal Government encourages nongovernmental organizations to pursue investigations of human rights abuses throughout the world. The Canadian Human Rights Commission and its Provincial counterparts investigate and resolve complaints of discrimination in public and private sector activities under governmental jurisdiction.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. Article 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equal benefits and protection of the law regardless of race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. These rights are respected in practice. However, a variety of groups continued in 1989 to express concern that the adoption by Canada of a constitutional accord, known as the "Meech Lake Accord," granting Quebec special status as a "distinct society" could endanger the rights of women and of linguistic and cultural minorities throughout Canada. The accord, signed by the Prime Minister and the Provincial Premiers and approved by Commons in 1987 but not yet approved by all the Provincial legislatures, is seen by some groups as threatening the promise of equal rights for women and minorities set forth by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Women's groups have been effective in bringing the issue of family violence to the fore. In a June 1987 report, a Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women estimated that 1 in every 10 women is physically, psychologically, or emotionally abused by her spouse or partner. Federal and Provincial governments have attempted to address the issue of family violence. In June 1988, the Federal Government appropriated $40 million for the construction of new shelters for battered women and their children, for police education on how to deal with domestic violence, and for research.

Ontario Province enacted a far-reaching law that took effect on January 1, 1990, which requires that all employers (public and private) with more than 10 workers provide equal pay to men and women for work of comparable skill and provides a formula for evaluating and comparing jobs traditionally held by women with those traditionally held by men. Women enjoy marriage and property rights equal to those of men.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers in both the public and private sectors have the right to associate freely and to strike. The Canada Labour Code, which covers all employees under Federal jurisdiction, protects these rights at the Federal level, while Provincial labor legislation protects all other organized workers. Trade unions are independent of the Government and may freely affiliate with international organizations. About 36 percent of Canada's nonagricultural work force is organized into trade unions. All workers' rights protected in law are respected in practice. The Canadian Labor Congress is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and many of its member unions are branches of American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations unions.

In practice, certain groups of essential public sector employees are not allowed to strike. Restrictions vary from province to province. The 17,500-member British Columbia Nurses Union struck legally in June 1989, while 1,000 Quebec nurses struck illegally in September 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers in both the public and private sectors have the right to organize and bargain collectively. Collective bargaining is protected by law and freely practiced, though some essential public sector employees have limited collective bargaining rights, which vary from province to province. Antiunion discrimination is banned by law, and there are effective mechanisms for resolving complaints. All labor unions have full access to mediation, arbitration, and the judicial system. Canada has a limited number of export processing zones, and labor laws and practices within them are consistent with Federal and relevant Provincial laws and practice.

CANADA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is illegal and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Child labor legislation differs among the provinces. The Federal Government generally prohibits those under 17 years of age from working for the Federal Government while school is in session. Provinces generally prohibit those under age 15 or 16 from working without parental consent, working in any hazardous employment, or working at night. These prohibitions are effectively enforced through inspections conducted by the Federal and Provincial labor ministries.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor standards vary from province to province, but all limit the standard workweek to 40 or 48 hours. Minimum wages are established in both Federal and Provincial jurisdictions. The Federal minimum wage, covering about 10 percent of the Canadian work force, is about $3.40 per hour. A lower minimum wage covers minors. Collectively, only 1 percent of workers governed by the Federal minimum wage are paid at the minimum. Eight percent of all workers are paid at the respective minimum wage covering their class of employment. Lower minimum wages for minors are being phased out. A family with only one employed member working at the minimum wage would be below the poverty level. All Provinces have established minimum wages higher than the Federal minimum.

The Federal Government establishes health and safety standards for the approximately 10 percent of workers covered by Federal labor legislation. Provincial legislation provides for health and safety standards for other workers. Federal and regional authorities enforce these standards through inspections.

CYPRUS

Cyprus has been divided since the Turkish military intervention of 1974, an event which followed a coup d'etat directed from Greece. Since that time, the southern part of the country has been under the control of the Government of the Republic of Cyprus, and the northern part under an autonomous Turkish Cypriot administration supported by the presence of Turkish troops. In 1983 that administration proclaimed itself the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus," which has been recognized only by Turkey. In 1985 it held a constitutional referendum and "presidential" and legislative elections.

The internal political systems of the Republic of Cyprus and the Turkish Cypriot administration are democratic and based on free elections, and they guarantee basic human rights to their populations in both theory and practice.

Free enterprise, private initiative, and the right to own property are characteristic of both Cypriot economies. The economy in the south has prospered in recent years, benefiting especially from tourism and manufactured exports. The economy in the Turkish Cypriot area is closely linked to that of Turkey and has significant underemployment. State enterprises play a large role in the Turkish Cypriot economy.

The conflict between the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities during the 1963-74 period, the Turkish intervention in 1974, and the subsequent presence of Turkish troops in the north have led to continuing charges of human rights violations. These events resulted in the uprooting of Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots from the northern and southern parts of the island respectively, and the loss of lives, homes, and livelihoods.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political or extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of persons abducted, secretly arrested, or held in clandestine detention during 1989. However, the issue of persons missing during the 1963-74 period remains a source of dispute between the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities. The Tripartite Committee on Missing Persons established under the auspices of the U.N. Secretary General in 1981 continued its investigations into this issue during 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Both the Cyprus Constitution and the basic document governing the Turkish Cypriot community specifically prohibit torture. Freedom from cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice in both communities.

CYPRUS

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile.

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention is guaranteed by law and respected in practice by the Government of Cyprus and Turkish Cypriot authorities. Preventive detention is not legally authorized, nor has it been reported in practice. No one may be held for more than 1 day for investigation of a crime without referral of the case to the courts for extension of the period of detention. Most periods of investigative detention do not exceed 8 to 10 days before formal charges are filed. Attorneys have free access to detainees. No instances of exile were reported.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In both parts of Cyprus, fair public trial is guaranteed by law and exists in practice. The judiciary is independent of executive or military control. Defendants have the right to be present at their trials, to be represented by counsel (at government expense for those who cannot afford one), to confront witnesses, and to present evidence in their own defense. Cases are generally tried before a judge or panel of judges, although a request for a jury trial is usually granted. There are no special courts to deal with security or political offenses. Civilians are not tried by military courts. There are no political prisoners in Cyprus.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

Both the Cyprus Constitution and the basic document governing the Turkish Cypriot community include provisions protecting the individual against arbitrary interference. A judicial warrant is required, for example, for a police official to enter a private residence. Abuses of privacy run counter to the democratic traditions of both communities. However, Turkish Cypriots continue to complain that mail coming through the Republic of Cyprus postal system is often delayed, opened, or not delivered.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These rights are provided for by law and are widely and freely practiced throughout the island. The press is free and represents the entire political spectrum. There is no press censorship, but the authorities exercise monopoly control over radio and television. Legislation was passed by the Republic of Cyprus in 1986 giving each party represented in Parliament a seat on the board controlling the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation. A draft bill in the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives would authorize private broadcasting. In addition, the proliferation of party and independent newspapers in both communities enables ideas and arguments to circulate freely.

Opposition papers on both sides of the island frequently criticize the authorities. When a prominent Turkish Cypriot politician in 1989 made statements and published articles critical of Turkey's relationship with northern Cyprus, the Turkish Embassy requested that he surrender his Turkish passport to it, which he did. Since most states do not recognize "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" passports, this severely restricted his freedom of movement outside of northern Cyprus.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to trade unions, see Section 6.a.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to associate, organize, and hold meetings is guaranteed by law and respected in practice.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is respected in Cyprus. In the south, the vast majority of the population is Greek Orthodox; in the north, Sunni Muslim. The Greek Orthodox Church in the south has the character of a state institution. Missionaries are permitted to proselytize in both communities. There is, however, some hesitation on the part of the Government of Cyprus to allow such activities to go on in an unrestricted manner owing to the primacy of the Greek Orthodox Church.

Approximately 100 Turkish Cypriots who still live in the south of the island are allowed to practice their religion freely. In the north, non-Muslims include approximately 700 Greek Cypriots, over 300 Christian Maronites, and some foreign residents--all of whom are free to practice their religions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Turkish and Greek Cypriots enjoy general freedom of movement within their respective areas. Turkish Cypriot authorities regulate travel into and out of the Turkish Cypriot area. In general, they have barred Greeks, Greek Cypriots, and sometimes third-country nationals with Greek surnames from entering the north and Turkish Cypriots from visiting the south. In late November, Turkish Cypriot authorities announced the easing of requirements for travel documentation for Greek Cypriots wishing to visit the north. While significant restrictions remain--including a requirement that Greek Cypriots have "legitimate business" to conduct in northern Cyprus--the period since November saw a marked increase in the flow of Cypriots in both directions across the U.N. buffer zone.

The applications of Greek Cypriot residents of enclaves in the north to visit the south are usually granted, but the applicants must return within a designated period or risk losing their right to return, along with their property; foreigners coming from the south must obtain permission to enter the north. At the same time, the Government of Cyprus bars entry into the Greek Cypriot area by foreigners who arrive at Turkish Cypriot ports of entry. Those who have entered through the south but wish to stay overnight in the north are discouraged from doing so by the Cyprus Government.

The right to travel abroad and to emigrate is observed, although persons facing military service or legal action in either part of Cyprus may not be allowed to travel without specific permission. Turkish Cypriots have difficulty in traveling to some countries because travel documents issued by the Turkish Cypriot authorities are not widely recognized. In such cases, they travel on Turkish passports, to which they are considered entitled by Turkey. Citizens may repatriate freely.

The Government of Cyprus does not honor the practice of accepting third-country persons as refugees, arguing that it already has enough responsibilities in caring for the Greek Cypriot refugees (displaced persons) from the 1974 Turkish intervention. The Greek Cypriot authorities endeavor to remove or deport all such third-country refugee claimants as soon as possible, even prior to a determination by the local United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees representative that the claim is valid, or prior to acceptance for resettlement by a third country.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Both the Government of Cyprus and the administration of the Turkish Cypriot community are democratically elected. In their lively multiparty political systems, parties compete actively and without restriction for popular support. Suffrage is universal, and elections are held by secret ballot. Elections for the office of President of the Republic of Cyprus are held every 5 years, and elections for the House of Representatives every 5 years or less. The Turkish Cypriots elect a leader every 5 years, and a representative body every 5 years or less. Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the north--the latter having chosen before independence in 1960 to be regarded as members of the Greek Cypriot community--do not participate in Turkish Cypriot elections but elect their own village officials. They are eligible to vote in Greek Cypriot elections but must make their way to the south in order to exercise that right.

There have been no requests from international human rights organizations to investigate human rights conditions in Cyprus. Representatives of such human rights organizations have open access to both the south and the north.

The question of human rights in Cyprus is closely connected to the political differences that divide the two communities. In 1986 a group of Greek Cypriots announced the formation of a "Committee for the Restoration of Human Rights Throughout Cyprus." This Committee ascribes the problem of human rights on the island to the 1974 Turkish military intervention and the continued presence of Turkish troops in the north. The Turkish Cypriot Human Rights Committee in turn denounces the Greek Cypriot charges, stating that the Turkish troops are present to protect Turkish Cypriot human rights. Such exchanges continued in 1989.

The Republic of Cyprus has applied to have the question of human rights in Cyprus placed on the agenda of the European Commission of Human Rights. In addition, the Government of Cyprus has repeatedly raised in international forums the question of persons missing since 1974.

CYPRUS

Food, shelter, education, and health care are usually available to members of both communities regardless of race, religion, ethnic background, or political opinion. Nevertheless, there have been complaints that the welfare of minorities in the north is impaired by Turkish Cypriot restrictions on housing, education, and movement. The United Nations Force in Cyprus monitors the welfare of the Greek Cypriots and Maronites in the north, as well as that of the Turkish Cypriots in the south.

Throughout Cyprus, women generally have the same legal status as men. In the north, legal provisions exist requiring equal pay for men and women performing the same job. In the south, until recently, government workers received equal pay for equal work, regardless of sex. In October a new law was passed requiring equality of pay between men and women working in the private sector.

Social taboos, traditions, and family honor shroud incidents of wife and family abuse on Cyprus. Moreover, it is understood that police files on incidents of domestic violence are sometimes destroyed under the pretext that it is "a personal matter." Several directors of the Crisis Center for Family Violence in the south, nevertheless, have recently reported that the number of domestic abuse cases, including wife beating, is on the rise. The Crisis Center, as well as several other support groups, has been established in part to draw public attention to this problem and to encourage governmental action in dealing with it.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Trade unions and confederations are free to organize in both the north and south. For several years, however, the Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has noted that Cypriot labor legislation restricting the rights of trade unions to elect their representatives freely is not in conformity with ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association which Cyprus ratified in 1966. More than 80 percent of Greek Cypriot workers and 40-50 percent of Turkish Cypriot workers belong to independent trade unions. Union officials in the north, however, allege that the ruling party has tended to exert its influence to split the labor movement, especially in the government service sector, by supporting the establishment of rival syndicates. In both communities, trade unions freely and regularly take stands on public policy issues affecting the workers.

All Cypriot workers have the right to strike. In general, strikes are infrequent and usually of short duration. Both the Government of Cyprus and the Turkish Cypriot authorities have the power to curtail strikes in what they deem to be essential services. The Government of Cyprus did so once in 1989, in relation to a strike by the staff of the Cyprus Ports Authority. In the north, authorities moved to ban a veterinarians' strike which had run for 2 weeks. In 1989 the Committee of Experts noted that essential services should be more strictly interpreted in Cyprus as those whose interruptions would endanger the life, personal safety, or health of the whole or part of the population.

CYPRUS

Unions in both parts of Cyprus freely take part in international meetings. Most unions are affiliated either with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions or with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. Labor unions, more than most other organizations on Cyprus, attempt to maintain contact and cooperation across the dividing line.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Under law and in actual practice, trade unions and confederations are free to organize and to bargain collectively in both parts of Cyprus. In both the north and the south, parties to a dispute may request mediation by the authorities. In both sectors, legislation prohibits dismissal for participation in trade unions. There are no export processing zones on either side of the demarcation line.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law, and no instances were reported.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Government of Cyprus has set the minimum age of employment of children in an "industrial undertaking" at age 16. In the north, the age is 15. The law is effectively enforced in both sectors by government labor inspectors.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

In the south, minimum wage laws exist for apprentices between the ages of 16 and 18. The wage set for this group is equal to about $250 per month. Minimum wages for other groups are fixed through collective agreement. In the north, the minimum wage equals about $100 per month. It is effectively enforced, but by itself is not adequate to provide a decent living for workers and their families. The Government of Cyprus has set 40 hours as the maximum number of hours of work per week except for shop workers and drivers, who work no more than 42 1/2 hours. In the north, the maximum number of hours of work per week in the winter is 38, and in the summer 36. Occupational safety and health regulations are effectively administered in both sectors, though the standards are not equivalent to those in Western industrialized countries.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Until December 1989, the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic was ruled as a centralized totalitarian state by the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (CPCZ). The CPCZ leadership decided all important political, economic, social, and cultural questions and sharply limited the scope of individual human rights. A brutal police attack on peaceful student demonstrators on November 17, however, sparked massive street demonstrations which led to the overthrow of the old Communist leadership. In December the first Czechoslovak government since 1948 in which a majority of ministers were not Communists was installed, and the human rights activist, Vaclav Havel, was elected President.

The new Government is led by Communist Prime Minister Marian Calfa but includes ministers associated with the Civic Forum, a new prodemocracy opposition group. The Government committed itself to free elections, an economic reform program leading to a market economy, and an overhaul of Czechoslovak laws governing human rights.

The Government also pledged to gain control of the Ministry of Interior, which includes a large, well-funded internal security establishment used as an instrument of control by the CPCZ. The new First Deputy Prime Minister, Jan Carnogursky, who had been imprisoned for a portion of 1989 for his human rights activities, was given primary responsibility for restructuring the Ministry. In December the Government also acted to disarm the People's Militia, the CPCZ's private army. The militia has since been disbanded.

Czechoslovakia's centrally planned economy has allowed virtually no private enterprise or ownership in manufacturing, retail operations, agriculture, or services. In recent years, the economy, characterized by excessive central planning, obsolete equipment and infrastructure, and an almost complete lack of incentives for innovation and initiative, had become less competitive in world markets. The ministers responsible for economic affairs in the new Government have committed themselves to creation of a mixed economy responsive to the demands of the marketplace.

The human rights situation worsened until November 1989. The 4-month imprisonment of playwright Vaclav Havel for his peaceful participation in a January demonstration drew international condemnation, but dozens of lesser known persons were also sentenced to prison or fined for exercising their freedoms of speech, assembly, and association provided in the Constitution. Other human rights concerns included arbitrary detention, arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, and correspondence, and restrictions on freedom of religion and worker rights.

The following report primarily describes the human rights situation as it existed before the November 17 student demonstration which precipitated the overthrow of the CPCZ leadership. Most of the practices that led to widespread human rights abuses appeared to have been abandoned by year's end, and important changes were being considered. The next annual report is likely to include a significantly different assessment of human rights practices.

CZECHOSLOVAKIARESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No substantiated reports suggesting political or extrajudicial killings came to public attention in 1989. A report that a person named Tomas Smid had been killed by police during the November 17 demonstration proved false, and the special commission investigating the events of November 17 had not found evidence that anyone had died as a consequence of the police attack.

b. Disappearance

At year's end, the Government was unable to substantiate reports that several students involved in November demonstrations and strikes had disappeared.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The former government did not appear to practice a systematic program of torture. However, several persons detained for their participation in week-long demonstrations in January, commemorating the death of student Jan Palach 20 years earlier, were severely beaten by police. Czechoslovak security officers on several occasions also attacked and beat human rights activists, such as Petr Placak, Josef Kuhn, and Stanislav Penc. In addition, Stanislav Devaty, while jailed and awaiting trial, was chained to a bed in a cold cell for several hours while dressed only in his underwear.

A 1989 Helsinki Watch report strongly criticized prison conditions in Czechoslovakia. Generally, prison conditions have been poor, especially the "third category" of imprisonment (the harshest regime). Cells are usually small and unheated, family visits and correspondence are strictly limited, and prisoners report such punishments as reduction in pay and limitations on free time, bathing, and exercise periods if they fail to meet unrealistically high production standards.

Informed sources also reported that prisoners were assigned hazardous work such as polishing crystal and costume jewelry in environments lacking sufficient ventilation to prevent glass fragments and chemicals from being inhaled. Sanitary and medical facilities and diet were reported to be inadequate. Former prisoners have reported that prison guards sometimes encourage hardened criminals to prey on persons serving sentences for political offenses. Prisoners or former prisoners who complained publicly of mistreatment had been severely punished and sometimes sentenced again for having complained.

No consensus exists among independent observers regarding whether or not there was widespread abuse of psychiatry in Czechoslovakia. However, one case of possible psychiatric abuse involved Augustin Navratil, the Catholic activist who drafted a 31-point petition for religious freedom. In October 1988 Navratil was committed involuntarily to inpatient psychiatric care for an indefinite period. This decision was made despite an examination in September by Western physicians who reportedly found Navratil's mental condition to be within

"normal parameters." Navratil was released from psychiatric care in early 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Until November, Czechoslovak citizens, especially human rights activists, were frequently arrested, detained, interrogated, and subjected to personal and home searches for the expression of personal views. Judicial and police authorities often explained such actions in legal terms and performed them with warrants. They also arrested and detained citizens without warrants. Under existing law, a person may be detained for cause for up to 48 hours without being charged, although in practice this limit was not always observed, and the authorities used the discretionary powers of the prosecutor general to extend such detentions. Searches, detentions, and frequent interrogations were among the tactics used by the regime when it decided to harass rather than to prosecute.

Dozens of activists from Charter 77 and other independent initiatives were detained during the days before the August 21 anniversary of the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia and the October 28 anniversary of the founding of the Czechoslovak Republic. Other activists had been warned that they would be detained if found in Prague and chose to remain outside the city. None of those detained were charged with violations of criminal law.

Detentions were also used before November as a means of preventing human rights activists from attending meetings or harassing them after a meeting. Members of the reform Socialist club Obroda were detained and subjected to interrogation on several occasions to prevent their attendance at Obroda meetings. Security forces prevented the three Charter 77 spokespersons, Vaclav Havel, Dana Nemcova, and Tomas Hradilek from meeting together in September, and Havel was detained in August in an apparent attempt to prevent his attendance at a meeting of the Czech chapter of PEN, an international writers' organization. Police detained members of the Czechoslovak Helsinki Committee in September as committee members left a meeting and then interrogated them and confiscated their papers. One independent observer believes there were hundreds, perhaps up to 1,000, such detentions until November.

According to law, a detainee could be held in investigative detention for 2 months if the authorities decided to press charges. A detainee could generally receive visits by family members only after a trial. Investigative detention could be extended beyond 2 months at the request of the prosecution, and detainees were sometimes held for long periods without being brought to trial. Cultural activist Petr Cibulka was held in detention for over a year while awaiting trial and was allowed only one visit, from his mother, during the entire period of detention.

Although the former government did not formally impose internal exile or house arrest, it introduced in 1984, for the first time, a regime of "protective supervision" which combined features of both. Protective supervision included travel restrictions, curfews, frequent searches of persons, homes, and guests, and the obligation to report regularly--sometimes as often as once a day--to the police. The imposition of such a regime, intended for habitually violent offenders, against persons who never committed or advocated an act of violence was a form of harassment that sharply curtailed their freedom of movement and isolated them from normal contact with those outside their home.

Since 1986 there have been no reports of the Government's use of forced exile to rid itself of critics. Prior to that time, people working or visiting abroad with official permission were at times stripped of their citizenship and refused the right to return. The authorities on occasion exerted heavy pressure to emigrate on those who had already served a jail sentence. If they refused, they and their families suffered harassment, denial of jobs and schooling, and the threat of rearrest. After a year or more of this treatment, some ex-prisoners applied for emigration passports.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

According to Czechoslovak law, people charged with criminal offenses are entitled to fair and open public trials. They have a right to be informed concerning the charges against them, to retain counsel, and to present a defense. In practice, however, the exercise of these rights was often reduced to a mere formality, especially where political offenses were concerned.

The judiciary was not independent of the regime and the Communist Party. In theory, judges could be removed only by the Federal Assembly (national parliament) or by the Czech or Slovak National Councils (regional parliaments). In practice, they were subject to direct control and supervision by the CPCZ, to which most judges belonged.

Defendants may either choose their own lawyers or request court-appointed lawyers. However, lawyers were subject to direct and indirect pressures from political authorities and in the past did not always vigorously represent their clients. In 1989, however, most independent observers believe defense lawyers generally offered vigorous defenses in cases involving political charges. Defendants occasionally succeeded in having charges dismissed or reduced at the original trial, but the prosecution could file an appeal, which sometimes resulted in an increase in the sentence or additional charges.

In 1989 it was easier for friends of defendants, press representatives, diplomats, and representatives of human rights organizations to attend trials with political content. Courtroom size on several occasions prevented all interested observers from attending a trial, but there was no evidence of manipulated assignment of courtrooms to limit attendance. The authorities also resorted to a ticketing system for admission to trials of particularly prominent human rights activists, such as Vaclav Havel. In the Havel trial, there were no diplomats in the handful of foreign observers who were admitted.

Persons arrested for expressing personal views that took issue with the Communist regime's official position generally were charged with "subversion," "incitement," or "damaging the interests of the republic abroad." Those arrested for religious activities usually were charged with "obstructing state supervision of churches and religious societies."

The former authorities also resorted to arbitrary or trumped-up criminal charges (e.g., "hooliganism" or "illegal enterprising") to punish those whose real offense was to engage in unauthorized political or cultural activity. The hooliganism charge was used against some of those detained in connection with January and August 1989 demonstrations in Prague. A charge of illegal enterprising was the prosecutorial tactic employed against Petr Cibulka.

The new Government has announced plans to revise the existing penal code during 1990, focusing on both procedural and substantive provisions of the law. Special attention will be devoted to those provisions used in the past to prosecute human rights and religious activists.

Figures available from the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Persecuted (VONS), which documents individual cases to the best of its ability, suggest there were at least 25 political prisoners in Czechoslovak jails in 1989. However, a sweeping amnesty signed in December by former President Gustav Husak provided for the release of virtually all persons who might have been imprisoned for political offenses. Among those not covered by the amnesty were those convicted of espionage. Indications are that the new Government, pursuant to a request by VONS officials, will review the cases of several persons whose convictions for espionage might have been politically motivated.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The former government monitored and controlled the activities of citizens whom it suspected of engaging in antiregime or independent activity. Consequently, it also interfered with privacy of communications.

Those who were considered opponents of the regime bore the brunt of heavily intrusive surveillance. They, their families, and their friends were subjected routinely to such measures as electronic surveillance, home searches, tapping of telephones, and interception and destruction of mail. The new Government has begun the task of dismantling the special security units which carried out these activities against human rights activists and others considered enemies of the Communist regime. It also transferred control of wiretap facilities from the Ministry of the Interior to the Ministry of Transportation and Communication and ordered sealing of the facilities.

Discrimination in employment was a regular aspect of the harassment and persecution of dissidents and their families. Instilling fear among intellectuals and white-collar workers that their children might be denied higher education was a factor in discouraging open dissent. These tactics were discontinued after November.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of speech and freedom of the press, it states that these freedoms must be exercised "in accordance with the interests of the working class." In effect, persons who voiced opinions publicly that differed from party policy or that questioned the legitimacy of party rule faced fines and imprisonment, especially when they asked others who shared their opinions to join them.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Before November, for example, Stanislav Devaty was sentenced to 20 months' imprisonment for circulating a petition in support of political prisoners. Ivan Jirous and Jiri Tichy were sentenced to 16 and 6 months respectively for circulating a petition criticizing the Communist management of Czechoslovakia since 1948, and Renata Panova was sentenced to 3 months' imprisonment for the distribution of political leaflets.

As a consequence of the November demonstrations and the installation of the new Government, persons were able to exercise their right to freedom of speech without official interference. The Government promised to enact new laws formally guaranteeing freedom of speech no later than February 1990.

The former government also attempted to repress a petition campaign centered around a document entitled "Nekolik Vet" (Several Sentences). The document called, among other things, for a release of political prisoners, respect for human rights, a public discussion of a new constitution, and reevaluation of the 1968 Soviet-led invasion which crushed the Prague Spring. The petition was signed by about 40,000 people before the events of November 17. Dozens of persons who collected signatures for the petition were fined for their activities, usually between $300 and $500 (i.e., in excess of 1 month's wages for the average worker.) Two of the petition's four "guarantors" of the signatures, Stanislav Devaty and Sasa Vondra, were sentenced to prison terms after the petition drive began, although their convictions were technically based on other charges.

All domestic radio and television broadcasting facilities are government owned. Self-censorship of news and entertainment programs under CPCZ guidelines was practiced, and there was no opportunity for views contrary to CPCZ policies to be expressed. However, beginning in late November a dramatic change occurred as television and radio workers challenged the former regime, and radio and television newscasts began presenting objective reports of events. Opposition political groups were also given air time to present their views.

In December 1988 the former government ceased jamming Radio Free Europe broadcasts for the first time in two decades. Voice of America and other Western radio broadcasts also were not jammed. Many people who live near the country's western or southern borders can routinely receive Western television broadcasts while those in the interior of the country may do so by means of special antennas or satellite dishes.

All officially recognized newspapers and magazines were published and controlled by mass organizations of the National Front (e.g., the Union of Socialist Youth, Revolutionary Trade Union Movement, or Sports Federation.) These in turn were controlled by the Communist Party. Legally published religious literature and periodicals were subject to strict censorship and were available only in limited editions. Publishing houses and the news media, all state owned, employed self-censorship under CPCZ guidelines. Editors who were insufficiently vigilant suffered fines or dismissal. Nonetheless, even before the events of November 17, some journalists took an increasingly more critical line concerning government and party policies. In the wake of November 17 the self-censorship seen before all but disappeared.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The independent newspaper, Lidove Noviny, began publication in 1988. Although authorities refused to register the publication officially and in 1989 imprisoned its two editors, Jiri Ruml and Rudolf Zaman, the monthly continued to appear. Other samizdat (self-published) material included a newsletter entitled Informace O Charte 77 (Information About Charter 77), which carried Charter 77 documents and VONS communiques reporting human rights violations. In addition, an independent new agency called the East European Information Agency was formed in December 1988 and functioned throughout 1989, providing reports to Western and other new media.

Some samizdat literature was sent abroad, where it was reprinted in emigre publishing houses and then brought back to Czechoslovakia. Persons engaging in independent publishing activities in 1989 included Frantisek Starek, who received a 30-month sentence, plus 2 years' protective supervision, in connection with the samizdat publications Vokno and Voknoviny that he compiled and distributed.

During 1989 only a limited number of Western non-Communist periodicals were imported, and these were usually not available to ordinary citizens. No Western non-Communist newspapers or newsmagazines were available to the general public. Access to Western political publications was limited to persons who had obtained special permission from their employers or their universities documenting their need for the material for official purposes.

At the end of 1989 virtually complete artistic freedom had come to exist in Czechoslovakia. A public reading of a play of Vaclav Havel, whose plays had been banned, had been given, and plans were under way by several theaters to feature works by Havel during 1990. In addition, one student group was performing "Animal Farm," a previously banned work. Several samizdat publications, such as the newspaper Lidove Noviny, had also announced plans to begin regular publication.

Academic freedom, as it is known in the West, did not exist. All universities and research institutes were operated by the State or party, and all teaching and research was required to conform to official requirements. In areas such as foreign policy or contemporary history, these requirements narrowly circumscribed the content of research and teaching to the virtual exclusion of independent investigation, but discussion concerning economic and environment issues was much freer than several years ago. Somewhat greater freedom was also allowed in scholarship not involving politically sensitive subjects.

Admission to study at the university level was based on party connections and political reliability as well as merit. Communist Party membership typically was a prerequisite to advancement beyond lower level teaching positions, as was basic conformity to orthodox opinions, at least superficially. Academics were among those who were required to report contacts with Westerners and an "official reason" was typically needed to associate with Western diplomats.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of assembly, that freedom was severely limited in practice until November. Public meetings could be held only with the permission of the police, and this permission depended upon whether or not the proposed meeting supported state objectives. A 1988 Prague ordinance banned independent demonstrations in the city's historic Wenceslas and Old Town Squares, although state-sponsored rallies continued to take place there. When the authorities wished to have a large rally, such as May Day or "peace" demonstrations, they exerted pressure on people to attend.

In January 1989, police used tear gas, water cannon, dogs, and baton charges to disperse crowds which peacefully gathered in Prague's Wenceslas Square for a week-long series of demonstrations to commemorate the anniversary of the 1969 self-immolation of Jan Palach. Vaclav Havel, Jana Petrova, Miroslav Sramek, and Otakar Veverka all were convicted for their participation in the demonstrations and served from 1 to 6 months in prison. Stanislav Penc, Petr Placak, Jana Sternova, and Sasa Vondra were convicted for laying flowers on Prague's Wenceslas Square to commemorate Jan Palach's death, but the sentences were suspended.

On May 1, a few hundred demonstrators attempted to mount a counterdemonstration on Wenceslas Square in juxtaposition with an officially sponsored May Day rally. Police broke up the counterdemonstration and detained approximately 50 persons. Among those detained was a British reporter who tried to interview demonstrators.

On August 21, the 21st anniversary of the 1968 Soviet-led invasion that put an end to the Prague Spring, the authorities suppressed a peaceful demonstration in Prague. Several thousand persons marched for more than 3 hours until police finally dispersed the crowd, detaining 320 persons.

On October 28, the anniversary of Czechoslovakia's founding as an independent state, a crowd of about 10,000 people gathered in Wenceslas Square to call for freedom and democracy. Police equipped with riot gear broke up the demonstration, arresting at least 250 persons.

The November 17 demonstration started as an officially sanctioned rally to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the death of Jan Opletal, a student leader killed by the Nazi Gestapo. The event was jointly sponsored by the Socialist Youth Union and an independent student group. After the completion of the official portion of the program, demonstrators numbering up to 50,000 persons attempted to march to Prague's Wenceslas Square, but were prevented from doing so by a line of police equipped with riot gear. After a peaceful stand-off of about an hour between the police and demonstrators, the police and special antiterrorism units of the Interior Ministry attacked the demonstrators, using truncheons, tear gas, and dogs.

A special commission of the Federal Assembly investigating the events of November 17 determined that at least 291 persons, including 7 American journalists, were injured by the police attack. Early reports that a student had been killed during the attack proved false, and the special commission at year's end had not unearthed evidence that anyone had died as a consequence of the attack. Former Prague Communist Party leader Miroslav Stepan and at least eight police officers faced criminal charges for their role in the police attacks.

After November 17, massive demonstrations occurred in Prague for 10 consecutive days, with crowds at times reaching one-half million persons. Large demonstrations in Bratislava and other Czechoslovak cities occurred as well during this period, and all of them without police interference.

The new Government has committed itself to sponsoring legislation which would guarantee Czechoslovaks the right to peaceful assembly. Such a right already existed in fact at the end of 1989. The mayor of Prague promised that police would not interfere with peaceful demonstrations, and several took place without incident.

The former government did not permit the establishment of independent associations. All social and other groupings were required to register with the National Front, an umbrella organization including the CPCZ and all legal political and social groups.

In May 1987, the founding committee of a proposed organization to be named the Society of Friends of the United States (SPUSA) submitted a request for approval of its bylaws to the Ministry of Interior. The organization was to be a voluntary, social association within the framework of the National Front, and dedicated to developing friendship, trust, and understanding between Czechoslovakia and the United States. Following final rejection of its application, SPUSA reorganized itself as an informal "association." SPUSA was characterized by the authorities as an antistate organization. SPUSA cofounder Stanislav Devaty was sentenced to up to 20 months' imprisonment in August, and other SPUSA activists were subjected to repeated harassment by security officials.

Other citizens' groups subjected to official harassment or unable to secure official recognition include the Independent Peace Association, the Movement for Civil Liberties, Obroda, the John Lennon Peace Club, and the Democratic Initiative. Citizens interested in the environment and in the visual and performing arts (including rock and punk groups,) although also harassed, had some success in organizing independent activities.

The former authorities in 1989 permitted establishment of an "Art Forum" for the promotion of independent cultural activities. The Art Forum was set up under the direction of Karel Srp and Joska Skanik, formerly imprisoned leaders of the Jazz Section.

After November, a multitude of independent organizations, including political parties, were created by Czechoslovak citizens. The new Government has not interfered or attempted to regulate the formation or activities of such groups.

In 1989 meetings between citizens and foreign visitors to Czechoslovakia generally passed without incident. Police in July did detain Jiri Hajek, the Foreign Minister during the Prague Spring, preventing him from lecturing to a group of visiting West Germans concerning the 1968 reform program. Other Czechoslovaks invited to speak to the same group were warned they would be detained if they attempted to deliver a lecture. In October Jeri Laber, a Helsinki Watch official, was briefly detained with members of the Czechoslovak Helsinki Committee when they attempted to meet in a Prague restaurant.

"Scientific atheism" was part of the official ideology, and freedom of religion, provided for in the Constitution, was strictly limited in practice. The former regime actively discouraged all religious activity, especially among the young. Teachers, policemen, Communist Party officials, and members of certain other professions encountered problems in their careers if they were seen in church.

The former government exercised strict control over all religious affairs. Churches were required to register with it in order to function legally in Czechoslovakia. Groups which proselytize, such as Jehovah's Witnesses and Mormons, were banned outright, and their members suffered frequent harassment and arrest. Jehovah's Witnesses were reported in several prisons, most apparently because of a refusal to serve required military service, but there was no reliable estimate of their number.

Organized religious practice was hampered by both written and unwritten restrictions. For example, the ability of clergymen to engage in religious work, including charitable endeavors outside church premises, was severely restricted. The State approved the assignments of clergymen and used its power to harass those it deemed too popular or active. In addition, clergymen were paid by the State and were required to obtain a state license in order to practice. Such licenses were often withdrawn without explanation. In 1989 two ministers of the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren, Zvonimir Sorm and Pavel Pokorny, lost their licenses as a consequence of their relations with independent political groups. Estimates of the number of clergymen who had lost their licenses vary, but they are known to have included several bishops. Those who continued to practice despite revocation of their licenses were liable to criminal prosecution.

Religious instruction in the home was forbidden, although in 1989 there were no reports of interference by the former government with such instruction. In the past, parents were required to apply to local authorities if their children were to receive religious education at state schools, but changes in 1989 provided that requests for religious instruction were to be made directly to a church representative. A student was to be registered automatically for religious instruction if both parents agreed. Instruction for Catholic children was provided at school but was limited to 1 hour per week for grades 2 through 7. Instruction for Protestant children took place at church, as arranged between the leaders of each religious denomination and the former government. School authorities warned parents that participation in religious classes could be damaging to a child's education and career prospects.

Although the former government stated its intention to increase the supply of religious literature, printing was severely restricted, and Bibles were in short supply. Bibles and other religious literature were smuggled in from abroad and produced by underground samizdat methods. Government efforts to confiscate smuggled religious materials or shut down samizdat sources of materials appeared to have been less extensive in 1989 than in previous years.

The authorities did not facilitate travel by religious officials to and from Czechoslovakia unless the proposed visit served the purpose of the State. In the case of the Catholic Church, the former government did not invite Pope John Paul II to visit Czechoslovakia despite Cardinal Tomasek's request that an official invitation be issued and the existence of petitions supporting such a visit signed by thousands of persons. Priests and other religious leaders were frequently denied permission to travel outside the country, although in 1989 denial of permission to travel was less frequent, and Cardinal Tomasek and some 10,000 Czechoslovaks were allowed to travel to Rome for the canonization of Agnes of Bohemia.

The State maintained all church property. In practice, this meant that the vast majority of church property was very poorly maintained. For many years, no proposed construction of new Catholic churches had been approved. However, some Protestant congregations--including Baptists--had been allowed to build new churches.

The Roman Catholic Church is the largest of Czechoslovakia's 19 officially registered religious bodies. There are an estimated 6 to 7 million Roman Catholics in the country, and up to 300,000 members of the affiliated Greek Catholic (Uniate) Church. The Greek Catholic Church was reestablished in 1968 after having been forcibly united with the much smaller Orthodox Church in 1950. However, the Greek Catholics have been unable to reclaim much of their property, which remains in the possession of the Orthodox Church.

In early 1989, only 2 of the country's 13 dioceses had bishops. During the course of 1989, the former regime approved the appointment of four new bishops to fill empty bishoprics. Students in Czechoslovakia's 2 remaining Catholic seminaries (out of a prewar total of 13) needed state approval to be admitted and ordained. Although the State in recent years had raised the limits on the number of Catholic seminarians, large numbers of qualified applicants were denied admission to theological studies.

In 1950 all male religious orders were dissolved. A few female religious orders were allowed to continue functioning and for the first time since a brief period in 1968 were allowed to admit a limited number of new members. Despite these limitations, some Catholic monastic orders continued to operate clandestinely.

In Slovakia there were several Catholic pilgrimages in 1989 in which several hundred thousand people took part. There was no substantial police interference with the pilgrimages, except for one in Nitra where the authorities controlled the pilgrimage's program.

"Pacem in Terris," the state-sponsored "peace association" of Catholic clergy, had been a major instrument of state control over the Catholic Church. The association had been losing ground since 1982 when the Vatican banned clerical participation in political organizations worldwide, and Cardinal Tomasek and the overwhelming majority of Catholic clergy in Czechoslovakia disassociated themselves from "Pacem in Terris."

Protestant denominations registered by the authorities also operated under state-imposed constraints. Proselytizing was forbidden; religious ceremonies were mostly restricted to church premises; and education of the clergy was closely controlled. In 1989 the former government recognized another Protestant denomination, the Apostolic Church of Bohemia.

Two Jewish community councils, one in the Czech lands and the other in Slovakia, serve the Jewish community of several thousand. These councils have been central religious organizations financially supported and controlled by the Government. There are synagogues and prayer houses open for worship and two rabbis, one in Prague and one in Kosice. Religious ritual articles and kosher meat are available in limited supply. There is no rabbinical seminary. In late December, the Czech Jewish Community (Council of Jewish Communities of Bohemia and Moravia) in its first free election in decades elected a highly respected former leader ousted earlier by the regime because of his independence.

Officials of the new Government indicated they would support repeal of a 1949 law regulating relations between the State and churches, and churches therefore will be free to conduct their own affairs without state interference.

Towards the end of 1989, the Minister of Culture of the new Czechoslovak government advised Roman Catholic Church officials that they were free to fill empty bishoprics without gaining prior approval of the State, and the Vatican thereupon named three new bishops, leaving four empty bishoprics at the end of 1989. In addition, priests and ministers who had previously lost their licenses to practice have been allowed to return to religious work, including Father Vaclav Maly, a former Charter 77 spokesman. The Catholic Church also announced plans to open three additional seminaries. Those priests who were still members of "Pacem in Terris" notified Cardinal Tomasek in December that the organization had ceased its activities and disbanded.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

For all Czechoslovaks, freedom of movement has been restricted near military installations and along the borders with Austria and the Federal Republic of Germany. Movement within the rest of the country was not restricted for most citizens. However, the former government restricted the movements of Charter 77 activists and other "suspect" persons, especially to prevent their participation in independently organized activities.

During 1989 the former government eased regulations affecting travel to the West. It also announced that it would lift the exit permit requirement for private travel in 1990, an action which in fact was taken after the events of November.

Travel by citizens of Czechoslovakia to East European countries also was regulated. The new Government at year's end had not taken action to alter these regulations.

Citizens deemed politically unreliable were often denied permission to travel outside of Czechoslovakia. They often were not provided with substantive reasons for the denials, making it difficult to appeal the denials to higher administrative authorities. In 1989 Czechoslovak authorities temporarily stripped Charter 77 founder Jiri Hajek of his passport after Hajek traveled to Norway to attend a conference of the Socialist International, but the passport was later restored to him. The new Government issued passports to many persons who had formerly been denied them.

The right to emigrate has been extremely limited. In general, only those wishing to join a foreign citizen spouse, or, in the case of retired persons, foreign citizen children abroad, have had this right. In 1989 the former government eased a series of restrictions affecting family reunification.

Emigration passports have not been valid for return without special endorsement, and in some cases permanent exile has been a condition for emigration or study abroad. Czechoslovak authorities in 1989 decided administratively not to prosecute persons who traveled or remained abroad without permission. The law which punishes unauthorized travel remains on the books, although authorities have indicated plans to decriminalize such travel.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens have not had the right to change the political leadership or the system of government. The Communist Party leadership made all significant decisions regarding government, economic, and social affairs. Real power was exercised by only a few top-level officials in the party presidium and secretariat. They determined who would be placed in decisionmaking positions not only within their own ranks but also throughout the Government, the economy, the media, and mass organizations.

Ordinary citizens, especially those who were not CPCZ members, had no role in selecting their leaders or in participating in political or economic decisions. Four minor political parties were permitted to exist and publish their own newspapers, but they were required to accept the leading role of the CPCZ and to conform to Communist Party directives. All parties and mass organizations were incorporated in the National Front, which was completely controlled by the Communist Party. Among its tasks was the nomination of a single slate of candidates to stand unopposed at all elections.

Under the enormous pressure exerted by massive street demonstrations after November 17, the CPCZ agreed to delete from the Constitution all references to the "leading role" of the Communist Party. After roundtable talks with the umbrella opposition group Civic Forum, an agreement was reached that a government of National Understanding would be formed in which members of the Communist Party would be a minority. Human rights activist Vaclav Havel was elected President, and Alexander Dubcek, CPCZ leader at the time of the Prague Spring in 1968, was elected Chairman of the National Assembly. The new Government of National Understanding has committed itself to changes leading to a democratic, pluralistic society, and has promised free, multicandidate elections during 1990.

The former government in Czechoslovakia generally reacted negatively to expressions of concern about human rights violations either by other governments or by nongovernmental institutions. Officials of the former government, however, discussed the subject of human rights with U.S. officials. During 1989 representatives of the International Helsinki Federation and Amnesty International were permitted to travel to Czechoslovakia.

Three groups within Czechoslovakia have been and continue to be concerned primarily with human rights issues. One is

Charter 77, composed of persons who signed a document, first made public in January 1977, which called on the former government to honor its commitments under international agreements on human rights, including the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, as well as human rights provisions in the Czechoslovak Constitution. The second group, VONS, has used public records and reports from friends and relatives of the accused to issue communiques in cases where it believes the police, the courts, or the prisons have abused citizens' rights. The third group, the Czechoslovak Helsinki Committee, was founded in October 1988 and has documented the degree of Czechoslovak compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki and subsequent international agreements. Members of all these independent groups were targets of official harassment.

The Committee of the Czechoslovak Public for Human Rights and Humanitarian Cooperation, an officially organized and recognized group, was founded in 1989. Members of the committee met with independent human rights activists, but the committee clearly was limited in its ability to be an outspoken advocate for human rights under the former regime.

Health care, education, retirement, and other services are provided without regard to race or sex. Membership in the Communist Party conferred special access to goods and services (including education, medical services, and consumer items), and party officials received particularly favorable treatment, but such special access is being brought to an end.

Women are equal under the law, and there are small numbers of women in the professions. Women receive pay equal to that of their male colleagues if they hold the same job.

Reliable statistics concerning the level of violence against women, such as wife beating, are not available, but anecdotal evidence suggests that violence against women is not widespread. Although there are reports that police on occasion have refused to respond to reports of intrafamily violence, prosecutorial authorities generally accept and conscientiously prosecute charges involving violence against women.

Czechoslovakia has two major nationalities--Czechs and Slovaks--and two substantial minorities--Hungarians and Gypsies. Czechoslovakia provides certain guarantees for minorities, but interethnic relations are still colored by historic animosities. Hungarians, who are concentrated in southern Slovakia, form the country's largest minority (600,000, according to official statistics). The State provides some primary and secondary education in Hungarian and permits a limited number of ethnic Hungarians to pursue higher education in Hungary. Ethnic Hungarians complain, however, that Hungarian-language instruction at the elementary and secondary levels is being reduced, and that the lack of opportunities for higher education in Hungarian is creating a growing shortage of qualified Hungarian-language teachers.

Gypsies, who number about 300,000, are the only other sizable minority. They tend to suffer disproportionately from high rates of poverty, crime, and disease. Their problems appear to result more from traditional and popular prejudice than from government policies. Some observers, however, complain that government policies attempted to pressure Gypsies to assimilate rather than preserve their distinct identity.

Approximately 30,000 Vietnamese laborers are temporarily working and residing in Czechoslovakia. Reportedly, they are allowed to retain two-thirds of their salary. The remainder is shared by the Czechoslovak and Vietnamese Governments. There are also reports that any Vietnamese who marries a Czechoslovak citizen is required to pay about $5,000 to the Government of Vietnam to secure permission to stay in Czechoslovakia.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have not had the right to associate freely or to strike. They could not establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. An attempt to establish an independent trade union in the early 1980's was suppressed. The Czechoslovak labor union umbrella organization, the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement (ROH), has been a mass organization strictly controlled by the Communist Party. Membership in official trade unions was virtually obligatory for workers. The ROH was affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions, whose headquarters are in Prague.

Efforts to form independent labor unions were under way at the close of 1989. These efforts were attempting to transform strike committees which had been formed at various enterprises into the basic units of a new labor organization. In addition, a grass roots revolt by the membership of the ROH had led to a turnover in its leadership, and some persons advocated using ROH structures as the basis for a new independent labor organization. The Government of National Understanding at year's end had not presented legislation which would formally allow or regulate the formation of independent labor organizations. Legislation permitting workers to strike is anticipated in 1990.

In 1989 both the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CACR) of the International Labor Organization (ILO) examined the single trade union system embodied in the Labor Code which accords special status to the ROH, as well as the absence of freedom of association for workers of collective farms. A government representative stated that the Government was looking for a solution, but the CACR regretted that no changes had yet been made with a view to implementing ILO Convention 87.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers have not had the right to organize or engage in collective bargaining. Special economic incentive zones do not exist in Czechoslovakia.

Amendments in December 1988 to the labor code generally strengthened the powers of management, which now may: terminate a worker's employment with 2 months' (instead of 6 months') notice, giving no reason; terminate a worker's employment for any serious infringement of work discipline instead of for major or repeated infringement(s); search the work force coming to and leaving work; check for alcohol intoxication and drug use; reduce workers' wages for producing substandard products; extend a worker's probationary period from 1 to 3 months; and determine independently timework, piecework, and other wages, bonuses, and rewards. Under the amendments, workers became eligible for leave after 60 days on the job instead of 5 months, and maternity leave without pay was lengthened to 3 years.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced labor in Czechoslovakia. However, "work education" was required of prisoners. Former prisoners report that convicts faced higher norms (quotas), lower pay, and poorer working conditions than did ordinary workers.

The current Constitution affirms the right to work. In practice, persons considered politically unreliable by the former regime were barred from professional positions and forced into menial, low-paid jobs such as coal stokers and nightwatchmen. The ILO has condemned this practice and has called for amendment of the so-called parasitism law..

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for full-time employment is 16, although younger persons may accept part-time employment. The law is effectively enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The average workweek is 42.5 hours. Beyond 45 hours, workers are paid overtime, and there are additional bonuses for some shift and weekend work. The retirement age is 60 years for men, while women may retire between the ages of 54 and 57, depending on the number of their children. The average pension is 55 percent of the average wage, an amount which can be insufficient to meet a citizen's needs if not supplemented from other sources. A welfare system does exist to supplement these resources if need can be demonstrated.

There has been a nominal labor shortage induced by low productivity and the underutilization of the labor force. The need for unskilled and semiskilled labor has been filled in part by workers from Communist countries.

Working conditions appear generally acceptable, although far less attention is paid to occupational safety and health than in most advanced industrial economies. Industrial equipment which is obsolete by Western standards complicates issues of occupational safety. The problem of environmental pollution, especially in heavily industrialized areas and in industries in which environmental safeguards have been neglected, has become acute for the general population.

Czechoslovakia does not have a state-wide, legally mandated minimum wage. However, individual ministries establish wage scales of economic enterprises. Workers appear to be able to secure minimally acceptable standards of living for themselves and their families based on these wage scales.

As of December 1989, the Government of National Understanding had not introduced legislation which would alter statutory provisions governing working conditions.

DENMARK

Denmark is a constitutional monarchy with a strong tradition of democratic parliamentary rule. Queen Margrethe II as titular Head of State has a mainly symbolic role. A cabinet led by the Prime Minister and accountable to the unicameral Folketing (parliament) leads the Government. A minority coalition government led by the Conservative Party has ruled since 1982.

Denmark has a unified national police force. A small intelligence service operates as a section of the police. Its director is a civil service lawyer, and it is subject to an intelligence oversight committee of the Folketing.

An advanced industrial state, Denmark has a mixed economy combining private and public ownership. The Government is seeking ways to reduce the public sector's share of the economy. Personal freedoms and the right to pursue private interests and to hold private property are protected by law and respected in practice.

Deeply-rooted democratic principles, an egalitarian tradition, a lively press, and highly developed educational and social welfare systems have made Denmark a leading defender of human rights in the world. This continued in 1989. The Constitution establishes the Folketing's "Ombudsman," to whom any citizen may protest if he or she feels wrongly or unreasonably treated by any national or municipal authority. Denmark participates actively in a number of international commissions concerned with the protection and preservation of human rights. It will host in 1990 the second meeting of the Conference on the Human Dimension of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political or extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no abductions, disappearances, secret arrests, or clandestine detentions.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There was no torture or inhuman treatment. An innovative Center for Torture Victims, supported by the Foreign Ministry and located at Copenhagen's municipal hospital, treats patients in the refugee community, assists torture victims, and contributes to hindering the use of torture worldwide.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No person in Denmark may be deprived of personal liberty without due process of law. Arrestees must appear before a judge within 24 hours. They may be held indefinitely in preventive detention, frequently in isolation, although a judge must periodically review and approve such detention. Bail is permitted. There are no exiles.

DENMARK

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Danish legal system consists of a series of courts, local and regional, up to the Supreme Court. Trials are usually public; judges may make exceptions to this rule in a few circumstances, such as paternity and divorce trials. In criminal cases, trials are only closed when necessary to protect a victim's privacy, such as in rape or child molestation cases or when a witness' identity must be protected.

The rights of the accused are carefully protected. Defendants have the right to be present, to confront witnesses, and to present evidence. They enjoy the presumption of innocence. Indigent defendants have the right to an attorney at government expense and may also change this attorney. The judiciary is fully independent. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A constitutional prohibition against searching homes, seizing and examining papers, and breaching secrecy of communications without a judicial order is respected in practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. There is no censorship. Criticism of the Government is not a punishable offense. Academic freedom is respected.

There is one large state-owned radio and television company. Editorial control is exercised by a board independent of the Government. A second channel, one-third government subsidized, opened in 1988. Programs critical of the Government appear on both channels.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Danes may freely assemble and form associations. Public meetings require permits, which are routinely given. Police may by law be present at any event which may endanger the peace. Any organization may affiliate with international bodies in its field.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Under the Constitution, the Evangelical Lutheran Church is the state church and receives a large subsidy. However, religious freedom is guaranteed to all. No religion is banned or discouraged; conversion is unrestricted. No one may be discriminated against for religious beliefs. Missionaries are freely given entry but are restricted in practice from staying more than 2 years. A number of foreign clergy serve expatriate and Danish congregations.

DENMARK

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Danes have full freedom of travel and movement. Refugees are never repatriated against their will.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Danes have the right to change their government. The Prime Minister is appointed by the monarch after consultation with the parties in the Folketing. The Folketing's 179 members are elected in free and open elections under a complex system of proportional representation designed to help small parties and to reflect the popular vote. In the 1988 election, 12 parties competed, of which 8, representing a wide range of political beliefs, achieved more than the 2 percent of the vote needed to obtain representation in the Folketing. The current Government is a three-party minority coalition.

Danes over 18 years of age may vote. Resident foreigners may vote and run in local elections. Elections occur at least every 4 years, or by a decision of the Prime Minister, a parliamentary vote of no confidence, or the Government's resignation.

The territories of Greenland and the Faroe Islands have democratically elected home-rule governments with broad powers encompassing all but foreign and security affairs. They each have two seats in the Folketing. Greenlanders and Faroese are full Danish citizens and enjoy the same level of human rights as in Denmark.

Denmark is party to various international human rights conventions that promote and protect human rights. Human rights organizations operate freely. The Danish Center of Human Rights is a private government-funded institution for conducting research and providing information on human rights issues.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Denmark provides food, shelter, health care, and education to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. However, the inflow of ethnically dissimilar refugees (mostly Iranians, Palestinians, Lebanese, and Sri Lankans) who require public assistance has provoked tensions between native Danes and immigrants. These tensions worsened perceptibly during 1989. A December 1988 poll sponsored by the European Community (EC) showed Danes in first place among EC countries for their support of racist movements, tied for first place in their support for restricting the rights of foreigners, and in second place in their opposition to immigrants. A group called "Stop Immigration" contested the 1989 Copenhagen city council elections but won no seats. A Pakistani woman was nominated by a leftwing party to run for a safe seat on the city council and should become its first elected immigrant member.

DENMARK

Denmark has eliminated laws containing sex discrimination provisions. Women hold positions of authority throughout society though they are much less represented at the top of the business world.

There is no tolerance, in law or in practice, of violence or abuse against women. Crimes against women are considered serious and are investigated with increasing vigor. However, independent experts estimate that less than 2 percent of all cases of domestic violence are reported to authorities. Denmark has no rape and domestic violence prevention programs. There are, however, 30 special crisis centers nationwide for counseling and housing of victims which are supported by municipal governments and voluntary workers and donations.

In 1989 Denmark became the first nation ever to grant homosexual partnerships legal standing and to give homosexual partners many of the same legal rights as heterosexuals. Also, a 1922 law requiring mentally ill and retarded persons to obtain special permission in order to marry was repealed.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

All workers, including military personnel and the police, have the right to associate freely in unions of their choosing. Some 90 percent of Danish wage earners belong to unions. Unions are independent of the Government and may freely affiliate with international organizations. All but civil servants have the right to strike, and this right is frequently exercised.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers and employers acknowledge each other's right to organize. Collective bargaining is widespread. Salaries, benefits, and working conditions are agreed upon in quadrennial negotiations between the Employers Association and the Confederation of Labor Unions, which has 1.4 million members (half of Denmark's labor force), and are used as guidelines by the rest of the labor market. In case of disagreement, an issue may be referred to a labor court made up of management and labor representatives and an independent member. The decisions of the court are binding.

The conditions surrounding the establishment of a Danish International Ship's Register in 1988 were the subject of a complaint to the International Labor Organization (ILO). The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association in 1989 urged the Government to enact legislation which would ensure that full and voluntary collective bargaining is open to all seafarers, including foreign nationals, employed on Danish-flag ships.

There are no export processing zones in Denmark or its territories.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited and does not exist.

DENMARK

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for full-time employment is 15. The law describes detailed specific limitations to work which may be one by those aged 15 to 18. The law is rigorously enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Danish law prescribes acceptable conditions of work, including safety and health; the duties of employers, supervisors, and employees; work performance; rest periods and days off; and medical examinations. It also establishes a labor inspection service which ensures compliance with labor legislation. There is no minimum wage, but the lowest hourly wage set in any national labor agreement is $9, which is adequate to ensure a family a decent living. Danes are guaranteed 5 weeks' paid vacation a year and a 38-hour workweek.

Similarly, work conditions are negotiated by means of collective bargaining in Greenland with some variations from the pattern in Denmark due to different levels of development. A major issue in collective bargaining negotiations in Greenland is the wage differential between indigenous and temporary Danish workers which arises because of the need to attract skilled workers from Denmark. This caused a major long-term strike by government workers in 1989. All parties in the Greenlandic Parliament have agreed to discontinue the differential soon. Another major difference is that no unemployment compensation is paid in Greenland unless a collective bargaining agreement specifically includes it. The Greenlandic tradition of spending part of a year hunting and fishing has slowed the evolution of a concept of unemployment. Because of this phenomenon and the lack of resources, Greenland has postponed establishing a legislatively mandated unemployment compensation system.

ESTONIA

Estonia, an independent state between the two World Wars, was annexed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.) in 1940 as a constituent republic. The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Estonia into the U.S.S.R.

Like the other Baltic states, Estonia has generally been subjected to the same centralized rule, the same Constitution and judicial system, and the same restrictions on civil and political liberties as the Soviet Union. Political power has been exercised by the leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which tightly controlled the activities of local government and Communist Party structures in Estonia.

Estonians have taken advantage of liberalization in the Soviet Union since 1988 to exert greater control over their own affairs. Responding to mass public pressure demanding political democracy and respect for human rights, the Estonian Supreme Soviet (parliament) adopted a "Declaration of Sovereignty" and constitutional amendments in November 1988, declaring that its laws superseded those of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet. In response to both the Estonian declaration and related developments in other Republics, the Supreme Soviet Presidium voted on November 10, 1989, to instruct all 15 Republic Supreme Soviets to bring their laws into conformity with all-Union law and the Soviet Constitution. By the end of 1989, however, no action had been taken to enforce this declaration. The Estonian Supreme Soviet declared in November 1989 that Estonia had been illegally incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1940.

The primary law enforcement organization is the militia (police). The powerful Committee for State Security (K.G.B.), special troops of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (M.V.D.), and the regular Soviet armed forces, which maintain a significant presence in Estonia, can be assumed to take orders from authorities in Moscow. Although K.G.B. surveillance is assumed to continue, there were few reports of human rights violations in 1989 by the security and military apparatus.

The standard of living in Estonia is higher than the Soviet average, but the margin is shrinking. Estonians resent the fact that much of the national income they create is transferred to other Republics and that most major economic enterprises are controlled by central ministries in Moscow. They also complain about a continuing decline in the quality and quantity of food supplies and consumer goods. In May the Estonian Supreme Soviet adopted a plan for a transition to economic autonomy to begin on January 1, 1990, with future relations between the Estonian and Soviet economies to be based upon mutual agreements. The U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet in November voted to grant Estonia control over its land, resources, banks, and a portion of state-run industry.

For the second year in a row, the human rights situation in Estonia improved markedly. As in the latter half of 1988, the authorities tolerated public expressions of Estonian national sentiment and independent political views which had previously been repressed. For the first time since annexation by the Soviet Union, relatively free multicandidate elections were held both to the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies and to local government councils. The independent prodemocratic mass organization, the Estonian People's Front, was officially registered as a sociopolitical movement, and the right of other independent organizations to freedom of association was generally respected. Limited progress was made, both in Estonia and the Soviet Union, toward legislative reforms that would help to institutionalize human rights improvements.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no confirmed cases of such killing in 1989. The 15-year-old daughter of former political prisoner Enn Tarto, an advocate of Estonian independence, was shot to death in 1989 under mysterious circumstances.

b. Disappearance

There were no known instances of permanent or prolonged disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In Estonia, as in the Soviet Union, harsh treatment of prisoners occurs during both interrogation and confinement in labor camps, prisons, or psychiatric hospitals. Physical and psychological abuse of prisoners, as well as detention under extremely unhealthful conditions, are common. Estonians in 1989 remained concerned about reports that Estonian youths are subjected to physical abuse, beatings, and degrading treatment in the Soviet armed forces.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Soviet laws are written and interpreted so broadly that persons may be arrested and convicted for trying to exercise their basic human rights. During 1989, however, the authorities in Estonia did not use these laws to arrest political activists.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Despite provisions for judicial objectivity in both the Estonian and Soviet Constitutions, the State retains the ability to control the judicial process and arbitrarily determine the outcome of trials. Procedural safeguards, such as the right to a public trial and to a defense attorney, are generally respected but are not sufficient to guarantee fair trials. Reforms to strengthen the rights of defendants have been proposed but were not implemented in 1989.

There were no known trials on purely political charges in 1989, and no Estonians were known to be imprisoned for purely political reasons at the end of 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government continued to interfere in personal life through the use of informers, monitoring of mail and telephones, surveillance, and other means. The security apparatus did little, however, to intimidate Estonians or to hinder the virtual explosion of social and political activism which began in 1988 and continued through 1989. Advocates of Estonian independence reported that obvious surveillance of their movements declined in 1989.

Contacts between Estonians and visitors from foreign countries continued to be monitored, despite a considerable increase in such contacts during 1989. Although many Estonians continued to assume that telephones and mail were monitored, they exhibited little fear of using these means of communications to express their views.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Soviet Constitution provides for most internationally accepted political liberties on the condition that exercise of them does not threaten the security of the Socialist system. The Estonian Constitution was amended in 1988 to include the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as other internationally recognized human rights instruments, as "an inseparable part of the legal system."

In previous years, the authorities had interpreted all such constitutional guarantees to fit the convenience of the State. Vague Soviet laws prohibiting "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" and "anti-Soviet slander", which had frequently been used in previous years to punish Estonian human rights and political activists, were replaced in 1989 by a more limited provision which specifically outlaws calls for the "violent overthrow" of the Soviet system.

In 1989, freedom of speech was widely respected. The authorities tolerated public expression of virtually any viewpoint, including criticism of Soviet officials and calls for the immediate withdrawal of Soviet "occupation" troops from Estonia. Several hundred thousand Estonians signed a petition calling for annulment of Estonia's 1940 "request" to join the U.S.S.R. Display of Estonian national symbols, which had been repressed until mid-1988, was extremely widespread and officially sanctioned in 1989.

The range of subjects covered by official Estonian television, radio, and publications continued to expand in 1989. Print and electronic media devoted considerable attention to the 50th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Nonaggression Pact between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union. The media also publicized the secret protocols that became the basis for the Soviet occupation and annexation of the Baltic states. The Pact and the protocols were widely republished in 1989 by Estonian newspapers, which also provided extensive treatment of the Soviet Union's 1940 occupation. Reports in the Estonian media on events in other areas of the Soviet Union, including such incidents as the April 9 killings by Soviet military forces in Tbilisi, tended to be much more timely and open than the reports provided by the central Soviet media.

The Estonian media provided extensive information about the positions of candidates in the spring elections for the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies and in the December 10 local elections, and they regularly reported on the views of Baltic deputies to the Soviet Parliament. These views frequently differed from those of the political leadership in Moscow, particularly when the Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party issued a harshly critical statement about the Baltic opposition movements on August 26. The Baltic responses included calls for the repeal of Article 6 of the Soviet Constitution, which provides for the "leading role" of the Communist Party.

While self-censorship was exercised in varying degrees by individual editors and journalists, no political subject remained off-limits in 1989. Articles advocating the reestablishment of Estonian independence appeared in numerous publications, as did articles opposing the service of young Estonians in the Soviet armed forces.

Among the issues on which Estonians expressed themselves most strongly in 1989 was the state of the environment. They were particularly concerned about the impact of oil shale mining in northwestern Estonia as well as the harmful environmental effects of aircraft using a military airfield near the historic university town of Tartu. Official censorship was apparently used to prevent the publication of such "state secrets" as operational military information, but the military draft and the environmental consequences of military bases were subjects addressed by the media. There was one report that military authorities had threatened to draft journalists who had written critical articles about the military.

Despite the extraordinarily open nature of the Estonian press, most publications remained under the formal control of the Communist Party or other official organizations. Independent publications were produced legally by the Estonian People's Front, the Estonian Heritage Society, a Jewish cultural society, and some other nonofficial organizations. Unauthorized (samizdat) publications were also produced and distributed by various groups without hindrance from the authorities, although the opinions in such publications were increasingly available in the official press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The peaceful assembly of citizens is controlled by the authorities, who retain the power to prohibit public gatherings. Soviet guidelines on demonstrations and meetings are contained in a 1988 decree confirmed by the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet, but the Estonian Supreme Soviet declined to adopt relevant implementing legislation.

In practice, the people of Estonia were allowed to hold mass meetings and demonstrations without hindrance from the authorities in 1989. Many of these meetings took place on anniversaries of historical events, commemoration of which had been repressed in previous years.

The Presidium of the Estonian Supreme Soviet declared February 24, the independence day of the interwar Estonian Republic, to be officially commemorated as the "Day of Restoration of Estonian Statehood." Leading Estonian Communist Party and government leaders participated along with People's Front leaders in public ceremonies attended by thousands of people as the blue, black, and white flag of the independent Republic, now recognized officially as Estonia's national flag, was raised over the symbolic Tall Hermann tower in central Tallinn. It replaced the red state flag of the Estonian Soviet Socialist Republic.

ESTONIA

Hundreds of thousands of Estonians joined hands August 23 in the first link of a 2-million-person human chain that extended through Latvia and Lithuania as a sign of protest marking the 50th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact. Participants in the demonstrations and related meetings ranged from members of the Estonian People's Front and many other nonofficial organizations, including the Estonian National Independence Party (ENIP), to the leaders of the Estonian Communist Party and Government. The Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party criticized these events in an August 26 statement as "nationalist hysteria."

The Estonian Constitution provides for the right to associate in public organizations and movements (such as the People's Front), but this right had been limited in previous years by legislation and repressive practices. A new law concerning official registration of public organizations was adopted in 1989, requiring the Government to review applications promptly and explain the reasons for any refusals. The People's Front was officially registered, as were the ecological "Green" movement and many other groups, but ENIP and other political parties were not registered.

While continuing to exercise a measure of control over mass organizations associated with the Communist Party, the authorities have acquiesced in the rapid growth of both registered and unregistered clubs, professional associations, and other organizations. There were no reports of significant harassment of any of these groups.

In 1989 a coalition of ENIP, the Estonian Heritage Society, and the Christian Union began an effort to form Estonian Citizens' Committees and eventually to convene a Congress of Estonia. Estonian citizens were defined as persons who had been citizens of the Estonian Republic in 1940 as well as their descendants, while other residents of Estonia were invited to submit applications for Estonian citizenship. Despite criticism from the authorities, who feared that the Citizens' Committees would represent a form of parallel political power, over 500,000 persons had registered by year's end.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Soviet Constitution provides for the right to profess, or not to profess, any religion, both the party and Government promote atheism. The authorities continued to improve their relations with organized religion in 1989. Christmas was celebrated as an officially sanctioned holiday for the second consecutive year, and religious services were sometimes shown on television. Top Estonian political leaders held highly publicized meetings with leaders of the Republic's religious communities, and there were no reports of significant church-state conflicts. Nevertheless, state control of religion continued to be formally governed by repressive 1929 Soviet legislation, as neither the U.S.S.R. nor Estonian Supreme Soviet adopted a new law to guarantee freedom of conscience.

ESTONIA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is neither guaranteed by law nor fully permitted in practice, although Soviet officials have publicly pledged to bring their legislation into conformity with international standards. The right to emigrate by choice is not recognized by Soviet law, and persons wishing to leave temporarily are generally required to present an invitation from abroad. Many Soviet Jews in Estonia were denied permission to emigrate in previous years, but the upsurge in Soviet Jewish emigration has had a positive effect on Jewish emigration from Estonia as well.

Although travel abroad is limited by restrictive legislation and arbitrary enforcement, bureaucratic procedures are considerably less cumbersome in Estonia than in the Soviet Union as a whole. For the second consecutive year, there was a dramatic upsurge in the number of Estonians visiting the United States and other Western countries in 1989. Leading figures in all of the Republic's main political movements, including the People's Front and groups favoring immediate Estonian independence, visited Western countries to present their views. An unprecedented number of Estonian-Americans, other emigres, and persons of Estonian descent were able to visit Estonia in 1989, with many visitors permitted to visit areas that are formally "closed" to foreigners.

Until 1989 the peoples of Estonia and the Soviet Union had not been free to change government leaders or the system of government. For the first time in postwar Estonian history, however, representatives to the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies (the federal legislature) and to Estonia's local soviets (government councils) were chosen in 1989 by secret ballot, on the basis of universal suffrage, in relatively free multicandidate elections.

Although alternative parties could not formally participate in the Estonian elections, nominating procedures were sufficiently flexible to permit nomination of candidates with a very broad range of political views. Unlike many areas of the Soviet Union, there was no apparent manipulation of the candidate registration process to exclude "troublesome" candidates from the ballot in Estonia. While many Communist Party leaders were elected or reelected to their posts, others --including the chief of the K.G.B. for Estonia--were defeated. Most of the successful candidates campaigned with the active support of the Estonian People's Front, which was able to nominate candidates on its own authority in the local elections. In heavily Russian districts, however, successful candidates included leaders of the predominantly Russian-speaking "Intermovement" and "United Councils of Work Collectives."

The spring elections to the U.S.S.R. Congress were boycotted by the Estonian National Independence Party, which opposed participation in elections to the legislature of Estonia's "occupying power." Participation in these elections was nevertheless very high, over 80 percent. Several predominantly Russian organizations favored a boycott of the December 10 elections to local government councils as a protest against the residence requirement for candidates to local office as well as other legislation which allegedly discriminates against non-Estonians. While the boycott reduced the turnout somewhat, a majority of voters took part in the local elections.

Although the Estonian Parliament and Government were not democratically elected, in 1989 they were frequently responsive to the sentiments of popular movements and the general public. Draft laws were circulated and amended on the basis of constituents' expressed interests, and the agenda for government action was heavily influenced by the People's Front, a leader of which--Edgar Savisaar--was appointed as a Deputy Prime Minister in 1989. The Estonian Supreme Soviet condemned the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact and endorsed reports which characterized the Republic's incorporation into the Soviet Union in 1940 as illegal.

Multicandidate elections to the Estonian Supreme Soviet were scheduled to be held on March 18, 1990, potentially providing the people of Estonia with their first opportunity in postwar history to determine the composition of their own parliament and government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Soviet Government has adopted a more forthcoming approach to foreign criticism of its human rights record in recent years, acknowledging that human rights are a legitimate subject of official diplomatic contacts. In the case of Estonia, the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet's Presidium was involved in a dispute with Estonian authorities over alleged human rights violations. The central Government accused the Estonian Supreme Soviet of violating the human rights of its non-native population by adopting a 2-year residence requirement for voters in Estonian local elections.

Although there were few other allegations of human rights violations in Estonia in 1989, the Estonian Government generally welcomed foreign and nongovernmental observers on any subject.

Discrimination on the basis of race, sex, or other grounds is prohibited in the Constitution. Tensions between ethnic Estonians and Russians, however, are always near the surface in Estonia where a low Estonian birthrate and an official Soviet settlement policy have caused the ethnic Estonian proportion of the population to fall from 92 percent in 1939 to approximately 60 percent in 1989. These tensions were expressed in heated debates over a number of issues. Ethnic Estonians continued to complain that they could not always conduct business in their own language, that immigrants from the Soviet Union receive favored treatment in the provision of housing and other social services, and that nonresidents frequently visited Estonia in order to buy out the Republic's relatively well-stocked stores.

The Estonian Supreme Soviet adopted a detailed language law to provide Estonian language training and to require that incumbents of certain management and service positions will eventually be bilingual. Regulations were issued to prevent nonresidents of Estonia from purchasing goods which are in short supply, and measures to control immigration were under consideration in 1989. Ethnic Russian and other Russian-speaking residents of Estonia were generally concerned by the Estonian language law, and many also objected to the Estonian economic autonomy plan, which asserted the "priority" interests of the native Estonian population and called for the Republic to assume control over enterprises which are currently subordinate to Moscow-based ministries. Russian-speaking workers constitute a significant percentage of the work force at such enterprises.

In the absence of a citizenship law, the Estonian Supreme Soviet adopted a requirement of 5 years' residence in a local district, or 10 years in Estonia, in order to stand as a candidate for local office.

Although the number of persons negatively affected by the local elections law was relatively small, representatives of the Russian-speaking population complained that it would have the effect of retroactively disenfranchising voters who had recently moved to Estonia. They also noted that it would affect very few ethnic Estonians, most of whom could meet its requirements for a total of 5 or 10 years' residence in the Republic. In July and August, at least 40,000 predominantly Russian workers staged a political strike in the Estonian cities of Tallinn and Kohtla-Jarve to protest the residence requirements in the local election law. The strike was halted when the Estonian Supreme Soviet agreed to defer consideration of the residence requirements but was resumed after adoption of the election law. The Estonian Government responded by issuing a decree to ban the strike, but the decree was not enforced.

Meanwhile, the Presidium of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet ruled that the residence requirements were discriminatory and that they violated the Soviet Constitution as well as the U.S.S.R.'s international human rights commitments. The strike was ended when the Republic's leadership agreed to enter into negotiations with strike leaders, eventually proposing a one-time suspension of the residence requirement for voters. This proposal was accepted by the Estonian Supreme Soviet in October, with the proviso that the election law will subsequently be brought into line with a new citizenship law. The compromise did not satisfy the Russian strike leaders, who continued to complain about the residence requirements for candidates in local elections as well as about other provisions of the election law.

While major ethnic tensions in Estonia divide the Estonian and Russian populations, most ethnic groups have formed officially recognized cultural societies which work closely with the Estonian People's Front on proposals to enhance their cultural autonomy. A law to protect the rights of national minorities was adopted by the Estonian Supreme Soviet in December.

Over the past 10 years, discrimination and persecution has been directed against Estonians who sought to express their national and cultural identity, against independent political and religious activists, and against Jews and Pentecostals wishing to leave the country.

Women nominally enjoy the same legal rights as men, and an extensive system of day-care service and maternity benefits assists women in obtaining and retaining jobs.

ESTONIA

Estonian statistics on the problem of violence against women, including wife beating, are unavailable. The official Soviet press in 1989 discussed the issue, and the Soviet Council of Ministers established a special branch (headed by a woman) to study the problems of women. Human rights and women's rights groups in Estonia are aware of the issue but have focused their efforts thus far on the broader questions of independence and freedom.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Soviet labor law and practice has generally been enforced in Estonia. There has been no right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO). Although the Constitution grants Soviet citizens the right to form trade unions, attempts to exercise this right independently of the state-controlled union had always been repressed. New professional associations with no ties to Moscow were created in 1989, but it is not yet clear whether they will effectively exercise trade union functions.

A dual effort to reform Estonian labor legislation and practice began to take shape in late 1989, with adoption of a new law on trade unions and moves toward comprehensive overhaul of the official trade union organization. The law cites ILO standards and provides for trade unions to exist as independent organizations with the right to strike to defend workers' interests. It is too soon to judge the practical effects of these proposed changes, which are consistent with the stated goals of the Estonian economic autonomy plan.

In addition to the politically motivated strikes by at least 40,000 predominantly Russian workers protesting against the new Estonian election law, a few other brief strikes were reported in the Estonian press. There were no reports of repression against strikers in 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers in Estonia generally have not been able to organize or engage in collective bargaining. Virtually all workers in the Soviet Union automatically become members of an affiliate of the official Soviet trade union organization, the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, in order to be entitled to government social welfare benefits. There are no economic incentive zones in Estonia.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Soviet law contains no prohibition on forced or compulsory labor. Most prisoners are confined to camps where they are forced to labor, often under harsh and degrading conditions.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The statutory minimum age for employment of children is 16. There is no indication of widespread violations of these norms.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor conditions in Estonia are similar to those in the Soviet Union. According to the Soviet State Statistical Committee, the average monthly wage in Estonia for blue- and white-collar workers in September 1989 was $430 and for collective farm workers $488 at the official exchange rate. The minimum monthly wage in the U.S.S.R. was $140. (The ruble is not a convertible currency, and its value here in terms of the U.S. dollar does not represent actual purchasing power for international purposes.)

The standard workweek is 40 hours. The average workweek is 40 hours for most white-collar workers and 41 hours for most blue-collar workers. Soviet law establishes minimum conditions of health and safety. Press reports suggest, however, that legislation on maximum hours of work and health and safety standards are widely ignored.

FINLAND

Finland is a constitutional republic, a democratic state built upon the principle of the rule of law. Sovereign power in Finland rests with the people as represented by their delegates assembled in Parliament. Supreme executive power is vested in the President. The Cabinet, consisting of the Prime Minister and 16 ministers and responsible to Parliament, works with the President in governing the country. Judicial power is exercised by an independent judiciary consisting of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court.

The security apparatus is controlled by elected officials and supervised by the courts.

Finland has a mixed economy with state-owned, privately owned, and publicly owned companies. Citizens are free to pursue their legitimate private interests, hold private property, and engage in economic activity without government interference.

During 1989 there were no reported violations in Finland of fundamental human rights. National minorities and women enjoy the same economic and political rights as all other citizens.

Finland joined the Council of Europe in May, and this event brought to light certain deficiencies in Finnish human rights legislation. During the next 2 years, Finland hopes to enact human rights legislation to meet the standards prevailing in other European countries and to ratify the European Convention on Human Rights without reservations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Killing for political motives did not occur.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of disappearances, abduction, or clandestine detention.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is guaranteed by law and is respected in practice. By law, prisoners must be treated justly with respect for their human dignity and without distinction on the basis of race, sex, language, nationality, religious or political conviction, social position, wealth, or any other grounds.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment or exile is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. A reform of pretrial procedures took effect on January 1, 1989. The stated purpose of the reform was to achieve uniformity with the practice in other Western countries. The law shortens the detention period to 7 days and gives the accused access to a lawyer during that time. The accused must be given a court hearing within 8 days of notification of the arrest, if in a city, or within 30 days, if in rural areas. The State pays legal fees for the indigent defendant.

Circumstances surrounding the arrest are subject to judicial review at the time the accused is brought to trial. The accused may apply to the same court for civil damages for loss of freedom in the event the accused is found to have been innocent of the crime charged and the arrest is deemed invalid.

The institutions of habeas corpus and bail do not exist as such in Finland. While those accused of serious crimes must by law remain in custody, those charged with minor offenses may be released on personal recognizance at the court's discretion.

Preventive detention is authorized only during a declared state of war for narrowly defined offenses, such as treason, mutiny, and arms trafficking. Supervisory personnel from the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of the Interior as well as the Parliamentary Ombudsman and the Chancellor of Justice have authority to enter prisons and to order the release of prisoners held without charges. Exile has not been used as punishment in Finland and, by law, Finnish citizens may not be exiled.

Legislation with regard to conscientious objectors to Finland's obligatory military service took effect in 1987 for a trial period of 5 years. While Jehovah's Witnesses are exempted from military service under the law, other Finnish citizens must serve in the military or become conscientious objectors. The law abolished the Investigative Board--a controversial entity which decided unilaterally the status of conscientious objectors--and lengthened the alternative civilian service for conscientious objectors to 16 months, twice the minimum length of military service. The passage of the law is reportedly a result of the Investigative Board's increased disposition to reject a growing number of applications for civilian service in recent years. Under the old law, those who refused unarmed service within the defense forces and were not granted alternative civilian service--including Jehovah's Witnesses--went to jail. A reduction of the period of alternative service is under current discussion in Finland.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to fair public trial is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Finnish citizens and aliens legally residing in Finland have the right to effective counsel. The law provides that charges must be clearly stated and that civilians may not be tried by military courts except in time of war. There are no separate "security" courts. Local courts may decide to conduct a trial behind closed doors in juvenile, matrimonial, and guardianship cases, or when publicity would offend morality or endanger the national security of the State. In national security cases, the judge may withhold information from the public pertaining to charges against individuals, verdicts, and sentencing. Sanctions may be imposed if such information is made public. Provisional tribunals are constitutionally prohibited.

FINLAND

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy and the sanctity of the home, including prohibition of eavesdropping and mail tampering, are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. The security police are subject by law to judicial scrutiny.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Law and practice, an effective judiciary, an independent press, and a functioning democratic political system assure freedom of speech and press. There have been no instances of abuse or legal decisions restricting freedom of the press. The press occasionally exercises restraint in treating issues deemed to be potentially harmful to the national interest, but is under no compulsion from the Government to do so. Full academic freedom prevails.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is guaranteed by the Constitution. However, only Finnish citizens may associate with a group whose aim is to influence political issues. Public demonstrations require prior permission from the police.

The Government encourages voluntary organizations and subsidizes private groups formed to achieve a public purpose. They are permitted to maintain relations with other international groups in both Communist and Western countries. Organizations with more than one-third foreign membership require government permission to operate in Finland.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Finland has two state religions: Lutheran and Eastern Orthodox. Taxes are collected by the Government from members to support churches belonging to these religions. All other religious groups enjoy unrestricted freedom of worship. Approximately 89 percent of the population belongs to the Lutheran Church.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Finns are free to travel within the Nordic countries--Finland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Iceland--without passports and need not apply for exit visas for travel to other countries. Over 200,000 Finns have emigrated to Sweden in the past two decades--primarily to seek employment--and over one-half of them have since returned. No restrictions are placed on emigration or repatriation.

Debate on the criteria used by the Finnish Government in deciding to grant political asylum continued in 1989. The Government maintains that, "in accordance with the Geneva Agreement, Finland grants asylum to individuals arriving (in Finland) who have the characteristics of refugees as determined by the Agreement." The Ministry of the Interior categorically denies that any agreement exists with the Soviet Union regarding repatriation of would-be Soviet refugees. Finland has not turned back any citizen of the Soviet Union or a Communist country who has asked for asylum, although in some incidents over the past few years persons who unwittingly crossed over into Finnish territory have been returned. Decisions on who is a legitimate refugee are made by the Minister of the Interior. In the case of an economic refugee who does not wish to return to his home country and is not accepted as a refugee in Finland, the Finnish Government permits the refugee to apply elsewhere. Even economic refugees will not be forced to return to Communist countries if they ask to go elsewhere and are accepted by a third country. Finland does not grant asylum to people wishing to escape economic hardship.

Current law does not define the grounds on which the applicant for political asylum may be repatriated. Guidance is provided by the U.N. Convention (and Protocol) Relating to the Status of Refugees, of which Finland is a signatory. Legislation has been proposed which will state less ambiguously the grounds for repatriation.

Finland is a multiparty, parliamentary democracy in which all citizens over the age of 18 are free to elect their representatives from among multiple lists of candidates representing a wide spectrum of political ideologies. The Finnish people freely choose by direct election a 200-member unicameral Parliament every 4 years. At present, there are seven political parties and a group of Greens represented in Parliament. Four of the parties form a so called "Red-Blue" coalition, headed by a Conservative Prime Minister. A reform of the presidential elections to change them in the direction of a direct popular vote was applied for the first time in the 1988 election. Two ballots were cast, one for the favored presidential candidate, the other for an elector in case none of the presidential candidates received an absolute majority of the votes cast. In the latter case, an electoral college of 301 electors would conduct the final vote. Presidential elections are held every 6 years.

Finland has not been the subject of an international investigation of alleged human rights violations. Within Finland, several organizations monitor human rights performance, including the Finnish Red Cross, the government-sponsored Equality Council, and the Women's Rights Union. A Finnish Helsinki Watch Group was established in July 1985 but was not very active during 1989. In conjunction with the Swedish-language University in Turku, a Human Rights Institute was founded in the spring of 1985 with the stated purpose of conducting human rights research, performing studies, and distributing information on human rights. Finland participates actively in international human rights organizations.

FINLAND

Food, shelter, education, and health care are available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion.

Although fewer than 20,000 aliens live in Finland, instances of violence have been recorded against resident Vietnamese refugees in Helsinki. The Government has strongly condemned these acts and has asked the police to make a more determined effort to apprehend the perpetrators.

Lapps constitute less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the Finnish population. They benefit from legal provisions protecting minority rights and customary practices. There is no discrimination in practice.

The government-established Council for Equality coordinates and sponsors legislation to meet the needs of women as workers, mothers, widows, and retirees. In 1985 Parliament passed two bills concerning the status of women. The first was a Comprehensive Equal Rights Bill which mandates equal treatment for women in the workplace. The second was a Family Name Bill which permitted women to retain their maiden names after marriage as their only surname. The law also made it possible for a man to take his wife's name. The Government's Equality Ombudsman monitors compliance with regulations against sexual discrimination. Of the few cases reported in 1989, the most significant concerned a complaint that a man was elected to an office for which a woman may have been more competent.

The first shelter for female victims of violence was opened 10 years ago. During 1988, 1,193 women (of which 79.9 percent were married) were treated in 10 shelters throughout Finland. The shelters also treated 70 men and two minors under the age of 18. Some critics suggest that the number of actual cases may be greater than those reported. Prosecution of perpetrators of intrafamily violence is low--except in cases of aggravated assault--because of the propensity of Finns not to file complaints against family members.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Trade unions are constitutionally guaranteed the right to organize, assemble peacefully, and strike--rights which are respected in practice. They enjoy a protected status and play an important role in political and economic life. A 1-million-member blue-collar confederation, the Central Organization of Finnish Trade Unions (SAK), dominates the trade union movement.

Three other central organizations cover white-collar, professional, and technical employees. All trade unions are democratically organized and managed and are independent of the Government. Finnish trade unions engage freely in Nordic and international labor activities.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively exists in law and practice and is exercised extensively. There are no export processing zones in Finland. Finland is a highly organized society in which more than 80 percent of both workers and employers are members of trade unions and employers' collective bargaining associations. With very few exceptions, all collective agreements since 1968 have been based on incomes policy agreements between central employees' and employers' organizations and the State. The central agreement covers the general level of wage and salary increases, other terms of employment, and a "social policy package" which provides for vacation, holidays, sick pay, maternity and paternity leave, travel costs, taxes, rents, etc. Workers are protected against antiunion discrimination.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and it is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

While the minimum age for employment in Finland is 18, there are some paid training/apprenticeship programs starting at age 16. There is compulsory education legislation in Finland, and child labor is not a problem.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no legislated minimum wage in Finland although all employers--including nonunionized employers--are required to pay the minimum wages agreed to in collective bargaining agreements in their industrial sector. Collective bargaining agreements provide minimum wages of about $9 per hour, which is adequate to ensure a family a decent living. The standard legal workweek must not exceed 40 hours in Finland.

Extensive legislation protects the worker's health and safety and ensures reasonable working conditions. All aspects of Finnish labor law are effectively monitored and enforced by the Ministry of Labor. Compliance with labor legislation is effected through the Ministry of Social Affairs and Health and the National Board of Labor Protection. Regional and local supervision is delegated to 11 labor protection districts, each employing several inspectors.

FRANCE

France is a democratic republic with constitutional provisions for human rights, civil liberties, freely functioning political parties, and regular elections. There is universal suffrage and voter participation is high.

The highly developed industrial economy features a mixture of public and private enterprises. The Government has halted the previous government's policy of denationalizing key industries, banks, and certain services while declaring that there will be no new nationalizations.

The military/security apparatus consists of the three traditional services, the 90,000-strong gendarmerie (national police/paramilitary force), and the police in major cities. These highly professional forces have a tradition of respect for human rights.

France's cabinet-level Secretary of State for Human Rights, who reports directly to the Prime Minister, is tasked with promoting human rights in France. Through a firm counterterrorist policy, France has reduced, but not eliminated, violent incidents perpetrated by small extremist groups. French authorities have taken steps to protect the rights of women and minority groups. France's overall human rights record is excellent.

The promotion of human rights is also a principal tenet of French foreign policy. There is a cabinet-level Minister-Delegate for Foreign Affairs with specific responsibilities for international human rights matters.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There is no evidence that French security services engaged in political and other extrajudicial killings in 1989. There were no major international terrorist murders, and the few incidents of violence perpetrated by the country's domestic terrorist groups, primarily Basque, Breton, and Corsican separatists, were mostly minor and nonlethal. The judicial system continued its vigorous prosecution of terrorists.

The president of the New Caledonian proindependence Kanak National Liberation Front (FLNKS), Jean-Marie Tjibaou, was assassinated in May by a proindependence extremist at a political meeting. The assassin was immediately shot and killed by Tjibaou's bodyguards.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence that French security services have engaged in abduction or secret arrests.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

France does not condone or practice torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. However, there have been a few documented cases of police brutality, including the beating of one American in a drug-related case in 1988. Investigation of this case is still under way.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

French law guarantees freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. There is no direct equivalent of habeas corpus in the French legal system, but there is a limit of 2 days--4 for drug and terrorist cases--before a suspect must be transferred to a magistrate for investigation.

The judiciary plays a determining role in the detention process. Government authority to hold a person beyond the prescribed periods is severely restricted, and such detention must be ordered by the competent court.

There is no provision for exiling persons. There is no evidence that the authorities detain any person for political reasons.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right of fair public trial is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Suspects are presumed innocent until proven guilty and have the right to legal counsel as soon as their cases are transferred from the police to the magistrate. For misdemeanors, pretrial confinement normally is limited to 4 months, with extensions in special circumstances of approximately 8 to 12 months. However, in drug cases (all of which are handled by the courts as misdemeanors), pretrial confinement may be unlimited. For felonies, pretrial confinement also is not limited. This pretrial period may be lengthy, depending upon the seriousness and complexity of the case. Evidence is gathered and assessed by an independent examining judge. Defendants are free to request and present evidence during this important investigatory period.

Trials in France are normally open and public, but provisions exist for the defense to request a closed proceeding. The press has free access to records of court proceedings, although under French law the prosecutor may not disclose information about cases being tried or investigated.

French law provides for the right of appeal, except in jury trials of felony cases. An appeal to the Court of Cassation is possible in felony cases, but this court rules only on procedure; no appeal that involves review of the facts of the case is possible.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

French law guarantees freedom from invasion of privacy, and this freedom is respected in practice. The search of a private residence requires a search warrant and must take place between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m. except in special circumstances, such as drug cases, when the search may be undertaken at any time. Telephone conversations may be monitored in conjunction with criminal proceedings with a court order and in national security cases with administrative approval from the agency conducting the investigation.

FRANCE

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Newspapers and magazines are free from government control and present views ranging across the political spectrum. There are two state-owned and three private television networks, in addition to private cable channels. Private radio stations have operated in France since 1983. Hundreds are now on the air and offer a wide array of independent, uncensored programming. Academic freedom of expression is respected in both public and private academic institutions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is widely respected, although, except for a specific reference to trade unions, it is not mentioned in the Constitution. Groups wishing to organize public meetings, protest marches, or demonstrations must obtain a permit from the local authorities. Permits are routinely granted for both political and apolitical gatherings. Private associations, whether political or apolitical, must register with the prefecture in the department in which they are established, but they do not require the prefecture's authorization to exist. Such registration is considered routine. Informal associations, such as those without officers, bylaws, or dues, need not register.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholics comprise by far the largest religious group in France. Separation of church and state is guaranteed by law. All religious groups function freely without persecution. Private and parochial schools receive substantial subsidies from the Ministry of National Education.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

French law provides for freedom of internal movement, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. Arriving refugees, intending emigrants, and intending repatriates can undertake foreign travel and, in most instances, return to France. France has an extensive record of refugee aid and resettlement.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The people have the right and ability to change their government by peaceful means, not only through the election of national representatives but also through amendment of the Constitution by means of a national referendum. This right was exercised with the adoption of a new Constitution in 1958.

The Constitution guarantees the equality of all citizens before the law, without regard to origin, race, or religion. All French citizens who have reached majority may vote, except for most convicted criminals, bankrupt persons, and persons certified to be mentally incompetent. These provisions are fully respected in practice. Presidential elections are held every 7 years, and elections for the National Assembly are held every 5 years, unless the Government is dissolved, in which case elections may be called sooner.

A wide variety of political parties compete freely in elections. In addition to national, presidential, and legislative elections, there are regularly scheduled local elections. For several years, the Government has been transferring selected powers from the executive branch to locally elected assemblies. Many special interest groups--business, labor, veterans, consumer advocates, ecologists, and others--organize freely and regularly support candidates for elective office.

The Matignon Accords of 1988, which call for a territorial referendum in 1998 to decide the future of New Caledonia, continued to be implemented in 1989. Municipal elections in March and provincial elections in June were conducted fairly. Despite the assassination of FLNKS leader Tjibaou in May (see Section 1.a.), the level of ethnic violence in the territory has substantially diminished.

France has traditionally been a leader in the human rights area. Human rights organizations, including the International Federation for Human Rights, operate freely in France.

The authorities do not condone discrimination based on race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. Although incidents of racial, religious, or political discrimination occur, particularly against the large immigrant community of Arabs and Africans, authorities consistently condemn such incidents. Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants.

Women have equal status under the law but are engaged in continuing efforts to maintain and strengthen their rights. A cabinet-level Secretary of State for Women's Rights, appointed in 1988, operates under the direct supervision of the Prime Minister. The Government also has taken steps to close loopholes in French legislation on sex discrimination in the workplace and to eliminate sexist advertising. In 1985 it passed legislation to ensure more equality in marriage rights.

The Government does not tolerate violence and abuse against women, and such violence, including wife beating, is prohibited under article 309 of the penal code. In 1987, the latest year for which statistics are available, 7,840 women in France lodged legal complaints of wife beating against their husbands under the provisions of article 309.

The rights of linguistic and ethnic minorities are protected, both in metropolitan France and in overseas territories subject to French authority. The right of legally admitted immigrants to coexist peacefully without assimilating completely into French culture is recognized. Legislation has been passed simplifying the deportation of illegal immigrants and tightening immigration procedures. In metropolitan France in 1989, extreme rightwing gangs in a number of instances assaulted members of minority groups, mainly Arabs. The authorities fully investigated such cases and vigorously prosecuted those apprehended.

An accord was signed in 1988 between ethnic Melanesians and European settlers on the status of New Caledonia in an effort to reduce deep-rooted antagonisms between the two ethnic communities.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution affirms the principle of freedom of labor union association, the right to a job, the right of equal opportunity for education and training, social security, and workers' participation in the operation of the enterprise in which they are employed.

Although only 10 percent of the work force is unionized, trade unions exercise significant economic and political influence. They participate actively in numerous tripartite (government, employer, and worker) bodies dealing with social matters, including labor courts and the Economic and Social Council, a constitutionally mandated consultative body. All unions are technically independent of the political parties, but many of the leaders of France's largest union, the General Confederation of Labor, belong to the Communist Party. (The General Secretary traditionally is a member of the Communist Party Political Bureau.) Leaders of most other unions are members of one or another faction of the Socialist Party, although members of other parties are also active in the labor movement. There are no restrictions on the unions' international activities, and all three world trade union confederations have French affiliates. French workers are free to strike, with a few exceptions in cases where strikes are determined to be a threat to public safety.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively. The principle of free collective bargaining was reestablished after World War II by a law of 1950, with separate statutes applying to public enterprises. The legislation, as amended in 1971 and 1978, encourages collective bargaining at the national, regional, local, or plant level. French law strictly prohibits antiunion discrimination. The law further sets forth procedures for dealing with labor disputes and defines two forms of collective contracts--extendable and ordinary. Amendments added in 1982 require at least annual bargaining on wages, hours, and working conditions at both plant and industry levels. France has no export processing zones, and labor law and practice are uniform throughout the country.

The Government encourages management and labor organizations to negotiate on issues important to public policy--such as adjustment plans for dislocated workers, training, retraining, unemployment compensation, and supplementary retirement schemes. The "social partners" sometimes invite the Government to participate in these negotiations, particularly if legislation will be needed for implementation or if public financing is involved.

FRANCE

The 1950 law sets forth procedures for resolving labor-management disputes. These are frequently arbitrated by labor inspectors. Conciliation boards, composed mainly of management and labor representatives, have proved ineffective. The Higher Court of Arbitration is rarely used. Mediation of wage issues at the national, regional, or local level has been more successful. Outside mediators, drawn from the upper ranks of the civil service, impose solutions that are binding unless formally rejected by either side within 8 days. In 1988, 1,242,000 man-days of work were lost because of strikes, as opposed to some 969,063 man-days in 1987.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

With a few minor exceptions for those enrolled in recognized apprenticeship programs, children under the age of 16 may not be employed. Certain categories of work considered to be arduous and night work (10 p.m. to 5 a.m.) may not be performed by persons under the age of 18 or by women in manufacturing, mining, the public sector, unions, and nonprofit organizations. However, women with managerial responsibilities may perform night work. This prohibition does not apply to women in commercial establishments, entertainment, or the health sector.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

France has a minimum wage of about $4.60 an hour, which is sufficient to provide a decent standard of living. The standard workweek is 39 hours, and overtime is controlled. In general terms, French labor legislation and practice, including that pertaining to occupational safety and health, are fully comparable to those in other industrialized market economy countries. The minimum wage is somewhat less in the overseas departments, and not all social legislation applies in overseas territories.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The German Democratic Republic (GDR) was created in 1949 as a Communist state out of the Soviet occupation zone of Germany. Approximately 350,000 Soviet troops are still stationed on its soil. The country has been ruled by the Communist Party, known as the Socialist Unity Party (SED). Its General Secretary since 1971, Erich Honecker, was replaced in October by Egon Krenz as a result of the crisis caused, in part, by large-scale popular demonstrations in East German cities and the flight of East Germans to the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) via Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Krenz was replaced by Gregor Gysi on December 3, 1989, following the resignation of the party leadership. Until November, the SED made all important political decisions; the other four political parties, whose existence was tolerated, had no power or independence. In December, however, the Parliament eliminated the constitutional provision granting the SED the "leading role" in the State.

Despite such formidable barriers as the Berlin Wall, deep historical, cultural, linguistic, and family ties remained between the people of the GDR and those of the FRG. Concern that such ties and constant exposure to Western values could undermine support for the Communist system was a central reason for the Government's tight control over its population. Control was maintained with an efficient and pervasive security apparatus administered by the Ministries of the Interior and State Security, which together employed approximately 300,000 people. Nevertheless, in the process of sanctioning increased glasnost (openness) and responding to the popular demand for the right to travel, the Communist leadership in November opened gates in the Berlin Wall allowing millions of East Germans to visit West Berlin with a minimum of formality. The Berlin Wall thereby lost its significance as a barrier to the free movement of East Germans into and out of West Berlin.

The GDR has had a highly industrialized, centrally planned economy in which the bulk of industry and agricultural property has been state owned. Although private property has been permitted, controls were placed on its acquisition, inheritance, and the income derived from it. Small private businesses, which may have up to 10 employees, are being licensed in increasing numbers.

Until November, the GDR continued to restrict the fundamental freedoms of speech, press, religion, assembly, and travel. However, it permitted record numbers of East Germans to emigrate and make short-term visits to the FRG. Other areas of human rights concern included arbitrary arrest and detention, the absence of fair trials for political prisoners, and arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, and correspondence.

Beginning in October, the authorities allowed increased freedom of speech and press, tolerated large street demonstrations, and did not interfere with the establishment of new political and other organizations. In December, they disbanded the Ministry for State Security and promised the release of the last political prisoners. Travel regulations for East Germans have been simplified. The new Prime Minister, Hans Modrow, named a cabinet with 11 non-Communist members among the 28 ministers, and free elections have been scheduled for May 6, 1990.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The following report primarily describes the human rights situation as it existed before the peaceful revolution in October which is now transforming the GDR. Some of the institutions and practices that led to widespread human rights abuses apparently were being changed at year's end, and the next annual report is likely to include a significantly different assessment of human rights practices.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

A 1982 law instructed border guards that they should open fire only as a last resort to prevent a person from leaving the country without permission. By mid-1987, there were reports that the practice of opening fire on would-be escapees had been virtually suspended, except in cases of military or police deserters or self-defense. Though GDR leaders repeatedly stated in 1989 that there is no shoot-to-kill order, there was an increase in shooting incidents at the Wall early in 1989, and one civilian was killed. There have been no verified instances of shooting since April when border guards reportedly were ordered not to shoot at civilians except in self-defense.

Several years ago, the regime removed lethal barriers, such as automatic shooting devices and minefields, which had existed on the GDR-FRG border (but never within Berlin). However, it expanded its system of barriers on the inner-German border to a depth of approximately 20 kilometers, and within Berlin increased the height of the border fence to 3 meters. The opening of the Berlin Wall and simplified travel regulations have rendered these measures obsolete.

There were no reports of permanent disappearance.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Specific laws state that the life, health, and ability to work of arrestees and prisoners must not be jeopardized. A law promulgated in December 1988 makes it a crime, with penalties up to 10 years' imprisonment, for an official performing state functions to mishandle a person psychologically or physically. There were no known instances in 1989 of this law being applied; previously, punishment of officials for abusing prisoners or detainees was rare.

In the past, prisoners have complained of cruel treatment and have reported excessively harsh conditions and psychological strain in prisons. Recently emigrated prisoners reported the selective easing of conditions within prisons. In particular, they noted an improvement in the guards' behavior. No report of physical abuse by prison officials came to light in 1989. In September, the GDR ratified the U.N. Convention Against Torture.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Until November, security agencies had blanket authority to detain and interrogate persons on suspicion alone. People who became particularly active in officially disapproved ways were sometimes subjected to repeated harassment, such as recurrent police interrogations, despite the absence of formal charges. They might be arrested with or without warrants, merely for expressing dissenting views. A person held in detention has the right to a judicial review of continued detention, but in political cases this right might not have been effectively observed. Beginning in November, the authorities generally avoided actions directed at dissidents.

Although the Criminal Procedure Code sets a limit of 3 months on investigatory proceedings, prosecuting authorities appear to have no difficulty in extending this period. Under the old regime, in most political cases, it often took many weeks before interested parties were notified of the arrest.

Charges filed in clearly political cases were often based on laws which were written in vague and general language. The penal code provides, for instance, that the transmission of information "detrimental to the interests of the German Democratic Republic," even if it is not classified, may be considered treason. Laws against "antistate agitation" and "asocial behavior" (parasitism) were often applied selectively against people who become politically active. The broad and vague wording severely restricted the possibility for defense. East German attorneys report that prisoners brought to trial under these laws were only occasionally acquitted. No effort to enforce these laws has been evident since October, and a revision of the penal code can be expected in 1990.

Until November, the authorities in selected cases issued passports and exit visas to dissidents and exiled them to the FRG.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under the old system, the public was usually excluded from trials involving security and political issues. Although the Criminal Procedure Code guarantees a defendant access to a defense attorney, and this right exists from the beginning of the investigative proceeding, the authorities were not required to inform a detainee of this provision, and the right was not always exercised in a timely manner. Prisoners are allowed to select their own attorneys. However, until investigatory proceedings were completed, prisoners were permitted to see their lawyers only in the presence of the police and to discuss only matters not related to the case. The prosecutor could restrict contacts between the defense attorney and his client. The number of instances in which such restrictions were applied reportedly has been declining, at least in nonsensitive cases. Discussion of a case itself often took place in a brief interview shortly before the trial. Attorneys could not make photocopies of their clients' files. Files could be reviewed only in court, and notes had to be taken in longhand or with the aid of a dictaphone.

GDR attitudes regarding the Criminal Procedure Code are changing. A 1987 official commentary to the Criminal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code stated a presumption against restrictions forbidding a defense attorney from discussing the case with his client. Another official commentary advanced the defense attorney's ability to gain more and earlier access to investigative documents. A court handed down a decision which freed a person from pretrial detention, and a Supreme Court justice published an article critical of excessive use of pretrial detention by many prosecutors and lower courts. The plenum of the Supreme Court has established new evidentiary rules which require prosecutors to meet a higher standard of proof in criminal cases. More changes to the GDR criminal justice system may occur due to the reforms which have occurred since October.

Trials in sensitive cases had been short and perfunctory. Constitutionally, the courts were under the control of the Council of State. In reality, they were controlled by the SED, which in effect appointed the judges. Military courts try civilians only in military espionage cases.

Until November, the Government did not admit to holding political prisoners. It did not publish statistics which would assist in determining the number of political prisoners. However, the FRG Ministry for Inner-German Relations has announced that it bought freedom for some 1,247 political prisoners from the GDR in 1987 and for some 1,200 in 1988. The Ministry continued this practice in 1989, but cited no figures. The Salzgitter Center, an FRG government office which monitors GDR human rights abuses, has registered some 25,000 prosecutions for political offenses in the GDR over the past 25 years. Such prosecutions have generally resulted in prison sentences of 18-24 months.

Estimates of the number of political prisoners vary widely, both because of the difficulty in obtaining information and the use of different definitional criteria. Official West German sources speak of more than 1,000 who were being held. The private West German-based August 13 Work Group estimated there were some 3,000 political prisoners, while other human rights groups' estimates ranged as high as 7,000. Most persons who fell into the political category were imprisoned as a result of pursuing their right of emigration by what the GDR considered extra-legal means, such as attempts to cross the Berlin Wall or the FRG-GDR border or to demonstrate publicly for emigration. Following the December 19 meeting between FRG Chancellor Kohl and GDR Premier Modrow, the GDR agreed to release all political prisoners before Christmas 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Until November, the secret police, assisted by informers, opened mail, installed listening devices, placed people under surveillance, subjected them to interrogation and intimidation, and arrested them without due process. By law, the police need court authorization to enter and search a house. They sometimes authorized entry themselves, however, and the courts retroactively gave approval. Evidence thus obtained could be used in court.

Young people are not forced to join the SED's youth movement, the Free German Youth (Freie Deutsche Jugend--FDJ), but school and government authorities made it clear that failure to do so would limit educational and job opportunities. Boys aged 15 and 16 normally had to attend a 2-week paramilitary training camp where they learned such skills as using weapons and throwing grenades. Since November, the FDJ has become increasingly less important in the GDR.

West German television can be viewed by 80 percent of the GDR populace, and the State does not try to jam or otherwise hinder foreign broadcasts.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Until November, freedom of speech remained severely circumscribed. There were restrictive laws relating to free expression, and public dissent could result in prison sentences. Perhaps out of a conscious effort to seem less repressive abroad, however, the authorities appeared increasingly reluctant to punish dissenting speech publicly. Most persons engaging in such activities were merely picked up and detained briefly by the police without charges being filed, as occurred in March, when there was a demonstration in Leipzig against new travel and emigration regulations and surveillance of would-be emigrants. It was also increasingly common for the State to fine rather than imprison individuals who attempted to exercise their right to freedom of expression. For example, some activists staging an independent Rosa Luxemburg/Karl Liebknecht demonstration in Leipzig in January were fined approximately $515 (at the official exchange rate) apiece, while persons attempting to deliver protest letters to the Chinese Embassy in June were fined amounts ranging from $256 to $769. After November, free speech was increasingly tolerated although the restrictive laws were still in effect.

Western journalists' ability to report on events in the GDR is limited by laws restricting their ability to travel without prior permission and to contact potential sources directly. Some East Germans considered contact with foreign journalists disadvantageous and tried to avoid it.

Until November, the Government controlled all media and licensed all publications prior to distribution. The media's basic function was to support and strengthen the Socialist order. Over the past several years, articles have appeared in established journals on previously taboo social subjects, such as alcoholism, homosexuality, child abuse, and juvenile delinquency. Late in 1989, the authorities encouraged increased openness in the media, which was reflected in part in detailed descriptions of the corruption of ousted SED leaders.

Government censorship of church newspapers, which began in 1988, continued into early 1989. Particularly affected was the coverage of church convocations which discussed subjects such as education policy, environmental protection, military service, and conscientious objection. In March, however, possibly as a goodwill gesture, the State stopped this practice. There has been no censorship of church publications since then.

There was little underground literature circulated by dissidents, in part because church-connected groups could circulate materials with considerable freedom within church confines, in part because of the small size of the GDR

dissident community, and in part because of the pervasiveness of the security apparatus. From time to time, however, unofficial activist groups produced, independently of both the church and the State, underground newspapers in limited quantities. One example is the monthly bulletin, Grenzfall, which covers peace, ecology, human rights, and independent activities in the GDR. Monthly publication of Grenzfall was suspended in January 1988 after some members of the group were arrested in the wake of a human rights demonstration and subsequently emigrated to the FRG. An issue appeared in February 1989 after a year's hiatus.

Circulation or importation of most printed materials required an official permit. Since former SED General Secretary Honecker's September 1987 visit to the FRG, however, East Germany relaxed somewhat the stringent controls governing importation of printed materials from the West. Private persons could import certain specialized publications, even if the publications did not have a special postal license. However, the regulation elastically excluded literature "directed against the preservation of peace and containing other agitation" or "contravening the interests of the Socialist State and its citizens."

The GDR also controlled the distribution of Soviet publications. Until November, it was often difficult for East Germans to open new subscriptions to Soviet periodicals. The State banned single issues of several Soviet publications, for example, an issue of a German-language Soviet newspaper, Neue Zeit, containing an interview with Polish activist Lech Walesa in February 1989. After November, East Germans were permitted to subscribe to Soviet periodicals without restriction.

Western newspapers and magazines were generally unavailable to the public at large. Small quantities of Western journals were for sale for hard currency in international hotels upon request. Some libraries, university departments, and official institutes also received Western journals, but circulation was highly restricted. Until November, GDR and Western travelers could be interrogated or arrested simply for possessing unlicensed printed material.

The SED conceived of art and literature as a means of promoting political goals. The value of works was judged on whether they ultimately conveyed a positive view of Communist society and goals, though they could be quite critical of individual aspects. Overly critical views or perceptions were discouraged or censored. Publishing houses practiced self-censorship, and works had to receive official clearance before they were published, performed or exhibited. Even before the November events, some previously banned books appeared in East German editions and a number of plays were staged on overtly political themes sharply critical of practices and positions inherent in Socialist societies.

Until November, academic freedom was severely limited and even formally restricted by law. The State viewed education as an instrument for "building socialism." All areas of academic inquiry were strictly controlled. Teachers who allowed open classroom discussion of unapproved themes or topics or who deviate from the party line were disciplined. Many books were prohibited totally; others permitted only in university libraries to which carefully screened and authorized personnel were allowed access.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of assembly, only the churches maintained the ability to organize meetings without prior state approval. The Government made no move to interfere with events held on church property, including protest gatherings in June over the events in China and an August 13 meeting calling for the destruction of the Berlin Wall.

In contrast, an independent organization, Neues Forum, which wanted to work outside the church to create a broad-based independent dialogue and a more attractive Socialist State, was refused permission to assemble in September. The authorities overturned this decision in November, however, and legalized Neues Forum.

The formation of private organizations or clubs also required government permission. Professional associations for writers and artists were headed by party members and ultimately controlled by the State. Dissidents and critics had been expelled and deprived of important professional privileges.

After the street demonstrations in Leipzig in September and October which spread to other cities, the opening of the Berlin Wall, and the discussions between representatives of the Government and of dissident groups, freedom of assembly and association have expanded in fact although not yet in law. For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for freedom of religious belief and worship. The State officially promotes atheism but in practice tolerates and even provides some financial subsidies for religious activity. Until late in 1989, overt adherence to religious beliefs could result in disqualification for preferred jobs and educational opportunities, although the largest religious community, the Evangelical (Lutheran) Church, had some success in pleading the cases of its members who suffered such discrimination.

New churches continue to be built, and old ones restored, in limited numbers with government approval. The Greifswald Cathedral was recently reconsecrated after extensive renovations funded by both West and East German Lutheran churches and the GDR.

Clergy are trained in both state universities and church-run seminaries. The Government has demonstrated some flexibility in its treatment of minority religions. Relations with the Catholic Church and the small Jewish community remain stable. The State is encouraging the first kosher cafe to open in East Berlin and recently promised to increase its financial support for the restoration of Berlin's largest synagogue and the establishment of a Jewish cultural center and museum.

While the Government has not rescinded a ban on organized activities by Christian Scientists, it has made no effort to interfere with those activities. Members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints continue to practice their faith relatively unimpeded. Under a special program beginning in March, young East German members of the church may go on mission to the West for 2 years, while Mormon missionaries from the West may proselytize in the GDR.

Until November, the churches remained under continuing government pressure to watch their words and deeds, and the secret police continued to monitor church-sponsored events closely. Nonetheless, the Evangelical (Lutheran) Church remained the only institutional forum in which divergent opinions could be expressed with relative freedom. With the exception of church-sponsored events held on church grounds, groups were not allowed to organize events without official approval.

The church-state dialogue on issues such as freedom of religion and thought, conditions of military service, conscientious objection, and compulsory military training in the schools, was postponed by the State in the fall of 1987. Due to the reforms which have occurred, this dialogue may now be resumed.

Western clergy were permitted to attend the important Europe-wide ecumenical convocation in the GDR in 1989, and more than 300 East Germans, selected by the East German Evangelical (Lutheran) Church, were permitted to attend the massive church meeting (Kirchentag) in West Berlin.

For many years, young men subject to universal conscription who are religious conscientious objectors have been able to choose alternative service in unarmed construction units. However, those opposed to any military service whatever were incarcerated. In the past 3 years, the Government has followed a policy of ignoring such persons, i.e., neither drafting nor prosecuting them. Conscientious objectors may still face discrimination in schools and jobs.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Most East Germans can travel freely within the country, except within special border zones or near military installations. Technically, they are not free to change their place of residence without government approval, but normally this amounts only to a requirement to register with the police. All East Germans must carry identification cards which the police have the right to check at will. Because of their criminal or political records, including the filing of emigration applications, approximately 60,000 East Germans carry a special identification card called PM-12, which in many but not all cases restricts domestic as well as foreign travel. Until November, foreign travel was tightly controlled, and exit visas were required.

A new law on short-term visits and permanent emigration to the West came into effect on January 1, 1989. Under this law, the categories of persons eligible to submit applications for travel and the circumstances under which applications could be made were somewhat broader and more clearly defined, though private travel remained limited to persons visiting relatives in the West. The new law also more clearly defined--though it did not greatly expand--the categories of persons who could apply for family reunification and created a new category of emigration for humanitarian reasons. One provision of the new law permitted emigration by minors so that they could be reunited with their parents.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The bureaucracy was required to accept applications, reach decisions within fixed time periods, and provide clear legal statements for rejections. After July 1, people had the right to appeal decisions to the courts, which, however, could review cases only for procedural errors. Additional amendments enacted in mid-March, in an attempt to respond to popular criticism that the new law was proving more restrictive than the relatively ad hoc liberal practices of the past several years, broadened the categories of persons who could make private visits to the West. The grounds for refusal, however, included some flexible clauses reserving for the authorities considerable discretionary power.

A crisis began in the summer when would-be emigrants staged sit-ins at the FRG's permanent mission in East Berlin and in the FRG embassies in Budapest, Prague, and Warsaw. Many additional people sought to escape via the Austrian-Hungarian border. By mid-September, more than 20,000 had crossed the border without proper GDR documentation. After the Hungarian Government opened its border to Austria in September, more than 100,000 East Germans succeeded in reaching the FRG without GDR permission. In addition, more than 15,000 East Germans were transported from Prague to the FRG by East German trains after special arrangements were reached to resolve the Prague and Warsaw embassy situations. Subsequently the GDR imposed controls on the travel of East Germans to Czechoslovakia. In November, GDR authorities opened gates in the Berlin Wall and along the inner-German border to enable East Germans to visit West Berlin and the FRG by simply showing their passports. Millions have now done so.

Until late in the year, most emigrants could return to the GDR only with great difficulty. In general, only East Germans in binational marriage cases were permitted to keep their GDR passports and travel freely between East and West. Other emigrants usually had to wait 5 years before they could return for family visits. Persons who received permission for an extended stay in the West but who made no attempt to change their citizenship, such as writers Jurek Becker and Monika Maron, apparently were allowed to return at any time for a visit. Those who left the country illegally before January 1, 1981, were eligible to apply for permission to visit, but reportedly only half of those who had applied had obtained permission. Persons who fled after 1980 faced possible criminal prosecution if they returned to the GDR.

Repatriation was even more tortuous and seldom occurred. The GDR authorities deliberated such cases carefully. When persons were permitted to return, they were treated by the State as regular East Germans, though they often faced suspicion and hostility from fellow East Germans who knew of their circumstances.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Until November, East Germans were not free to change the system of government. The SED leadership made all important decisions, controlled the Government and its operations, determined who would fill executive positions in the government apparatus, and ensured that its party members occupied a majority of them. Although four other parties were represented in the Government, they were not permitted to challenge Communist leadership or control. In the first indications of change in this situation, the unicameral legislature, the Volkskammer, in November elected the chairman of the Democratic Peasants Party as its presiding officer and in December elected the chairman of the Liberal Democratic Party to succeed Egon Krenz as chairman of the Council of State (chief of state). Furthermore, the Volkskammer in December voted to amend the Constitution eliminating the SED's "leading role" in the State.

All parties and mass organizations (such as trade unions) were represented in the National Front, which was controlled by the SED. For election purposes, the National Front prepared lists of approved candidates according to a formula which ensured the SED's domination. Candidates exceeded the number of available seats, and a candidate high on the list could be rejected on election day if more than 50 percent of the voters crossed his name off the ballot. In such a case, a candidate lower on the list could be elected. This was, however, extremely rare. For the first time in 20 years during the May elections, two candidates lost. In December 1989, the National Front was dissolved.

Charges of fraud during the May 7 local elections raised questions about how far the East Germans' right to self-determination extends. Although there is no question that the majority of people voted for the official ballot, unofficial poll watchers maintain, and most people believe, that the official count showed many fewer "no" votes and a higher participation rate than was actually the case. The Government dismissed such allegations. Officially, 98.7 percent of those eligible to vote participated, and 99.91 percent of the voters "approved" the ballot.

Although the GDR is a signatory of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), it had generally taken the position that inquiries into its human rights policies constituted interference in its internal affairs. Requests by private human rights groups in the West for information on human rights conditions went unanswered, and the Government discouraged visits by such groups. Within the GDR, members of unofficial human rights groups, such as the Peace and Human Rights Initiative and the Solidarity church working group, faced surveillance and harassment by the secret police and could have been arrested if their activities were deemed threatening to the Government. Such groups were often the only source of current information available to outside observers on human rights developments in the GDR. Until November, their ability to disseminate information was restricted by official harassment.

The Vienna Concluding Document of the CSCE permits signatory states to question human rights implementation in other member countries. Spain, in its capacity as president of the European Community, invoked the human rights issue against the GDR in the spring of 1989 in a case in which an escaping East German was arrested by GDR river police just after reaching West Berlin. The GDR responded to the note but insisted that the matter lay entirely within its sovereign competence and did not immediately resolve or otherwise provide information about the case. The person in question was ultimately allowed to emigrate to the FRG.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The government-sponsored Committee for the Protection of Human Rights does not attempt to safeguard the human rights of East Germans. Instead, it criticizes human rights conditions in other countries while claiming there are no problems in the GDR. East German refusal, until recently, to recognize human rights problems has also meant that there were few effective executive, legislative, judicial, or administrative remedies for addressing human rights violations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

An extensive social welfare system provides free medical care to the population without discrimination. Men and women are treated equally in most respects, and women's marriage and property rights are generous. Women and men receive equal pay for equal work. Violence against women, including wife beating, is not condoned either legally or in practice. Although it occurs, no statistics or reliable information is available as to its extent. In the event of such abuse, women have the right to seek redress in the courts.

The Democratic Women's Federation of Germany officially represents women's interests within the SED. Its functions, however, are nominal.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers do not have the right to establish and join unions and federations of their own choosing. The Free German Trade Union (FDGB) is an appendage of the SED. It consists of 16 unions covering all workers and professionals and represents some 90 percent of the work force. All large industrial and retail enterprises, which employ some 85 percent of the labor force, are owned by the State. The FDGB's role has been to enforce and promote official government and party policies, which were considered to correspond with the interests of the masses, rather than to promote members' interests, which might conflict with those policies. The FDGB is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Following the upheaval which began in October 1989, labor entered a period of transition. In the intervening period, independent trade union groups have emerged demanding respect for freedom of association and the right to strike, and scattered wildcat strikes have occurred. However, neither these groups nor the rights they demand have thus far achieved any basis in law. Meanwhile, the FDGB has experienced a dramatic loss of membership and two spontaneous changes of leadership under the pressure of mass demonstrations and accusations of corruption. The former president of the organization remains in detention on corruption charges. The FDGB has scheduled an extraordinary convention for January 1990 in an apparent attempt at reform intended to make the organization more responsive to workers' interests.

Except as noted above, workers do not have the constitutional right to strike. There were no published reports of strikes in 1989.

In its 1989 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) reiterated its rejection of the trade union monopoly granted to the FDGB. The Committee found that the situation in the GDR was not compatible with ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and called on the Government to provide legislation granting the workers, including members of collective farms, freedom to establish organizations of their own choosing.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no legal provision for collective bargaining, nor does it exist in practice. Although worker representatives are allowed to sit on the enterprises' boards, in reality they rubberstamp the boards' policies. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is not legally prohibited but it is not practiced in the GDR.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children from age 14 may work part time during vacations and to further their education. Children can work full time with parental permission between ages 14 and 18. Youths under the age of 18 may not work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. Youth commissions within the FDGB effectively enforce the child labor laws.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Under the law, a full-time worker is entitled to a minimum wage of approximately $216 per month. This provides subsistence-level living for workers and their families.

The maximum workweek is 43 3/4 hours, with a maximum of an additional 120 hours overtime per year permissible by law, except under extraordinary conditions. A 2-day weekend is common. The GDR guarantees persons the right to a job, and there is essentially no unemployment.

Labor law obliges enterprises to protect their employees' health and safety in the workplace. In reality, working conditions are often difficult, especially in mining and heavy industry. The Government has had some success, however, in reducing the relatively high rate of accidents in the workplace.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) is a constitutional republic and parliamentary democracy. National power is divided among executive, legislative, and judicial branches. The head of the Federal Government, the Chancellor, is elected by the Bundestag, the lower house of Parliament. The powers of the Chancellor and of the Parliament, which are substantial, are set down in the Basic Law (constitution). There is a division of governmental authority between national and state governments. The latter retain significant autonomy, especially in matters relating to law enforcement and the courts, culture and education, the environment, and social assistance.

Organized essentially at the state (land) level and operating under the direction of state governments, well-trained and disciplined police scrupulously respect citizens' rights, as well as those of other persons resident in the FRG to the extent they are protected by law. In dealing with hostile elements, including terrorists, special care is taken to respect the rights of the accused.

The industrialized economy of the FRG provides one of the highest standards of living in the world.

The foundation of the Basic Law, adopted in 1949, rests firmly on the principles of liberty, equality, and the free exercise of individual rights. The "basic rights" enumerated in that document are theoretically subject to interference only on the basis of a law, and in practice these human rights are scrupulously protected.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Politically motivated killing by the Government or by mainstream political organizations is unknown. Terrorist groups on the far left (the Red Army Fraktion--RAF), the far right (neo-Nazi groups), and Middle Eastern terrorists continue to engage in political violence.

b. Disappearance

Governmental or police authorities do not abduct, secretly arrest, or otherwise illegally detain persons.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Police authorities do not physically or mentally torture prisoners, nor do they engage in cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment. Use of excessive force against prisoners or detainees is not legally sanctioned or officially encouraged. On the rare occasions when it occurs, it is subject to impartial investigation and legal sanction.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No person may be arrested in the FRG except on the basis of an arrest warrant issued by a competent judicial authority. Any person detained by the police must be brought before a judge and charged no later than the day following the day of apprehension. The court must then issue an arrest warrant with stated reasons or order the person's release.

There is no preventive detention in the normal sense. The law, however, provides that a prisoner may be held in custody (but no longer than 24 hours) while awaiting a formal charge if there is evidence that he might seek to flee the country to avoid prosecution. The right of free access to legal counsel has been restricted only in the cases of some terrorists who have used contacts with lawyers to promote and continue terrorist activity even while in prison. Only judges may decide on the validity of any deprivation of liberty. Bail bond exists in the FRG but is seldom employed. There is no exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials are public. The Basic Law assures due process and prohibits double jeopardy. The judiciary is free of both government interference and intimidation by terrorists. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The inviolability of the home is ensured by the Basic Law and fully respected in practice. Prior to forcible entry by police into a home, a warrant must be issued by a judge or, in an emergency, by a public prosecutor. Electronic surveillance or monitoring of mail may be undertaken only after authorization by a court order.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The provisions of the Basic Law, an independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. Criticism of the Government is unrestricted. The media and artistic works are not censored. Academic freedom is complete. There is no censorship of foreign or domestic books. Newspapers and magazines are privately owned.

Radio and television networks and stations function, for the most part, as corporations under special public laws. They are governed by independent boards made up of representatives of churches, political parties, and other organizations.

A few experimental private television cable stations and local television cable networks have been set up. Legislation has been enacted in all states except Bremen and Hesse to facilitate and encourage private television stations using cable, satellites, and other "new" media.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The rights of assembly and association are fully respected, as is the right to demonstrate. Organizers of street demonstrations are required to obtain police permits beforehand and may be asked to pay a deposit to cover the repair of any damage to public facilities. When demonstrators have not obtained the required permits, police have exercised considerable restraint, showing concern primarily for the continued functioning of public facilities and for the safety of the general public.

Membership in nongovernmental organizations of all types, including political parties, is entirely open. Parties found to be "fundamentally antidemocratic" may be outlawed. Under this constitutionally based provision, the Federal Constitutional Court in the 1950's declared both a neo-Nazi and a Communist party to be illegal.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The full practice of religion is allowed. Major religious groups participate in a state-administered church tax system. The Government subsidizes church-affiliated schools and provides religious instruction in schools and universities for Protestants, Catholics, and members of the Jewish community.

The major religious groupings are active in FRG public political debates. Political parties are legally barred from refusing members on the basis of religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

German citizens are free to move anywhere within the country and to leave and return at any time. The Basic Law provides that Germans who arrive in the Federal Republic from the German Democratic Republic (GDR), as well as from Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, are treated as German citizens and therefore may take up residence without restrictions. Continuing a trend begun in 1986, the number of ethnic Germans from Eastern Europe coming to settle in the FRG grew steadily. By June, nearly 152,000 had come, including nearly 100,000 from Poland, 41,000 from the Soviet Union, and 11,000 from Romania. In addition, nearly 56,000 Germans from the GDR had arrived by July 31. With the opening of the Hungarian-Austrian border in September and unimpeded travel to the FRG through Czechoslovakia in November, the number of East German refugees increased dramatically to an official total of 343,854 by year's end.

The right of asylum of those who are politically persecuted is also guaranteed by the Basic Law and respected in practice. By August, the total number of asylum seekers in the FRG was estimated to be 800,000, with Poles, Yugoslavs, and Turks the three largest groups.

Once formally granted asylum status, and to a lesser extent while being processed, asylees have essentially the same access to social welfare benefits as German citizens. Short of the right to vote, they enjoy complete civil rights. While only about 10 percent of the asylum seekers are successful with their requests for political asylum, denial of political asylum does not automatically result in deportation. Eighty percent of those whose petitions are denied are typically allowed to remain in the country for other, humanitarian reasons. Persons from Eastern European countries are normally allowed to remain whether or not official asylum status is granted. Extraditions have been extremely rare.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Under the parliamentary democracy established by the Basic Law, the FRG is ruled by a government chosen by the people through orderly elections based on universal adult suffrage. The Bundestag (lower house) is elected through a mixture of direct constituency candidates and party lists. Members of the upper house of Parliament, the Bundesrat, are appointed by the state governments. Around 87 percent of voters normally participate in national elections, but local contests attract significantly lower participation.

Candidates for public office are usually members of political parties but are not required to be. New political parties are free to form and enter the political process, but the Basic Law and the state constitutions stipulate that parties must achieve at least 5 percent of the total vote in order to be represented in the Federal and state Parliaments. The FRG has been ruled since its creation by governments headed by one of the two major parties, the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) or the Social Democratic Party (SPD). The current Government is led by a coalition of the CDU joined by its Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union (CSU), and the Free Democratic Party (FDP). The SPD and the Greens, a party represented in the Bundestag since the elections of March 1983, comprise the opposition. Although party discipline plays an important role, voting on issues in the Bundestag is ultimately a matter of individual decision.

There were no allegations of violations of human rights in 1989. A number of human rights organizations, both international and local, freely conduct their activities in the Federal Republic. The Government considers the international promotion of human rights one of its highest priorities.

There is no legal and relatively little de facto discrimination in the availability of shelter, health care, and education to all inhabitants, regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, political opinion, or citizenship.

Due to increased unemployment, the Government has pursued a three-pronged policy with regard to foreign workers: integration of longtime residents, limitation of further entries, and repatriation aid for those willing to return to their home countries. At the end of June, foreign workers totalled 1.592 million, or 5.8 percent of the work force, and 36 percent were organized in trade unions. A national debate has been under way over whether the rights of guest workers should be broadened to permit unlimited residence and the right to vote or reduced by limiting the right of entry for dependent children.

Since the passage of an equal employment rights law in 1982, women are guaranteed equal employment at the workplace. They are increasingly rising to management and leadership positions in the private and public sectors. Protective legislation bars women from working in certain heavy industrial occupations and also generally bans night work. Young women experience difficulties in gaining access to training in some traditionally male fields. Recent court rulings and government pilot programs, however, have helped break down some of these attitudinal and institutional barriers. Women enjoy full and equal protection under the law, including property and inheritance rights. Consistent with the special status which mothers enjoy pursuant to the terms of the Basic Law, the Government provides financial benefits for mothers, including maternity leave and child allowances. There are several active women's rights groups.

Violence against women is acknowledged, and the women's movement has urged public discussion of the problem and tougher penalties for crimes against women. Reliable figures concerning domestic violence, including wife beating, are not available. Women's groups have taken the lead in calling for tougher punishment for domestic violence and other crimes against women. They have also sponsored the creation of a number of refuges for women who are victims of such violence. These refuges receive support at the state and local level varying from 100 percent of expenses in Berlin and Hamburg to more limited support in other states. According to the Interior Ministry, the official number of rape cases reported in 1988 fell to 5,251, the lowest level since 1958. In a parliamentary speech in May, the CDU Minister for Youth, Family, Women, and Health referred to a recent study by the Allensbach Public Opinion Research Institute which said rape occurs at least once in every fifth marriage. Claims by some women's organizations that many rapes are not reported and that rape in marriage is serious enough to require making it a punishable offense have so far not persuaded legislators to make marital rape a punishable offense.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right to associate freely, choose representatives, determine programs and policies to represent members' interests, and to publicize views is recognized and exercised freely. The right to strike is guaranteed by law, except for civil servants and personnel in sensitive positions, such as members of the armed forces. Strikes occurred in 1989, notably in the printing industry and in the retail trade, in which work time reduction was one of several issues.

The country has a long-established and highly organized labor movement, with about 41 percent of the eligible work force unionized. The German Trade Union Federation represents over 83 percent of organized workers. Reborn in the wake of World War II, the unions are particularly conscious of their historic role as the protector of worker rights and a bulwark of the democratic system. In order to avoid the political divisions which plagued the post-World War I labor movement, the unions adopted the principle of a "unified union," independent of any political party but in which the two major parties are represented. They actively participate in the International Labor Organization and in international and European trade union organizations.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is guaranteed by law and is widely practiced. Each year approximately 7,000 contracts are renegotiated, affecting some 20 million workers, or 90 percent of the dependent work force.

No government mechanism to promote voluntary worker-employer negotiations is required because of a well-developed system of autonomous contract negotiations. There is a two-tiered bargaining system, whereby basic wages and conditions are established at the industry level and then adapted to the circumstances prevailing in particular enterprises through local negotiations. A distinguishing characteristic of FRG industrial relations is the legally mandated system of works councils which provide a permanent forum for continuing selective worker participation in the management of the enterprise. Workers are fully protected against antiunion discrimination, and there is a well-developed labor court system to process complaints. There are no export processing or free trade zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is barred by the Constitution and is nonexistent in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Federal law generally prohibits the employment of children under age 15 with a few exceptions: children aged 13 and 14 may do farm work for up to 3 hours per day or may deliver newspapers for up to 2 hours per day; children aged 13 through 14 may take part in cultural performances under stringent conditions with regard to number of hours, time of day, and form of activity.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

While there is no legal minimum wage, minimum wages are set by contract within each industry sector. At the lower end of the minimum wage scale is the $5.40 per hour wage (at current exchange rates) for agricultural workers. Such minimum wage levels provide an adequate standard of living for workers and their families. The number of hours of work per week is regulated by contracts which directly or indirectly affect 80 percent of the working population. Negotiation of a 35-hour workweek is a major goal of FRG unions. The average workweek is nearly 39 hours. Federal legislation sets occupational safety and health standards. For each occupation, there is a comprehensive system of worker insurance carriers who enforce requirements for safety in the workplace.

GREECE

Greece is a constitutional republic and parliamentary democracy. The party or coalition with the majority of seats in Parliament names the Prime Minister, who forms the Government. Parliamentary elections in June and November 1989 were freely and vigorously contested by a full spectrum of political parties and resulted in an orderly, democratic change of government. The President, the largely ceremonial Head of State, is elected by Parliament.

Activities of the police and security services are monitored by the Government and the independent judiciary. The generally alert press reports rare abuses, including the improper expulsion of political refugees and isolated instances of rough treatment of ordinary criminals.

A developed country and a member of the European Community (EC), Greece benefits from EC subsidies designed to bring its per capita gross national product into line with that of other EC members. Economic development is hampered by a public sector bloated by generations of politically motivated hirings and by consequent massive budget deficits.

The Constitution provides a full range of fundamental human rights. Some members of religious and ethnic/cultural minorities, however, continue to complain about the behavior of some government officials who, they allege, restrict their rights and discriminate against them. About 420 Jehovah's Witnesses are in prison due to the absence of nonmilitary alternative service to conscription. Treatment of the respective Muslim and Greek minorities in Greece and Turkey continues to be a subject of dispute between the two countries.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Neither government forces nor legal opposition organizations engage in politically motivated killings. In 1989 domestic terrorist groups assassinated a prominent deputy of the conservative New Democracy party and two judicial officials.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of official abductions, secret arrests, or clandestine detentions during 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution provides for freedom from torture. A November 1984 law makes the use of torture an offense punishable by sentences ranging from 3 years to life imprisonment. Greek human rights groups contend that police overreliance on confessions occasionally leads to physical or reported psychological intimidation of ordinary criminals. Amnesty International reported several allegations of torture or ill-treatment of prisoners in 1989.

Poor treatment of the severely mentally handicapped in a psychiatric institution on a remote island sparked a storm of protest from psychiatrists and journalists in 1989. Current

GREECE

Greek law on commitment to psychiatric institutions is criticized for not insisting on adequate judicial review, but there were no allegations of abusive commitments in 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution states that a judicial warrant is required for any arrest except during the actual commission of a crime. Occasionally, suspects are briefly and informally detained pending confirmation of their identity, but there is no evidence of any serious infringement of civil liberties. A person arrested on the basis of a warrant or while committing a crime must be brought before an examining magistrate within 24 hours and charged. The magistrate must issue a warrant of imprisonment or order the release of the detainee within 3 days of the examination unless special circumstances require a 2-day extension of this time limit.

A Dutch national was imprisoned by administrative order for 8 months during 1988 and 1989 over a disputed customs obligation. New legislation passed in October deprived tax authorities of the power to order imprisonment without judicial review for unpaid debts to the State.

The effective maximum duration of detention pending trial is 18 months for felonies and 9 months for misdemeanors. Most trials occur within 12 months of the charges being submitted. Release pending trial, with or without bail, is granted in limited cases by decision of a judicial council.

Exile is unconstitutional and does not occur, except in the form of loss of citizenship for dual nationals (see Section 5). With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for fair and public trials. Greece has a regular system of civil and criminal courts. The independence of the judiciary, though provided for by the Constitution, is occasionally subject to political intervention. Judges are sometimes accused of allowing political criteria to influence their judgments. A new law on judicial codes passed in October was designed to strengthen the independence of the judiciary by eliminating the role of politically appointed judicial officials in assigning judges to specific trials.

Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence. Defense lawyers are available to all accused persons, at public expense if necessary. A defendant or his attorney may confront witnesses. Court sessions are public, unless the court decides that privacy is required for the protection of victims or in matters of national security. The latter provision is not abused. A defendant may appeal a court verdict to an appeals court. Pending the passage of long-delayed enabling legislation, the decisions of military courts are not subject to review by the Supreme Court, and the courts themselves are criticized for inadequately safeguarding the rights of those accused. Military courts have no jurisdiction over civilians. Greece has no political prisoners.

GREECE

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of the home and of the individual's personal and family life. No house search may be made except in the presence of a judicial representative and with a judicial warrant issued in conformity with strict legal standards. Alleged abuses of this provision have provoked swift official investigation. There is no compulsory membership in political groups. The Constitution guarantees privacy of correspondence and of communications. An investigation by Parliament in August concluded that the previous Greek government (1981-1989) had engaged in systematic wiretapping of opposition political parties, politicians, and newspaper publishers. Former Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and two senior officials were remanded to a special judicial tribunal for trial on these charges.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and the press is provided for in the Constitution and respected in practice. Censorship is prohibited. Opposition viewpoints are constantly presented in the active Greek press and criticism of the Government is unhampered.

Greek law prohibited privately owned television stations until new legislation was passed in September. Two private stations are scheduled to begin transmitting broadcasts in November, though municipal television stations had operated on a quasi-illegal experimental basis irregularly during the year. Although the activities of opposition political leaders are covered by state-controlled radio and television, opposition parties assert that news and information programming tends to reflect the political perspective of the governing party. During elections, air time is allocated to all political parties. Legislation passed in 1988 legalized municipal and privately operated radio stations, which air a wide range of viewpoints. Since 1988, the Government rebroadcasts foreign satellite television programs in major cities.

The Constitution allows for seizure, by order of the public prosecutor, of publications which insult the President, offend religious beliefs, contain obscene articles, advocate the violent overthrow of the political system, or disclose military and defense information. No periodicals or newspapers are known to have been seized in 1989. Academic freedoms are protected by democratically chosen faculty organizations, though such groups tend to be highly politicized.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly, but the police may impose limits on outdoor public meetings if they determine that a serious disturbance of social and economic life is threatened. This exception was not abused in 1989.

The right of association is guaranteed by the Constitution and observed in practice. All citizens are free to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, including trade unions, political groups, and private organizations, without previous authorization or government interference.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion and prohibits discriminatory practices against religious minorities, which include communities of Muslims, Jews, and non-Orthodox Christians. The Constitution nevertheless establishes the Greek Orthodox Church, to which 98 percent of the population at least nominally adheres, as the "prevailing" religion. In addition, the Constitution prohibits proselytism by any religious group. The number of foreign missionaries arrested has decreased since the courts ruled that distribution of literature alone does not constitute proselytism. In the first 9 months of 1989, about 110 Jehovah's Witnesses were arrested for proselytism, and 5 were sentenced to fines (about $3,000 each) and brief imprisonment. The Jehovah's Witnesses allege that on at least two occasions in the past 12 months Orthodox priests incited crowds to beat up women distributing religious tracts. They also claim that, in defiance of Greek law, many public schoolteachers refuse to excuse children of Jehovah's Witnesses and other faiths from mandatory religion classes, in which their beliefs are attacked in state-approved textbooks as heretical.

The Constitution declares that "no person shall be exempt from discharging his obligations to the State or may refuse to comply with laws by reason of his religious convictions." Although Greece provides for alternative noncombatant military service, it has no provision for nonmilitary alternative national service to its universal conscription of men. Jehovah's Witnesses and a small number of other conscientious objectors of military age who refuse alternative noncombatant military service are tried and sentenced by military courts to military prison for a term twice that of normal service. In September there were about 420 Jehovah's Witnesses serving sentences of between 3 and 5 years. A portion of this sentence may be served in a minimum security (civilian) agricultural prison, where each day served is credited as 2 days toward fulfillment of the sentence. In 1989 the average time actually served was reportedly about 38 months.

Two conscientious objectors unconnected with the Jehovah's Witnesses were released in 1989 after having served two-thirds of their sentences. Parliament in 1989 did not debate long-pending legislation to create nonmilitary alternative service.

In late 1987, a lower court in Crete held that Jehovah's Witnesses do not constitute a "known" religion and are thus not entitled to legal protection on the grounds that their doctrine of refusal to serve in the military violates Greek law. The Supreme Court's consideration of the appeal of this decision was postponed until late in 1989. Jehovah's Witnesses complain that the Government does not recognize that Jehovah's Witnesses' clerics are entitled to the same exemption from military service as that accorded to Orthodox and other recognized clerics. In addition, Jehovah's Witnesses in military prison are reportedly denied access to religious services.

GREECE

Some non-Orthodox churches experience difficulties in building or acquiring new meetingplaces when necessary permits from the Ministry of Education and Religious Affairs, which must consider the opinion of the Orthodox Church hierarchy, are denied. Jehovah's Witnesses complain that their requests for use of public facilities are routinely denied.

Greece has a Muslim minority of approximately 126,000, made up of ethnic Turks, Pomaks, and Gypsies, located principally in Thrace in northeastern Greece. Their freedom of religion was guaranteed under the 1923 Treaty of Lausanne, and some 250 working mosques exist. Members of the Muslim community insist that, in accordance with a never-implemented law of 1920, the community itself should elect the Muftis (religious leaders) of the two major towns (Xanthi and Komotini). An interim Mufti appointed by the Government has not been accepted by many in the community, and the issue remains at an impasse.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution ensures freedom of movement within the country, foreign travel, and emigration, and these rights are generally respected. Persons intending to emigrate and emigrants who return to Greece experience no discrimination. However, the Greek citizenship code makes a legal distinction between Greek citizens of ethnic Greek descent and those of nonethnic Greek descent. Citizens of nonethnic Greek descent may be deprived of their citizenship by a simple administrative decree if they move abroad with the apparent intent not to return. Every year a small number of Greek Muslims who have moved to Turkey find that they have been stripped of their Greek citizenship. There is no prior hearing or judicial review and no effective right of appeal. The Muslim community protests this practice as discriminatory.

Greek Civil War refugees of Slavic ethnicity (stripped of their Greek citizenship for participation in the Communist-led insurrection of 1946-49) were expressly excluded from the general amnesty and return of exiles completed in 1982. In 1989 the head of the Greek Communist Party (KKE) denounced the Government's refusal to allow their return as "racist."

Greece is a first-asylum country under the 1951 Geneva Convention on Refugees but makes no provision for permanent settlement of refugees in Greece. In October 1989, the Minister of Labor promulgated a decree allowing bona fide refugees to work, an important step forward in improving the inadequate institutional framework for refugees. Refugee organizations note that Greece has no objective criteria for distinguishing asylum seekers from economic migrants. Greek border officials returned an escaped political prisoner involuntarily to Turkish authorities in August. The Government characterized this and other reported expulsions as contrary to its policy but refused to release the report of its investigation of the incident.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Greece is a multiparty democracy in which all citizens enjoy full political rights, without regard to race, sex, religion, or political persuasion. Greek citizens freely choose the officials and laws governing them. The President is elected by Parliament to a 5-year term. Members of the unicameral

GREECE

Parliament are elected to maximum 4-year terms by compulsory universal suffrage (over age 18) and secret ballot.

Opposition parties function freely, have broad access to the media, hold public meetings, and serve as a check on actions by the Government. In June the 8-year government of the Panhellenic Socialist Movement was voted out of office and replaced by an interim coalition of the conservative New Democracy Party and an alliance of Communist and leftist parties. New parliamentary elections November 5 under the same proportional electoral system again did not produce a majority government.

The Government has not objected to visits and investigations by human rights organizations, although visits by U.S. and other foreign diplomats to the border regions, where the bulk of the Muslim minority population resides, are subject to prior notification to and occasional refusal by the Government, as well as surveillance by the security services. Domestic human rights organizations are allowed to operate freely and actively assist those who believe their rights have been violated. The Government also participates in multilateral human rights organizations.

The subject of minority rights is a sensitive one in the Balkans, where real or alleged human rights abuses have been used in the past to justify irredentist claims. Greece has a significant Muslim minority, primarily in western Thrace, and there are smaller communities in the Dodecanese Islands and in Athens and other industrial areas. Pomaks (Bulgarian-speaking Muslims) occupy the mountainous border with Bulgaria, and Gypsies are scattered throughout Greece. There are remnant populations speaking Albanian, Vlach (related to Romanian), and Slavic dialects.

The Treaty of Lausanne includes provisions protecting the political and cultural rights of the Muslim (Turkish, Pomak, and Gypsy) minority in western Thrace, as it did the rights of the Greek minority in Istanbul. By and large these rights are respected. Muslim villages in Thrace regularly elect Muslim mayors, and an independent Muslim deputy was elected to the Parliament in June 1989 by an overwhelming majority of the local Muslim population in his district. In the November parliamentary elections the independent Muslim Deputy, Ahmet Sadik, and one of his two running mates were disqualified on the basis of a missing affidavit in their applications. This exclusion and a sudden strike by customs officials which closed the border with Turkey just before these elections (and the June elections as well) have fueled allegations by critics that local authorities may have played a role in attempting to block the Muslim party. The remaining independent Muslim candidate was nevertheless elected.

Greek authorities insist on the religious, not ethnic, character of the minority (as specified in the Lausanne Treaty). The Greek Supreme Court upheld a ruling that local minority associations cannot call themselves "Turkish," a decision the associations have appealed to the European Parliament. The independent Muslim candidates campaigned on a platform of insisting not only on equal treatment, but also on the Turkish ethnic/cultural (rather than Muslim religious) identity of the minority. Most Greeks assert that the Government of Turkey actively intervened to support the independent Muslim candidates, giving as evidence the extensive coverage the Muslim campaign received in the Turkish media.

Members of the Muslim community complain that Greek officials encourage an overly traditional, religious education in Turkish-language schools and obstruct entry of teachers and educational materials from Turkey. Greek officials contend that the Government of Turkey has not acted to revise materials found unacceptable under the terms of a 1968 agreement on reciprocal imports of textbooks. Access to Turkish-language secondary schools is restricted by government insistence that entrance exams be given in Greek. In the current impasse, Turkish-language schools in Greece are considered inadequate to prepare students for a modern economy, while Muslim Greeks who study in Turkey complain that their professional credentials are not accepted by Greek professional bodies.

Muslim leaders complain about barriers to land purchases and discrimination in approval of building permits, business licenses, and many other permits. The Government insists that ethnic Greeks and Muslims receive equal treatment, though it acknowledges that widespread illiteracy in Greek among members of the minority hinders their access to the State's machinery. Muslim leaders complained in early 1989 that a major expropriation of chiefly Muslim-owned land for an agricultural prison had been decided upon without advance warning or consultation with the local population.

Efforts by other smaller ethnic/cultural groups to maintain distinct cultural identities are reportedly met with suspicion by security authorities. One dual U.S.-Greek national of Vlach ethnicity, who maintained property in Greece and published a Vlach-language publication in the United States, was stripped of his Greek citizenship without his knowledge in 1986 and in 1989 was expelled from Greece for "anti-Greek activities."

Some conservative elements of the Greek public adopt a critical view of the open exercise of unfamiliar religions. According to Jehovah's Witnesses' reports, supported by press accounts and official documentation, at least 40 families of Jehovah's Witnesses in Thessaloniki were systematically denied municipal documents needed for the exercise of their civil rights in 1989. Under pressure from the European Parliament, however, the municipality of Thessaloniki ceased this practice as of November 10. According to the Watchtower Society, all pending cases have been satisfactorily resolved.

Both the Constitution and the revised family law provide women the same individual, political, and social rights as men. Women's rights advocates agree that the legal protections for women are sweeping and progressive, though attitudes and social practice lag behind. The law mandates equal pay for men and women in equivalent jobs. Over the past decade the Government has made substantial progress in reforming marriage, divorce, and property laws, and has expanded services to women in unemployment, family planning, and child care.

GREECE

Women's rights figures say that Greece is comparable to other Western European countries in the incidence of violence against women, with no special pattern of abuse and a low rate of alcohol-related crimes. Rape, incest, and wife beating exists, but the nearly complete absence of reliable statistics makes exact comparisons impossible. The social infrastructure for battered women is almost nonexistent, despite past funding by the European Community, and police and local authorities have no training and little enthusiasm for intervening in domestic conflicts.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

All workers except the military and police are entitled to form or join unions of their own choosing. The right of association is provided for in the Constitution and in specific legislation passed in 1978 and amended in 1982. In 1988 an estimated 35 percent of wage and salary earners were organized in unions.

Unions receive most of their funding from a Ministry of Labor organization, the "Worker's Hearth," though a few unions have their own additional sources of funding. The Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) for some years has expressed concern that procedures for collecting union dues are not compatible with the provisions of ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association, which Greece ratified in 1962. Unions are highly politicized, with competing unions linked to political parties, but they are not controlled by the parties or the Government in their day-to-day operations. There are no constraints on service as a union official. Over 4,000 unions are grouped into regional and sectoral federations and 2 umbrella confederations for civil servants and for private sector workers. There are no restrictions on international contacts. Greek unions and federations are affiliated with the European Trade Union Confederation and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Some 250 to 300 strikes took place during the past year. The right to strike is restricted only by the Government's power of civil mobilization of workers when there is a danger to national security, life, or property, or to the social and economic life of the country. Although there were no reported abuses in 1989, the extent of the Government's powers is considered to exceed the standards of ILO Convention 87 by the Committee of Experts which has urged the Government to bring its legislation into conformity with the principles of the Convention. Employees in public services must notify employers of their intention to strike 4 days prior to the strike and must continue to provide certain basic services. Union leaders, particularly those of the stronger private sector unions, complain that a high percentage of labor agreements are reached through compulsory arbitration. Legislative remedies were discussed but not enacted in 1989. Security personnel (military, police, fire, port police) are prohibited from forming unions and from striking. Police personnel staged protests during 1989 against government efforts to prevent union organizing activities.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is ensured by legislation passed in 1955. Antiunion discrimination is prohibited. Complaints of discrimination against union members or organizers may be referred to the labor inspectorate or to the courts. Litigation is lengthy and expensive, however, and penalties for employers are seldom severe.

There are no restrictions on collective bargaining for private workers, though social security benefits, legislated by Parliament, are excluded from the process. Civil servants negotiate their demands with the Ministry of Interior but have no formal system of collective bargaining. Greece has no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is strictly prohibited by the Constitution and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for work in industry is 15. Additionally, legislation and regulations provide alternate minimum ages for work in specified areas or for specific jobs. For example, those performing loading or unloading work must be at least 18, while workers at the ports of Piraeus and Thessaloniki must be 21. In family businesses, theaters, and the cinema, the minimum age is 12 years. Enforced by occasional labor inspectorate spot checks, these age limits are generally respected. However families engaged in agriculture, food service, or merchandising often have younger family members assisting at least part time.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The minimum daily wage in Greece as of September 1989 was $16, sufficient for a decent standard of living. Minimum wages and salaries, established by the National Collective Bargaining Agreement and by branch collective bargaining agreements, are generally respected by employers. The workweek is 40 hours in the private sector and 37.5 hours in the public sector, and business hours are strictly regulated by the Government. The law mandates an annual paid holiday of 1 month per year and sets maximum limits on overtime.

Minimum standards of occupational health and safety are provided for by legislation. Although the Greek Confederation of Labor characterizes health and safety legislation as satisfactory, it charges that enforcement of the legislation is inadequate, citing the high number of job-related accidents. Enforcement reportedly suffers because of inadequate inspection, failure to enforce compliance with regulations, and outdated industrial plants and equipment. Complaints about unsafe working conditions are usually made anonymously.

HUNGARY

Hungary is undergoing an historic transition in which reform-minded Communists, now calling themselves Socialists, endorsed in 1989 the country's transition toward free, multiparty elections scheduled for March 25, 1990. The reform Communists abandoned the party's claims to a leading role in the State and established the Hungarian Socialist Party (HSP) to replace the Hungarian Socialist Workers (Communist) Party (HSWP) which dissolved itself. The Parliament adopted sweeping amendments to the 1949 Constitution, and the country's name was changed from the Hungarian People's Republic to the Republic of Hungary. Communists in 1989 had to retreat on fundamental issues, such as the legitimacy of opposition political parties; its paramilitary Workers Militia was disbanded.

The strong state security apparatus has been nominally detached from Communist party control. Its activities, less obtrusive in 1989, were opened to very limited public scrutiny for the first time. The Soviet Union in 1989 announced cuts in its military forces stationed in Hungary of some 20 percent, reducing them to about 55,000, and the Hungarian Army announced manpower reductions of 35 percent, to about 85,000. Eventual neutrality was accepted as a policy goal by reform-minded Communist party leaders.

The economy has structural problems headed by inefficient state industries, a $20 billion gross debt, which is Eastern Europe's largest per capita, and deficits in a government budget which consumes 63 percent of gross domestic product. The Government, which is committed to social tolerance as well as market reforms, must cope with widespread unhappiness over a high inflation rate (officially 16-17 percent). The Government was concerned that growth in unemployment and widening income differentials might trigger social unrest.

There was impressive practical and legislative progress in Hungary's human rights record throughout 1989. Hundreds of public demonstrations and opposition political meetings took place without police interference under the law on assembly adopted in January. The country took an important step in coming to grips with its Communist past as over 100,000 people took part in the June 16 public funeral services for Imre Nagy, Prime Minister during the 1956 Hungarian Revolution, and colleagues who were executed in 1958. Hungary stood out among Warsaw Pact members by acceding to the International Covenants on Human Rights as well as the 1951 U.N. Convention on the Status of Refugees and the 1967 Additional Protocol. The Government in 1989 dismantled the "iron curtain" border with Austria and courageously opened the border for over 50,000 East Germans to travel to the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) despite the provisions of an Hungarian-East German agreement and vociferous protests from East German authorities.

Under the new law on associations, the roster of new political parties swelled to about 50. Radio Free Europe opened its first East European office in Budapest in September. The Parliament in September passed a law significantly broadening freedom of speech. With the virtual withering away of the official press, the proliferating independent journals have become watchdogs against official abuses. In multiparty parliamentary by-elections, the first in over 40 years, the opposition Hungarian Democratic Forum won four clear victories over the HSWP. The State Office for Religious Affairs, a Stalinist vestige, was abolished, and negotiations were opened to restore full diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

HUNGARY

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There is no evidence that such killings occurred.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

No known instances of torture have occurred in Hungary in recent years. Citizens, in principle, may bring complaints against the police.

There are three levels of punitive incarceration: "workhouse," which allows some privileges such as visiting, outside work, and leave; "jail," which is more punitive; and "prison," which means a maximum-security penitentiary. With varying degrees of frequency, depending on levels of imprisonment, prisoners have rights to visitation by family members, other relatives, and friends. There does not appear to be systematic mistreatment of prisoners, and no such cases were reported in 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Hungary's legal system underwent considerable change in 1989 with the adoption of amendments to the penal code in September, which restricted the definition of "anti-State crimes" to offenses which threaten the political system in respect to the principles of the Constitution, or the independence or territorial integrity of the State. Attacks on leading officials are no longer accepted within the meaning of "anti-State crimes," and criminal proceedings may no longer be pursued against those who publicly urge a change in the political system.

Citizens are no longer subject to arbitrary arrest. The amended Constitution provides that any past victims of unlawful arrest or detention shall be entitled to compensation. Upon arrest, a detainee must be informed in writing of the offense he or she is suspected of having committed and may be held at a police station for a maximum of 72 hours before charges must be filed. There is no right of bail or provisional pretrial liberty. A Supreme Court ruling is needed to extend incarceration for over 1 year while criminal proceedings are in progress. No cases of police violation of arrest procedures came to light in 1989.

The new law on criminal procedure adopted by Parliament in September limits the issuance, extension, and withdrawal of orders for detention without authorization by magistrates, allows for the presence of defense attorneys during police questioning, and limits detention without charges to 1 month. The law limits the jurisdiction of military courts to members of the armed forces and border guards. Policemen must be tried in civil courts.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

HUNGARY

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for a Constitutional Court consisting of 15 members elected by Parliament. One-third of the 15 were elected by the current Parliament, and the remainder will be elected by the new Parliament. The Supreme Court exercises guidance over the Budapest, county, and local courts. No judge, member of the Supreme Court or Constitutional Court can be a member of a political party or engage in political activity.

The Constitution establishes the presumption of innocence until criminal responsibility is established. Trials are open. Defendants have a right to counsel at all phases of proceedings. Decisions of the courts, public administration, or other authorities that infringe on individual rights can be appealed. In general, judicial procedures are investigative rather than adversarial in nature. There is no trial by jury.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The amended Constitution provides for personal freedom, the protection of privacy, and the inviolability of domicile, but these provisions continued to be violated when the State believed that it was in its interest to do so. Search warrants are generally obtained. House searches are conducted by court order and must be carried out in the presence of two witnesses. A written inventory of items removed from the premises must be prepared.

Since the 1960's, Hungarian authorities have become more tolerant with respect to a person's private activities. Formal systems for gathering personal information, such as the widespread use of informers and block wardens and overt intrusions of the police into daily life, have been substantially curtailed. It is widely assumed, however, that the authorities tap private telephone lines and open correspondence when they wish to do so.

Parents are not discouraged from enrolling their children in religious instruction classes. Officially encouraged membership in political organizations ceased to be a feature of Hungarian life in 1989. Hungarian citizens' ability to receive foreign publications is effectively limited only by the need for hard-currency funds to pay for subscriptions, although new banking regulations make it possible for Hungarian citizens to maintain bank accounts denominated in Western currencies.

Hungary does not jam foreign radio broadcasts. Since the spring of 1989, accredited Radio Free Europe correspondents have regularly covered Hungarian events from within the country, and in September Radio Free Europe opened its first East European office in Budapest.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The latitude for freedom of expression expanded further in 1989. In October Parliament passed a law broadening freedom of speech. The Government and HSP have virtually no control over the press and diminishing influence over radio and television. The state media became increasingly free in 1989 to raise hitherto unreported issues, air opposition views, and criticize the Government. An independent press began to function. In December the Prime Minister announced he wanted to include a law ensuring freedom of the press in the current Parliament's agenda. In the meantime, supervisory boards for radio and television were established to select directors. The boards include representatives from major sectors of society, including opposition parties, and control of the national radio and television became major public issues.

The television programs A Het (The Week) and Panorama offer searching and relatively balanced examinations of current events which are close to West European network quality. Opposition spokesmen have frequently appeared in radio and television news broadcasts, although some opposition parties charge that they do not receive sufficient air time. The June 16 funeral services for former Prime Minister Imre Nagy were broadcast live and in full on Hungarian radio and television. Wide-ranging interviews were held on official television with the Czechoslovak Communist Party leader in 1968-69, Alexander Dubcek, and Romania's ex-King Michael, which complicated Hungary's relations with neighboring Czechoslovakia and Romania. Despite financial and practical obstacles, a virtually independent radio station, Radio Calypso, and a television station, NAP-television, were launched.

Scores of independent and semi-independent newspapers and periodicals were launched in Budapest and in several county seats, while some county councils continue to retain influence over provincial newspapers. Independent publications established with the support of major Budapest banks and state-owned companies include Mai Nap, Hungary's most successful and nominally independent daily paper, financed by, among others, the Hungarian Credit Bank, the Hungarian post office, and a major paper firm. British publishing magnate Robert Maxwell subsequently acquired 50 percent of the stock. Meanwhile, Australian publisher Rupert Murdoch purchased a stake in Reform, a weekly illustrated journal featuring news, political scandals, and sex.

By early 1989 censorship of the press and, to an increasing degree, radio and television was abandoned. Investigative journalism includes probing questions on officials' performance. From different ends of the political spectrum, conservative Communist officials as well as several opposition parties have expressed unhappiness with the editorial management of Hungarian television.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In January Parliament passed new laws on assembly and associations. The former provides that organizers of public gatherings must give at least 72 hours' notice and that assembly shall be unrestricted, with the condition that it "shall not result in any crime or call for committing crimes, and shall not harm the rights and freedom of others." Police may also move or alter the times of public meetings which would jeopardize the operations of legislative bodies or courts or seriously disrupt normal traffic flow. No actual permits are required.

Hundreds of demonstrations and opposition political meetings took place in 1989 without any recorded police interference. The first of the opposition demonstrations around Budapest was the March 15 national holiday commemorating the 1848

Revolution (which included a symbolic takeover of the Hungarian Radio-Television building), and the June 16 funeral ceremonies for Imre Nagy. Police also allowed a June 15 demonstration outside the Soviet Embassy chancery by 100 young people from the Young Democrats' radical faction and other groups calling for Soviet troop withdrawal from Hungary, as well as several processions by radical oppositionists during the summer along Budapest's Ferenc Munnich Street. The radicals objected to the street's name, derived from a conservative Communist prime minister, and sought to restore the former name with printed signs and paint. Although the sites of changed street signs included the back of the Interior Ministry building itself, police limited their response to charging two persons for defacing public property in removing the old street signs. For these gatherings, as well as the June 5 demonstration by young people outside the Chinese Embassy, organizers failed to provide the 72 hours' notice required by law, and police waived the requirement.

The new law on association provides that 10 or more people may establish associations (identified as "political parties, trade unions, mass movements, federated organizations, associations, or other organizations"). The law requires that exercise of the right of association "shall not commit or abet in committing a criminal offense and shall not disturb the rights and freedoms of others." Court registration is required on the basis of 10 or more founding members, the adoption of a constitution, and election of executive officers.

Although Parliament's adoption of the new law on parties came only in October, the list of declared political parties swelled throughout the year to about 50. Polls indicate that 6 of these have significant national support. Most of the 50 are opposition parties although some, such as the Ferenc Munnich Society and Workers' Marxist-Leninist Party, represent conservative Communist factions. The new parties may establish bank accounts, receive assistance from domestic and foreign nongovernmental sources, set up headquarters, field candidates in parliamentary by-elections, and conduct political campaigns. There have been no apparent efforts to restrict these parties' affiliations with international bodies or limit their contacts with foreign political parties. For example, the U.S. National Democratic Institute sponsored a seminar on political campaign strategies in September with attendance from a range of Hungarian opposition parties; political activists from the United States, Chile, the United Kingdom, Poland, and Yugoslavia took part.

While there were no reports of denials of registrations of private organizations during 1989, legal and bureaucratic obstacles continue to hinder the establishment of nonprofit foundations by private sector economic groups, trade unions, and political parties. Norms of accepted political activity remain uneven throughout Hungary, and it is still possible that activities which would pass without notice in Budapest could generate official sanctions in the countryside or in traditional Communist strongholds, like Miskolc.

HUNGARY

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of conscience and freedom of religious practice are affirmed in the Constitution, and Hungary's control over organized religious activities has virtually been lifted. Under opposition pressure, the Government abolished its State Office of Religious Affairs, a Stalinist vestige established in 1950 to regulate and control the activities of accepted religious denominations. In its place, the Government established the National Council of Churches, a consultative body chaired by the Prime Minister with the participation of denominational leaders.

The authorities are consulting with religious leaders on a new law governing church-state relations, scheduled for implementation in 1990. Although Communist party members and teachers were traditionally barred from religious activity, the HSWP Central Committee said in June that religious convictions were not incompatible with party membership. Despite the tolerant atmosphere, vigorous expression of religious beliefs can still inhibit a person's professional advancement in some fields.

All denominations willing to make minimal concessions to governmental authority are recognized in Hungary. They include the Roman Catholic Church, Hungarian Reformed and Lutheran Churches, the Jewish community, and, more recently, the Nazarenes, Islamic, and Mormon communities, and a small Hare Krishna sect. Recognition excludes the Jehovah's Witnesses, who on principle reject governmental authority.

Religious denominations generally have good access to religious materials, including Bibles and prayer books. The disposition of church possessions and properties seized in the late 1940's is under discussion, and some schools and other properties reverted to church control in 1989.

Church activities in education and social work are encouraged by the Government. An outstanding issue in church-state relations remains the thousands of so-called "basic communities"--small, countercultural, pacifist Catholic communities inspired by Piarist Priest Gyorgy Bulanyi. The "basic communities" have long operated in defiance of both the Government and the Catholic Church. In 1989 over 20 religious orders banned since 1950 were allowed to function again.

An important irritant in relations between the Hungarian Government and the churches--particularly the Protestant fundamentalist groups which affirm conscientious objection to military service--was removed in March when all 73 conscientious objectors then in jail were released. Alternatives to obligatory military service have been instituted for conscientious objectors.

For the first time since 1948, the reliquary hand of St. Stephen was carried in the procession around the Catholic Basilica in Budapest in services for St. Stephen's Day on August 20. During the Mass, Cardinal Paskai referred several times to his predecessor, Cardinal Mindszenty, who played a role in the 1956 Revolution, became a refugee in the American Embassy during 1956-71, and later died in exile. The Vatican announced the Pope's intention to visit Hungary in 1991, and the Prime Minister expressed readiness to begin negotiations to reestablish diplomatic relations between Hungary and the Vatican, which were severed in 1946.

HUNGARY

Reverend Billy Graham on July 29 addressed a capacity crowd of 90,000 at Budapest's People's Stadium. With the Government's agreement, Reverend Graham's address was announced with posters and newspaper and television advertisements.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

All adult citizens are issued an identity booklet which they should carry at all times. They must register with local police when moving from one locality to another. However, no permission is required for movement within Hungary, except to Budapest, where housing shortages have led the Government to restrict the number of new inhabitants.

Operation of the new passport law which came into effect on January 1, 1988 has made foreign travel available on demand to virtually any Hungarian. Hungarian passports are valid for 5 years from the date of issuance for travel to any country for a period of 90 days.

No cases were reported in 1989 in which a person was denied a passport for transparently political reasons, although passport issuance is withheld for cause, including pending legal actions. According to Interior Ministry statistics, 3,552,804 new "World Passports" were issued in 1988, with 8,205 refusals for all reasons, and 1,173,925 "World Passports" were issued in the first 6 months of 1989, with 4,945 refusals for all reasons. Hungarians have become travelers. According to tourist authority statistics, Hungary's 10.6 million citizens made 9.9 million trips abroad in the first 8 months of 1989.

In a new law on emigration and immigration, Parliament provided for the repeal of statutes mandating fines of up to $90 and denial of tourist passports for 2 years to those who overstayed their authorized 90-day periods abroad without seeking extensions from Hungarian consular officials abroad. Senior Interior Ministry officials stated in September that these sanctions were being waived pending formal entry into force of the new legislation. The new law establishes that it is the fundamental right of Hungarian citizens, for whatever reason, to emigrate from Hungary and return. The law limits emigration by persons who are facing criminal charges for crimes punishable by more than 3 years' imprisonment and other reasons, including possession of state secrets. This last provision may delay departure for 3 years from the date of ceasing to possess state secrets and, along with the other restrictions, is subject to appeal before a court.

The new law specifically guarantees the right of every qualified Hungarian residing abroad to resettle in Hungary. The authorities' recent behavior in this respect has been convincing. Visitors who took part in the June 16 funeral of Imre Nagy included numerous 1956 exiles headed by General Bela Kiraly whose forces fought against the Red Army. The criminal records of many who participated in the 1956 uprising have been expunged. There is currently no reason to expect that any group of returnees would face political persecution in Hungary.

Since early 1988, Hungary has given refuge to over 30,000 people from Romania, mainly ethnic Hungarians, although the recent flow has included substantial percentages of ethnic Romanians. A nationwide system administered by local authorities assists all refugees, including nonethnic Hungarians, to find jobs and housing.

In March Hungary became the first Warsaw Pact country to adhere to the 1951 U.N. Convention on the Status of Refugees and the 1967 Additional Protocol, which obliges Hungary not to expel or involuntarily repatriate refugees to countries in which they have a well-grounded fear of persecution. The last documented case of an official effort to repatriate refugees involuntarily to Romania was in January, and it involved three men who had repeatedly sought to cross the Austrian border illegally. The Prime Minister overruled the repatriation order. However, before Ceausescu's overthrow in Romania in December, undocumented reports persisted that Hungarian authorities on the Romanian border continued to repatriate involuntarily some would-be refugees on the basis of local decisions not subject to appeal. These were said to include some ethnic Romanians, Gypsies, unaccompanied minors, couples leaving minor children behind in Romania, and persons suspected of having been sent to Hungary by the Romanian secret police. Since December, the Hungarian Government has worked closely with the new Romanian Government in preventing members of Ceausescu's secret police from fleeing to Hungary.

During 1989 Hungary also began to receive a limited number of refugees from the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia. An office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) opened in Budapest in October in a major effort to assist the large numbers of Romanians present. On May 6, the Hungarian army began to dismantle the barbed wire and electrified fences of the "iron curtain" border with Austria. In September Hungary's commitment to the Helsinki Accords and the U.N. Convention on the Status of Refugees was demonstrated by the Government's decision to suspend the terms of a bilateral agreement with the German Democratic Republic (GDR) and open the Hungarian-Austrian border to over 50,000 East Germans who refused to return to the GDR voluntarily so that they could resettle in the FRG.

During 1989 the reform leadership of the nominally ruling Communist party (since October, the Socialist party) repeatedly committed itself to the transition to a democratic multiparty system. Hungary is no longer a recognizable one-party Communist state, and, if current trends persist, there will be further fundamental changes in the political system in 1990. Citizens may well be able, under the law, to change the system of government and their political leaders. Communists lost four multiparty parliamentary elections since July to Hungarian Democratic Forum candidates, Hungary's most influential opposition party.

In May the HSWP Central Committee stripped former secretary general (1956-1988) Janos Kadar of all party positions, including that of party president. In June it elected a four-member Presidium headed by party Chairman Rezső Nyers. In October the party congress voted to dissolve the party. Its successor, the Hungarian Socialist Party, excluded Karoly Grosz, former secretary general (1988-89) and prime minister, from its 24-member Presidium.

HUNGARY

Negotiations between the Government and Opposition Roundtable (a group of eight opposition parties) from June to September resulted in a limited accord clearing the way for multiparty elections. The September 18 document, signed by Rezso Nyers and Imre Pozsgay on behalf of the Communist party, concluded that the talks "served to create the political and legal conditions for peaceful transition, to develop a democratic constitutional state on the basis of a multiparty system, and to extricate the nation from its social and economic crisis." The opposition parties which signed the accord claimed important progress in securing the departure of party units from workplaces, reducing the Communist party's paramilitary Workers' Militia and bringing it under military control, and promoting the depoliticization of the military and judiciary. The Association of Free Democrats and the Young Democrats (FIDESZ) neither signed nor vetoed the accord because of objections to holding direct presidential elections before the multiparty parliamentary elections.

The Free Democrats and FIDESZ launched a campaign to hold a national referendum on November 26. The referendum confirmed overwhelming popular support for political changes already undertaken (e.g., withdrawal of party units from workplaces, disclosure of Communist party assets, and disbanding of the Workers' Militia), but only a razor-thin majority voted in favor of delaying the Presidential election until after the March 1990 Parliamentary elections.

Voting was compulsory until the 1960's and was subsequently officially encouraged, but low turnouts have been a feature of recent by-elections. Suffrage is universal, and election is by secret ballot. Polling places were monitored, and ballots were counted by local officials together with representatives of the Communist party and opposition parties.

Parliamentary elections take place every 5 years. Nearly 50 percent (176 of 386) of the members of the new Parliament will be chosen on the basis of individual local candidacies, with 152 chosen by proportional representation within each of the 19 counties and Budapest, and 58 chosen on the basis of national proportional representation. In elections based on individual candidacies, the winner must obtain a majority of votes from a 50-plus percent turnout or, failing that, a plurality from a 25-plus percent turnout in the second round.

In 1989 Hungary was not the subject of any resolutions, investigations, or other actions by international or recognized nongovernmental organizations dealing with human rights. However, Hungary cosponsored a United Nations human rights resolution calling for a special rapporteur for Romania to investigate the treatment of ethnic Hungarians in Transylvania.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

In theory and practice, Hungary is sensitive to the cultural aspirations of its recognized ethnic minorities. Schools provide instruction in the mother tongue, and varieties of ethnic expression are encouraged on a nondiscriminatory basis. A major reason for this policy is the hope of creating a "demonstration effect" which will indirectly benefit the millions of Hungarians living as minorities in adjacent countries.

Hungary has some 500,000 people, or about 5 percent of the population, who identify themselves as Gypsies. Although they are not recognized as an official minority, the Government has various programs designed to raise their standard of living and promote their absorption into the mainstream of Hungarian life. Gypsies are, on the average, considerably less educated and poorer than the majority Magyar population or the recognized ethnic minorities. Male Gypsy life expectancy--55 years--is 8 years below the national average for males. Half of Gypsy school-leavers fail to complete the minimum eight grades; Gypsies reportedly account for over half of Hungary's unemployed; and the crime rate is nearly twice as high among Gypsies as non-Gypsies. Media reporting of Gypsy issues makes clear that there is abundant popular prejudice against them and that they suffer effective discrimination in housing and jobs. Gypsies have established a number of rights organizations, including the Cultural Federation of Hungarian Gypsies, established in 1986.

The year saw an important revival of Jewish cultural life with the foundation of the Raoul Wallenberg Society, the Jewish Cultural Association, and the Iles Monus Association. The Jewish Cultural Association is a grouping of young Jewish intellectuals who are in opposition to the Jewish community's established leadership. The Iles Monus Association, named after a Jewish Social Democrat who died in a German death camp, seeks to cooperate with the political left in Israel, including trade unions, cooperatives, and kibbutzes.

Manifestations of anti-Semitic sentiments during the year were criticized by the Communist party and government leadership. Israeli leaders, including the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, visited Hungary in 1989, and in September Hungary became the first of the Warsaw Pact countries which broke diplomatic relations with Israel in 1967 to restore full relations.

Women enjoy the same legal rights as men and benefit from a good national system of child-care facilities. Inheritance and property rights of women are identical to those for men.

The women's movement is in its infancy. The first feminist group, a chapter of the Democratic Trade Union of Scientific Workers, was established in Szeged in September. According to Hungarian feminists, wife beating is common in society, especially among lower income groups. Husbands' sexual abuse of wives is not an acknowledged legal concept. Rapes are frequently unreported. There were 321 convictions for rape in 1988; the crime is a felony, and punishment is from 2 to 8 years' imprisonment or from 5 to 10 years in cases involving "criminal partnership."

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Legal norms and actual practice in the organization of trade unions continue to be in flux. The official trade union organization, SZOT, remains under pressure from several directions. As the traditional "conveyor belt" for securing worker compliance with central economic planning, SZOT remains the nominal representative of Hungary's 4.5 million actively employed persons through its 19 affiliated unions..

During 1989 it sought to refurbish its image as defender of workers' interests through means such as a national warning strike in August to protest a 6-percent meat price increase. The warning strike and similar tactics were denounced by the independent unions and characterized by reform Communist Prime Minister Miklos Nemeth as "social demagoguery." While SZOT's relations with the country's Prime Minister and other reform Communists are strained, the institutional links with the ruling party remain. SZOT remains affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

Hungary's first independent trade union, a grouping of scientific and technical workers (TDDSZ) formed in 1988, has been joined by democratic unions of teachers, film workers, teachers of the handicapped, ambulance drivers and pharmacists, railway workers, and building maintenance workers. Also, there are independent local unions of transport cooperatives (bus drivers), and a small blue-collar union, Workers' Solidarity, which has some 3,000 members.

These unions are independent of the Government, the Communist party, and SZOT. In April the Democratic League of Independent Trade Unions was formally established to coordinate the work of independent unions; representatives took part in the June-September negotiations between the Communist party and the Opposition Roundtable. Several SZOT branch unions and locals, including the official Film Workers' Union, work cooperatively with the independent unions. Together with the double-affiliated SZOT branch unions, Hungary's independent unions have over 40,000 members. They have contacts with Western Europe's Christian-Socialist unions, Poland's Solidarity, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and the World Confederation of Labor. Two of the independent unions have affiliated to an ICFTU-associated International Trade Secretariat (ITS), and there have also been contacts between SZOT branch unions and other ITS's. There is no legal impediment to these affiliations.

Strike legislation adopted by Parliament in March authorizes strikes if conciliation procedures have broken down. Strikes are excluded: if workers' complaints are under legal adjudication; if the objective is to alter a currently valid collective labor contract; or if the strike would "threaten life, health, bodily safety, or the environment in a direct and serious manner, or hinder disaster relief efforts." The law specifically authorizes solidarity strikes. The right to strike is denied to members of the judiciary, military personnel, and the police. In addition to the national warning strike mentioned above, several small-scale strikes occurred in 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The end of Hungary's system of centrally mandated wages became effective in January when the Government implemented a system of "interest coordination," in which labor and management negotiate specific wages in individual enterprises based on government suggestions, which are backed up with tax incentives. The new system thus provides for a limited element of collective bargaining. Managers have some flexibility in job categorization and in payment of allowances, which also gives importance to worker-management discussions in individual enterprises. There is some evidence that employers consult representatives of independent unions as well as those of SZOT in individual workplaces. While experience is lacking, there are no apparent safeguards against antiunion discrimination by employers against union members and organizers. The 1989 strike law rules out punitive measures against employees who take part in strikes. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Hungary took a step forward when Parliament in 1989 repealed the so-called Parasitism Statute of the penal code, which provided for sanctions against persons lacking visible means of support who were convicted of refusing to work twice within 2 years. Possible punishments included a year's imprisonment, reformatory work, a fine, or expulsion to another part of the country. More than 2,000 people were convicted under the Parasitism Statute in 1987. Gypsies were prosecuted under the law, but there was no evidence of its use against political dissidents.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 15 years. There are no reports of significant abuses.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Hungarian workplaces are obligated under law to provide workers with safe working conditions, a hot meal at heavily subsidized prices, and such pay-related benefits as overtime. The Government guarantees all Hungarians the right to 15 days of paid vacation per year and 1 additional day for each 3 years of service. The minimum wage is equivalent to $66 per month at the official exchange rate, which is not sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for a worker and his family.

The State in principle provides most workers with free education, health care, and pensions, but in reality the standard of such services is declining. The average official workweek is approximately 45 hours, although most Hungarians supplement their incomes by working after hours in cooperatives and private second jobs. Many must do so in order to provide a minimal standard of living for their families. The Government sets occupational health and safety standards, but safety conditions in Hungarian firms are not up to the standards of Western industrialized countries.

ICELAND

Iceland is a constitutional republic and a multiparty, parliamentary democracy. Its literate and educated people participate in high percentages in regular fair and free elections which determine the distribution of power among political parties and leaders. Freedom of the press and freedom of association are sacrosanct.

The civil and criminal justice systems offer equal protection to all. The nation has no indigenous military forces or political security apparatus.

Iceland has a mixed, open economy in which all of its citizens enjoy the right to hold private property.

Icelanders have long been strong defenders of human rights both at home and internationally, and the country has an exemplary human rights record.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political killings do not occur.

b. Disappearance

There were no instances of abductions or disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are all prohibited by law and do not occur in practice.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Due process is provided by law and observed in practice. The Icelandic Constitution states that any person arrested by the authorities must be brought before a judge without undue delay. The judge must, within 24 hours, rule whether the person is to be detained. Although the Constitution allows for the imposition of bail, no such condition is usually applied. Any judicial ruling by the judge may be appealed immediately to a higher court. Preventive detention is not practiced. There were no allegations of arbitrary arrest.

There is no exile. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Defendants may confront witnesses and otherwise participate in public trials, which are fair and free from intimidation. In addition, defendants are guaranteed the right to competent legal counsel of their own choice. In cases where defendants are unable to pay attorney's fees, the State does so. The courts are free of political control. Although the Ministry of Justice administers the lower court system, the Supreme Court carefully guards its independence and fairness. Juries are not normally used, but multijudge panels are common, especially in the appeals process. Due process is rigorously observed. There are no political prisoners.

ICELAND

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the Constitution and in practice, there is deep respect for the autonomy and rights of individuals. A warrant from a court is required for entry into a home except in cases of hot pursuit. Arbitrary intrusions by official entities, political organizations, or any other organized group into the private beliefs or personal liberties of individuals do not occur.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution expressly forbids censorship and other restrictions on the freedom of the press and a person's right to express his thoughts. Citizens and the media exercise this freedom extensively. Academic freedom of expression is vigorously exercised.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right to assemble unarmed, except when it is feared that such gatherings may cause riots. In practice, plans for public meetings are virtually never forbidden, and the authorities only rarely modify them.

In addition, the Constitution provides citizens the right to join together formally or informally to form associations without governmental authorization. A varied and wide spectrum of voluntary organizations plays a vital role in Icelandic politics and society. Icelanders are free to maintain international contacts.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Lutheran Church is the established church of Iceland and most citizens are nominally members, there is complete freedom for other faiths. A variety of both Christian and non-Christian faiths are allowed to proselytize freely. They may maintain ties with and receive support from coreligionists abroad. Religious affiliation is not a factor in political or economic life.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Icelanders have freedom to travel at home and abroad, to emigrate, and to return to Iceland at will. Refugees are never compelled to return to a country in which they would face persecution.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The political system is an open, fully functioning, parliamentary democracy in which voters freely choose the members of the Althing (parliament) who, in turn, make the laws of the land and determine the composition of the Cabinet. Parliamentary elections are held at 4-year intervals unless the Althing dissolves itself before the end of its full term. Voting in elections and membership in the various political parties are open to all citizens who are 18 years of age or older. Primary elections are used to select most Althing candidates. Multimember districts and proportional representation increase the chances for minority points of view to be represented. In addition, there is a strong cultural insistence on having the views of all significant groups represented in the Althing. Because no party gained a majority of seats in the April 1987 election, a three-party coalition government was formed in July 1987. This coalition broke up in September 1988 and was succeeded by a center-left Government comprising the Progressive Party, the Social Democratic Party, and the People's Alliance with Steingrímur Hermannsson of the Progressive Party as Prime Minister. The Citizen's Party joined the coalition on September 17, 1989.

No serious human rights violations have been alleged. In 1987, however, one Icelandier complained to the European Commission of Human Rights that it was a violation of his rights to have an official of the same agency which accused him of violating a traffic law also pass judgment on and sentence him (i.e., impose a monetary fine for speeding). The Commission determined that the case was admissible, but no further action took place in that forum pending discussions between the complainant and the Icelandic Ministry of Justice. Furthermore, a law will come into effect in 1992 that will transfer all judicial authority from local officials, who also serve concurrently as chiefs of police, to a new system of eight district courts.

Several human rights organizations are active in Iceland. The Government and populace support international efforts to improve human rights.

Iceland's ethnically homogeneous population is fiercely egalitarian and opposed to discrimination regardless of whether it is based on sex, religion, or other factors.

Violence against women, both physical and mental, occurs. The problem is not widely publicized, but the Women's List raises it periodically in political debate. A public women's shelter operates in Reykjavik and offers protection to approximately 200 women per year. Fifty percent of those who make use of the shelter cite alcohol abuse by their male partners as a contributing factor to the violence they suffer.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers and employers in Iceland make extensive use of the rights to (a) establish organizations, (b) draw up their own constitutions and rules, (c) choose their own leaders and policies, and (d) publicize their views. The resulting organizations are not controlled by the Government or any single political party but instead reflect the views of their members. Icelandic unions participate actively in European and international trade union organizations.

ICELAND

With the exception of limited categories of workers in the public sector whose services are essential to public health or safety (e.g., air traffic controllers), unions have possessed and used the right to strike under the law in Iceland for many years. However, the right to strike was abridged through February 15, 1989, after the Government promulgated a provisional law on May 20, 1988, intended to cool down the overheated economy (also see Section 6.b.).

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Over 90 percent of all eligible workers in Iceland belong to unions. There are no impediments to union membership in law or in practice. Virtually all unions utilize the right to bargain collectively on wages, working conditions, and related issues. Labor courts adjudicate disputes over labor contracts and over the rights and provisions guaranteed under the 1938 Act on Trade Unions and Industrial Disputes.

Under the provisional law of May 20, 1988, those unions which had not yet concluded labor contracts were prohibited from making agreements giving workers larger increases in wages and benefits than was provided under the contracts concluded prior to May 20. The provisional law, later amended, also set aside through February 15, 1989, any provisions of labor contracts which would have permitted workers to cancel or renegotiate these contracts in the event that the consumer price index exceeded the predicted levels (called red lines) on specified, quarterly dates. (Red line provisions are common in Icelandic labor contracts.) The Icelandic Federation of Labor (IFL) protested this law publicly and sent a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labor Organization (ILO) citing all three provisions as infringements of workers rights. After receiving the Government's position and views, the ILO found the Government's measures to be violations of bargaining rights, but nevertheless found them justifiable in view of the condition of the Icelandic economy.

On August 26, 1988, the Government promulgated another provisional law affecting many labor contracts. This law froze wages and prices through September 30, 1988. A third provisional law, promulgated on September 28, extended this freeze through February 15, 1989, thereby depriving most workers of two or more wage increases scheduled under existing labor contracts. The IFL publicly protested these laws.

There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not exist in Iceland.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The employment of children below the age of 16 in factories, on ships, and in other places which are hazardous or require hard labor is prohibited by law, and this prohibition is observed in practice.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Icelandic workers are protected by laws which effectively ensure their health and safety as well as guarantee them unemployment insurance, paid vacations, pensions, and reasonable working conditions and hours. Although there is no minimum wage law, union membership is so pervasive and effective that labor contracts, in effect, guarantee even the lowest paid workers a sufficient income to give them and their families decent living conditions. Food, shelter, health care, and education are all guaranteed without discrimination to those lacking adequate income because they are too old, too young, sick, or otherwise disadvantaged.

ICELAND

IRELAND

The Republic of Ireland is a parliamentary democracy with a long tradition of orderly transfer of power. Individual liberties and civil rights are guaranteed by the 1937 Irish Constitution and subsequent Supreme Court interpretations.

A civilian police force maintains public safety. Successive Irish governments have had to deal with the spillover into the Republic of violence from Northern Ireland. That violence led Irish authorities to adopt special legislation in 1984 granting the police increased powers to detain and interrogate those suspected of acts of terrorism. During 1989 Irish officials continued to apply such special legislation with restraint.

The Irish economy, based largely on free enterprise, has grown rapidly as a result of long-term policies of industrialization and diversification. It performed well in 1989 despite continued fiscal austerity and unemployment of about 17 percent. Exports were strong, and the budget deficit was reduced.

The Government and people of Ireland attach great importance to the observance and maintenance of human rights, both in theory and practice at home and abroad, and there were few, if any, reports of human rights abuses during 1989. Discrimination (and violence) against women remains a human rights problem.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In the past, politically motivated killings have occurred in Ireland as a spillover from the violence in Northern Ireland. In these cases, such groups as the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) or the Irish National Liberation Army (INLA) usually claim responsibility. In 1989 two such killings took place in the Republic's border area with Northern Ireland. The Government uses the full force of law to pursue and prosecute such cases wherever possible.

b. Disappearance

People are not abducted, secretly arrested, or held in clandestine detention by the Irish authorities.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment is respected in practice by the Government.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that a person shall be deprived of personal liberty only in accordance with the law. The same section of the Constitution provides for a judicial determination of the legality of a person's detention and requires in such cases that the arresting authorities make written explanation to the court about the person concerned. Neither in law nor in practice is anyone subject to arrest for the expression of political or religious views.

IRELAND

Short-term detention without charge exists but is restricted. It is permitted for a maximum of 48 hours in cases covered by the Offenses Against the State Act of 1939, legislation designed to "prevent actions and conduct calculated to undermine public order and the authority of the State." This legislation was reactivated in 1972 and broadened to include other "scheduled offenses" against peace and order. The police may now arrest and detain for questioning anyone suspected of any offense involving firearms, explosives, membership in an unlawful organization, or malicious damage to property. After the 48-hour period, the person must be brought before a magistrate, presented with written charges, and given legal representation.

The Omnibus Criminal Justice Act of 1984 gives some increased powers to the police in the area of detention for interrogation. Critics of the 1984 act have argued that those increased powers, which did not come into effect until 1987, following implementation of the companion complaints procedure, are out of proportion to the threat addressed and are unhealthy for democracy. Defenders of this legislation counter that two issues of human rights are at stake: the right of citizens to be protected against crime, along with the safeguarding of individual rights from abuse by police.

Neither incommunicado detention nor exile is used. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Fair public trial is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. A defendant has the right to legal counsel. The courts are independent, and jury trial is the norm. The Constitution provides, however, for the creation of "special courts" to deal with cases where the "ordinary courts are inadequate to secure the effective administration of justice, and the preservation of public peace and order." The Offenses Against the State Act of 1939 formally set up such courts and provided that they may try persons for offenses against national security, particularly cases of political violence perpetrated by terrorist groups likely to intimidate regular juries. Rather than having juries, these courts have panels of judges, each consisting of an uneven number of judges, but in any event not less than three. Their verdicts are by majority vote. Rules of evidence generally are similar to those of regular courts, except that the sworn statement of a police chief superintendent that the accused is a member of an illegal organization is considered prima facie evidence of such membership. Court sessions are usually public but may exclude certain persons, other than genuine press representatives. There is provision for free legal aid and appeal against conviction or sentence.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Though not specifically provided for in the Constitution, the basic human right of noninterference with personal privacy, family, and home is affirmed by the Supreme Court and generally observed. The Constitution, however, provides that the State shall enact no law "providing for the grant of the dissolution of marriage." A proposal to amend the Constitution to permit divorce in limited circumstances was overwhelmingly defeated in a 1986 nationwide referendum. In the same year, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the absence of divorce is not a breach of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and generally respected in practice. The State endeavors to insure that organs of public opinion, while preserving liberty of expression (including criticism of government policy), are not used to undermine public order, morality, or the authority of the State. Furthermore, "publication or utterance of blasphemous, seditious, or indecent matter" is an offense punishable by law.

Ordinarily, official censorship is directed largely toward pornographic material. Nonetheless, the state-owned radio and television network, on the basis of the constitutional provisions dealing with public order and the authority of the State, denies air time to members of a list of organizations including (Provisional) Sinn Fein, the legal political wing of the illegal Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA). In 1982 this prohibition was challenged before the Irish Supreme Court and upheld on constitutional grounds. All political parties not on the list are given access to both publicly owned radio and television facilities and major independent daily newspapers. Criticism of the Government in such media is allowed and it flourishes. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Certain terrorist organizations, such as PIRA and INLA, however, are illegal, and membership in them is an offense against national security. Political parties or groups associated with such organizations, such as (Provisional) Sinn Fein, are not proscribed.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Ireland is 94 percent Roman Catholic. The Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and there are no restrictions upon freedom of worship. Discrimination in employment, education, and other fields based on religious grounds has not been alleged. Some Irish laws, such as the prohibition against divorce, reflect the point of view of the majority of the population. The area of family law--including the rights of illegitimate children--is the subject of current debate in which minority religious communities have felt fully at liberty to take a vocal and active role.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is complete freedom of movement within the country, as well as freedom to engage in foreign travel, emigration, and voluntary repatriation. Irish authorities have accepted asylum-seekers only on a limited basis and firmly apply international definitions to those who claim refugee status.

IRELANDSection 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Ireland has enjoyed a consistent history of orderly transfer of power by elections since the end of the Irish civil war in 1923. The country has several political parties and provision for independents to stand for election to either house of the Irish Parliament. The constitutional requirement that elections be held at least every 7 years has always been met. Ireland uses a proportional voting system, and the secrecy of the ballot is fully safeguarded. There is universal suffrage for those over 18 years of age.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Irish governments generally cooperate with independent outside investigations of alleged human rights abuses, although they have not always been receptive to prisoners' rights groups. The Irish Council for Civil Liberties operates freely and without hindrance as the principal independent organization interested in domestic human rights issues.

Ireland has held the vice-chairmanship of the U.N. Human Rights Commission, reflecting concern by both the Government and people for worldwide respect for basic human rights. This concern is reflected as well in support for Amnesty International's activities in other countries.

Government social services provide adequate shelter, nutrition, health care, and education without regard to race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. People whose means are inadequate and who are not entitled to other benefits may receive pensions or other payments from public funds.

The Anti-Discrimination (pay) Act of 1974 and the Employment Equality Act of 1977 seek to provide protection and redress against sex and pay discrimination. Their operation is monitored by the Employment Equality Agency. The number of cases has fallen in recent years, but this has not been accompanied by real progress in eliminating the differential in the key index of average hourly earnings in industry. In June 1988, women's hourly earnings in the manufacturing sector were 67 percent of men's earnings.

According to women activists, violence directed specifically against women, including wife beating, is not acceptable in Irish society. Nevertheless, violence against women occurs, although its extent is not reliably known. Police frequently are reluctant to bring domestic problems into court, and women do not readily seek redress under the law for abuses committed against them. The women's movement continues to highlight family law, rape law reform, and social welfare discrimination as problem areas.

Section 6 Worker Rightsa. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to strike. There is no basic law governing trade union activities. The right to join a union is guaranteed by law, as is the right to refrain from joining. Most businesses (covering over 56 percent of the labor force) are unionized.

The Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU), which represents unions in both the Republic and Northern Ireland, has 81 member unions with 663,000 members. Both the ICTU and the unaffiliated unions are independent of the Government and of the political parties. The ICTU is affiliated with the European Trade Union Confederation.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Labor unions have full freedom to organize and to engage in free collective bargaining. Most terms and conditions of employment are determined through collective bargaining. As part of the industrial relations machinery, the Labour Court, consisting of an employer representative, a trade union representative, and an independent chairman, may investigate trade union disputes, recommend the terms of settlement, engage in conciliation and arbitration, and set up joint committees to regulate conditions of employment and minimum rates of pay for workers in a given trade or industry. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not exist. For a number of years, however, the Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has urged the Government to bring an 1894 merchant seaman's law, still on the books, into conformity with ILO Convention 105 on the Abolition of Forced Labor which Ireland has ratified. The Government has assured the Committee that the provisions in question regarding disciplinary measures for seamen have not been used in recent times and that steps are under way to amend the legislation.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 14 years with the written permission of the parents. Irish laws limit the hours of employment for 15-year-olds to 8 hours per day and 40 hours per week. Those from 16 to 17 years of age may work up to 9 hours per day and 40 hours per week. These provisions are effectively enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no general minimum wage legislation. However, some workers are covered by minimum wage laws applicable to specific industrial sectors, mainly those which tend to pay lower than average wages. The 1988 average weekly wage of $310 for production and transport workers was generally adequate to provide an acceptable standard of living. Working hours in the industrial sector are limited to 9 hours per day and 48 hours per week. Overtime work is limited to 2 hours per day, 12 hours per week, and 240 hours in a year. Four basic laws dealing with occupational safety provide adequate coverage. An extensive system of public health insurance offers health protection.

ITALY

Italy is a democratic multiparty republic with a parliamentary system of government. Parliament is directly and freely elected on the basis of universal adult suffrage. Executive authority is concentrated in the Council of Ministers, which is currently led by Prime Minister Giulio Andreotti from the Christian Democratic Party. The judiciary is independent of the executive. The Chief of State, the President, is elected by Parliament and representatives of Italy's 20 regions.

Terrorist violence of both the left and right has remained at low levels in recent years, due to the effective work of police and magistrates and its overwhelming rejection by the people as a whole. Although terrorism has yet to be completely overcome, its considerable reduction has freed increased law enforcement resources for the struggle against organized crime, which remains a serious problem.

Italy has an industrialized market economy ranking among the top 10 in the world in gross national product. It is characterized by sizable government ownership in the primary industrial sectors and by a dynamic private sector, comprising especially small and medium-sized companies.

In 1989 Italian citizens began to face directly the need to confront the problem of racism. The issues of violence against women and child abuse also were raised. The human rights situation in general was good, and the trend toward more openness in dealing with sensitive human relations problems may require new legislation.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Neither government forces nor legal opposition organizations engage in these kinds of killing, and there were none in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no cases of politically motivated disappearance or kidnapping.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture is provided for by law and respected in practice. Cruel and degrading punishment is forbidden by law, and cases of violations have been rare. There were no allegations of ill-treatment of prisoners during 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Police procedures are carefully controlled by law and judicial oversight. Arbitrary arrest is not practiced. Anyone detained by the authorities must be charged within 48 hours. In normal criminal cases, the permitted duration of pretrial detention varies according to the gravity of the crime. Under reforms passed in 1984, the maximum time that any person may be held in pretrial detention, even for the most serious crimes, is 5 1/2 years and no more than 2 years at each step of the trial and during the long appeals process.

ITALY

In September the Government issued a decree permitting the detention of persons convicted of Mafia-type organized crimes and crimes involving drug trafficking for an additional 6 months. This extension applies only to appeals, not to trials of first instance. The step was taken to avoid the release from prison of many convicts whose appeals were still pending after 2 years. In Italy, an appeal results in a new trial which must be completed within 2 years after the appeal is filed.

Lengthy pretrial detention remains a problem in Italy. As a safeguard against abuse, "liberty tribunals" are empowered to review evidence in cases of persons awaiting trial and to decide whether continued detention is warranted.

Exile as a form of punishment is unknown. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A fair trial is assured by law and observed in practice in almost all cases. Counsel is provided for the accused, free of charge if necessary. Trial procedures are often cumbersome, with the result that trials frequently last an inordinately long time. An "adversarial"-type trial system is to be implemented before the end of 1989. It is hoped that this system, similar to that in use in the United States, will result in speedier trials.

The judiciary is independent of the executive, and there are no political or security courts. All cases may be appealed to the highest appellate court, the Court of Cassation. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The concept of the privacy of the home is legally safeguarded and respected by the authorities. Searches and electronic monitoring may be carried out only under judicial warrant and in carefully defined circumstances.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Free speech and a free press are assured under Italy's democratic political system, which allows expression of a wide spectrum of political views. Although there is no censorship, publications may be seized for violation of obscenity laws or for defamation of state institutions. These powers are seldom invoked. Government-run radio and television are politicized at the administrative level but are open to widely differing views. A large number of private radio and television stations have been broadcasting since the early 1980's and providing competition for the state-owned broadcasting system. Public and private stations air vigorous debate on political and social issues.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Italian citizens are unhampered in exercising their right of free assembly, which is limited only in cases where national security or public safety is endangered. Permits are not required for meetings, but organizers of public demonstrations must notify the police in advance. Professional and employee associations organize and represent their constituencies freely. For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

People are free to profess and practice any religious faith. All religions are free to organize and proselytize within the limits imposed by the laws governing public order. The Government has reached agreements with some religious groups to define their rights and status.

Italy's relations with the Roman Catholic Church are governed by a 1984 agreement (Concordat) between the Italian Government and the Holy See, ratified in 1985. The agreement, which replaced the Concordat of 1929, recognizes the rights and place of Catholicism but no longer accords it the status of a state religion. The Roman Catholic Church continues informally to enjoy special standing in Italy because of the presence of the Vatican and because the overwhelming majority of Italians are, at least nominally, Roman Catholic. Starting in 1990, the clergy will be supported entirely by voluntary contributions instead of by a subsidy provided by the State. Roman Catholic religious instruction is offered in the public schools as an optional subject.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Italian citizens may travel freely both within the country and abroad. Emigration is unrestricted. Citizens who leave are guaranteed the right to return, and the Constitution forbids deprivation of citizenship for political reasons. Although it does not normally offer permanent resettlement to political refugees, Italy has provided temporary haven for many persons fleeing persecution who are eventually resettled in third countries. There were no cases of forced repatriation of political refugees in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Italy has a democratic, multiparty parliamentary system. Although the Constitution outlaws the Fascist party, a wide range of organized and active political parties exists from the far left to the far right of the political spectrum. Election campaigns are free and open, and voting is by secret ballot. The two chambers of Parliament and regional, provincial, and municipal councils are elected at regular intervals. Opposition groups are active and are frequently able to alter or reject government policies.

Nongovernmental organizations are free to investigate conditions in Italy, attend trials, and publish their findings.

The Government actively promotes human rights around the world and participates fully in various international human rights organizations, including the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

ITALYSection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

There is no legal discrimination on the basis of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion.

In 1989 there was an increase in race-related incidents involving persons of African origin residing, often illegally, in Italy. In one such incident, a black refugee from South Africa working as a migrant farm worker near Caserta, was murdered in the course of a robbery by a band of Italian youths. The case focused Italian Government and media attention on the problem of Third World immigrants living in Italy whose numbers have been growing rapidly over the past decade. The Government is contemplating immigration legislation which will limit entry of non-European Community residents into Italy.

Intolerance by northern Italians toward their fellow citizens from the south has also become more apparent during the past year, with the murder of a southerner vacationing in the north evidently motivated by such feelings. Discrimination based on race is deplored by the Government and by the great majority of Italians. In both incidents, the perpetrators were apprehended and prosecuted.

The condition of women in Italy has improved greatly over the past 20 years. Women participate freely in political and social life. Since 1963 it has been illegal to dismiss a female employee within 1 year of her marriage date except "for cause."

Women enjoy equal rights with men in marriage. In the event of divorce, a woman is entitled to a share of the survivor's pension and any inheritance in the event of the death of her ex-husband. The property of a married couple is considered community property unless husband and wife agree to keep their property divided. All assets acquired prior to marriage are exempt from the community property provision.

Violence against women and children became a major topic of governmental and media attention during 1989. Demands were made by women's groups for stiffer penalties against rapists; the Parliament is considering this possibility. Media attention was also focused on the subject of wife beating and child abuse. There are no reliable statistics available on the subject, however, since most incidents of this nature are not reported to the police. A telephone "hot line" service established in 1988 reported receiving 8,000 telephone calls during its first year from abused women throughout Italy.

German speakers in the Alto Adige region bordering on Austria have claimed for many years that they were discriminated against on the basis of language--particularly in legal proceedings and in the schools--and a recently enacted package of reforms is aimed at providing further protection for them. Italian speakers have complained that the new concessions to the German-speaking minority have in fact resulted in reverse discrimination. Italian speakers, who are a minority in many parts of the region, have claimed that they are discriminated against in obtaining housing and employment.

ITALY

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Workers' Statute of 1970 provides for the right to establish a trade union, to join a union, and to carry out union activities in the workplace. Trade unions are not government controlled, and the Constitution fully protects their right to strike, which is frequently exercised. In practice, the three major labor confederations have strong ideological ties to the three major political parties and perform certain services for the Government, (e.g., administering certain social welfare benefits), which compensates them accordingly. Moreover, the Workers' Statute favors the three confederations to the extent that it is difficult for small unions, including the so-called "base committees" (COBAS) to obtain recognition. This was a major issue in the numerous strikes called by the COBAS in 1989.

Overall, there was some increase in the number of hours lost to strikes during the year. However, the major cause was a 4-hour general strike in May called by the three confederations to protest government plans to increase health benefit contributions. Italian unions engage freely and actively in international trade union organizations.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right of workers to organize and bargain collectively is protected by the Constitution and is freely practiced throughout the country. Labor-management relations are governed by legislation, custom, collective bargaining agreements, and labor contracts. A key element of labor-management-government cooperation affecting the industrial relations climate has been the 1986 agreement on indexing wages (scala mobile) to the cost of living every 6 months. National collective bargaining agreements de facto apply to all workers regardless of union membership. Collective bargaining at the national level (involving the three confederations, the public and private employers' organizations and, where appropriate, the Government), occurs irregularly and deals with issues of universal concern, particularly the system of wage indexation.

Sectoral negotiations, involving national-level industry unions and employers' organizations, typically occur three times a year and set agreements covering all aspects of labor relations which apply to all workers, whether unionized or not. Voluntary, nonbinding mediation is provided by the Ministry of Labor and is often effective in bringing labor and management together. There are no areas of the country, such as export processing zones, where union organizations and collective bargaining are impeded or discouraged. The law prohibits antiunion discrimination by employers against union members and organizers.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor.

Forced or compulsory labor, which is prohibited by law, does not exist in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Under current legislation, no child under 15 years of age may be employed (with some specified exceptions). The Ministry of

ITALY

Labor, having consulted with the labor organizations, may, as an exception, authorize the employment on specific jobs of children over 12 years of age. The minimum age is 15 for men employed in dangerous, fatiguing, and unsanitary work, and 16 for men employed underground; in quarries, mines, and tunnels without mechanical vehicles; in weight lifting and carrying; in loading and unloading sulphur ovens in Sicily; and in occupations harmful to the workers' morale. No worker under 18 years may be employed in driving and pulling trucks and carriages, or in jobs for the manufacture, handling, and salvaging of explosives. Minimum age and compulsory education laws are effectively enforced.

No women, regardless of age, are permitted to be employed underground, in quarries, mines, or tunnels. Only women over 21 are allowed to work in dangerous, fatiguing, and unsanitary jobs, on the cleaning and servicing of engines, or on moving machinery.

Minimum work and safety standards are established by law and buttressed and extended in collective labor contracts. The Basic Law of 1923 provides for a maximum workweek of 48 hours--no more than 6 days per week and 8 hours per day. The 8-hour day may be exceeded for some special categories. Most collective labor agreements provide for a 36- to 38-hour week. Overtime may not exceed 2 hours per day or an average of 12 hours per week.

There is no minimum wage set under Italian law; basic wages and salaries are set forth in collective labor agreements. National collective labor agreements contain minimum standards to which individual employment agreements must conform. In the absence of agreement between the parties, the courts may step in to determine fair wages on the basis of practice in related activities or related collective agreements.

Basic health and safety standards and guidelines for compensation for on-the-job injury are set forth in an extensive body of law and regulations. In most cases, these standards are exceeded in collective bargaining agreements. Enforcement of health and safety regulations is entrusted to labor inspectors, an autonomous group within the Labor Ministry who have the same status as judicial police officers. Inspectors make periodic visits to companies to ensure observance of safety regulations. Violators may be fined or even imprisoned. Trade unions also play an important role in reporting safety violations to inspectors.

Despite these enforcement provisions, according to government statistics, the number of deaths from on-the-job accidents has risen from 1,704 recorded in 1985 to 1,905 in 1988. Part of the problem is an inadequate number of inspectors. There is also pressure on workers in southern Italy, due to high unemployment, to accept unsafe conditions as a necessary evil if they are to have a job. There are many substandard workplaces in Italy, especially in the south.

LATVIA

Latvia, an independent state between the two World Wars, was forcibly annexed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.) in 1940. The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Latvia into the U.S.S.R.

Like the other Baltic states, Latvia has been subjected to the same centralized rule, the same constitution and judicial system, and the same restrictions on civil and political liberties as in the Soviet Union. Political power has been exercised by the leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which has tightly controlled the activities of local government and Communist Party structures.

Since 1988 Latvians have seized greater control over their own affairs. Responding to mass public pressure demanding democracy and respect for human rights and following the example of the other Baltic states, the Latvian Supreme Soviet (parliament) adopted a "Declaration of Sovereignty" and constitutional amendment in July 1989, declaring that its laws took precedence over those of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet. In response to both the Latvian declaration and related developments in other republics, the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet Presidium voted on November 10, 1989, to instruct all 15 Republic Supreme Soviets to bring their laws into conformity with all-Union law and the Soviet Constitution. By the end of 1989, however, no action had been taken to enforce this declaration.

The primary law enforcement organization in Latvia is the militia (police). The powerful Committee for State Security (K.G.B.), special troops of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (M.V.D.), and the regular Soviet armed forces, which maintain a significant presence in Latvia, take orders from authorities in Moscow. Although K.G.B. surveillance of political and human rights activists is assumed to continue, there were few reports of human rights violations in 1989.

The standard of living in Latvia is higher than the Soviet average, but the margin is shrinking. Latvians resent the fact that much of their national income is transferred to other republics and that most major economic enterprises are controlled by central ministries in Moscow. They are also concerned about a continuing decline in the quality and quantity of food and consumer items. In July the Latvian Supreme Soviet adopted a plan for transition to economic autonomy to commence January 1, 1990. The U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet in November voted to grant Latvia control over its land, resources, banks, and a portion of state-run industry.

The human rights situation in Latvia continued to improve in 1989. The authorities tolerated public expression of Latvian national sentiment and independent political views which previously would have been repressed. For the first time since annexation by the Soviet Union, relatively free elections were held for representatives to the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies and local government councils (soviets). Most successful candidates were supported by the Latvian Popular Front, which declared at its second congress in October that its goal is an independent Latvian state. The Latvian Supreme Soviet on December 28 voted to repeal the constitutional provision giving the communist party the leading role in Latvia. Limited progress was made, both in Latvia and the Soviet Union, toward legislative reforms that would help to institutionalize human rights improvements.

LATVIA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known cases of political or other extrajudicial killing in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no known instances of permanent or prolonged disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In Latvia, as in the Soviet Union, harsh treatment of prisoners occurs during both interrogation and confinement in labor camps, prisons, or psychiatric hospitals. Physical and psychological abuse, as well as extremely unhealthful conditions, are common. Latvians remained concerned in 1989 about allegations that Latvian youths are subjected to brutal and degrading treatment in the Soviet armed forces, leading in some cases to physical injuries, psychological trauma, and even suicide.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Soviet laws are written so broadly that many people have been imprisoned for trying to exercise their basic human rights. In 1989, however, the authorities in Latvia rarely used these laws to arrest political activists.

In one exceptional case, several picketers were detained in Riga in March for violating rules on holding demonstrations and meetings. The detentions led to an outcry of protest from Latvian activists, and the picketers were soon released.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Despite provisions for judicial impartiality in both the Latvian and Soviet Constitutions, the State retains the ability to control the judicial process and arbitrarily determine the outcome of trials. Nominal safeguards, such as the right to a public trial and to a defense attorney, are not sufficient to guarantee fair trials when the accused are charged with political crimes. One law was passed by the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet to increase the independence of the judiciary. Other reforms to strengthen the rights of defendants have been proposed but not yet enacted. There were no known trials on purely political charges in 1989, and at year's end no Latvians were known to be in prison for purely political reasons.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government continued to interfere in personal life through the use of informers, monitoring of mail and telephones, and surveillance. Security police in 1989 did little, however, to intimidate Latvians or to hinder the rapid growth of social and political activism. Advocates of Latvian independence reported that overt surveillance of their movements declined in 1989. Contacts between Latvians and foreign visitors continued to be monitored, but at the same time the authorities facilitated a very considerable increase in such contacts.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Soviet Constitution provides for most internationally accepted political liberties on condition that their exercise does not run counter to the interests of the working class. In Latvia this notion continued to be interpreted more liberally in 1989 than it had been in early 1988. In addition, the Latvian Constitution was amended in 1988 to include the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as other internationally recognized human rights instruments, as "an inseparable part of the legal system."

Freedom of speech was widely respected in 1989. The authorities tolerated criticism of Soviet officials, demands for independence, and calls for the immediate withdrawal of Soviet "occupation" troops from Latvia.

The range of subjects covered by official Latvian media continued to grow. Print and electronic media highlighted the 50th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Nonaggression Pact between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany, together with the secret protocols that became the basis for the Soviet occupation and annexation of the three Baltic states. The Pact and protocols were reprinted in 1989 and widely circulated in the Latvian press, which also provided extensive commentary on the Soviet Union's 1940 occupation.

The Latvian media gave wide coverage to political campaigning in the elections for the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies and the December 10 local elections. They routinely presented the views of Baltic deputies to the Soviet Parliament, even when these views sharply contradicted those of the political leadership in Moscow. The media did not shy away, for example, from publicizing deputies' calls for the repeal of article 6 of the Soviet Constitution, which enshrines the leading role of the Communist Party in virtually all aspects of Soviet life. On December 28, the Latvian Supreme Soviet voted to remove mention of the leading role of the Communist Party in Latvia from the Latvian Constitution. Articles advocating the reestablishment of Latvian independence appeared in numerous publications. Official censorship was apparently used only to prevent the publication of military information that the Government considered (on grounds of alleged secrecy) too sensitive for public release.

Although most publications remain under the formal control of the Communist Party, independent journals are produced legally in Latvia by such organizations as the Latvian Popular Front, whose journal Atmoda claims a circulation of 165,000. Unauthorized publications (samizdat) were also produced and distributed without hindrance from the authorities. The opinions in such publications are increasingly expressed in the official press as well. A new draft press law, now under consideration by the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet, may ease restrictions on the right to publish such journals.

LATVIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The peaceful assembly of citizens is controlled by the authorities, who retain the power to prohibit public gatherings. Soviet guidelines on demonstrations and meetings are contained in a 1988 decree confirmed by the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet, but the Latvian Supreme Soviet adopted a more liberal version in 1989.

In practice, Latvians held frequent mass meetings and demonstrations, largely without hindrance from the authorities. Many such meetings took place on the anniversaries of historical events, the commemoration of which had been repressed in previous years. Leading Latvian Communist Party and government officials participated, along with Popular Front leaders, in public ceremonies attended by thousands of people, such as the March 25 remembrance of Latvians deported to Siberia in 1941. Hundreds of thousands of Latvians joined hands August 23 in a human chain that extended through Estonia and Lithuania as a sign of protest marking the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. Participants included members of the Latvian Popular Front and many other nonofficial organizations (e.g., the Latvian National Independence Movement) as well as leaders of the Latvian Communist Party and Government. An estimated 500,000 people participated in a peaceful rally in Riga on November 18, the independence day of the interwar Latvian Republic, which was celebrated in Latvia as a legal holiday for the first time since 1939.

The Latvian Constitution formally provides for the right to associate in public organizations, but this right has been circumscribed in the past by proscriptive laws and repressive practice. Throughout 1989, however, the authorities acquiesced in the rapid growth of both registered and unregistered clubs, professional associations, and other popularly based organizations. There were no reports of significant harassment against any of these groups.

A coalition of organizations, including the Latvian National Independence Movement and the human rights group Helsinki-86, undertook in 1989 to form Latvian Citizens' Committees and eventually to convene a Latvian Citizens' Congress. Latvian citizens were defined as persons who had been citizens of the Latvian Republic in 1940 and their descendants, as well as others who were committed to the independence of Latvia. Despite an official ban by the authorities, who feared that the Citizens' Committees would represent a form of parallel political power, well over 700,000 persons had registered without hindrance by late 1989.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Soviet Constitution provides for the right to profess, or not to profess, any religion. Both the party and Government, however, while promoting atheism continued to improve their relations with organized religion in 1989. Christmas was again celebrated as an officially sanctioned holiday (official recognition came only in 1988), and religious services were sometimes shown on television. High-level Latvian political leaders held widely publicized meetings with leaders of local religious communities, and there were no reports of significant church-state conflicts. State control of religion nevertheless continued to be formally governed by repressive 1929 Soviet legislation, as neither the U.S.S.R. nor Latvian Supreme Soviet adopted a new law to guarantee freedom of conscience.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is neither guaranteed by law nor fully respected in practice, although Soviet officials have publicly pledged to bring their legislation into conformity with international standards. The right to emigrate by choice is not recognized by Soviet law, and persons wishing to leave temporarily are generally required to present an invitation from abroad. Some Soviet Jews in Latvia were denied permission to emigrate in previous years, but the upsurge in Soviet Jewish emigration has had a positive effect on Jewish emigration from Latvia as well.

Although travel abroad is limited by restrictive legislation and arbitrary enforcement, bureaucratic procedures are considerably less cumbersome in Latvia than in the Soviet Union as a whole. For the second consecutive year, there was a dramatic increase in the number of Latvians visiting the United States and other Western countries, including leading figures in the Popular Front and groups favoring immediate Latvian independence.

Until 1989 the peoples of Latvia and the Soviet Union had not been free to change government leaders or the system of government. For the first time in postwar Latvian history, however, representatives to the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies (the federal legislature) and to Latvia's local government councils were chosen by secret ballot on the basis of universal suffrage in relatively free multicandidate elections, in which over 70 percent of eligible voters participated.

As in the other Baltic states, alternative parties could not formally participate in the Latvian elections, but nominating procedures were sufficiently flexible to permit nomination of candidates from a wide political spectrum. There was no evidence of manipulating the registration process against opponents of the existing regime. Most successful candidates campaigned with the active support of the Latvian Popular Front, which was able to nominate candidates on its own authority in the local elections. Latvian Popular Front representatives won 26 of 34 contested seats. In heavily Russian districts, however, successful candidates included conservative party leaders.

Helsinki-86 and some other proindependence groups refused to take part in elections to fill seats in the legislature of an "occupying power," but some leaders of the Latvian National Independence Movement did participate. They gained significant media coverage but were not successful in defeating the First Secretary of the Communist Party, as they had hoped.

Elections to the Latvian Supreme Soviet are scheduled for March 18, 1990.

LATVIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Soviet Government has adopted a more forthcoming approach to foreign criticism of its human rights record in recent years, acknowledging that human rights are a legitimate subject of official diplomatic contacts. Although there were few allegations of human rights violations in Latvia in 1989, the Latvian Government generally welcomed foreign and nongovernmental observers on any subject.

Discrimination on the basis of race, sex, or other grounds is prohibited by the U.S.S.R. Constitution. Tensions between ethnic Latvians and Russians are always near the surface, however. A low Latvian birthrate and an official policy of encouraging ethnic Russian settlement in Latvia has lowered the ethnic Latvian proportion of the population to approximately 52 percent. In 1989 these tensions were expressed in heated debates over a number of issues. Ethnic Latvians continued to complain that they could not always conduct business in their own language, that immigrants from the Soviet Union receive favored treatment in the provision of housing and other social services, and that nonresidents frequently visited Latvia in order to shop in the Republic's relatively well-stocked stores.

The Latvian Supreme Soviet adopted a detailed language law requiring that people holding certain specified management and service positions be bilingual and providing Latvian language training for those incumbents who are not. Regulations were issued to prevent nonresidents of Latvia from purchasing goods which are in short supply, and economic measures to control immigration were adopted in 1989. Work also continued on a law to define the criteria for Latvian citizenship.

Ethnic Russian and other Russian-speaking residents of Latvia were generally concerned by the Latvian language law and proposals for a citizenship law, fearing that they could be disenfranchised or in some other way converted into second-class citizens.

While major ethnic tensions in Latvia divide the Latvian and Russian populations, most ethnic groups, including Russians, have formed officially recognized cultural societies which work closely with the Latvian Popular Front on proposals to enhance their cultural autonomy.

Over the past 10 years, discrimination and persecution has been directed against Latvians who sought to express their national and cultural identity, against independent political and religious activists, and against Jews and Pentecostals wishing to leave the country.

Women nominally enjoy the same legal rights as men. Under the Constitution, they are accorded the right to participate as equals in all spheres of Soviet life. An extensive system of day-care service and maternity benefits assists women in obtaining and retaining jobs. Equal pay for men and women in the same job has been the rule since World War II.

LATVIA

Latvian statistics on the problem of violence against women, including wife beating, are unavailable. The official Soviet press in 1989 discussed the issue, and the Council of Ministers established a special branch (headed by a woman) to study the problems of women. Human rights and women's rights groups in Latvia are aware of the issue but have focused their efforts thus far on the broader question of independence and freedom.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Soviet labor law and practice have generally been enforced in Latvia. There has been no right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization. Although the Constitution grants Soviet citizens the right to form trade unions, attempts to exercise this right independently of the state-controlled union had always been repressed. New professional associations with no ties to Moscow and an independent "Latvian Workers' Union" were created in 1989, but it is not yet clear whether they will effectively exercise trade union functions.

The Latvian press reported a few brief strikes. There were no reports of repressive actions against strikers in 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Legislation governing collective bargaining and organizing is pending in the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet. To date, workers in Latvia generally have not been able to organize or resort to collective bargaining. There are no economic incentive zones. Virtually all workers in the Soviet Union automatically become members of an affiliate of the official Soviet trade union organization, the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, in order to be entitled to government social welfare benefits.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Soviet law contains no prohibition on forced or compulsory labor. Most prisoners are confined to camps where they are forced to labor, often under harsh and degrading conditions.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The statutory minimum age for employment of children is 16. There is no indication of widespread violations of this norm.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor conditions are similar to those in the Soviet Union. According to the Soviet State Statistical Committee, the average monthly wage in Latvia for blue- and white-collar workers in September 1989 was $410 and for collective farm workers $402 at the official exchange rate. The minimum monthly wage in the U.S.S.R. was $140. (The ruble is not a convertible currency, and its value here in terms of the U.S. dollar does not represent actual purchasing power for international purposes.)

The average workweek is 40 hours for most white-collar workers and 41 hours for most blue-collar workers. Soviet law establishes minimum conditions of health and safety. Press reports suggest, however, that the laws on maximum hours of work and health and safety standards are widely ignored.

LITHUANIA

Lithuania, the largest of the three Baltic states, was an independent state between the two World Wars. It was forcibly annexed by the Soviet Union in 1940 as a constituent republic of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.). The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Lithuania into the U.S.S.R.

Like the other Baltic states, Lithuania has generally been subjected to the same centralized rule, the same constitution and judicial system, and the same restrictions on civil and political liberties as in the Soviet Union. Political power has been exercised by the leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which tightly controlled the activities of local government and Communist Party structures in Lithuania. Since 1988 Lithuanians have taken advantage of liberalization in the Soviet Union to seize greater control over their own affairs. Responding to mass public pressure demanding political democracy and respect for human rights, the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet (parliament) adopted a "Declaration of State Sovereignty" and constitutional amendments in May 1989, declaring that its laws superseded those of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet. In response to both the Lithuanian declaration and related developments in other Republics, the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet Presidium voted on November 10 to instruct all 15 Republic Supreme Soviets to bring their laws into conformity with all-Union law and the Soviet Constitution. By year's end, however, no action had been taken to enforce this declaration.

A commission of the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet approved a report which characterized the 1940 incorporation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union as illegal. The Supreme Soviet also repealed the constitutional provision which provided for the "leading role" of the Communist Party, paving the way for a multiparty political system, and the Lithuanian Communist Party declared itself to be independent of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Two competing political parties, the independent Lithuanian Communist Party and the Lithuanian Democratic Party, were officially registered by year's end.

The primary law enforcement organization in Lithuania is the militia (police), the officers of which are predominantly Lithuanian. The powerful Committee for State Security (K.G.B.), special troops of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (M.V.D.), and the regular Soviet armed forces, which maintain a significant presence in Lithuania, can be assumed to take orders from authorities in Moscow. Although K.G.B. surveillance continues, there were few reports of human rights violations in 1989 by the security and military apparatus.

The standard of living in Lithuania is higher than the Soviet average, but the margin is shrinking. Lithuanians resent the fact that much of the national income they create is transferred to other republics and that most major economic enterprises are controlled by central ministries in Moscow. They also complain about a continuing decline in the quality and quantity of food supplies and consumer goods. In May the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet adopted a plan for a transition to economic autonomy to begin on January 1, 1990, with future relations between the Lithuanian and Soviet economies to be based upon mutually acceptable agreements. The U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet in November voted to grant Lithuania control over its land, resources, banks, and a portion of state-run industries.

LITHUANIA

The human rights situation in Lithuania improved markedly for the second year in a row in 1989. As in the latter part of 1988, the authorities tolerated public expressions of Lithuanian national sentiment and independent political views which previously had been repressed. For the first time since annexation by the Soviet Union, relatively free multicandidate elections to the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies were held. The Lithuanian Popular Front, Sajudis, a mass, prodemocratic organization, swept the elections after declaring that its goal is to restore the independence of Lithuania. Limited progress was made, both in Lithuania and the Soviet Union, toward legislative reforms that would serve to institutionalize human rights improvements.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known cases of such killings in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no known instances of permanent or prolonged disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In Lithuania, as in the Soviet Union, harsh treatment of prisoners occurs during both interrogation and confinement in labor camps, prisons, or psychiatric hospitals. Physical and psychological abuse of prisoners, as well as detention under extremely unhealthful conditions, are common. Lithuanians remained concerned in 1989 about allegations that Lithuanian youths are subjected to brutal and degrading treatment in the Soviet armed forces, leading in some cases to physical injuries, psychological trauma, and even suicide.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Soviet laws are written and interpreted so broadly that persons may be arrested and convicted for trying to exercise their basic human rights. During 1989, however, the authorities in Lithuania did not use these laws to arrest political activists.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Lithuanian Communist Party and Government in the past frequently subverted constitutional provisions for the objectivity and independence of the judicial process. Procedural safeguards, such as the right to a public trial and to a defense attorney, are generally respected but are not sufficient to guarantee fair trials. Reforms to strengthen the rights of defendants have been proposed but were not implemented in 1989. There were no known trials on purely political charges in 1989, and no Lithuanians were known to be imprisoned for purely political reasons at year's end. Many Lithuanians were juridically rehabilitated in 1989 following judicial review of cases in which they had been convicted on political charges in previous years.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Through the use of informers, monitoring of telephones and mail, surveillance, and other means, government authorities have the ability to interfere in every aspect of personal life. Constitutional provisions to the contrary, Soviet investigative agencies do not abstain from forced entry and illegal searches. The security apparatus did little, however, to intimidate Lithuanians or to hinder the virtual explosion of social and political activism which began in 1988 and continued in 1989. Advocates of Lithuanian independence reported that obvious surveillance of their movements declined in 1989. Contacts between Lithuanians and visitors from foreign countries continued to be monitored, but the authorities facilitated a very considerable increase in such contacts during 1989. Although many Lithuanians continued to assume that telephones and mail were monitored, they exhibited little fear of using them to express their views.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Soviet Constitution provides for most internationally accepted political liberties on condition that their exercise does not threaten the security of the Socialist system. In previous years, the authorities had interpreted all such constitutional guarantees to fit the convenience of the State. Vague Soviet laws prohibiting "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" and "anti-Soviet slander," which had frequently been used in previous years to punish Lithuanian political and religious activists, were replaced in 1989 by a more limited provision which specifically prohibits calls for the "violent overthrow" of the Soviet system.

In 1989 freedom of speech was widely respected. The authorities tolerated public expression of virtually any viewpoint, including criticism of Soviet officials and support for total Lithuanian independence. Approximately 1.6 million Lithuanians signed a petition which called for the withdrawal of Soviet "occupation" troops from Lithuania. In the fall over 1,000 young Lithuanians tore and burned their draft letters to underscore their refusal to serve a 2-year conscription term based on a provision of the Geneva agreement of 1949 that an occupying army may not forcibly conscript the men of the occupied territories. Display of Lithuanian national symbols, such as the prewar flag, which had been repressed until mid-1988, was extremely widespread and officially sanctioned in 1989.

The range of subjects covered by official Lithuanian television, radio, and publications continued to expand in 1989. Print and electronic media devoted considerable attention to the 50th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Nonaggression Pact between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany, together with the secret protocols that became the basis for the Soviet occupation and annexation of the three Baltic states. The Pact and the protocols were widely republished by Lithuanian papers, which also extensively described the Soviet Union's 1940 occupation.

LITHUANIA

Lithuanian media provided extensive information about the positions of candidates in the spring elections for the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies, and they regularly reported on the views of the Baltic deputies to the Soviet parliament. These views frequently differed from those of the political leadership in Moscow. The Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party issued a harshly critical statement on August 26 about the Baltic opposition movement's failure to curb "extremist" and "separatist" forces. Nevertheless, the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet on December 4 voted to replace the provision in its Constitution which provided for the "leading role" of the Communist Party with one legalizing political parties and organizations.

While self-censorship was exercised in varying degrees by individual editors and journalists, no political subject remained off-limits in 1989. Articles advocating the reestablishment of Lithuanian independence appeared regularly in state-supported publications. Official censorship was apparently used only to prevent the publication of such "state secrets" as operational military information.

Despite the open nature of the Lithuanian press, most publications remained under the formal control of the Communist Party or other official organizations. Dozens of independent publications were also produced legally by Sajudis and some other nonofficial organizations. Unauthorized (samizdat) publications appeared without hindrance from the authorities, but the opinions in such publications were increasingly available in the official press.

In Kaunas a university has been established which is independent from Republic or all-Union educational ministries, and the Republic's Academy of Sciences is urging complete independence from Moscow.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The peaceful assembly of citizens is controlled by the authorities, who retain the power to prohibit public gatherings. Soviet guidelines on demonstrations and meetings are contained in a 1988 decree confirmed by the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet.

In practice, the people of Lithuania were allowed to hold mass meetings and demonstrations without hindrance from the authorities in 1989. Many of these meetings took place on the anniversaries of historical events, commemoration of which had been repressed as recently as 2 years ago.

The Presidium of the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet declared that February 16, the independence day of the interwar Lithuanian Republic, should be officially commemorated as the "Day of Restoration of Lithuanian Statehood." Lithuanian Communist Party and government leaders participated along with the representatives of Sajudis and the Lithuanian Liberty League and religious leaders in public ceremonies attended by tens of thousands of people to mark the event.

Hundreds of thousands of Lithuanians joined hands with Latvians, Estonians, and others on August 23 in a 2-million-person chain that extended from Tallinn, Estonia, through Riga, Latvia, to Vilnius, Lithuania, as a sign of protest marking the 50th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact.

LITHUANIA

The Lithuanian Constitution provides for the right to associate in public organizations, but this right had been limited in previous years by legislation and repressive practices. While continuing to exercise a measure of control over mass organizations associated with the Communist Party, the authorities have acquiesced in the rapid growth of Sajudis as well as many other independent clubs, professional associations, and organizations which refer to themselves as "political parties." There were no reports of significant harassment against any of these groups. Even the official Communist youth organization, the Komsomol, decided in June to break all its official ties to the central Komsomol organization in Moscow. The Lithuanian Communist Party in December declared itself independent of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. An emergency session of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) Central Committee plenum met in December to discuss Moscow's reaction to the Lithuanian Communist Party vote. As 1989 closed, the CPSU Central Committee plenum had decided to send a high-level delegation to Lithuania in early 1990, but further action was not taken.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor Unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Soviet Constitution provides for the right to profess, or not to profess, any religion, both the party and Government promote atheism. The authorities continued to improve their relations with organized religion in 1989. Christmas was celebrated as an officially sanctioned holiday for the second consecutive year, and All Saints' Day was also celebrated for the second time since 1940. The Lithuanian Catholic Church began to publish a monthly journal on official printing presses, and religious television programming began to be shown on a regular weekly basis. The Lithuanian Catholic Church also gained greater control over the selection, training, and appointment of priests, which had previously been the subject of considerable government interference. Top Lithuanian political leaders held highly publicized meetings with leaders of the Republic's religious communities. Some church property, including churches, chapels, and monasteries, has been returned to the church. A second seminary was allowed to open.

State control of religion nevertheless continued to be formally governed by repressive 1929 Soviet legislation, as the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet has not yet adopted a new law to guarantee freedom of conscience. The Lithuanian Supreme Soviet, however, in November amended its Constitution to guarantee freedom of thought, profession of religion, and the independence of church organizations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is neither guaranteed by law nor fully respected in practice, although Soviet officials have publicly pledged to bring their legislation into conformity with international standards. The right to emigrate by choice is not recognized by Soviet law, and persons wishing to leave temporarily are generally required to present an invitation from abroad. Many Soviet Jews in Lithuania were denied permission to emigrate in previous years, but the upsurge in Soviet Jewish emigration has had a positive effect on Jewish emigration from Lithuania as well.

Although travel abroad is limited by restrictive legislation and arbitrary enforcement, bureaucratic procedures are considerably less cumbersome in Lithuania than in the Soviet Union as a whole. For the second consecutive year, there was a dramatic increase in the number of Lithuanians visiting the United States and other Western countries in 1989. Leading figures in all the main political movements, including Sajudis and other groups favoring Lithuanian independence, visited Western countries to present their views.

The number of visits by Lithuanian-Americans, other emigres and persons of Lithuanian background to Lithuania rose dramatically for the second consecutive year, with many visitors permitted to travel to areas formally "closed" to foreigners, although some Lithuanian-Americans have still been denied visas.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Until 1989 the peoples of Lithuania and the Soviet Union had not been free to change government leaders or the system of government. For the first time in postwar Lithuanian history, however, representatives to the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies (the all-Union legislature) were chosen in 1989 by secret ballot, on the basis of universal suffrage, in relatively free multicandidate elections.

Although alternative parties could not formally participate in the Lithuanian elections, nominating procedures were sufficiently flexible to permit nomination of candidates with a very broad range of political views. In Lithuania, unlike many areas of the Soviet Union, there was no apparent manipulation of the candidate registration process to exclude "troublesome" candidates from the ballot. Of 42 seats, 36 were won by candidates, including some Communists, endorsed by Sajudis, and the remaining 6 were retained by Communist Party leaders. While many Communist Party leaders were elected or reelected to their posts, others--including the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of Lithuania--were defeated. Most successful candidates campaigned with the active support of Sajudis, which voluntarily withdrew its front-running candidates to allow the election of the party's two top leaders.

The spring elections to the U.S.S.R.'s legislature were boycotted by the Lithuanian Liberty League and some other proindependence organizations, which opposed participation in elections to the legislature of Lithuania's "occupying power." Participation in the elections was nevertheless very high--over 80 percent. Although the Lithuanian Parliament and Government were not democratically elected, in 1989 they were frequently responsive to the sentiments of popular movements and the general public. Draft laws were circulated and amended on the basis of public debate, parliamentarians frequently voted on the basis of their constituents' expressed interests, and the agenda for government action was heavily influenced by Sajudis, a leader of which--Kazimiera Prunskiene--was appointed as a Deputy Prime Minister in 1989. A commission of the Supreme Soviet condemned the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact and characterized the Republic's incorporation into the Soviet Union in 1940 as illegal.

LITHUANIA

Multicandidate elections to the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet were scheduled to be held on February 24, 1990.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Soviet Government has adopted a more forthcoming approach to foreign criticism of its human rights record in recent years, acknowledging that human rights are a legitimate subject of official diplomatic intercourse. Although there were few allegations of human rights violations in Lithuania in 1989, the Lithuanian Government generally welcomed foreign and nongovernmental observers on any subject. Its decision to allow eight Lithuanian-American activists to visit Lithuania for the February 16 Independence Day ceremonies, however, was apparently overruled by Moscow, and their visa applications were denied. At the end of 1989, a subsequent application by a member of this group was again denied, as were the applications of other American activists.

The Government did not interfere with the activities of various independent human rights groups in Lithuania, including those led by such former political prisoners as Helsinki Final Act monitor Viktoras Petkus. The last person regarded by most of these groups as a Lithuanian political prisoner, Boleslavas Liziunas, was pardoned and freed in 1989.

Discrimination on the basis of race, sex, or other grounds is prohibited in the Constitution. The relative homogeneity of Lithuania's population, its strong sense of national identity, and the binding force of the Lithuanian Catholic Church have helped to preserve many of the country's social and cultural traditions. Nevertheless, the disruptive effects of an antireligious ideology, forced collectivization, and a policy of industrialization have been severe. Lithuanians complain that immigrants from the Soviet Union receive favored treatment in the provision of housing and other social services and that nonresidents frequently visit Lithuania in order to shop in the Republic's stores.

Regulations were issued to prevent nonresidents of Lithuania from purchasing goods which are in short supply, and economic measures to discourage immigration were adopted by major Lithuanian cities in 1989. The Lithuanian Supreme Soviet adopted a law granting Lithuanian citizenship to virtually all permanent residents of the Republic, while providing stringent requirements for new immigrants to become citizens.

Among non-Lithuanian residents of Lithuania, about 20 percent of the population (mostly Poles and Russians), there has been some concern about the rise of Lithuanian nationalist sentiment in 1988 and 1989. Some non-Lithuanians formed organizations known as "Yedinstvo" (Unity) and the "Committee to Defend Soviet Power," ostensibly to oppose discriminatory and separatist tendencies among Lithuanians. Members of these groups claimed, for example, that a newly adopted Lithuanian language law was discriminatory against residents of Russian and Polish background.

Local government councils of two predominantly Polish districts in Lithuania declared themselves to be "autonomous" in 1989. This step was criticized and rejected by the central Lithuanian authorities.

Most ethnic groups have formed officially recognized cultural societies which work closely with Sajudis on proposals to enhance their cultural autonomy. A law to protect the rights of national minorities was adopted by the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet in November.

Over the past 10 years, discrimination and persecution has been directed against Lithuanians who sought to express their national and cultural identity, against independent political and religious activists, and against Jews and Pentecostals wishing to leave the country.

Women nominally enjoy the same legal rights as men, and an extensive system of day-care service and maternity benefits assists women in obtaining and retaining jobs.

Lithuanian statistics on the problem of violence against women, including wife beating, are unavailable. The official Soviet press in 1989 discussed the issue, and the Soviet Council of Ministers established a special branch (headed by a woman) to study the problems of women. Human rights and women's rights groups in Lithuania are aware of the issue but have focused their efforts thus far on the broader question of independence and freedom.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Soviet labor law and practice has generally been enforced in Lithuania. There has been no right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization. Although the Constitution grants Soviet citizens the right to form trade unions, attempts to exercise this right independently of the state-controlled union had always been repressed. New professional associations and an independent "Lithuanian Workers' Union" with close ties to Sajudis were created in 1989, but it is not yet clear whether they will effectively exercise trade union functions.

Soviet authorities permitted the travel to the United States of a member of the Soviet Congress of People's Deputies, who is the leader of an independent union in Lithuania, in order to attend the convention of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

A few brief strikes were reported in the Lithuanian press in 1989. There were no reports of repression against strikers.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers in Lithuania have not generally been able to organize or resort to collective bargaining. There are no economic incentive zones or special industries in which labor standards differ from those elsewhere in Lithuania. Virtually all workers in the Soviet Union automatically become members of an affiliate of the official trade union organization, the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, in order to be entitled to government social welfare benefits.

LITHUANIA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Soviet law contains no prohibition on forced and compulsory labor. Most prisoners are confined to camps where they are forced to labor, often under harsh and degrading conditions.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The statutory minimum age for employment of children is 16. There is no indication of widespread violations of this norm.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor conditions in Lithuania are similar to those in the Soviet Union. According to the Soviet State Statistical Committee, the average monthly wage in Lithuania for blue- and white-collar workers in September 1989 was $396 and for collective farm workers $282 at the official exchange rate. The minimum monthly wage in the U.S.S.R. was $140. (The ruble is not a convertible currency, and its value here in terms of the U.S. dollar does not represent actual purchasing power for international purposes.)

The average workweek is 40 hours for most white-collar workers and 41 hours for most blue-collar workers. Soviet law establishes minimum conditions of health and safety. Press reports suggest, however, that the laws on maximum hours of work and health and safety standards are widely ignored.

LUXEMBOURG

Luxembourg is a constitutional monarchy and parliamentary democracy. The Grand Duke is the Chief of State, but his duties are mostly ceremonial. Real power rests with the 12-member Government, headed by the Prime Minister and responsible to Parliament, which receives its authority through free and fair elections.

The police and gendarmerie maintain internal order. Both organizations are under the control of the Government and respect human rights. The country is free from strife, and residents enjoy fair and efficient judicial and penal systems.

The Grand Duchy is a highly developed, industrialized state with a free enterprise economic system and a high standard of living.

Luxembourg continued its commitment to human rights in 1989. Individual human rights are ensured by the Constitution and protected in practice, and Luxembourg actively promotes human rights internationally. It continues efforts to treat its relatively large foreign population fairly and to engage labor unions in the industrial decisionmaking process.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Politically motivated killings did not occur.

b. Disappearance

There were no known abductions or hostage-taking cases.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law and does not occur.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Due process is provided by law and observed in practice. Luxembourg law is a composite of local practice, legal tradition, and foreign systems--French, Belgian, and German. Except in cases of hot pursuit, a warrant must be obtained from the judiciary before an arrest may be made. Any person detained by the authorities must be charged and appear before a judge no later than 24 hours after arrest. Immediate access to a lawyer of one's own choosing is accorded by law. No one is held incommunicado. Bail may be granted, depending on the circumstances. Preventive detention does not exist, but persons may be incarcerated pending trial, if so ordered by a judge. Exile is not imposed.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Luxembourg's judiciary is independent and free from executive or military interference. Due process is ensured. Military courts exist, but civilians are not subject to their jurisdiction. The right of defendants to have legal counsel, at public expense if necessary, is assured. Charges are formally and clearly stated. Defendants have the right to be tried in public, to confront witnesses, and to present evidence. They are presumed innocent until proven guilty. Verdicts may be appealed by either the defendant or the State. An appeal results in a completely new judicial hearing, and sentences may be increased as well as reduced. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Luxembourg law and customs are based on regard for personal freedom. The State, political organizations, and other entities do not arbitrarily intrude into the private lives of Luxembourg residents. Police must have a warrant, issued by the judiciary, to enter a private home. Statutes prohibit other violations of the home such as demolition, and the sealing of doors and windows. Wiretaps are not legal.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and the press, which is respected in practice. Except for restrictions on pornography, there is no censorship of the media. The broadcast industry is privately owned, except 4 percent which is indirectly controlled by the French Government. The industry operates independently from the Luxembourg Government. The print media are privately owned and controlled. Academic freedom is respected.

While not limiting free speech, a rarely used law contains a provision which may reduce public debate on a given issue. It provides that a law may be promulgated by the Grand Duke after certain bodies (the Chamber of Commerce, the Council of State--a parliamentary consultative body made up of representatives of all elements of Luxembourg society--and the appropriate committee of the Chamber of Deputies) have given their opinions on a report which has been submitted by the relevant minister(s) and approved by the Cabinet. This procedure avoids a parliamentary debate and was used in 1989 to pass a law clarifying bank secrecy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is assured constitutionally and respected in practice. There are no limitations on orderly public meetings. All groups enjoy the right of free assembly, and permits are routinely issued when required.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Luxembourg, and one may freely practice the religion of one's choice, including: maintaining places of worship, training clergy, publishing religious material, providing religious education, and participating in charitable activities. Statistically, 90 percent of the residents are Roman Catholics.

LUXEMBOURG

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within the country (including changing residence or workplace), foreign travel, or emigration and repatriation. Refugees are treated fairly, and they are not forced to return to countries in which they fear they would be persecuted.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The citizens of Luxembourg have the right and ability to change their government peacefully. All Luxembourg citizens 18 years of age and older may participate in national elections, held every 5 years, and in local elections, held every 6 years. Voting is by secret ballot with multiple candidates for most positions. Luxembourg's large foreign population (26 percent) does not have the right to vote, but it may exert considerable influence on the political process indirectly by joining labor unions or other organizations. Representative bodies, including Parliament, are free to debate and vote against the Government. Opposition groups, including political parties, function openly and freely, without fear of government repression.

There were no requests for the investigation of human rights abuses.

Luxembourg has consistently supported international and nongovernmental investigation of alleged human rights violations.

Discrimination based on the above factors is prohibited by law. Adequate food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion.

Equal pay for equal work is mandated by law. Women and men enjoy the same property rights. Property acquired during a marriage is divided equally upon dissolution of the marriage, unless a prenuptial agreement exists which stipulates how property is to be divided. Family members are protected by law.

Violence against women is not widespread, and it is not tolerated by the Government. Wife beating is prohibited by law. Several women's rights groups are active in Luxembourg, including those which aid battered women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely, choose their own representatives, publicize views, and determine their programs. Slightly more than 50 percent of the labor force is unionized. Membership is not mandatory. The two largest industrial unions are linked to, but organized independently of, Luxembourg's Socialist Party and Christian Social Party. With the exception of government workers who provide essential services, all workers have the right to strike. Government workers who may legally strike must observe certain conditions, such as a cooling off period, before implementing their action. Strikes are rare, however, and there were none in 1989.

Unions are free from government interference and maintain unrestricted contact with international bodies in their fields. Luxembourg unions maintain affiliation with the European Trade Union Confederation and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Constitution ensures freedom of union activity and protects union leaders and members from discrimination. Unions have the right to organize and bargain collectively on behalf of their members, and this right is applied uniformly throughout the country. Worker representatives are required in all businesses of 15 or more employees. In businesses with over 150 employees, 50 percent of the joint works councils are elected by the employees. In businesses with more than 1,000 employees, one-third of the membership of the boards of directors must be employees or their elected representatives. An effective system exists to hear and adjudicate employment-related complaints.

There are no export processing zones, and labor law and practice apply uniformly throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not exist in practice.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The employment of children under the age of 15 is prohibited. Children are required by law to remain in school until they are 16 years old. Child labor and education laws are strictly enforced. Adolescent workers (ages 15 to 17) are provided special protection by law, such as limiting overtime and specifying the number of hours which may be worked continuously.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Luxembourg's health and safety standards are among the highest in the world. A safe working environment is mandated by law and enforced throughout the country by a stringent inspection system, which may impose severe penalties. Pregnant women who work receive special consideration in the workplace. The normal workweek is 40 hours, spread over 5 days. Premium pay is required for work outside the normal workweek. Work on Sunday is generally prohibited, except in certain circumstances, such as continuous process industries (steel and chemical), and for certain workers such as maintenance and security personnel. All workers receive a minimum of 5 weeks of paid vacation a year, in addition to paid holidays. The minimum wage is $4.50 per hour for all workers 18 years of age and older. Younger workers receive a lower minimum wage. This is $2.70 per hour for workers 15 years old. The minimum wage increases annually until the worker is 18. A supplement is added for workers with dependents. It would be difficult to support a family on the minimum wage. However, few workers receive the minimum wage, and Luxembourg wages are among the highest in the world.

MALTA

Malta is a constitutional republic and parliamentary democracy. Executive power is vested in a president who appoints as prime minister the leader of the party which gains a plurality of seats in the quinquennial elections for the unicameral legislature. The two major political parties reflect widely divergent political views. After 16 years of Labor Party rule, the election in 1987 brought the Nationalist Party to power with a one-seat majority in Parliament.

Law enforcement and internal security are the responsibility of the Malta police under the command of a civilian commissioner. The Deputy Prime Minister, who is also Minister of Justice, has jurisdiction over the police. A specially trained riot police, the Special Assignments Group (SAG), forms part of the regular police force. Human rights, a subject included in the curriculum of the police academy, are generally respected by the police force.

The Maltese economy is a mix of state-controlled and private firms. Malta is heavily dependent on its ability to export and on tourism. Foreign private investment in export-oriented, light manufacturing industries is being actively promoted, and the Government is also developing Malta as a center for offshore business activities.

Constitutional protection for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual is upheld by an independent judiciary. The current Maltese Government is strongly committed to human rights. Women encounter a degree of culturally based inequality. In 1989 the National Council of Women complained publicly about discrimination against women in the newly enacted dual citizenship law.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No known incidents of political killing occurred.

b. Disappearance

No cases of disappearance are known to have occurred.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were accusations by the opposition party against the police for using excessive force in controlling unruly crowds on two separate occasions during the year. Measures for prison reform taken in 1989 included training wardens and providing higher wages and better working conditions for prison guards. The Government announced its intention to bring the penitentiary system "up to European standards."

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention is provided for in the Constitution and is generally respected in practice. Police officers above the rank of inspector may issue arrest warrants without court order. The police may, on the basis of reasonable suspicion, arrest a person for questioning. Within 48 hours, persons so arrested must be brought before the court and charged or released. There is no right to legal counsel during this 48-hour period. Persons incarcerated pending trial have access to counsel, and periodic hearings are mandatory. Provision for bail exists. While previously the granting of bail to defendants accused of murder and crimes against the security of the State was prohibited by law, the Constitutional Court in April, acting on an appeal filed by three persons charged with attempted murder, ruled that the criminal code was in violation of the European Convention on Human Rights. The court decreed that judges may now exercise their discretion on whether to grant bail or not, and remanded the cases to the lower courts. The Constitutional Court in another case ordered two police officers to pay a citizen compensation for an illegal arrest and detention which occurred in 1983.

MALTA

There are no known cases of incommunicado detention or political exile. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution requires a fair public trial before an impartial court. Recommendations to reform the Constitution and to strengthen both the independence and peer review of the judiciary are under review by political parties and the public.

Defendants have the right to counsel of their choice, at public expense if necessary. They enjoy a presumption of innocence, may confront witnesses and present evidence, and have the right of appeal. The courts' jurisdiction is limited in certain areas. Lay tribunals (e.g., the Industrial Tribunal, the Commissioners for Justice, and the Inheritance Partition Tribunal) have exclusive authority over certain judicial functions, although their independence is not legally guaranteed. Defendants in cases before the Industrial Tribunal or the Public Service Commission may not be represented by lawyers.

Maltese criminal law has on several occasions in the past year been challenged in the Constitutional Court for not conforming to certain provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights. In every instance the court has ruled in favor of the appellants. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Protection of the privacy of the home is ensured in the Constitution and generally respected in practice. Search warrants may be issued, on reasonable suspicion of crime, by public officers above the rank of inspector, without a court order. In a 1989 decision in a case against a former parliamentary Secretary for Housing dating back to 1974, the Constitutional Court ruled that the requisition order and eviction of the complainant from his home had violated his constitutional rights. The court ordered payment of compensation.

Political party membership and participation is voluntary. However, there is strong societal (family, employment) pressure for affiliation with particular parties.

Electronic surveillance is prohibited by law. However, prompted by the opposition's charges that wiretaps were being unlawfully used against it, the Minister of Justice said he would introduce legislation permitting the Government to use wiretaps in exceptional circumstances when state security was threatened.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of expression (speech and press) is protected by the Constitution and generally respected in practice. The only exception is the 1987 constitutional amendment which bans foreign participation in local politics (e.g., guest foreign speakers sponsored by a political party) during the period prior to an election.

The broadcast media (television and radio) are state owned. During 1989 opposition viewpoints received prominent, frequently extensive, coverage on a par with coverage provided to the Government, irrespective of news value, although both majority and opposition political parties complained of bias in news coverage. A constitutionally mandated Broadcasting Authority exists to ensure impartiality in broadcasting, and a parliamentary select committee has reported on ways to strengthen the broadcasting authority.

Ten privately owned daily, weekly, and monthly newspapers freely express partisan views. Several newspapers are associated with political parties. Academic freedom generally is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of peaceful assembly is ensured in the Constitution. In 1989 police permits were routinely issued for political meetings and other public activities of political parties or groups of citizens. On two occasions during the year, violence erupted, prompted by longstanding animosity and polarization between the two leading political parties. The first incident occurred during a wedding in an opposition party stronghold attended by prominent government officials, where opposition party adherents proceeded to attack the wedding party. The second instance was in connection with ceremonies and festivities on March 31, the day which the opposition party claims as Malta's independence day. On both occasions, the Special Assignments Group (SAG) was called in to control the crowd and particular individuals' violent behavior. Some people were affected by the tear gas and injured by police batons. The opposition party later accused the SAG of police brutality and of using excessive force.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The right to practice the religion of one's choice is protected constitutionally and is respected. The overwhelmingly dominant religion is Roman Catholicism; small numbers of people practice other religions. State subsidies are granted only to Catholic schools. In the state schools, students have the option at some stage to opt for religious instruction in the Catholic faith.

MALTA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within the country, foreign travel, or emigration. In July a law was enacted enabling returning Maltese emigrants, who have acquired the citizenship of another country and resided abroad for a minimum of 6 years, to hold dual citizenship. The law does not apply to children of emigrants nor to women who left Malta to marry a foreigner and obtained the citizenship of their husbands.

Foreign nationals claiming refugee status while visiting Malta generally are not permitted to remain in Malta but are allowed to stay until settled in a third country. The Emigrants' Commission, established in 1987 as the local representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), has worked well in providing assistance and counseling for refugees until they are accepted by the UNHCR.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Malta is a parliamentary democracy in which the incumbent Nationalist Party and the opposition Malta Labor Party dominate public life. Political activity is often intense, and partisan feelings can be very pronounced, heated, and polarized. Elections with universal suffrage, in which all parties participate freely, are held every 5 years. During the 1987 election, 96.11 percent of those registered actually voted.

The Government places no restrictions on investigations by international human rights groups. It is strongly committed to human rights and is active in international human rights forums. Several local human rights groups and persons interested in promoting and protecting human rights operate freely.

Maltese citizens have a legal right to housing, employment, and education on a nondiscriminatory basis. In practice, however, there is discrimination in employment, the provision of public services, and the granting of import licenses based upon political party affiliation and extended family ties. In conformance with its election campaign pledge to obtain redress for individual injustices incurred under the previous government, the present Government set up a commission shortly after its election in 1987 to probe alleged injustices brought to its attention. Because of its heavy workload, another two commissions were added in 1989 to investigate injustices with respect to appointments of public officers, granting of licenses permits and government contracts, and provision of public services.

For reasons derived from tradition and culture, Maltese society has only recently begun to associate women's rights with human rights. There are laws on equal opportunity and equal pay for equal work, but discrimination occurs. Job advertisements may specify whether the positions are for men or women. The low rate of participation of women in the work force can be partly attributed to a tax structure which discourages married women from working. As of January 1990, however, a new tax law will eliminate the tax disincentive for married women.

Married women lose entitlements and seniority personally acquired (retirement, health benefits, social security) upon marriage. Legally, the husband is head of the family unit with dominant responsibility for economic and financial questions, as well as all major decisions concerning children. Married women can own businesses and hold checking accounts only with the consent of their husbands. They must be represented by their husbands in business or financial litigation. This inequity has been challenged by women's organizations, among others the Commission for the Advancement of Women, which was formed in collaboration with the Government in March. The Commission has drafted a new family law aimed at eliminating the inferior status and discriminatory treatment of women, which it hopes the Government will act upon. The Government has responded by setting up a Secretariat for the Equality of Women within the Ministry of Social Policy, which will monitor legislation relating to women and draw up initiatives leading to the equality of women. Married women are also discriminated against in the recently enacted dual citizenship law (see Section 2.d.). The National Council of Women has complained to the Government and threatened to take its case to the European Commission of Human Rights.

There are no laws specifically prohibiting abuse of women. A church refuge for battered women exists and is partially supported by the Government. In 1989 the Government increased its contribution to the refuge. A privately organized association of battered women also exists.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right, respected in practice, to associate freely and to strike. The only groups restrained from striking are the uniformed personnel of the armed forces and the police. In 1989 there were 23 trade unions registered in Malta representing over 51 percent of the work force. The General Workers Union (GWU) and the Union Haddiema Maghqudin are the two largest unions. The GWU has been institutionally tied to the Malta Labor Party since 1978, and it has participated in the Labor Party Government. The other labor unions are independent of political parties, and the current Government encourages the development of free trade unions without party affiliation. Maltese unions belong to a variety of international trade union groupings.

There were occasional sporadic strikes of short duration during 1989, most of them politically motivated. Under the Industrial Relations Act of 1976, the responsible minister may refer disputes to the Industrial Tribunal for binding settlement, in effect limiting the right to strike. In 1989 the Committee of Experts of the International Labor Organization (ILO) asked the Government to take the necessary measures to bring this legislation into conformity with ILO principles. It also noted with satisfaction the efforts made by the Government to refund the salaries of worker-students involved in a teachers' strike in 1984.

MALTA

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers are free, in law and in practice, to organize and bargain collectively. Voluntary worker-employer negotiations and collective bargaining are encouraged by the current Government. The 1976 Act provided for the creation of a joint negotiating council for the public sector, but this has not yet been formed.

According to the Industrial Relations Act, an employer may not take action against any employee because he or she belongs to a trade union. Complaints may be addressed through a court of law or an industrial tribunal composed of one member each named by the employer, union, and the Government. Complaints of discrimination may also be lodged with the Commission against Injustices which was set up in 1987.

There are no export processing zones in Malta.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is constitutionally prohibited and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children younger than 16 years may not legally be employed. This injunction is generally respected and enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The legal minimum wage in Malta in 1989 was $86.65 per week. The minimum wage is generally enforced. Given government subsidies in housing, health care, and free education, the minimum wage provides a basic standard of living.

Maximum hours of work are regulated by wage council orders for various trades. For most sectors, the maximum is 40 hours per week, but in some trades the maximum allowable is 43 or 45 hours per week. Government labor regulations prescribe daily rest periods of 1 hour. Annual paid vacation according to law is currently 22 working days.

Occupational safety standards and health regulations, especially in the dockyards and construction sectors, are being reviewed and updated. The Government is in the process of organizing the recently established authority for workers' health, safety, and welfare, which will be responsible for educating workers and enforcing occupational safety standards; enforcement heretofore has been lax. Following two serious occupational accidents, one of which resulted in death, the Department of Labor took legal action against the employers.

THE NETHERLANDS

The Netherlands is a constitutional monarchy with a parliamentary legislative system. Executive authority is exercised by a council of ministers representing the governing political parties. A bicameral parliament, in which the full range of the political spectrum is represented, is selected through nationwide proportional voting.

The police and security organs are effectively subordinated to the executive and judicial authorities.

The Dutch have a mixed free market economy with extensive involvement by governmental entities. The Netherlands has a complex social welfare system providing a high level of social benefits.

The Dutch attach great importance to human rights in their foreign and domestic policies. The principal internationally recognized rights are protected by Dutch law and widely respected in practice by both the State and the general public.

The press, public interest groups, and both domestic and international human rights organizations are quick to challenge practices which they believe violate established human rights norms. Such complaints characteristically receive a full airing in the media, through the judicial process, and in Parliament.

There are no significant differences in human rights practices between the Netherlands proper and the autonomous regions of the Kingdom: Aruba and the five-island Netherlands Antilles.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Killing for political motives by government or domestic political groups did not occur.

b. Disappearance

Abductions, secret arrests, and clandestine detention by police or other official security forces did not occur.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel or inhuman punishment are prohibited by law and did not occur in practice.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Preventive detention is permitted only in times of emergency, upon declaration, for a limited time, by national or municipal authorities. The practice of preventive custody is frequently used in drug smuggling cases.

Under normal circumstances, a person may be held no longer than 6 hours, or 9 if the arrest was made at night, unless charges are brought. Persons suspected of having committed serious crimes may be held in custody for 48 hours without charge with the agreement of the public prosecutor, who is also authorized to decide on an extension of another 48 hours. Any further decision on extending detention is made by an investigating judge. In January the Netherlands was criticized by the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg for holding suspects in custody up to 4 days and 9 hours without access to a judge. The Court considered the Dutch practice a violation of the European Convention on Human Rights which guarantees arrested persons "immediate" access to a judge. The Dutch Justice Ministry is currently investigating how its procedures may be brought in line with the Court's verdict. Search and arrest warrants issued by the judiciary are required in most criminal cases.

Forced exile from the Netherlands is unknown. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Defendants have the right to counsel, and a system of free or low-cost legal assistance exists for those unable to pay. Charges must be formally stated. The judiciary is independent. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A judicial warrant is required to enter a person's home or to monitor private communications. The State respects individual freedom of choice in family matters.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. Dutch media policy allocates broadcasting time to a wide range of social and political groups, ensuring that minority viewpoints are heard. There are no prepublication restraints on any media, but there exists a broad social understanding which precludes the mainstream media from disseminating sensitive information involving national security, defense, or the royal family. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are effectively unrestricted. Permits are required from local governmental authorities for large-scale assemblies and for demonstrations of a political nature. Permits are granted on a routine basis but may be denied when authorities believe that "public order and safety" cannot be guaranteed as a result of a rally or demonstration. Membership in, or the formation of, organizations is not impeded by the Government except under exceptional circumstances.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

THE NETHERLANDS

c. Freedom of Religion

There is full freedom of religion. State subsidies in the educational field are provided to religious organizations which maintain educational facilities. The subsidy is granted on a fixed per student basis to both parochial and nonparochial educational institutions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of domestic and foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. Due to the Netherlands' shortage of housing in its major cities, there are some restrictions on the allocation of government-subsidized housing.

The Netherlands has elaborate procedures for deciding asylum applications, designed to give full respect to the due process rights of applicants and to take into account conditions in the applicants' countries of origin. In close cooperation with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, the Netherlands annually offers permanent resettlement to 500 refugees, principally Iranians, Vietnamese, and Cambodians, who are in temporary asylum in other countries. The Dutch provide housing and social services to asylum applicants awaiting decisions as well as to those awarded refugee status.

Applicants denied refugee status are requested to leave the Netherlands, but a significant portion do not depart. The Dutch Government rarely sends asylum seekers back to their country of origin.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Netherlands is a functioning multiparty democracy. Election results are decided on the basis of proportional representation. There is universal suffrage for persons over 18 years of age, and foreign residents have the right to vote in municipal elections. Dutch citizens elect the Second Chamber of Parliament every 4 years (or more frequently in the event a government resigns or is toppled by a parliamentary vote of no confidence). The most recent national elections, held in September, led to the formation of a center-left government with Prime Minister Lubbers remaining in office. Eleven political parties have seats in Parliament, representing all points of view from the far right to the far left.

The Government is responsive to allegations of human rights violations arising both domestically and internationally. The Dutch consider themselves to be in the forefront of international concern over reported human rights abuses, and Dutch authorities readily assist international and nongovernmental organizations in their investigation. Support for human rights is a key tenet of Dutch foreign policy. The Netherlands is a strong advocate of human rights, both bilaterally and in international forums, including the United Nations and its agencies and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Dutch have repeatedly spoken out against human rights violations in all parts of the world.

THE NETHERLANDSSection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

The Dutch view the problem of fully integrating racial and ethnic minorities into national economic and social life as one of their most difficult domestic issues. Hundreds of thousands of persons from the former Dutch colony of Suriname and the Netherlands Antilles and Aruba have come to live in the Netherlands since 1975. In addition, there are significant numbers of foreign workers and their families, mostly from Turkey and Morocco. These groups face some private discrimination in housing and employment, as well as practical limits on opportunities for social and economic advancement as a result of educational levels that are inadequate when compared to those of the majority of Dutch citizens. Unemployment among minority groups runs significantly higher than among the population as a whole.

The Government's longstanding policy of combatting discrimination is outlined in its 1983 "Minority Note," a comprehensive plan of action to address the problems of minorities in the fields of health, education, employment, and the law. The National Advisory and Consultation Board on Minority Policy, which is incorporated by legislation into the administrative structure of the country, is chaired by the Minister of Internal Affairs and includes representatives of seven ethnic minority groups. It acts as a consultative body to the Cabinet on minority issues and as a conduit into the Government for the expression of minority concerns.

Administrative tribunals have been set up for filing claims of discrimination against employers and government and in housing matters. They provide a practical means of redress for discrimination claims.

Women enjoy full legal rights and enter marriage with the choice of pooling wealth or maintaining separate assets. According to a recent study ("Violence Against Women in Heterosexual Relationships") financed by the Dutch Ministry of Welfare, Health, and Culture, 20.8 percent of Dutch women in heterosexual relationships are or have been the victims of unreciprocated violence. Slightly over half of these (or 11 percent of women) experience or have experienced repeated violence severe enough to be considered wife beating. The Government supports programs to prevent or reduce violence against women. Battered women find refuge in a network of government-subsidized women's shelters which offer the services of social workers and psychologists. In addition, battered women who leave their husbands immediately become eligible for an array of social benefits, including a basic (and livable) subsidy as well as an allowance for any dependent children.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of Dutch workers to associate freely is well established. The active trade union movement includes in its membership approximately 30 percent of the employed labor force. Unions, while entirely free of government and political party control, may and do participate in political life. They are free to form federations and to maintain relations with recognized international bodies. All union members, except civil servants, have the legal right to strike. Even Dutch military personnel are free to join unions. Legislation is pending which would grant the right to strike to civil servants not involved in "lifesaving" activities.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is recognized and well established in the Netherlands. Neither in law nor in practice is discrimination against union members practiced. Dutch society has developed a social partnership between government, private employers, and trade unions which grew out of post-World War II reconstruction efforts. This "harmony model of industrial relations" involves all three participants in negotiating collective bargaining agreements. Every year, the three participants develop a "central accord" with agreed-upon social and economic goals for the nation. Sectoral collective bargaining then takes place under the umbrella of the "central accord."

There is a disagreement between the Government and the major Dutch trade union confederation (FNV) over the degree of government participation in the collective bargaining process permitted by a series of laws passed in the 1980's. This legislation moved the status of quasi-public workers from being "trend followers of the private sector" to being "trend followers of the public sector." The status of quasi-public workers is now closer to the status of government workers whose salaries and terms of employment are determined by the Government. A predecessor confederation of the FNV, the NVV, unhappy with this situation, appealed to the International Labor Organization (ILO) under Convention 87. An ILO fact-finding mission in 1985 essentially agreed with the union's position. The Government continues to maintain that its role in the discussion of salaries and terms of employment does not constitute interference in the collective bargaining process, and the FNV itself does not consider this disagreement to be a worker rights issue.

There are no export processing zones in the Netherlands.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment of young people is 16. At 16 years of age, youths may work full time only if they have completed the mandatory 10 years of schooling. Those still in school at age 16 may not work more than 8 hours per week. Laws prohibit youths under the age of 18 from working at night, overtime, or in areas which could be dangerous to their physical or mental development. The Netherlands has a reduced minimum wage for employees under age 23. The purpose of this law is to provide incentives for the employment of young people, one of the groups with the highest rate of unemployment. Full-time workers 16 years and older receive a paid vacation of at least 20 days per year.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Dutch law and practice adequately protect the safety and health of workers. The average workweek for adults is 38 hours. There is minimum wage legislation, and the minimum wage is approximately $6.00 per hour. This minimum wage, together with social benefits available to all minimum wage earners, provides an adequate living for workers and their families. For unemployed workers, an extensive system of unemployment benefits allows recipients to maintain an adequate standard of living.

THE NETHERLANDS

NORWAY

Norway is a constitutional monarchy and parliamentary democracy with King Olav V, the titular Head of State, having a largely symbolic role. Norway is governed by a prime minister, cabinet, and a 165-seat Storting (parliament) that is elected every 4 years and cannot be dissolved.

The police, security forces, and the military are scrupulous in their protection of human rights. The Government (including the judicial system and the Storting) exercises firm control over these organizations and investigates thoroughly any allegations of human rights violations.

Norway is an advanced industrial state with a mixed economy combining private, public, and state ownership. Personal freedoms, such as freedom of association and of speech, and the right to pursue private interests and to hold private property, are protected by the Constitution and respected in practice.

Deeply rooted democratic principles, a strong egalitarian tradition, an independent press, and highly developed educational and social welfare systems have made Norway a leading advocate of human rights in the world.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Such killings have not occurred.

b. Disappearance

Secret arrests and detentions have not occurred.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment do not exist in Norway's penal system. Generous furlough and visitation rights characterize the system, which emphasizes rehabilitation. The maximum sentence for any crime is 21 years.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Norwegian law provides for arrest warrants, which are used except in circumstances such as hot pursuit. Persons may be detained for up to 4 hours without being charged. A person charged with a crime has the right, observed in practice, to appear before a judge for arraignment within 24 hours. If charges are formalized at the arraignment, the judge then determines whether the detainee should be kept in custody or released (bail need not be posted) pending trial. A strong case must be made to justify detention. Possible grounds include fear of flight, the needs of the investigation, and fear that a detainee will commit further crimes.

Any person held in pretrial detention appears before a judge every 4 weeks for a determination of the necessity of continued detention. There is no legal limit on the length of time a prisoner may be held before trial; however, lengthy pretrial detention is rare. Preventive detention also exists but is used infrequently.

There is no exile. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair, public trial is ensured by law and honored in practice. Only in certain cases, including those involving state security or private family matters, are trials closed. In criminal cases, all Norwegian citizens and aliens are entitled to free counsel. Indigent persons are granted free counsel in certain civil cases as well.

The judiciary is independent of both the legislative and the executive branches of the Government and tries military and security as well as civil and criminal cases. The Labor Court mediates industrial relations disputes.

In recent years, the legality of imprisoning those refusing both military service and alternative civilian service has become a public issue. Persons refusing both kinds of service have been held in prison for up to 16 months (a period equivalent to military service) without a trial. Detention is based on an administrative rather than a judicial decision, and prisoners held in this manner receive salary and benefits normally accorded to military recruits during their period of confinement. Recent administrative decisions by the Justice and Defense Ministries have expanded the grounds for conscientious objector status.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The privacy of the family and the person is free from arbitrary interference by the Government. Police may conduct searches of the home only with court approval or in instances of hot pursuit or when they fear evidence is being destroyed. There were no allegations of extralegal official entry into Norwegian homes in 1989. In most cases, wiretaps are prohibited by law, but they may be used in cases involving state security or narcotics offenses and when officially approved by the court pursuant to carefully drawn legal guidelines. Correspondence may be opened only by court order in cases involving state security.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is protected by the Constitution and respected in practice. In addition to restrictions on slander and libel, Norwegian law forbids racist or sexist remarks in print or public speech. It is forbidden to publish information concerning national defense which could prove damaging to Norwegian security.

Norway's state broadcasting company maintains a near monopoly on television broadcasting and nationwide radio programming, but the Government does not exercise editorial control over programming. Private local radio stations exist throughout the country, and licenses have been granted to private groups to operate local cable stations. A private television network, TV Norge, has been on the air for almost 1 year. It broadcasts in the Oslo area and is available on cable throughout Norway. Norway has an active and diversified press, and many papers are sustained by government subsidies. Some newspapers are loosely connected to various national political parties.

Certain restrictions apply to the showing of films. The government Film Control Board has the authority to censor or ban any film deemed overly violent, pornographic, or blasphemous. The blasphemy clause in the censorship law has, however, not been used in the last 20 years. There is no evidence that any films have been censored because of political content.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Norwegians exercise these freedoms without restraint. Permits for public demonstrations are granted routinely.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The state church is the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Norway, which is financially supported by the State and to which 93 percent of the population nominally belongs. There is a constitutional requirement that the King and half of the Cabinet belong to the state church. The Workers' Protection and Working Environment Act permits prospective employers to ask job applicants in certain fields, such as education, whether they respect Christian beliefs and principles.

Approximately 4 percent of the population are registered members of 20 other denominations which operate freely and may proselytize. Foreign clergy are welcome in Norway. No religious community is required to register with the Government unless it desires state support, which is provided to all registered denominations on a proportional basis in accordance with membership. Although the state religion is taught in all public schools, children of other faiths are allowed to be absent from such classes upon parental request. If there are enough students of the same faith, the school will arrange religion classes in that faith. Workers belonging to minority denominations are allowed leave for religious holidays.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not impede foreign or domestic travel. The right to voluntary repatriation is guaranteed. Refugees and asylum seekers are provided generous benefits, including social services, free medical care, and education while awaiting decisions on their asylum applications.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Norway is a multiparty democracy. Seven parties are represented in the Storting where distribution of seats is based upon proportional representation by district. The Storting may reject or modify government proposals; if a government loses a vote on a major issue of confidence, it resigns, and a new government is formed. The minimum voting age is 18, and voter turnout in the 1989 parliamentary elections was over 82 percent. Foreigners who have resided in Norway for at least 3 years, and are otherwise eligible, have the right to vote in local elections only.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Norway cooperates with nongovernmental investigations of alleged violations of human rights. In recent years, Norway has cooperated with both the European Commission of Human Rights and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Norway is itself an active participant in international human rights organizations. A number of public and private organizations monitor alleged human rights abuses either inside or, more often, outside the country.

Through a highly developed social welfare system that reflects a long tradition of egalitarianism, the Government provides for the health, education, retirement, and other needs of its people regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion.

Apart from an extremely small Finnish population in the northeastern corner of the country, the Sami (Lapp) people were Norway's only significant minority group until the influx of immigrants during the 1970's. In recent years, the Government has taken steps to protect the cultural rights of the Sami by providing Sami-language instruction at schools in Sami-inhabited areas, radio and television programs broadcast or subtitled in the Sami language, and subsidies for the publication of newspapers and books oriented toward the Sami.

Norwegian Samis elected their own constituent assembly, the Sameting, for the first time in 1989. The 39-seat body is a consultative group which will meet regularly to consider issues of importance to the Sami people. Various Sami and other leaders have raised the possibility that the Sameting could eventually be transformed into a constitutional law-making body within certain territorial and functional boundaries.

There is continuing political debate on whether current restrictions on non-Nordic immigration, in effect since 1975, are racially motivated and whether immigrant minority groups such as Pakistanis, Vietnamese, Turks, and Africans are treated equally by Norwegian authorities. The Government provides legal protection for the rights of all minorities and has taken active measures to help these groups adjust to Norwegian society, including free Norwegian-language instruction for any foreign resident.

In recent years, Norway has experienced a dramatic increase in the number of persons seeking political asylum. As a result, the Storting passed a bill in 1988 that would no longer allow asylum applicants who are not bona fide refugees to remain on humanitarian grounds. The new law (expected to be fully operational by early 1990) introduces new measures, however, designed further to safeguard the rights of those asylum seekers allowed to remain in Norway. With the rise in the number of asylum seekers, refugee policy has become a significant political issue; reducing or ending the inflow of refugees remains the single most visible issue for the Progress Party, which posted big gains in the 1989 parliamentary elections. At the same time, some human rights groups and political parties urged the Government to accept more refugees and expressed concern over the adequacy of the treatment given those seeking political asylum in Norway. Although there have been problems in dealing with individual refugee cases, Norway has a well-organized system which includes advance planning, careful dispersion of refugees throughout Norway, and generous welfare, educational, and vocational training programs. The current backlog of refugee cases pending judicial processing is expected to ease significantly as the new procedures mandated by the 1988 law are implemented fully.

Women are protected under the Equal Rights Law of 1978 and other regulations. Under that law, "women and men engaged in the same activity shall have equal wages for work of equal value." A state Equal Rights Council monitors enforcement of the 1978 law, and an Equal Rights Ombudsman processes complaints of sexual discrimination. The Government provides liberal maternity leave and time off for either parent to care for their children.

Norway has an extremely low crime rate, and, in that sense, crime against women is not widespread. A recent general increase in the crime rate has included crimes against women, although police authorities believe that much of the increase in reported rapes and incidents of wife beating is due to a greater willingness among women to report these crimes than has been the case in the past. The police vigorously investigate and prosecute such crimes and have instituted special programs for rape and domestic violence prevention and for counseling of victims. Public and private organizations run several free shelters which give battered wives an alternative to returning to a violent domestic situation after an incident of wife beating.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to strike. The Government, however, has the right to invoke compulsory arbitration under certain circumstances, with the approval of the Storting. This procedure, which has been invoked several times in the 1980's, particularly in the oil industry, has been criticized by the expert committees of the International Labor Organization, which are of the opinion that the situations were not a sufficient threat to public health and safety to justify the action.

With membership totaling about 60 percent of the work force, unions play an important role in political and economic life and are consulted by the Government on important economic and social problems. Although the largest trade union federation is associated with the Labor Party, all unions are free of party and government control. They maintain strong ties with international bodies, such as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. There were several small but no major strikes in 1989.

NORWAY

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

All workers, including government employees and military personnel, have the right to organize and bargain collectively. There are no export processing zones, and labor legislation and practice is uniform throughout Norway.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is prohibited by law and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age of Employment of Children

Children are not permitted to work full time before the age of 15. Minimum age rules are observed in practice.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Ordinary working hours do not exceed 37.5 hours per week, and 25 working days of paid leave are granted per year (31 for those over 60). There is no minimum wage as such in Norway, but wages normally fall within a "national wage scale" negotiated by labor, employers, and the Government. The average annual wage, not including extensive social benefits, is approximately $26,000, which is adequate to provide a family a decent living.

Under the Workers' Protection and Working Environment Act of 1977, all employed persons are assured safe and physically acceptable working conditions. According to the Act, working environment committees, composed of management, workers, and health personnel, must be established in all enterprises with 50 or more workers, and safety delegates must be elected in all organizations. The Directorate of Labor Inspections ensures effective compliance with labor legislation.

POLAND

For the first time since World War II, Poland is ruled by a coalition government led and dominated by non-Communists. This far-reaching and fundamental change stemmed from the so-called roundtable talks in early 1989 between the Communist authorities and the opposition led by Lech Walesa, the leader of the Solidarity movement. The agreements reached provided, among other things, for legalization of the Solidarity trade union, establishment of the post of President of the Republic, creation of a freely elected upper house of parliament or Senate, partially free elections to the lower house or Sejm, permission for the publication of opposition periodicals, the easing of censorship, access for the opposition to the Communist-controlled radio and television, and an independent judicial system.

Parliamentary elections in June produced an overwhelming Solidarity victory, and General Wojciech Jaruzelski, the Communist President, was compelled in September to appoint a non-Communist, Tadeusz Mazowiecki, a Solidarity adviser, as the first non-Communist Prime Minister to head a Warsaw Pact government. This event marked the end of the de facto one-party system.

The Minister of Internal Affairs, a Communist, continued to supervise the uniformed police, the powerful security apparatus, and the militarized riot police. However, in October he announced the dissolution of the riot police, which had been responsible for serious human rights violations.

The new Government inherited an extremely difficult economic situation characterized by spiraling inflation, a deepening budget deficit, and nagging consumer shortages. In addition, the Government must deal with industrial obsolescence, a weak infrastructure, bad management, and low labor productivity. Its plans include stabilization measures to rein in inflation and longer-term institutional reforms aimed at restructuring the centrally planned economy into a market economy and encouraging private enterprise.

The transformation of Polish society includes the lifting of many previous restrictions on a citizen's right to free speech and free assembly. For example, in September the 1939 Soviet invasion of Poland was marked by wreathlaying and anti-Soviet street demonstrations without police interference. Freedom of association is being pursued pending passage of a liberal law on associations. Political crimes are to be eliminated from the criminal code. A non-Communist was appointed head of the Polish Radio and Television Committee, and censorship was significantly reduced.

In sum, Poland made dramatic progress in human rights in 1989. In a few months, the country overturned 40 years of domination by the communist party and formed a government which is pledged to respect human rights and civil liberties.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No conclusive instances of political killing were reported. However, three Catholic priests known for their opposition activity died under suspicious circumstances in the first half of 1989. Some Poles fear that security forces acting either under orders or unofficially in some kind of vigilante "death squad" operation were responsible for the priests' deaths. Preliminary investigations by the police suggest accidental circumstances (e.g., fire, burglary), but official investigations into these alleged political murders are continuing, and a parliamentary committee has been created for this purpose.

b. Disappearance

Instances of prolonged or permanent disappearance were not reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reported allegations of torture during 1989. There were a few reported instances of police beating people in melees following demonstrations in the first months of 1989. A particularly violent protest action occurred in Krakow in May. Youth activists, staging an anti-Soviet demonstration in front of the Soviet Consulate General, began pelting the building and the responding police forces with bricks, bottles, and stones. The police resorted to heavy use of tear gas and water cannon, and a number of demonstrators were injured in the clash. However, more recent demonstrations and protest actions have met with no police resistance.

The Minister of Internal Affairs in October announced the dissolution of the Zomo units, riot police that were most closely associated with the martial law crackdown. In its place, the Minister plans to establish a special unit of the civil militia to perform crowd control and other similar activities.

Demonstrations and riots by inmates of Polish prisons became increasingly frequent and violent in 1989. The convicts are demanding improved health care and living conditions, amendments to the criminal law, and the abolition of the death penalty. Solidarity legislators have acted as mediators in the ongoing negotiations between the Government and the prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Polish law allows for a 48-hour detention period before the authorities are required to bring formal charges. Before the signing of the roundtable accords, the detention provision was used as a preventative or deterrent measure against prominent opposition activists. Since April, however, this provision has not been used in practice and is being reviewed.

In theory, the law provides that once a prosecutor presents the legal basis for a formal investigation, a detainee may be held in indefinite "investigatory" or "temporary" arrest until an indictment is filed. During this period, access to counsel is not guaranteed. Legal provisions for bail are rarely used, but suspects, as well as those already convicted, sometimes are furloughed for humanitarian reasons.

Those elements of the Criminal Code that had been used in the past for political purposes were the focus of attention at the roundtable working group set up to negotiate legal and judicial reforms. The roundtable reached agreement on eliminating these provisions, but the actual amendment of the criminal code was deferred until a later date when a thorough redrafting of the code would be possible.

Polish law contains no provision for forced exile. In 1989 many prominent opposition leaders traveled to the West and returned without incident.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Most cases are tried in open court. The court having jurisdiction over a case, however, retains the option of closing a trial to the public in some circumstances, such as divorce cases and trials in which state secrets may be disclosed. Once a formal indictment is filed, the defendant is allowed ample time to study the charges and consult with up to three attorneys of his or her choice. A defendant who cannot afford to pay is provided an attorney at public expense. Once the defendant is prepared, a trial date is set. Defendants must be present during the trial and may present evidence in their own defense. All are presumed innocent until proven guilty.

The court of original jurisdiction has 7 days from the date of the oral decision in which to prepare a written decision. Under Polish law, defendants have the right to appeal within 14 days from the time that the court issues a written decision. Appeals may be made on the basis, among other grounds, of new evidence, procedural irregularities, or a perceived offense against the law.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government allegedly no longer monitors mail and telephone calls. Postal workers may inspect packages to be mailed abroad for customs purposes. The slowness of postal and telecommunications services result from an inefficient system coupled with a chronic lack of resources rather than from direct interference by the Government.

Polish citizens are not forced to participate in any political organizations. The Government does not interfere with the right to marry or to have children as one chooses, nor does it prevent the teaching of religion to children at home or in churches. In early 1989, some searches without warrants occurred in violation of the law requiring warrants.

The Government does not jam Western radio broadcasts. More and more Western dailies and periodicals are available in outlets frequented by tourists, such as hotel kiosks and international reading rooms. Personal and institutional subscriptions may be ordered but are limited severely by the availability of hard currency.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution of 1952 provides for freedom of speech. Since the signing of the roundtable accords in April, Polish citizens have been able to express their opinions publicly or privately without restraint. Poles likewise have been openly distributing pamphlets and speaking publicly at antigovernment and anti-Soviet demonstrations without reprisals.

The roundtable accords also granted the opposition full access to the mass media. While censorship laws thus far remain on the books, the Solidarity-led Government has effectively narrowed their application. Many of the former underground periodicals surfaced with legal publications: 1 month after the signing of the accords, for example, a Solidarity daily, Gazeta Wyborcza began publication, and a Solidarity weekly, Tygodnik Solidarnosc, which was launched in 1981 and closed down by martial law, resumed publication. Gazeta Wyborcza reaches over 500,000 readers, almost double the circulation of the Communist party daily. To compete, party journals have begun to carry differing opinions on a variety of issues, contributing thereby to an invigorated and vibrant press.

The current journalistic atmosphere also has fostered open discussions in Poland of what has come to be referred to as the numerous "blank spots" in Polish history, especially with respect to its relations with the Soviet Union. Many heretofore taboo episodes in bilateral relations are now being debated in journals and newspapers and on the airwaves.

Both television and radio have taken on a new character, as opposition figures regularly appear on the state-run media. Under the roundtable agreement, Solidarity's Citizens' Committee has guaranteed full access to both television and radio. Accordingly, "Studio Solidarnosc," a weekly opposition television program, began on May 9. Radio Solidarity similarly originated a daily broadcast in May. The newly appointed head of the Polish Radio and Television Committee, a Solidarity supporter, stated his intention to establish a politically independent and pluralist television and radio service based on competence, not political affiliation. In one of his first steps, he removed three newscasters most closely associated with martial law. Moreover, the new government spokesman, another opposition activist, declared that her role is to provide information, not block it as in the past.

The Main Office for the Control of Press, Publishing, and Public Performances continues to exist but has greatly reduced its activity in light of legislative changes implemented by the roundtable agreement. Formally, the office oversees censorship of all media and deletes material which it considers libelous or detrimental to national security interests. The new Government, however, intends to amend the law by eliminating censorship of books, monthlies, and less frequently issued periodicals.

Poland is the home of the only independent university in Eastern Europe, the Catholic University of Lublin. Its very existence, as well as its extensive ties to institutions and persons in the West (it counts Pope John Paul II among former faculty members), is visible evidence of the national and religious traditions which still help to shape Polish higher education. There are also a number of diocesan seminaries, independently administered by the Bishop Ordinary of Poland's dioceses.

Amendments adopted in 1985 to the 1982 Higher Education Law increased governmental control over universities and other college-level institutions. Hence, the Minister of Science, Higher Education, and Technology must approve all candidates for university rector and other high offices before their names can be submitted to university senates for election. The new Government and the new Minister have indicated an intention to move rapidly to restore greater autonomy to educational institutions. An association that aims to establish private schools in Poland successfully registered with the courts, and a group of teachers was granted permission to found a private high school in Warsaw.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Since April, most groups and associations have been free to organize and assemble. Major rallies were held during the national electoral campaign, and peaceful demonstrations were staged without police interference.

May Day observances in Warsaw turned into a Solidarity election campaign parade and rally, drawing perhaps as many as 100,000 people. The May Day celebration in Gdansk featured a campaign rally led by Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. Neither of these parades encountered government intervention.

Many protests by young people also took place. The Freedom and Peace Movement held rallies, set up picket lines in front of the Parliament building, and staged a 2-week hunger strike to press for changes in military service requirements. The group also led violent anti-Soviet demonstrations in the southern city of Krakow, which resulted in some clashes with police and some short detentions. But the most recent anti-Soviet demonstrations--those that took place after the Solidarity Prime Minister took control of the Government--met with no police response.

Since the signing of the roundtable agreement, the opportunities for Poles to engage in political and professional association activity are virtually unrestricted. Although associations and clubs by law must register with the courts, in practice most groups seeking legal status have been approved. Among the most significant of Poland's new independent associations is the Citizens' Committee, a brain trust of Solidarity activists. In June a Warsaw court registered the Association of Polish Writers (SPP), which more than 500 writers reportedly joined. A week later, the Association of Polish Journalists, comprising journalists associated with Solidarity, was reestablished. A group dedicated to exposing the truth about the massacre at Katyn of Polish military officers by the Soviet secret police applied for and received legal status, and the Independent Association of Students, denied permission in May to register, later won a 4-month struggle to organize legally.

Although the roundtable agreement did not resolve the question of the legalization of political parties, subsequent events rendered the issue moot. Pluralism in the form of competing political parties became a fact, and new parties were formed or planned. The National Alliance of Trade Unions (OPZZ), heretofore affiliated with the Communists, announced its intention to form a new party. Rural Solidarity has called for the establishment of a new rural-based political party, the Polish Peasants' Party-Solidarity, to address more specifically the concerns of agriculture-based workers. Finally, a group of Catholic activists formed a new political party, the Christian-National Union. The party's organizers reportedly enjoy a close relationship with Poland's Primate.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution ensures "freedom of conscience and belief," and Polish citizens enjoy freedom to practice their religious beliefs. Churches may organize, select and train personnel, solicit and receive contributions, publish, and engage in consultations with coreligionists without government interference. There are no restrictions on establishing and maintaining places of worship.

Poland is predominantly Roman Catholic. The Catholic Church maintains over 16,000 churches, schools, and other institutions and continues a vigorous program of building new churches. It regularly organizes religious gatherings, such as pilgrimages and conferences, without interference. It also publishes significant numbers of books and periodicals, as does the independent Catholic press. Sunday Catholic mass and services of other religions are broadcast regularly on the state-run radio. In July the Government established diplomatic relations with the Vatican after years of negotiations. Earlier in the year, negotiations led to a new legal status for the Catholic Church, the first such agreement in the Warsaw Pact area. The Church has been a stout defender of human rights and took an active role in bringing about the historic roundtable talks, in which the Church participated as mediator.

There is no government-sponsored discrimination against minority religions. Eastern Orthodox, Ukrainian Catholic, and the much smaller Protestant, Jewish, and Muslim congregations meet without interference but find it difficult to maintain their places of worship and train their clergy, mainly because of their small size, wide dispersion, and limited financial resources. Jehovah's Witnesses held an international congress in Poland in August, attracting 40,000 delegates from 22 countries.

The largest minority is the Orthodox faith, with between 800,000 and 1.5 million faithful concentrated in Poland's eastern provinces. The Orthodox Church maintains 350 places of worship and continues to build churches and renovate monasteries. It sponsors the publication of a number of books and several periodicals and broadcasts its masses on Polish radio four times a year. Some Orthodox believers complain of Polish ethnic prejudice (most of the Orthodox faithful in Poland are of Byelorussian, Ukrainian, or Russian origin).

World attention focused on Polish-Jewish relations after a group of Americans protesting the presence of a Carmelite Convent adjacent to the Oswiecim (Auschwitz) death camp scuffled with Polish workmen. The June incident gained momentum after the Primate of Poland, Cardinal Jozef Glemp, delivered a homily at a religious celebration at Czestochowa on August 26, in which he called on the Jews not to look down on Poles and not to use their control over mass media to inflame anti-Polish feelings. Opinion leaders immediately condemned the Cardinal's position; the Solidarity daily published a highly critical front-page editorial deploring the language and sentiments expressed by the Primate. The Church has since confirmed its intention to move the Convent.

POLAND

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no legal restrictions on travel within Poland. There also are no legal restrictions on changing one's residence, but in practice the acute housing shortage makes this difficult, and in some areas virtually impossible. Although Polish citizens and legal permanent residents in Poland are required to register with the local police each time they change their place of residence, this regulation is rarely followed and even more rarely enforced.

With the liberalization of policies governing passport issuance in July 1987 and again in January 1989, the vast majority of Polish passport applicants now are able to obtain passports valid for up to 10 years for travel to the West. Foreign travel is not restricted, and it is no longer a punishable offense for Polish citizens to remain abroad "illegally" after their tourist exit permission has expired. Poles who emigrated on passports issued for tourist travel, whether as a tourist or through a refugee camp in Europe, may return to Poland with no sanctions or limitations on future travel. Many Poles who obtained refugee or asylee status abroad are now returning to Poland to visit family and friends, and some are choosing to remain in Poland.

As of July 1, 1989, there were no unresolved cases on the list of divided families maintained by the U.S. Embassy.

Under laws dating back to 1962, only the Council of State may revoke citizenship. Involuntary revocation must be based on one of the following activities: actions violating the duty of allegiance to the Polish State; actions detrimental to the substantial interests of Poland; departure from Poland after May 9, 1954, and failure to return when so requested by the Polish Government; evasion of military service; or conviction abroad of a crime also recognized as a felony under Polish criminal law. The Government rarely revokes citizenship. Legislation is being drafted which would revise the statutes concerning the acquisition, loss, and revocation of citizenship.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Poland was ruled for more than 40 years by the Polish United Workers' (Communist) Party (PZPR). Forced by a series of crippling labor strikes in 1988 and a rapidly deteriorating economy, government authorities in February met with representatives of the opposition to debate questions concerning the future political, economic, and social configuration of Poland. The resulting agreement, signed in April, provided for a wide range of measures aimed at creating a more pluralistic and democratic political and economic order.

In the political area, the opposition obtained the right to contest 35 percent of the seats in the lower house or Sejm as well as all 100 seats in the resurrected upper house or Senate. In the June elections, Solidarity won 99 of the 100 seats in the Senate and all 161 seats it contested in the Sejm.

Solidarity's resounding victory at the polls forced a resolution of the issues of power sharing and Poland's political future. Although the PZPR, together with its coalition partners, the United Peasant Party and the Democratic Party, still had a working majority in the Sejm, it quickly began to lose control of the political situation. General Wojciech Jaruzelski, Communist Party First Secretary since 1981, stood for the new post of President of the Republic and was elected by the Sejm by a margin of one vote. After the inability of Jaruzelski's nominee, General Czeslaw Kiszczak, the Minister of Internal Affairs, to form a government because of the defection of the PZPR's coalition partners to the Solidarity side, Jaruzelski nominated Tadeusz Mazowiecki, a Solidarity adviser, who was confirmed as Prime Minister. Mazowiecki formed a government based on a broad coalition in which the PZPR continues to control two vital portfolios, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, with authority over the police and security apparatus, and the Ministry of Defense, with control over the armed forces. Moreover, the PZPR will continue to exert influence in the government and throughout the bureaucracy through its past control over key administrative positions. Free local elections are scheduled for the summer of 1990, and free multiparty parliamentary elections are anticipated in 1993 at the latest.

There is no government-controlled or sponsored organization in Poland devoted exclusively to human rights issues, although there are reports that some are being formed. As yet, no independent human rights groups have sought to register with the courts.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status.

There is no legally sanctioned discrimination against women, and women's rights have not become a major public issue in Poland. Spouse abuse is a criminal offense; reported incidents are often attributed to alcoholism. Persons convicted of spouse abuse are subject to imprisonment from 6 months to 5 years. As spouse abuse is not discussed openly, and most women do not report such incidents to the police, the extent to which it occurs is not known.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The roundtable agreement, implemented by the Act of April 7 amending the Trade Union Act of 1982, cleared the way for Poles to be represented by trade unions or professional associations of their choice by agreeing to eliminate laws that conflict with International Labor Organization (ILO) conventions, particularly 87 and 98 regarding basic trade union rights. However, many laws infringing on ILO conventions, including the law on compulsory labor, have not yet been repealed. The Mazowiecki Government, in cooperation with Solidarity deputies in the Polish Parliament, has begun preparation of new labor legislation including a draft labor code.

After more than 6 years of illegal status, the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union Solidarity was registered on April 20. Affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labor, Solidarity currently has a membership of 2.2 million, compared to 9.5 million members in 1981 before martial law. The Communist-inspired trade union organized in 1982, the National Alliance of Trade Unions (OPZZ), is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. As heir to traditional state-sponsored unions, the OPZZ "owns" or controls state assets and allocates benefits and perquisites, including vacations, sanatoria visits, and, in many regions, preferential access to housing; it claims 6.5 million members, approximately 3 million of whom are white-collar administrators and pensioners. The Trade Union Act of April 7, 1989, abolishes restrictions on the establishment and functioning of trade unions, especially the limit of one union per enterprise. In addition, the law: ensures the equality of all unions; grants the freedom to choose the principles of union structure, including the right to establish unions on a territorial basis; establishes principles of cooperation between unions in matters related to the representation of workers' individual and collective rights and interests vis-a-vis management and the organs of workers' self-management. A law adopted on the same day implements constitutional guarantees of equal rights of all citizens to participate in the public life of the country. The May 29 amnesty annulled convictions related to strikes or protests occurring after August 31, 1980.

A number of "illegal" strikes occurred in 1989, largely to protest deteriorating living standards and to press wage demands, but also to protest unsafe working conditions. The Communist Government's policy of allowing state firms to set prices, thereby dramatically increasing food prices in August, met with strikes in the transportation service, shipyards, steel mills, and mining, among other industries. For the most part, demands for increased wages were met.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

An amendment to the Labor Code which came into force in 1987 and is still on the books, enshrines the right to collective bargaining at the industry level and the right to conclude wage agreements at the enterprise level, but in the context of a planned Socialist economy. According to this system, collective agreements had to be submitted to the Ministry of Labor, Wages, and Social Affairs for registration in order to ensure that their contents were in conformity with the 5-year national socioeconomic plan adopted by the Sejm. If they were not, the dispute was submitted to arbitration by the Supreme Court, or, at the request of one of the parties to the agreement, to arbitration by a mixed commission of government and trade union representatives. This issue, among others involving freedom of association, has been under review by supervisory bodies of the ILO for a number of years. In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts requested the Government to clarify the current status of the centralized wage policy and the requirements to register negotiated wage schedules, which had been the subject of longstanding allegations of government interference in the collective bargaining process, in violation of Convention 98 on collective bargaining.

Polish wage levels have been calculated according to a very complex formula based on a theoretical base wage, extensive bonuses and overtime, and production quotas. Specific industrial sectors and enterprises are increasingly expected to accept responsibility for setting wage levels. Throughout 1989 wage tables were generally negotiated at the enterprise or sectoral level--instead of through a national plan.

POLAND

In keeping with the roundtable agreement, the new Polish Parliament passed legislation in July 1989 requiring state and private firms to index wage levels to offset increases in retail prices. The formula for calculating indexation assured that workers were compensated for at least 80 percent of the inflation rate for the relevant period. During the strikes in August, the Rakowski Government met with leaders of both Solidarity and the OPZZ union to reach wage agreements. The Mazowiecki Government amended the indexation law in October to provide for monthly rather than quarterly compensation, but wage adjustments were not to exceed the inflation rate.

Polish law provides guarantees against antiunion discrimination, backed by civil and penal sanctions. However, ILO supervisory bodies criticized and queried the Government in 1988 and 1989 regarding job dismissals on grounds related to participation in social activities or acts of protest against the authorities and also with respect to difficulties encountered by interned, arrested, or sentenced Solidarity trade unionists, who were subsequently amnestied, in finding employment. In May 1989, as a result of the roundtable agreement, an Act was adopted which provides that such persons may apply to establishments which had dismissed them for reemployment in accordance with their skills and professional experience. Under the Act, all workers whose employment was terminated after December 13, 1981, due to their trade union activity carried on in contradiction with the then-existing laws are ensured continuity of employment regardless of whether they return to the previous enterprise or not.

There are no special economic incentive areas or export processing zones in Poland as yet, but their establishment is under consideration by the new Government.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Under legislation dating from the early 1980's, persons who are registered as unemployed and who refuse to seek employment without adequate justification, may be listed as "habitual parasites" and compelled to accept assigned employment, usually in street cleaning, park maintenance, or garbage collection, under threat of penal sanction. Sanctions under this law have not been implemented in the current political climate. Moreover, the law has never specifically been applied as a means of political coercion, curtailment of the free expression of political or ideological opinions, or racial or social discrimination. The new Government plans to review the law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The labor code generally forbids the employment of a person who has not reached the age of 15. The employment of a young person, defined as someone aged 15 to 18, is permitted, provided that person has completed basic schooling. Special exceptions sometimes are required if a particular job might pose a health danger. The labor code specifies that a young person without professional qualifications may be employed only for the purpose of vocational preparation, although again there is provision for special exceptions. These laws are enforced effectively.

POLAND

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

A 6-day workweek was introduced at the end of 1985, canceling the 5-day workweek which was conceded to Solidarity in principle in 1981 but never implemented. In practice, most families find that both the husband and wife must be employed in order to sustain an acceptable standard of living. In 1989 the base wage, used primarily for statistical purposes, was about $20 to $35 per month. The structure of the wage scale throughout Polish industry, however, is a major irritant to workers. Polish workers earn most of their pay from overtime and bonuses (basic pay is approximately only 30 to 50 percent of average pay), thereby increasing pressure on workers to work overtime to keep pace with inflation. As a result, less than 10 percent of workers work as few as 8 hours per day. Indeed, where employment is deemed the most unsafe--in the coal mining industry, for example--workers generally work more than 10 hours per day and 6 days a week.

The Polish legal code spells out minimum conditions for the protection of workers' health and safety, and the Council of Safety at Work was set up in May. Although in most respects these standards meet the international norm, several Western and other independent observers reported substandard safety conditions and work environments, most notably in the mining sector. The Social Labor Inspectorate (SLI), the compliance arm of the Government, is empowered to monitor the implementation of collective agreements and insure that regulations concerning safety and the employment of women and children are followed. Both the Council of Safety at Work and the SLI are frequently criticized for a lack of efficiency and being too close to management; its representatives have been appointed by state and party authorities.

PORTUGAL

The Republic of Portugal is a parliamentary democracy with a president of the republic and legislative assembly freely elected by secret ballot. Former Prime Minister Mario Soares was elected Portugal's first civilian President in 60 years in 1986. In 1987 Prime Minister Anibal Antonio Cavaco Silva was reelected and formed the first majority Government since the 1974 revolution.

Macau, a small Portuguese-administered island group off the coast of China, has limited representative government. Macau is regarded by both the Portuguese and the Chinese Governments as Chinese territory operating under Portuguese administration. Under a 1987 agreement between the two Governments, Macau will become a special administrative region of China in 1999.

Internal security is primarily the responsibility of the Ministries of Justice and Internal Administration. Security forces are fully controlled by and responsive to the Government.

Portugal has a market-based economy and is a member of the European Community. An increasing percentage of the population is employed in industry and services, while employment in the agricultural sector continues to decline. Unemployment in 1989 was low by European standards at under 7 percent; however, underemployment remains a chronic problem. Current government policies aim at encouraging investment, reducing inflation, and cutting the public sector deficit. In order to reduce government obligations, the Government initiated in 1988 a privatization program for state firms nationalized following the 1974 revolution.

The human rights situation in 1989 was stable. Government authorities continue to demonstrate respect for human rights. Civil rights are outlined in the Constitution in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. An ombudsman, elected by the Assembly of the Republic (legislature) to serve a 4-year term, is Portugal's chief civil and human rights officer. Any citizen may apply to him for relief. The Ombudsman receives about 3,500 complaints annually; the vast majority concern cases of alleged maladministration by the cumbersome bureaucracy.

The fundamental rights and guarantees contained in the Portuguese Constitution apply also to Macau. Violent repression of dissidents by authorities in the People's Republic of China (PRC) in the spring of 1989 left many in Macau concerned about the future, and Portuguese officials actively tried to reassure Macau residents that Portugal will remain concerned with their well-being. Under the terms of the 1987 agreement, Macau's current social, economic, and legal systems are to remain basically unchanged during the first 50 years after 1999.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Government-sanctioned political killings do not occur. There were no killings attributed to domestic terrorist groups.

PORTUGAL

b. Disappearance

Government or police authorities do not abduct, secretly arrest, or otherwise illegally detain persons. There were no abductions by terrorist organizations.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution forbids torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, as well as the use in criminal proceedings of evidence obtained under torture. There were no reports of complaints of such treatment in 1989.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Portuguese law, a prosecuting judge reviews the case against a person arrested and accused of a crime to determine whether that person should be detained or released on bail. A person may not be held for more than 48 hours unless a prosecuting judge orders preventive detention. Preventive detention is limited to a maximum of 4 months for each crime. Because of the cumbersome, backlogged judicial system, detention beyond 4 months is not unusual for major crimes such as murder or armed robbery. Detainees and persons in preventive detention have access to lawyers, who are generally effective in protecting their clients' rights.

Exile and incommunicado detention are illegal and not practiced in Portugal. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Portugal has an independent and impartial judicial system. All trials are public except those which may offend the dignity of the victim, such as in cases involving the sexual abuse of children. The accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty.

A clear procedural distinction is made between arrest and trial. A panel of three judges (which does not include the prosecuting judge) presides over cases which go to trial. A ministerial delegate assists the judges in reviewing the evidence. At the request of the accused, a jury may be used in trials for major crimes. The judges or jury may render the verdict. Sentence may be passed only in the presence of the defense attorney.

Portugal holds no political prisoners. Some radical leftist opponents of the regime have claimed that certain persons imprisoned for participation in terrorist organizations were political prisoners, including 64 persons found guilty of membership in FP-25 (translated as the "Popular Front of the 25th of April," referring to the April 25, 1974 revolution) and sentenced to prison terms in 1987. Most noteworthy of these was Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho, one of the leaders of the April 25, 1974 coup and convicted leader of the FP-25's shadowy "Global Project" organization, which advocates the overthrow of the Government by armed rebellion. Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho and 27 other defendants were released from prison in May on constitutional and procedural grounds, but an appeals court reaffirmed their convictions in September.

PORTUGAL

Carvalho and the other defendants remain at liberty, however, pending a ruling by the Supreme Court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution forbids forced entry into homes and searches without a judicial warrant. In addition, entry into a person's home at night requires the consent of the occupant. The State does not tamper with private correspondence or telephones except with a court order.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is provided for in the Constitution and respected by the State. The constitutionally mandated Council of Social Communication acts as a watchdog to protect freedom of speech and access to the media. The Council, whose members are elected by the Assembly of the Republic, makes recommendations to the Assembly and has enforcement powers. The academic community is free to express its views.

"Fascist organizations," however, are prohibited by law. In addition, a person may be prosecuted for "insulting" civil or military authorities if the "insult" is intended to undermine the rule of law. There were no prosecutions for "insult" in 1989.

Although the State owns both television channels, the provision of the Constitution making television a state monopoly was removed in 1989. There is as yet no firm schedule for the introduction of implementing legislation to authorize the operation of one or more private television stations, but the Government is committed to this step.

In principle, the Government does not exercise direct control over the state-owned television system, though it does wield considerable influence through personnel appointments. Opposition parties sometimes charge that the state network ignores or distorts opposition views and activities. Station news directors defend their decisions as based on editorial judgments, not political partisanship. All political parties use their legal right to "antenna time" during prime viewing/listening hours.

During 1989 the Government passed legislation permitting private radio stations to operate. As of October, more than 100 such local stations had been authorized and were on the air, breaking what had previously been the dominant role of the Catholic Church and two government networks.

The entire spectrum of political thought is represented in the Portuguese press. There is no press censorship. More than a dozen new national publications appeared in 1988-1989 and several more are planned. Their rise and fall is determined by economic and editorial competitiveness.

As a result of postrevolutionary nationalization of the banks, to which many of the newspapers were indebted, the State acquired title to a number of newspapers. These papers are editorially independent but state owned. The Government in 1989 sold three of these publications and announced that the two remaining state-owned papers would also be sold.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Persons have the right, in law and practice, to associate formally or informally and to promote nonviolent causes. Public meetings or protests require 24-hour advance notice to the civil governor of the region in which the event is to be held. Permission is routinely granted. The official registration of a new political party requires 5,000 signatures.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Portugal does not have a state religion. The Government does not interfere with the free practice of religion, missionary work, or religious publications. Organized religious groups may establish places of worship, train clergy, and proselytize without government interference. These freedoms extend to foreign clergy, many of whom work in Portugal. To qualify as tax-exempt institutions, religious groups must be established as nonprofit, private societies.

Roman Catholicism is the prevailing religion in Portugal. Catholic religious instruction is offered as an elective course in public schools. Other denominations offer religious education in their own institutions without interference. Success in a civil, military, professional, or political career does not depend upon adherence to a religious creed. There were no reported cases of religious persecution.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for freedom of movement, foreign travel, and emigration. There are no restraints on domestic travel or on the right of a person to change domicile. Some currency restrictions still affect travel. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

Displaced persons who qualify as refugees as defined by the United Nations are entitled to permanent resident status and work permits. Displaced persons are not forced to return to the country from which they fled.

The Macau Government has followed an unofficial policy since 1982 of towing all Vietnamese boat people arriving in Macau into or near Hong Kong territorial waters. This policy has the tacit cooperation of the Hong Kong Government. In July, according to reports by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Hong Kong Government, a boat carrying approximately 35 Vietnamese broke apart while being towed at high speed by Macau marine police. The Macau authorities reportedly towed the boat to a deserted Chinese island nearby and abandoned the refugees with no food, water, or other provisions. Two of the boat people eventually succeeded in reaching Hong Kong and gaining assistance from Hong Kong marine police. There were no fatalities. The Macau authorities denied any knowledge of this incident.

PORTUGAL

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Portugal is a multiparty, participatory democracy. Candidates for president and for legislative, regional, and municipal offices are freely nominated and elected by secret ballot on the basis of universal suffrage. The unicameral Assembly of the Republic is the legislative body. The Prime Minister is the head of the Government. Opposition parties and candidates operate freely and enjoy access to the media. General elections are held at least every 4 years. The President has a 5-year mandate and may not serve more than two consecutive terms.

In Macau, representative government exists on a limited basis. The 17-member Legislative Assembly is an organizational hybrid in which 6 members are chosen by means of universal, direct elections, 6 are indirectly elected by local communities' economic or cultural associations, and 5 are appointed by the Governor. There is also popular representation in the Consultative Council, an advisory group to the Governor. The Macau Government, by tradition, also consults informally on a regular basis with local business and cultural leaders.

Portugal cooperates with independent outside investigations of human rights conditions and actively participates in the monitoring of human rights by the Council of Europe. Portugal was elected to the United Nations Human Rights Commission in 1988 and plays an active role. International and local human rights groups operate freely in Portugal.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

There are no laws discriminating against any racial, ethnic, or religious group, nor does any group benefit from a privileged status in Portugal.

The civil code guarantees full legal equality for women. Women are increasing their representation in universities, business, science, government, and the professions. Traditional attitudes of male dominance persist but are changing gradually. The Commission on the Status of Women, an official organization established in 1976, is a leading advocate for women's rights.

Various women's groups in Portugal have drawn attention to the largely hidden problem of violence against women, particularly in the family. Portuguese law provides for criminal penalties in cases of violence between couples without referring specifically to wife beating. Women's groups point out that traditional attitudes discourage many women who suffer such violence from seeking recourse in the judicial system and complain that Portugal lacks official institutions established specifically to provide relief to battered women.

Reported cases of violence against women in Macau are not common. Macau's criminal statutes prohibiting domestic violence are enforced, and violators are prosecuted. Abuses are reported by police and doctors to the Social Welfare Department where they are investigated. If hospital treatment is required, a resident medical social worker offers the victim counseling and information on social welfare services. Battered women may be placed in public housing until their complaints are resolved, although there are no facilities reserved for battered women.

Because Macau's governmental and legal systems place a premium on knowledge of the Portuguese language and metropolitan law, top leadership positions in the territorial administration are almost without exception filled by officials recruited from Portugal. Nevertheless, efforts are under way to change this. Legislation is now being drafted in both Chinese and Portuguese, and both languages have equal status in the Legislative Assembly and Consultative Council.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to establish committees in the workplace "to defend their interests." The Constitution ensures the right to establish unions by profession or industry. Trade union associations are guaranteed the right to participate in the preparation of labor legislation. Strikes are permitted for any reason, including political causes. Lockouts are prohibited. These constitutional guarantees are respected in practice.

Neither the Government nor unions publish membership statistics. It is estimated that approximately one-third of Portugal's work force is unionized. There are two labor federations. The General Confederation of Portuguese Workers Intersindical (CGTP-IN) is controlled by the Communist Party and engages freely in cooperative activities with the Communist labor international, the World Federation of Trade Unions. The General Union of Workers (UGT) is a pluralist, democratic federation affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the European Trade Union Confederation. The UGT and the CGTP participate jointly in the annual meetings of the International Labor Organization.

Both federations and their affiliates function free of government control but are closely associated with political parties. The CGTP-IN generally supports the Communist Party's policies and causes. UGT leaders are associated with either the Socialist or Social Democratic Parties. Although some UGT leaders serve in Parliament, the federation pursues a generally independent path that occasionally puts it in conflict with the Socialist and/or Social Democratic Parties. The labor movement in Portugal exercises significant influence on social and economic policymaking.

In Macau, current laws recognize the freedom of workers to join unions and to strike. The Government neither impedes the formation of unions nor practices discrimination against union members. The PRC Government and the Chinese Communist Party do not exercise any direct control over Macau labor unions. Chinese mainland influence is considerable in a number of sectors, however. This influence has resulted in a quiescent labor movement in keeping with PRC aims to maintain domestic stability in Macau in the period up to 1999. Such influence indeed complements the local traditional view of unions as centers for social and cultural activities.

PORTUGAL

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions are free to organize without government or employer interference. Collective bargaining is guaranteed by the Constitution and practiced extensively in the public and private sectors. When collective bargaining fails, the Government, at the request of management and labor, may make a mediator available. When collective bargaining disputes lead to prolonged strike action in key sectors (for example, health and transportation), the Government is empowered to order the workers back to work for a specific period. The Government has rarely done so in practice. Union officials and members are protected by law against antiunion discrimination, and this law is observed in practice. There are no export processing zones in Portugal.

In Macau, unions tend to resemble traditional neighborhood associations, promoting social and cultural activities rather than issues related to the workplace. Local custom, moreover, favors employment without the benefit of written labor contracts, the exception being the import of labor from China which is under contract. Unions traditionally have not attempted to engage in collective bargaining. Accordingly, while the Macau Government does not impede or discourage collective bargaining, there are no government mechanisms to promote voluntary negotiations. There are no export processing zones in Macau.

A legal requirement for Government approval before collective agreements in public enterprises can become effective is the subject of a pending union complaint before the ILO.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

In both Portugal and Macau, forced labor is illegal and does not exist.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum employment age is 14 years. The Government has cited plans to boost the minimum age to 16 years once new educational reforms take effect. Child labor is not common but does exist. The UGT and CGTP-IN have charged that a number of "clandestine" companies in the textile, shoe, and construction industries in northern Portugal exploit child labor. The Government has acknowledged that abuses exist and has vowed to eliminate them but had not taken any steps by the end of the year.

In Macau, minors under the age of 14 are forbidden by law to work. Nevertheless, child labor reportedly is not uncommon in Macau.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

A national monthly minimum wage for full-time workers was first established in Portugal in 1974. Minimum wages for rural workers and domestic employees were legislatively established in 1977 and 1978 respectively. Except in 1982, minimum wages have been increased every year. The current minimum monthly wage for general workers is $203; for agricultural workers and domestics, it is $193 and $155 respectively. The minimum wage is generally enforced. Even with rent control and various social assistance subsidies, it is difficult for a single income family to maintain a decent standard of living on a minimum wage income, particularly in urban areas. Various social assistance subsidies are available to ameliorate the situation somewhat.

Workers receive a Christmas bonus equal to 1 month's salary. Workers are required by law to be granted an individual written contract which must include their professional category and salary, the work site, the starting date, and the duration of the contract (in the case of temporary workers). Employers are required to contribute to an employee's social security fund. The average workweek is 42 hours, and the Government has submitted a draft bill to reduce the maximum workweek to 44 hours. Current legislation limits regular hours of work to 8 hours daily and 48 hours per week. Overtime is limited to 2 hours per work period, up to 160 hours annually. Work on a normal day off is restricted to 8 hours. These limits are respected in practice. Workers are guaranteed 21 days of paid annual leave per year. The Ministry of Employment and Social Security monitors compliance with the above regulations through its regional inspectors.

Employers are required by law to hold accident insurance or to assume responsibility for accidents at the work site. Portugal has developed a compendium of legislation that regulates safety and health. Labor unions deem these regulations inadequate and continue to urge the Government to enact and enforce stiffer legislation.

In Macau, existing labor legislation provides for a 48-hour workweek (normally 8 hours per day and no more than 10.5 hours per day), overtime, annual leave, medical and maternity care, and employee compensation insurance. The Labor Department is responsible for processing complaints. However, government enforcement of the labor laws appears lax at times, partly owing to limited fiscal resources and personnel skills but also to a lack of policy emphasis. In the absence of any statutory minimum wage or publicly administered social security program, some large companies have provided private welfare and security packages. Candidates for public office in Macau have called for reform of the existing labor law, for medical insurance, a social security system, and increases in employee compensation. To offset the current labor shortage, the Macau Government allows the importation of labor from China under contract. There are heavy fines on employers harboring illegal immigrants. The number of imported workers in Macau is between 1,500 and 3,000 out of an estimated work force of 195,000.

ROMANIA

After 24 years of highly centralized and personal rule, Nicolae Ceausescu, President of the Socialist Republic of Romania and Secretary General of the Romanian Communist Party, was overthrown on December 22 by a spontaneous popular revolt, and a group of reform Communists, dissidents, intellectuals, students, and army generals called the National Salvation Front (NSF) took power. Ceausescu and his wife, Elena, the second most powerful figure in the country, were tried and convicted of genocide and other crimes by a secret military court and were executed on December 25. A provisional government formed by members of the NSF renamed the country Romania, declared its goal to be a pluralistic democracy, and called for free elections in April 1990.

Under Ceausescu, the powerful Department of State Security, known as the Securitate (organizationally under the Ministry of Internal Affairs), had among its major functions providing protection for the leadership and suppression of dissent and opposition of any kind. The NSF decreed the dissolution of the security services, which even after Ceausescu's death continued to battle the army and engage in acts of terror against the population.

The State controls all means of production. Only vestiges of private enterprise exist. In April the Government announced that it had paid off Romania's foreign debt, but there was no change in the stringent austerity program which has caused great hardship for the population. Shortages of consumer goods, rationed but often unavailable basic foodstuffs, rationed electricity, periodic lack of cooking gas, and breakdown of heating facilities characterized daily life. One of the NSF's first actions was to cancel the restrictions on heating and electricity and to divert food stocks reserved for export sale to domestic consumption.

Human rights were tightly circumscribed under Ceausescu's rule, and their observance in 1989 showed no improvement prior to the December revolution. Major problems included physical and mental abuse of prisoners, arbitrary arrest and detention, lack of fair trials, pervasive interference with privacy, family, home, and correspondence, and oppressive restrictions on freedom of speech, press, assembly, and association and worker rights, strict controls on religious activities, and denial of the right of citizens to change their government. Constant harassment by security forces stifled the expression of views different from those of the leadership. At least two secret trials of dissidents or of those related to dissidents occurred in 1989. Among the NSF's early decisions were those permitting the formation of political parties, freedom of speech, the press, assembly, association, and religion, and authorizing the release of all political prisoners. The NSF has also renounced the Communist Party's leading role in the State. At year's end, however, there was concern about the ability of other groups to mount effective opposition to the reform Communists and dissident members of Ceausescu's old regime that continued to lead the NSF. Ceausescu's severe repression so stifled dissent that there was no organized dissident activity to form a base of opposition.

Members of the Hungarian ethnic minority in Transylvania continued in 1989 to object to government policies which, they claim, erode their ethnic identity. The NSF promised full rights and equality for the members of all ethnic minorities.

ROMANIA

Rural "systematization," or the restructuring of rural Romania to eliminate half of Romania's 13,000 villages and move their inhabitants to regional "agroindustrial" centers, made little headway in 1989. The systematization of urban areas, including Bucharest, which had abruptly displaced thousands of people from their homes and had destroyed many historic buildings, homes, and churches, attracted international criticism. The NSF disavowed both programs.

The Government under Ceausescu tightly controlled religious practice. It did not approve longstanding applications for church building permits or for expansion and renovation of church premises, nor did it authorize a second printing of 5,000 Bibles which it had promised in 1988 to the Baptist Union. At year's end, Christmas services were broadcast in Romania for the first time in more than 40 years, and the NSF undertook to end restrictions against religious freedom.

The Government approved more emigration applications of Romanian citizens to the United States than in 1989 or 1988, but the authorities, contrary to the 1985 bilateral agreement, frequently denied jobs, housing, schooling, and medical care to those who applied for emigration, even before they had received U.S. entry documents. The NSF announced that it would permit freedom of travel and simplify the issuance of passports.

The following report primarily describes the human rights situation as it existed before December 22 when Ceausescu was overthrown. Some of the institutions and practices that led to widespread human rights abuses apparently were being changed at year's end, and the next annual report is likely to include a significantly different assessment of human rights practices.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

In their futile effort to crush antigovernment demonstrations in Timisoara, Bucharest, and other cities in mid-December, security forces loyal to Ceausescu indiscriminately killed hundreds, perhaps thousands, of unarmed civilians.

Under Ceausescu's rule, allegations continued to be made that some prisoners are mistreated to the point of causing their death. There are also credible reports that several priests who allegedly showed too much independence were beaten and one was killed in incidents which the Government attributed to common criminals. No suspects had been arrested by year's end.

b. Disappearance

Under Ceausescu's rule, there were some politically motivated temporary disappearances in 1989 but no confirmed, unresolved cases. Family and friends of persons arrested on political charges were frequently left unaware of their arrest, their circumstances, and their location for long periods of time.

ROMANIA

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were numerous reports during Ceausescu's rule that persons were mistreated while in Romanian prisons or police custody and that police authorities acted brutally to obtain information. Romanian authorities also used physical and mental degradation to intimidate those suspected of wrongdoing. Persons detained for questioning were often held incommunicado and kept for long periods without sleep, food, or access to toilet facilities. Those caught attempting to leave the country illegally, for example, were reportedly subject to physical and mental harassment, prior to being tried and sentenced. Reliable witnesses also reported incidents in which police administered severe beatings to persons arrested for minor infractions.

The most common complaints about mistreatment cited long periods of isolation, excessive use of force by guards, cells which are badly ventilated and poorly heated, bad food in inadequate quantities, difficult working conditions, and segregation of prisoners deemed "dangerous to the State" because of their religious beliefs or for other reasons.

Political prisoners who did not cooperate with their jailers reportedly were treated with great cruelty. They were generally kept apart from other offenders and restricted to their cells. Prison guards are said to have engaged in abusive behavior and allowed, and in some cases even encouraged, favored prisoners to punish those less favored.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, Exile

Romanian law provides for either a judge or a prosecutor to issue an arrest warrant. Once arrested, a person may be held without trial for up to 1 month before a hearing, but the prosecutor may obtain an extension for an additional 3 months. Thereafter the court may order further extensions in 30-day increments. There is no limit set by law on the total length of time a person may be held prior to trial. There is no provision for bail, although those accused of minor or nonviolent offenses can be set free on their own recognizance at the judge's discretion.

The law also provides for preventive detention. During Ceausescu's rule, persons detained for investigation often were held incommunicado. They were detained for varying periods of time, sometimes as long as several days, and then released without charge. Such arbitrary detention could be repeated several times, and the person could be called back repeatedly and threatened with further harassment or punishment.

During Ceausescu's rule, four persons were arbitrarily detained when they attempted to exercise their basic right to freedom of movement within Romania. One activist pastor was called in for questioning by police in order to make him miss a U.S. Embassy reception. Three other persons were detained (one on a charge of speeding) to prevent their attendance at a trial, and one of the three missed his own sentencing. This treatment was particularly common for religious activists and former political prisoners.

The Ceausescu regime did not use exile as a form of punishment. In many instances, it compelled persons to change their residence and employment. This action effectively constituted internal exile and was accompanied by extrajudicial house arrest or forced domicile. In the case of such house arrest, the detainee was severely restricted in his movements, and contact with others, especially foreigners, was either partially or completely shut off.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is constitutionally charged with defending the Socialist order and educating citizens to respect the law. No court has the authority to review the constitutionality of the laws. Theoretically, judges are independent and subject only to the law, but the outcomes of politically sensitive cases during Ceausescu's rule often appeared predetermined and at times contradicted evidence offered during the trial.

Most trials were held in public, though secret trials were common where state security was involved and could also be permitted in certain other cases. The law states that a trial may be held in secret if a public trial would be contrary to the interests of the State, Socialist morals, or the dignity of the individual. Under Ceausescu's rule, some former prisoners reported they were tried in secret by military courts on essentially political charges. Detailed sentences or records of trials for political crimes were generally not available, even to the accused. Four journalists who attempted to print an antigovernment manifesto were apparently tried in secret, convicted, and punished, and after release kept from all foreign contact. A Foreign Ministry official, who was arrested in January and charged with espionage, was tried and convicted in a secret trial before a military court. After Ceausescu's overthrow, he was released.

In one trial of a religious dissident prosecuted on charges of theft of state property, the authorities excluded all observers from the first session and tried to pack the court and exclude supporters of the defendants at the second session.

The ability of an accused person to defend himself or herself effectively was severely limited during Ceausescu's rule, especially in politically sensitive cases. The law in most cases requires that a defendant be represented by counsel, although some sources claimed that defendants did not always have an opportunity to consult with their attorneys before trial. The court may appoint an attorney to represent the defendant. In theory, a defendant has the right to choose another attorney, but in practice this right was severely restricted. Privately hired attorneys often refused to accept political cases. Acquittals in such cases were rare, and when defendants pursued their right to appeal, they sometimes received longer prison terms from the higher courts.

Many criminal laws are so worded that the authorities could charge persons coming under official scrutiny with some kind of offense. Examples of typical charges were "defaming the Socialist order" for speaking frankly to a foreigner; "disturbing the peace" or "illegal assembly" for private prayer meetings in the home; "social parasitism" if unemployed but technically guilty of no other offense; and "distributing literature without a license"--a felony--if caught attempting to transport or hand out free Bibles.

ROMANIA

The authorities frequently used "punishment at the workplace" as an alternative to incarceration. Those prosecuted and convicted for nonpolitical crimes, including most prosecutions motivated by the campaign against religion, were sometimes released from prison to forced labor, which allowed them to serve their sentence at their usual job, with lesser compensation, and live at home.

Prior to Ceausescu's overthrow, the number of political prisoners, including those convicted of trying to leave the country illegally and those tried with apparent political motivation for common crimes, was estimated at about 1,000. The NSF authorized the release of all political prisoners. On Christmas Day, Ceausescu and his wife, Elena, were tried by a secret military court and sentenced to death. The secret and summary nature of the proceedings did not accord with international norms of fair trial. Subsequent to the execution of Ceausescu and his wife on December 25, the NSF abolished the death penalty.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under Ceausescu's rule, Romanian laws and regulations governing the security apparatus sanctioned a high degree of interference with the individual and the family, which was somewhat mitigated by uneven enforcement, official corruption, and limitations on resources. Through intimidation and promises of material advantages, the security apparatus developed an extensive network of informers.

Deliberate and arbitrary interference with the privacy of the family, home, and correspondence was frequent. Searches were made of private homes, persons, and personal effects without search warrants or probable cause that a crime may have been committed. The authorities occasionally entered homes on the pretext of looking for building code violations, excessive consumption of electricity, illegal use of electrical appliances, etc. These searches facilitated the discovery of forbidden books and publications, religious materials, or any other evidence of "wrongdoing." Militiamen at checkpoints located on roads leading out of cities and at major highway intersections in the countryside randomly stopped and searched vehicles as a matter of course.

Until Ceausescu's overthrow, there was continued concern about the long-range plan to "systematize" or restructure rural Romania by eliminating approximately 6,000-7,000 of the some 13,000 Romanian villages and concentrating the population in over 500 towns to be redeveloped as "agroindustrial centers." There was also international concern and criticism over urban "systematization," especially in Bucharest where entire neighborhoods were torn down with a minimum of prior notification to residents, and many historic buildings, including churches, were destroyed. The NSF disavowed both programs.

The authorities had the capability to monitor domestic and international telephone calls and, under Ceausescu's rule, appeared to do so regularly. Under the NSF, the practice of monitoring calls appears to have been abandoned.

Romania's official policy during Ceausescu's regime was to encourage a higher birthrate, and it was considered the duty of every Romanian woman to produce five children. In order to prevent abortion, the authorities could compel a woman to show a doctor's certification as to whether she was pregnant or not. The NSF restored the right of a woman to choose whether to have an abortion or to carry the baby to term.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Under Ceausescu's rule, these freedoms, while recognized in principle, were severely restricted. Public expression of viewpoints at variance with official policy was almost always severely punished. While the Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, it prohibits their use for any purpose "hostile to the Socialist system," as defined by the State and party. Similarly, the penal code prohibits "propaganda with a Fascist character," any action aimed at changing the Socialist system, and acts endangering state security. These offenses are punishable by prison terms of up to 15 years. A 1971 law prohibits citizens from giving interviews to foreign media which "defame Socialist reality."

Under Ceausescu's rule, all media were state owned, rigidly controlled, and used primarily as vehicles for government and party propaganda. Government control of all necessary materials, such as newsprint, further limited the ability of the press to act independently.

The unauthorized importation or distribution of foreign publications was forbidden. In 1989 there were frequent reports of confiscations of foreign, including religious, materials at the border. Publications from the West or from other Communist countries were not generally available, although foreign cultural centers and libraries which are open to the public were allowed to distribute limited quantities of Western periodicals with government approval. Romanian libraries carefully controlled access to "restricted" materials, such as prewar historical texts. For live theater, official boards had to approve all new productions before the opening performance. Serial numbers and type-face samples of all typewriters had to be registered with the authorities, and the use of duplicating machines was strictly regulated. Western radio broadcasts in the Romanian language were not jammed and were a major source of both foreign and domestic news for the Romanian people. Academic freedom did not exist. Academics, writers, and journalists who dissented from officially sanctioned views were dismissed from their respective institutions.

The NSF restored freedom of speech and the press. While it controlled the national television and radio stations and their output of information, it did not interfere with the establishment of independent newspapers.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Under Ceausescu's rule, the Government attempted to control all group activity, and its permission was required for holding public meetings and forming associations. Peaceful assembly and association without permission were usually short-lived and could bring severe penalties to those involved. "Formation of a group" was a punishable offense applicable to groups as small as three persons.

ROMANIA

Citizens were required to obtain permission in advance to attend functions hosted by non-Romanians. Secret decrees promulgated late in 1985 and never officially published further discouraged contacts with foreigners and strengthened the requirement that all such contacts be reported to the authorities within 24 hours. In particular, Romanian writers, scientists, and professionals were reportedly forbidden to speak with their foreign counterparts without government permission.

The NSF has not interfered in any activities by independent interest groups. Political parties are in the process of being established with the NSF's consent.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for freedom of conscience, and the penal code prescribes a penalty of up to 6 months' imprisonment or a fine for anyone who impedes or disrupts any recognized religious sect. However, the Communist Party under Ceausescu's leadership officially promoted atheism, and the Government exercised broad control over religious practice. Although many Romanians feared that open exercise of their beliefs damaged their chances of social or professional advancement, religious practice remained very active.

There are 14 recognized religions, by far the largest being the Romanian Orthodox Church, to which about 80 percent of the population belongs. During Ceausescu's regime, most other denominations were of the opinion that the Orthodox Church received favored treatment from the Government, especially in the realm of finances and education. The Government subsidized clerical salaries (which some denominations did not accept), issued licenses to preach, controlled permits for church construction or renovation, severely limited the number of new admissions to seminaries, and controlled the importation and printing of religious materials, including Bibles. Government restrictions were usually directed against groups whose beliefs, in the Government's view, inspired "antisocial" or "antigovernment" behavior. Several of these were unrecognized religious groups, such as the Nazarenes and Jehovah's Witnesses. In 1989 there were no reports of significant restrictions on meetings held by these groups.

The Ceausescu regime remained in disagreement with the Roman Catholic Church, a majority of whose members are ethnic Hungarians, on a number of issues, and the Church technically remained without a government-approved charter. However, the church enjoyed de facto recognition and operated as if it were fully recognized.

The Government under Ceausescu did not recognize the Uniate Church, also known as the Catholic Church of the Byzantine Rite. This denomination was outlawed in 1948, and many of its leaders were imprisoned. Despite its unrecognized status, there remain adherents to this faith throughout the country. The Government also took active measures to suppress a revival movement within the Romanian Orthodox Church known as "The Lord's Army." Members of this group often met in small gatherings for prayer and Bible study, and they reported being fined for holding illegal assemblies. They also reported being subject to other harassment, such as loss of jobs or surveillance.

The rapid growth of evangelical denominations has led to pressures for more religious training, more printing of religious materials, and the expansion and construction of more churches. Conflicts between evangelical groups and the authorities arose frequently, and the Government's response was at times harsh. Activists who were vocal were kept under surveillance and often were subject to loss of jobs and social benefits, police intimidation or arrest, and in some cases, beatings.

Many religious denominations were able to publish a newspaper or newsletter on a regular basis. They were also permitted from time to time to publish other religious materials, although usually in small quantities. A second printing of 5,000 Protestant Bibles, under negotiation since 1987 between the Government and the Baptist Church, has still not taken place. The shortage of religious materials overall led some Romanians to risk severe penalties for smuggling Bibles and other religious literature.

Religious groups continued to be concerned over issues of maintenance, repair, and construction of church buildings. Extensive urban renewal projects, undertaken in Bucharest and other cities, continued to threaten churches of various faiths. The Government was often slow to approve the purchase or construction of replacement buildings for the affected congregations, for example, the second Baptist Church in Oradea. There is still no replacement for the large Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Bucharest, demolished in August 1985, although the denomination recently purchased a site. The congregation continues to meet in a temporary, tent-like structure inadequate to its needs. A replacement was finally found for the seminary demolished in 1988, and classes began in the fall of 1989.

Any repair or addition to a church building requires a building permit approved by both the local city council and the Government's Department of Religious Affairs. Church members state there were unreasonable delays in obtaining these approvals. A church could be demolished, or the congregation fined large sums, for infractions of the building codes. In past years, churches of various denominations were demolished or threatened with demolition under these regulations. The Comanesti Baptist Church was demolished in May, and four members of the church building committee were tried and convicted of theft of construction materials. The congregation was finally allowed to resume services in December in a private home but did not receive authorization to remodel the house to suit their needs. Their pastor was still not allowed to officiate at their services.

There is an active Jewish community organization which provides religious education to its members and enjoys relatively unrestricted freedom of emigration. Jewish leaders emphasize that, due to the level of emigration to Israel permitted by the Romanian Government, their numbers are declining, and they are permitted to maintain enough synagogues to meet their needs.

Leaders of religious denominations generally received permission to travel abroad on official business without difficulty. Foreign visitors preached occasionally in Romanian churches. There were three reported cases in 1989 of unofficially invited clergymen who were either told or asked to leave Romania by the authorities after their visits to Romanian churches.

ROMANIA

After the NSF took power, the Romanian Orthodox Church had its Christmas service broadcast over nationwide television. The NSF plans to eliminate restrictions on religious freedom.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Except for certain very limited military or other restricted areas (access prohibited) and border areas (access limited to residents of the areas and those with economic need to travel there), there are no official restrictions placed on travel within Romania. Most foreigners, including Western diplomats, are permitted to travel freely but often were kept under surveillance.

The right of citizens to change their place of residence is restricted. All citizens are required to have residence permits and may not legally move from one town to another, or between districts within a city, without official permission. Workers are technically free to change jobs, although antiunemployment laws and governmental controls may limit this freedom in practice.

Under Ceausescu's rule, travel outside Romania was treated as a privilege, frequently arbitrarily withheld, even for those who could "guarantee" their return by leaving a close family member behind. Employees generally had to obtain the approval of their "workers' committee" to apply for tourist passports. The NSF announced freedom of travel for all Romanians and the issuance of passports without delay.

In principle, the Government under Ceausescu continued to oppose emigration for any purpose but family reunification and sought to discourage those wishing to emigrate. The authorities sometimes refused arbitrarily to accept emigration applications from some Romanians. Romanians who applied for emigration or who held emigration approval were frequently harassed and discriminated against.

In February 1988, Romania renounced U.S. most-favored-nation tariff status, which was tied to Romania's emigration performance by U.S. trade legislation. The Government pledged to continue approving emigration applications for the purpose of family reunification, and the rate of approvals for emigration to the United States during 1989 was higher than either in 1987 or 1988.

A Romanian citizen who emigrates abroad must obtain the approval of the Government before resuming residence in Romania. Such approval was not always granted by the Ceausescu regime, but the NSF stated it would permit the repatriation of Romanians who had emigrated or sought asylum abroad. Several political exiles returned to Romania without incident by year's end.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Although the Constitution assures the right of Romanians to change their government and leaders, in practice they were unable to exercise this right under Ceausescu's rule. The Romanian Communist Party, led by Ceausescu, his wife, and a few advisers, ruled the country, tolerating no opposition and suppressing public criticism and dissent from their policies.

Officially, the Communist Party comprised about 16 percent of the total population or about one-third of the adult population. The Grand National Assembly (parliament) met for two short sessions every year and approved the President's decisions by unanimous vote. There is universal, compulsory suffrage for those over the age of 18.

Street demonstrations protesting Ceausescu's rule erupted in Timisoara in western Romania on December 17. Despite the intervention of the army and security forces, which caused many deaths, the protests continued in Timisoara and spread to other cities. Army units in many instances refused to fire on demonstrators, joining them instead. In Bucharest, thousands of people attending a large public meeting on December 21 shouted down Ceausescu instead of applauding him, and the security forces attempted unsuccessfully to suppress the protests by force, causing many casualties. When Ceausescu fled the city on December 22, a group of reform-minded Communists, dissidents, intellectuals, students, and generals assumed authority, calling itself the National Salvation Front.

The NSF, numbering 29 members at first and expanding to 145 members later, rules by decree through an 11-member executive committee. It promised free elections in April 1990 in which all political parties may participate. With the overthrow of Ceausescu and his execution, and the arrest of all members of the party's Political Executive Committee, the Communist Party was deprived of its leading role in the State, but members (or former members) of the Communist Party appear to be dominant in the NSF.

There are no human rights monitoring organizations operating in Romania. No outside groups were permitted to visit Romania to investigate alleged violation of human rights during Ceausescu's rule. The Government under Ceausescu did not comment officially on reports issued by governmental or nongovernmental organizations such as the Council of Europe, Amnesty International, or Freedom House, all of which were harshly critical.

Romania continued officially to proclaim that discussion and examination of its human rights situation was "unwarranted interference in domestic affairs," despite its professed support for human rights standards embodied in the United Nations Charter and the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE).

After Romania signed the Vienna Concluding Document of the CSCE, it announced that it did not consider itself bound by those parts of the document related to the human dimension (human rights), which it had tried but failed to amend. Romania consistently refused to respond to any request related to human rights. The NSF has pledged that Romania will faithfully observe its CSCE human rights commitments.

ROMANIA

The November 14-17 session of the International Labor Organization (ILO) Governing Body established a commission of inquiry to look into a complaint against Romania for employment discrimination against ethnic minorities. The Government rejected the decision as null and void, despite reminders of Romania's obligation as an ILO member to cooperate. The complaint refers to employment discrimination against the Hungarian minority.

In 1989 the Government sought to prevent a Romanian citizen, Dumitru Mazilu, from carrying out his responsibilities as special rapporteur to the U.N. Human Rights Commission, a position to which he had been named in 1985. Romanian representatives stated that Mazilu was too ill to prepare his report; Mazilu wrote U.N. officials that it was only the actions of his Government that impeded him. In spite of attempts to cut Mazilu off from all contact with the United Nations, he was somehow able to transmit his report, which was published in August. The Romanian authorities then intensified their surveillance and harassment of Mazilu and his family and blocked efforts by foreign diplomats to gain access to him. After Ceausescu's overthrow, Mazilu became First Vice Chairman of the NSF.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status.

According to official figures, about 12 percent (2.7 million) of Romania's 23 million citizens are members of ethnic minorities, including Hungarians, Germans, Gypsies, and many smaller groups. Based on a 1977 census utilizing self-declaration, the Government under Ceausescu stated that ethnic Hungarians make up the largest minority with some 1.7 million members. Some Hungarian sources claim the true figure for the ethnic Hungarian population is over 2 million.

Most minority groups are concentrated in Transylvania, the central and northwestern part of Romania. In recent years, Ceausescu's regime reduced the opportunities for minorities to have periodicals, theaters, and schools in their native language. The ability of members of minority groups to visit friends and relatives in neighboring countries was limited. Minority groups protested that government controls and restrictions constituted discrimination. Many observers maintained the Government under Ceausescu was pursuing a program of "Romanianization" in order gradually to absorb the minority groups into a unified Romanian culture. The Government denied discriminating against minority cultures.

There are no longer any television or radio broadcasts in the Hungarian language. Most Hungarian-language theaters now have a Romanian-language section. Hungarian- and German-language newspapers continue to be printed.

In the field of education, primary schooling is still available in Hungarian and German, and even in the native language of tiny minorities, such as Czechs in western Romania, although opportunities are shrinking. Under Ceausescu's rule, the number of ethnic Hungarian children being educated in Hungarian declined significantly. Several German-language high schools still operate, although they face declining enrollment of native German speakers because of the emigration of members of the ethnic German community. Several sources report that Hungarian-language sections in high schools have replaced what were formerly entirely Hungarian-language high schools. Except in a few departments, students can no longer take university entrance examinations in minority languages, and opportunities for university study in Hungarian have also decreased. Babes-Bolyai University in Cluj, formerly two universities, one conducting its courses in the Romanian language, the other in Hungarian, has increased its intake of ethnic Romanian students over the years and made Romanian the language of instruction in most subjects. All publications, including those in the languages of minority groups, must use the Romanian place names, not the Hungarian or German equivalents.

Ethnic Hungarians point to other government policies under Ceausescu they believe were designed to erode their cultural identity. Under a 1989 regulation, parents were no longer permitted to give their children Hungarian names which do not have Romanian equivalents. Members of the Hungarian minority claim that the Government used its controls over residence permits, employment, and study opportunities to dilute the concentration of the Hungarian population in its traditional centers. The Government maintained that demographic changes in Transylvania are natural and result in part from increased industrialization which has drawn ethnic Romanian workers into urban areas formerly inhabited predominantly by ethnic Hungarians.

Women are constitutionally accorded the same rights and privileges as men. The Government under Ceausescu sought to upgrade the role of women in society with specific policies in the areas of education, access to employment, and comparable wages.

There is no information available on the extent to which violence against women, including wife beating, may occur. The Government during Ceausescu's rule gave no indication through the controlled press or through legislation that it perceived a problem, and neither the Communist-controlled women's organization nor independent human rights activists addressed this subject.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Although the Constitution stipulates the right to join a union, the labor code states that the primary function of the trade unions is to "mobilize the masses for the fulfillment of the Communist Party's program," and trade unions independent of the party were prohibited. Romania's single trade union system is imposed by law. The Labor Code entrusts the party-controlled General Confederation of Trade Unions (UGSR) with exclusive responsibility to represent the workers before the Government. Under Ceausescu's rule, workers did not have the right to form their own associations, elect representatives, or affiliate with international organizations except through the official unions. Attempts to form independent groups or unions were quickly suppressed.

Romania's labor code is silent on the right to strike, except to elaborate procedures by which the union leadership is required to mediate disputes between the workers and management, with recourse to the courts when the dispute cannot be settled. In practice, sanctions available to the party and the union made it unlikely that such disputes would reach the courts or be settled in a manner favorable to the worker rather than to the Government. Individual workers who have been dismissed from their jobs may sometimes take their case to civil court. Under Ceausescu's rule, the Government's reaction to actual strikes, or to advocacy of the worker's right to strike, was harsh repression. Worker demonstrations in Brasov in 1987 were swiftly suppressed by the Government. There were no confirmed reports of strikes or protests since then--until the dramatic wave of political protests in December 1989.

In 1987 Romania lost its eligibility for the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) tariff treatment after the U.S. Government found that Romania was not taking steps to afford its workers internationally recognized worker rights.

In 1989 the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) lodged a complaint in the ILO alleging that the Government resorted to acts of reprisal and repression (discriminatory measures, imprisonment, violence, dismissals, and demotions, as well as forced labor) against individuals who attempted to form trade unions outside the official labor central or who participated in protest movements or strikes. The ICFTU cited the June 1988 arrest of 34 workers from an armaments factory who had met to discuss the creation of an independent union. It also charged that between 50 and 80 workers had been reported missing since the demonstrations which took place in Brasov in November 1987 and that several dozen workers were still under detention in 1989 despite an amnesty decreed in 1988. These charges were extensively aired by several ILO supervisory bodies in 1989. In addition, the ILO's Governing Body, in November 1989, established a Commission of Inquiry to look into another complaint against Romania for employment discrimination against ethnic minorities.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers do not have the right to organize or bargain collectively. Wages are set in Romania by central planning boards. While workers nominally have a direct voice in the management of the workplace through the unions that all must join, in most factories during Ceausescu's regime the union's chief executive was also the senior party official, and a primary function of the unions was to channel party doctrine and directives to the workers. Unions also dispensed social benefits, such as vacations at union-owned hotels (for which the member pays only a fraction of the real cost), low-interest loans, and access to cultural, educational, and other leisure activities.

The institution of unrealistic production and sales quotas during Ceausescu's rule and penalties in the form of salary deductions for failure to meet them increased worker dissatisfaction. No mechanism existed by which the workers could protest such arbitrary reductions in pay. The worker demonstrations in Brasov in 1987, which were suppressed by the Government, were called to protests pay cuts and poor living conditions.

There are no export processing zones in Romania.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The labor code stipulates that each citizen over the age of 16 has the right and the duty to work. Unemployment is a crime

ROMANIA

("social parasitism"). With certain exceptions, such as housewives, full-time students, and private farmers, any unemployed able-bodied citizen must report to a government employment bureau for placement in a job. A 1976 law states that persons who refuse to take up gainful employment may be fined or assigned to positions in the construction, agricultural, or other sectors of the economy where they are required to complete 1 year of service.

Since 1985 the Committee of Experts of the ILO has observed that these provisions of Romanian law appear to constitute forced labor in that they are an obligation to work under the menace of penalties. At the 1988 ILO Conference of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Romanian Government took the position that these laws served to encourage able-bodied citizens to contribute productively to society and that the sanctions provided for by law had never been applied. Other sources note, however, that individuals were frequently convicted for "social parasitism" under a 1968 law which provides imprisonment as a sanction for persons not gainfully employed.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no specific minimum employment age, although Romanian law requires schooling to age 16. According to the employment code, children over 16 not enrolled in full-time schooling are expected to work. Youths 14 years of age may be employed in temporary jobs, and youths of 15 may be employed in industrial work, so long as the employer provides continuing educational opportunities and shows that the work being performed is "appropriate for the age and condition" of the employee. In such cases, the law limits work to 6 hours per day. Children from age 11 may work in the fields or in other "patriotic labor," usually as part of a school or other group activity.

b. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Constitution provides for an 8-hour workday (a 6-hour day for arduous occupations), a 24-hour rest period each week, paid vacations, and the "right to leisure." The monthly minimum wage is equivalent to $220 at the official exchange rate. It is difficult if not impossible to maintain an adequate standard of living at average wage levels. Labor law elaborates further on these standards but allows employers to override them "if conditions warrant." In 1989 there were widespread reports of workers required to perform extra, uncompensated labor to make up for lagging production or for official holidays. Workers also reported that wages and salaries were cut when an enterprise failed to meet its production quota, even though production shortfalls were often due to the lack of raw materials or insufficient electric power.

The labor code promises Romanian workers a safe environment, and the Ministry of Labor has established safety standards for most industries and is responsible for enforcing them. In practice, however, observers report that conditions in many factories present substantial health and safety hazards. Unions theoretically also have a responsibility to protect worker health and safety. Although management and unions are reportedly aware of these deficiencies in most cases, the Ceausescu regime's emphasis on meeting production goals took precedence over safety and health factors in light of Ceausescu's insistence on rapidly paying off the foreign debt.

and on pursuing industrial and economic development at all cost. A government-run institute devoted to worker safety and health concerns has existed since 1968. It is relatively small and does not appear capable of challenging unrealistic government production targets or eliminating hazardous working conditions, but it does work to ameliorate extreme conditions in some factories (workers receive supplementary benefits in some hazardous occupations).

SPAIN

Spain is a parliamentary democracy with a constitutional monarch, Juan Carlos I. In free and open parliamentary elections in October, Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez was elected to a third term. The fundamental rights of speech, assembly, press, religion, movement, and participation in the political process are guaranteed in the Constitution of 1978 and are respected in practice.

The security forces are under the full control of the Government. This was last demonstrated in 1988 when three police officers were each sentenced to 29 years in prison for their role in the 1983 disappearance and presumed death of a prisoner.

The Spanish economy is mixed, with primary reliance on private initiative and market mechanisms. Spain continues to experience high unemployment, although the economy is growing and unemployment dropped in August to its lowest level since October 1983. High unemployment is due in part to the entry of new workers into the labor force. Women and youth are disproportionately affected by the high level of unemployment.

In 1989 the human rights situation continued to be dominated by the protracted campaign of terrorism waged by the Basque separatist group ETA (Basque Fatherland and Freedom). The Government continued its efforts to bring individual terrorists to justice while adhering to democratic standards of due process and civil rights. Suspected terrorists arrested and charged with crimes frequently assert that they were abused by police. In 1989 there were no confirmed cases of police abuse.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were approximately 42 terrorist-related incidents from January through September 1989 in which 12 people were killed and 18 injured. Of those killed, five were Spanish National Police, one a civil guard, three military personnel, and three civilians. All of the deaths and most of the injuries occurred during actions claimed by or attributable to ETA. In July ETA shot to death two military officers as they drove down a street in Madrid. In September, also in Madrid, ETA gunmen assassinated a public prosecutor involved in the cases of several ETA terrorist suspects. Several days later, two ETA members were killed in an armed confrontation with members of the Guardia Civil. In a subsequent series of raids and arrests, Spanish authorities claimed to have effectively dismantled the "Araba Command," one of ETA's most violent cells. In September two civil guards were gravely wounded in a bomb attack on their barracks in Gerona by the Catalan separatist group Terra Lliure.

The Government held intermittent talks with ETA in Algeria during the past several years in an attempt to end the violence. The talks broke down in early 1989, however. On April 7, a 3-month truce by ETA effectively came to an end when the group set off a series of bombs. Since then, ETA has continued an intermittent campaign of bombings. Since 1987 there has been close and effective cooperation between the Spanish and French Governments in the fight against ETA terrorism.

Two ranking police officers are in prison awaiting trial on charges that they organized a secret antiterrorist assassination band, the Antiterrorist Liberation Group (GAL), which took credit for the killings of alleged Spanish Basque terrorists in Southern France from 1983 to 1986. They were arrested in May 1988. The delay in bringing the two policemen to trial is not unusual for a criminal case. The law provides for maximum imprisonment of 2 years before trial.

b. Disappearance

Kidnapings for ransom are occasionally carried out by ETA. There are no claims that police or government security forces carried out secret arrests or kidnapings.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no documented instances of police abuse during 1989, although ETA detainees routinely charge that they are abused during detention. An improved police attitude with respect to human rights over the past several years may be attributed to enhanced police discipline, the willingness of the Government to punish improper police behavior, publicity in the press, and concern by the police unions themselves with denunciations of police misconduct.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Constitution, a person is free from arbitrary arrest and detention, and normally a suspect may not be held more than 72 hours without a hearing. The Penal Code, as reformed in 1988, permits a suspected terrorist to be held an additional 2 days without a hearing.

Exile is not practiced in Spain. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for an independent judiciary and the right to a fair public trial. This right is observed in practice. Defendants have the right to be represented by an attorney, at state expense for the indigent. The right to be released on bail is guaranteed, unless the court has reason to believe a suspect may flee or constitute a serious threat to public safety. The law provides for an expeditious judicial hearing following arrest. Suspects may not be imprisoned for more than 2 years before being brought to trial. In practice, the delay generally is less than 1 year. In cases of petty crime, suspects released on bail may face a wait of as long as 5 years before their trial comes up. Following a conviction, defendants may always appeal to the next highest court. The European Court of Human Rights is the final arbiter in cases concerning human rights.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution protects the privacy of the home and correspondence. Under the Criminal Code, government authorities must obtain court approval before searching private property, wiretapping, or interfering with private correspondence. The present antiterrorist law gives discretionary authority to the Minister of Interior to act prior to obtaining court approval "in cases of emergency." There have been no complaints that the Minister has abused this authority.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government scrupulously observes the guarantees of free speech and press provided for in the Constitution. Opposition viewpoints are freely expressed in speech and through the media. In 1989 the Government approved a law allowing three new private television stations to begin broadcasts.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

As provided in the Constitution, all groups have the right of free assembly and association for political or other purposes. This right is fully respected and freely practiced.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Spain. Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion, but other religions are represented and function with full freedom. Adherence to a particular faith neither enhances nor diminishes a person's status.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Spanish citizens have complete freedom to travel within and outside the country. The Government restricts neither emigration nor repatriation. The law on aliens permits detention of a person for up to 40 days prior to expulsion but specifies that the detention may not take place in a prison-like setting. Spain has a liberal refugee law. Generally, the Government grants refugee status on the recommendation of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Spain is a multiparty democracy with open elections in which all citizens over the age of 18 have the right to vote. At all levels of government, elections must be held every 4 years. Opposition parties and groups take an active part in the political process.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government cooperates readily with international human rights groups, such as Amnesty International and the International Committee of the Red Cross, as well as with independent national groups, such as the Spanish Human Rights Association. The Foreign Ministry, through an Office of Human Rights Affairs, takes an active interest in human rights issues internationally.

SPAIN

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution provides for equal rights for all citizens. Education and economic and social services are generally available to all without discrimination of any kind. An independent ombudsman actively investigates complaints of human rights abuses by the authorities. The Constitution promises equal rights to women, and the Government has indicated its intent to eliminate discrimination against women wherever it occurs.

The Women's Institute, a government agency under the Ministry of Social Affairs, actively promotes social equality, women's mobility, and the participation of women in political, cultural, economic, and social life. However, traditional attitudes result in de facto discrimination against women in a number of areas.

The Government and the largest labor union confederation are active in trying to increase public awareness of sexual harassment as a problem in the workplace. In February the Government passed a law making it easier for women to file charges of sexual harassment. The Government also funded a project to develop new schoolteaching materials designed to eliminate sexually stereotyped job roles.

The Government has identified domestic violence against women, especially wife beating, as a social problem. The Women's Institute reports that, in 1988, 14,711 complaints were filed by women against their husbands and that 11,060 of these complaints involved charges of physical abuse. Spanish law treats wife beating as a form of assault and battery. Punishment is accordingly meted out according to damage done. In 1987 a law was passed recognizing the concept of marital rape. This law took effect in 1988.

Several levels of government provide a number of institutional remedies, such as shelters for battered women. The Government also is attempting through education to change public attitudes that contribute to violence against women. The Women's Institute has charged that some judges are reluctant to get involved in what they feel should remain a domestic problem. Similarly, in smaller towns some police officers have been reluctant to accept complaints from battered women. To deal with this problem, the Ministry of the Interior initiated a program in 1986 that created special sections within police departments to deal with violence against women, staffed by specially trained women.

Gypsies are a minority group representing 3 percent of the Spanish population. Despite their constitutional rights, they suffer de facto discrimination in housing, schools, and jobs. Legal mechanisms exist by which they can seek redress, for example, from discrimination by an employer. As a practical matter, however, Gypsies do not normally seek such redress. The Government has stated its commitment to securing equal rights and treatment for Gypsies. A representative of the Gypsy community serves as special advisor to the Minister of Interior.

SPAIN

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

All workers except those in the military services are entitled to form or join unions of their own choosing without previous authorization. The only requisites for forming a union are a group of more than two persons and registration with the Ministry of Labor and Social Security. There are no limitations on the right of association for workers in special economic zones. According to the European Commission, 11 percent of the Spanish work force is unionized.

Under the Constitution, trade unions are free to choose their own representatives, determine their own policies, represent their members' interests, and strike. They are not restricted or harassed by the Government. A strike is legal when it fulfills the requirement of 3 days' prior notice in the private sector and 5 days in the public sector. Illegal strikes are rare. Strikes affecting essential services must respect legal minimum service requirements, which are negotiated between the Government and the unions.

Spanish unions are free to form or join federations, confederations, and international bodies. Two major unions, the General Workers Union and the Basque Solidarity Union (ELA/STV) are members of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the European Trade Union Confederation. ELA/STV and the United Workers Union are also members of the World Confederation of Labor.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively was established by the Workers Statute of 1980. Trade union and collective bargaining rights were extended to all workers in the public sector, except the military services, in 1986. Public sector collective bargaining is restricted in those aspects that require approval of Parliament, i.e., salaries and employment levels. Collective bargaining is widespread in both the private and public sectors. Sixty percent of the working population is covered by private sector collective bargaining agreements, although only a minority are actually union members. Labor regulations in free trade zones and export processing zones are the same as in the rest of the country. There are no restrictions on the right to organize or on collective bargaining in such areas.

The law prohibits discrimination by employers against union members and organizers. Discrimination cases have priority in the labor courts. No statistics are available on the number of antiunion discrimination complaints. One practice which the unions consider discriminatory is the use by employers of temporary employment contracts. Around 26 percent of the work force is employed under this type of contract. The unions believe that employees engaging in union organizing under this type of contract are frequently not allowed to renew their contracts. This issue is the subject of a union complaint pending before the International Labor Organization.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is outlawed in Spain and is not practiced. Legislation is effectively enforced.

SPAIN

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The legal minimum age of employment as established by the Workers Statute is 16 years. The Ministry of Labor and Social Security is primarily responsible for enforcement. The minimum age is effectively enforced in major industries and in the service sector. It is more difficult to control on small farms and in family-owned businesses. Legislation prohibiting child labor is effectively enforced in the special economic zones. The Workers Statute also prohibits the employment of persons under 18 years of age at night, for overtime work, or in sectors considered hazardous by the Ministry of Labor and Social Security and the unions.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Workers in general have substantial, well-defined rights. A 40-hour workweek is established by law. Spanish workers enjoy 12 paid holidays a year and a month's paid vacation. All workers receive 12 monthly paychecks a year plus 2 bonus checks equivalent to an additional 2 months' salary. The legal minimum wage for workers over age 18 is 14 "monthly" paychecks amounting to $5,320 a year, which is sufficient for a worker's decent standard of living. Minimum wages for those aged 16 and 17 are less. The minimum wage rate is revised every year in accordance with the consumer price index.

Government mechanisms exist for enforcing working conditions and occupational health and safety conditions, but bureaucratic procedures are cumbersome and inefficient.

SWEDEN

Sweden is a constitutional monarchy and a multiparty, parliamentary democracy. The King is Chief of State. All executive authority is vested in the Cabinet, which is formed through direct parliamentary elections every 3 years and consists of the Prime Minister (Head of Government) and some 20 ministers. The Social Democratic Party, Sweden's largest, retained power in the September 1988 elections.

The police, all security organizations, and the armed forces are controlled by and responsive to the civilian government and, with very few exceptions, are scrupulous in their protection of human rights. Either the Government, the judicial system, the Parliament, or an ombudsman investigates thoroughly any allegations of human rights violations.

Sweden is an advanced industrial democracy with a high standard of living, extensive social services, and a mixed economy. Over 90 percent of businesses are privately owned.

Private persons are entirely free to express their political preferences, pursue individual interests, and seek legal resolution of disputes. Ombudsmen, appointed by the Parliament but with full autonomy, investigate private complaints of alleged abuse of authority by officials and prescribe corrective action, if required.

Respect for human rights is a basic social value that underlies Sweden's active support of international efforts to improve human rights observance. The human rights situation was largely unchanged in 1989. Some human rights organizations, such as the Swedish section of Amnesty International, again complained about human rights violations, particularly with reference to refugees seeking asylum who are rejected at the border. There have also been complaints about individual Kurds who have been found deportable as suspected terrorists. They have not been deported, however, since they would face possible death penalties or other severe punishments in their countries of origin. These Kurds are restricted to their resident municipality and are not free to travel in Sweden.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Killing for political motives by the Government or by domestic opposition groups does not occur.

b. Disappearance

Abduction, secret arrests, and clandestine detention by Swedish authorities do not occur.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Swedish law prohibits these abuses, and such prohibitions are respected by Swedish authorities. Occasional accusations against individual policemen for excessive use of force in connection with arrests are carefully investigated and have not produced evidence of a systematic problem. Three police officers were suspended and six subjected to other disciplinary actions after investigations.

After a report was made public about the degrading treatment of some detainees, the Swedish Red Cross offered to provide Swedish citizens as witnesses to assist foreign detainees in Stockholm police custody. No actual proof of degrading treatment could be found, but two guards were given other assignments.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Statutory guarantees of individual liberty are observed. Persons disturbing public order or considered dangerous may be held for 6 hours without charge. Criminal suspects may be held no longer than 12 hours without formal charges. If a person files for bankruptcy and refuses to cooperate with the official investigation, a court may order detention for up to 3 months (with judicial review every 2 weeks). Arrest is public and by warrant. Legislation that took effect in 1988 to reduce the time between detention and arraignment from 5 days to 48 hours has been criticized, particularly by prosecutors. The short time during which prosecutors have to reach a decision has led to an increase in arraignments. In particularly difficult cases, the time between arrest and the first court hearing may be extended to 96 hours. Bail does not exist, but suspects not considered dangerous or likely to destroy evidence are released to await trial. By law, Swedish citizens may not be deported. Convicted foreign criminals are often deported at the conclusion of their prison terms, unless they risk execution or other severe punishment at home.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution forbids deprivation of liberty without public trial by a court of law. The judiciary functions freely and independently. The accused has the right to counsel. Since 1983, however, budget cutbacks have restricted the availability of public defenders to cases where the maximum penalty could be a prison sentence of 6 months or more. Convicted persons may appeal to a court of appeals, and in some cases also to the Supreme Court. There are no military courts in peacetime.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Freedom from these offenses is provided for by law. Home searches are limited to investigations of crimes punishable by at least 2 years' imprisonment, such as murder, robbery, rape, arson, sabotage, counterfeiting, and treason. Search warrants are granted only on the basis of well-founded suspicion. Wiretaps are permitted only in cases involving narcotics or national security. Searches and wiretaps normally require court approval. When the time factor is critical, or when life is believed to be in immediate danger, the ranking police officer may approve these measures. Limitations on such police decisions were introduced in 1988.

Human rights groups in Sweden have expressed concern about the increased number of wiretaps. The number of persons subjected to wiretaps, excluding those in connection with the Palme murder investigation, reached a high of 414 in 1984 but dropped to 213 in 1986 and to 197 in 1987. There have been public reports that illegal wiretaps and bugging were used by the Swedish secret police both in the Palme murder investigation and in a case involving a Soviet diplomat who later was expelled for industrial espionage. These reports, which caused a political scandal, are to be investigated by the parliamentary Constitutional Committee.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Swedes enjoy these freedoms fully. Newspapers and periodicals are for the most part privately owned. Government subsidies to daily newspapers, regardless of political affiliation, assure the expression of differing opinions. Swedish radio and television broadcasting is a government monopoly. An increasing number of Swedes are able to view foreign television broadcasts on cable.

Publications containing sensitive national security information as well as film and television programs portraying excessive violence are subject to censorship. Commercial video tapes are also screened and banned if they contain scenes of unacceptable violence.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Swedes exercise these freedoms without restraint. Public demonstrations require a police permit, for which applications are routinely approved.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Swedes have unimpaired religious freedom. There is a state Lutheran Church, supported by public funds, but all faiths are freely observed. Parents have full freedom to teach their children religious practices of their choice.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within and from the country and voluntary repatriation are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Refugees, displaced persons, and others seeking political asylum are on the whole generously treated, though long waits and denial of asylum requests from applicants not meeting internationally agreed criteria have become common.

Some travel restrictions were imposed on certain Kurds, who were to be deported after serving prison terms for terroristic crimes. Since it was legally impossible to deport the Kurds, because they faced possible execution or other severe penalties in their home countries, Swedish authorities have restricted their movement to their respective communities of residence.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Sweden has a long history of vigorous democratic political life within a representative, multiparty parliamentary system. The 349 seats in the unicameral Parliament are divided proportionally among the 6 political parties currently represented. To enter Parliament, a party must win a minimum of 4 percent of the votes cast. For the first time in 70 years, a new party, the Greens, secured enough votes to be represented in Parliament. There is universal suffrage above the age of 18. Voting is not compulsory, but approximately 85 percent of eligible voters participated in the 1988 election. Aliens who have been legal residents for at least 3 years have the right to vote and run for office in municipal elections. There has been periodic discussion about extending this right to national elections.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Ombudsmen serve as official governmental monitors of individual rights in Sweden, effective both in making citizens aware of their rights and publicizing and correcting abuses of state authority. Active private organizations monitor issues such as the impact on individuals of comprehensive social legislation and the condition of the native Lapp population. Government agencies are in close contact with a variety of local and international groups working in Sweden and abroad to improve human rights observance. State-supported Stockholm University offers instruction in making human rights complaints to bodies such as the European Commission of Human Rights. The Government also published a pamphlet on the matter in 1989, which was widely distributed free of charge.

In 1989 Sweden was criticized in three instances for violations of human rights by the European Commission of Human Rights. In all three cases, Swedish authorities took steps to provide redress to the complainant. Sweden is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission (UNHRC).

Basic human needs for the entire population are thoroughly met without discrimination. The State provides social welfare and medical services, benefits to families, pensions, and disability and unemployment insurance. The Government runs special programs to help immigrants adjust to Swedish life and culture (including 240 hours of paid language instruction).

Two of Sweden's 284 municipalities refused to permit refugees to settle in them. Both the Government and the political parties tried to persuade these communities to change their attitude. In a local referendum in connection with the 1988 elections, 70 percent of the voters in one municipality voted to exclude refugees. The mayor of that town was expelled from his party, the Center Party. However, studies show that a majority of Swedes have a positive attitude towards refugees.

Certain refugee groups, particularly those from the Middle East, complained that their relatives had difficulties in obtaining visitor visas for Sweden. Sweden has been restrictive in issuing such visas because many of these visitors apply for asylum upon arrival in Sweden.

The Government supports groups working against racism. Swedish schools seek to provide education and information designed to counter racist tendencies. In 1986 the Government appointed a special ombudsman to deal with complaints of racism and discrimination. As a result, the number of civil and criminal complaints being filed has increased.

In October 1985, the UNHRC carried out a study on Sweden. The Commission commented upon the fact that Sweden lacks forceful legislation against racism. Sweden's answer was that such legislation would not be compatible with the Swedish Constitution, which guarantees full freedom of speech and the right to form organizations. However, a government commission was set up to study methods of stopping racist groups. The Commission presented its final report in February 1989. The report recommended legislation banning extremist racist groups and additional measures to discourage expressions of racism. The Government is studying the Commission's recommendations.

Institutionalized efforts to extend equality between the sexes continue. A law adopted in 1988 aims at promoting equality in five general areas: in the labor market, in education, within families, and in terms of women's role in the economy and women's influence in society. A public ombudsman, called the Equality Ombudsman, investigates complaints of sex discrimination in the labor market. Employers are required to base hiring decisions on merit and to pursue actively the goal of equality.

Abuse against women has received a great deal of attention by the Government. Studies have been conducted to survey the cause and pattern of rapes and other forms of abuse. A temporary increase in street rapes in 1988 was the reason for one of the studies, but the rape rate during 1989 has been at the same level as in 1987. Thirty-six percent of convicted rapists were foreign nationals, although immigrants make up only 10 percent of the population. Researchers, however, believe that one cause for this may be that rapes perpetrated by foreign nationals are reported more frequently than those committed by native Swedes.

In recent years, many old laws have been amended and new laws added to protect abused women from having their abusers contact them or find out their whereabouts. In a few cases women have been helped to obtain new identities and homes. Both national and local governments support voluntary groups that provide shelter and help to abused women. The Government is continuing to investigate whether the increase in reported rapes and abuse of women represents an actual increase or reflects an improved awareness by women of their rights. Men who rape or abuse women are provided rehabilitative treatment.

Section 6 Workers Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers have the right to associate freely and to strike. A large majority of the working population, including career military personnel and civilian government officials, belongs to trade unions. Unions conduct their activities with complete independence from the Government and freely affiliate with international organizations.

Several strikes took place in 1989, some of them wildcat strikes. Most strikes were in the public sector in protest against reductions in the work force and the failure to meet demands for large salary increases.

SWEDEN

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers are free to organize and bargain collectively. Swedish law fully protects workers from antiunion discrimination and has sophisticated and effective mechanisms for resolving disputes and complaints. There are no export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited in law and does not exist in Sweden.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Compulsory education ends at age 16, and full-time employment is normally permitted at this age under supervision of local municipal or community authorities. Young people under age 18 may work only during daytime and under a foreman's supervision. During the summer and in vacation periods, children as young as 13 years of age may be hired for part-time work or light "summer jobs" for periods of 5 days or less, although it is rare for young people under 15 years of age to find a job except with family members.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no minimum wage law. Wages are set by collective bargaining contracts which typically are applied in nonunion establishments as well. Even the lowest paid workers are able to maintain a decent standard of living. A designated and trained trade union steward monitors observance of the regulations governing working conditions.

The standard legal workweek is 40 hours, although collective bargaining agreements can provide for shorter or longer workweeks. The amount of permissible overtime is also regulated, as are rest periods. Sweden has a vacation law which guarantees all employees a minimum of 5 weeks' paid annual leave. A gradual increase to 6 weeks' annual leave will take effect by 1993.

Occupational health and safety rules are closely observed. Safety ombudsmen have the authority to stop life-threatening activity immediately and call for a labor inspector. The Swedish courts have upheld this authority. Swedish authorities are studying as many as 400,000 jobs to compile a list of those that are most dangerous and cause long-term health problems, and are actively trying to improve the situation for those employees.

SWITZERLAND

Switzerland is a constitutional democracy with a federal structure. Federal legislative power is vested in a bicameral legislature. Given its linguistic and religious diversity, Switzerland has developed a political system based on considerable autonomy for its 26 cantons and on local and national political consensus.

The Swiss armed forces are a militia based on universal military service for able-bodied males. There is virtually no standing army apart from training cadres and a few essential headquarters staff functions. Police duties are primarily a responsibility of the individual cantons, which have their own distinct police forces. The National Police Authority has a coordinating role and relies on the cantons for actual law enforcement.

Switzerland has a mature, free-enterprise, industrial and service economy which is highly dependent on international trade. There has been virtual full employment and labor peace for many years. The standard of living is one of the highest in the world.

There were no significant human rights problems during 1989. Switzerland maintained its own strong association with human rights issues, exemplified by hosting the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva. The headquarters of the the International Labor Organization and the International Committee of the Red Cross are located in Switzerland.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no political killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abductions, secret arrests, or clandestine detention.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution provides freedom from all of the above, and there were no allegations of any violations.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile is provided by law. A detained person may not be held longer than 24 hours without a warrant of arrest issued by the magistrate conducting the preliminary investigation. A suspect must immediately be shown the warrant and has the right to contact legal counsel as soon as a warrant is issued. A suspect may be detained with a warrant until an investigation is completed, but the length of investigative detention is always reviewed by higher judicial authority, and investigations are typically completed quickly. Release on personal recognizance or bail is granted unless the examining magistrate believes the person is a danger to society or will not appear for trial. There is no summary exile, nor is exile used as a means of political control, although non-Swiss convicted of crimes may receive sentences which include denial of reentry for a specified period following completion of a prison sentence.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for public trials. All courts of first instance are cantonal courts, with right of appeal to the Federal courts and freedom from interference by other branches of government. Minor cases are tried by a single judge, difficult cases by a panel of judges, and murder or other serious crimes by a public jury. Even the most serious cases are usually brought to trial within a few months. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There were no reported violations of this nature by Swiss authorities. Police entry into the premises of a person suspected of a criminal offense is regulated by cantonal legislation. Regulations differ widely among the cantons.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. Groups or associations determined to be a potential threat to the State may have restrictions placed on their freedom of speech and press. No groups or associations are so designated at the present time. Broadcast media are government funded but possess editorial autonomy, and foreign broadcast media are freely available. Press and publishing are private enterprises operated without government intervention. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The only restriction on peaceful assembly and association is a requirement to obtain permits from police authorities before holding public meetings. These are routinely granted unless authorities have reason to believe the meeting will lead to violence.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Switzerland enjoys religious freedom. There is no single state church, but individual cantons may support a particular church out of public funds, and most cantons do so. Foreign clergy are free to perform their duties in Switzerland. The legal requirement for universal male military service provides no exemption for conscientious objectors. They may apply for military service which does not entail bearing arms, but in the past refusal to serve has nearly always led to prosecution and conviction. Efforts continued during 1989 to develop alternative service for those claiming exemption for reasons of conscience.

SWITZERLAND

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Swiss citizens have freedom to travel in or outside the country and can emigrate without difficulty. Switzerland has traditionally been a haven for refugees, but public concern over the growing number of asylum seekers, many of whom come for economic reasons, sparked a government review of existing policy. Although some asylum seekers were forced back into Italy as they attempted to cross the border, there were no cases of refugees being forced to return to countries in which they fear persecution.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Switzerland is a highly developed constitutional democracy. There is universal adult suffrage by secret ballot in Federal elections. Elections are free and actively contested by four major national parties and at least a dozen significant regional or minor parties. Initiative and referendum procedures provide unusually intense popular involvement in the legislative process. Participation by women in politics has been limited historically but continues to expand slowly. One of the smallest and most rural of the 26 cantons still excludes female suffrage at the cantonal level.

Switzerland cooperates with international and nongovernmental groups in all areas of human rights. All major international human rights groups are active in Switzerland, and some of the leading ones--e.g., the United Nations Human Rights Commission and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC)--are based there. The ICRC is made up of Swiss nationals, and Swiss play prominent roles in other humanitarian nongovernmental organizations. Human rights advocacy groups in Switzerland concern themselves almost exclusively with lobbying the Swiss and other Governments about human rights situations in other countries. During 1988 the European Court of Human Rights found against Switzerland in a case of a complaint by a woman who alleged that her legal rights had been violated by an investigating magistrate in one of the cantons. The Swiss changed legal procedures in 1989 to prevent any repetition of this problem.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Although the Constitution prohibits discrimination against women in the workplace, government and other sources noted in 1989 that further implementation was necessary to ensure equal pay and other benefits for women. Switzerland created a special government office of equal rights for men and women to address this problem. A Federal Commission for Women's Rights and several private groups, such as the Federation of Women's Organizations, monitor and promote women's rights. The discrimination that persists today is typically social, not legal, but it nevertheless hinders opportunities for women in fields that have been traditionally dominated by men.

Swiss policymakers have become aware in recent years of the issue of violence toward women. Observers believe that many cases go unreported, so that accurate statistics are lacking. There is, however, widespread agreement that a problem exists. The Federation of Women's Organizations and other women's advocacy groups have heightened public consciousness. Each city has an emergency telephone number through which women who are victims of violence can obtain help and counseling. Specialists work with police authorities to interview women who report attacks. Appropriate laws exist against wife beating and similar crimes, although there is some disagreement among Swiss as to whether existing law adequately prohibits spousal rape. While the penal code is established at the Federal level, enforcement is the responsibility of the cantons. Thus, variations in enforcement can occur.

Italian and Romansch linguistic minorities (respectively about 10 and 1 percent of the population) express concern that the limited resources made available to them by the Federal Government endanger the continued intellectual vitality of these languages. Some argue that this amounts to deprivation of freedom of speech. The Federal Government's announced policy is to ensure, through careful apportionment of funds, that all linguistic groups have commensurate facilities and means to carry out cultural activities in their own languages. Employment opportunities and residence permits are limited for foreigners. Some assert that this reflects racial prejudice and discrimination, but these limitations apply to all non-Swiss. There is no discrimination on religious grounds.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

All workers, including foreign workers in Switzerland, have freedom to associate freely, to join unions of their choice, and to select their own representatives. Unions are free to publicize their views and determine their own programs and policies to represent member interests without government interference. Unions may join federations or international bodies. Swiss trade union federations belong to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labor, as well as to the European Trade Union Confederation. The right to strike is legally unfettered, but a unique labor peace agreement between unions and employers has provided a nearly strike-free environment for over 50 years.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Swiss law provides workers the right to organize and bargain collectively and protects workers from acts of antiunion discrimination. The industrial sector is generally unionized; in the service sector, union membership is less general. The Government encourages voluntary negotiations between employer and worker organizations, although for the most part employers and workers alike (in common with most Swiss institutions) seek successfully to exclude the Government from involving itself in their affairs. There are no export processing zones in Switzerland.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor. While there is no specific statute or constitutional ban on compulsory labor, legislation regulating conditions of employment and, specifically, the rights of a worker upon terminating employment, make clear that compulsory labor would be illegal.

SWITZERLAND

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment of children is 15 years. Children over 13 may be employed in light duties (e.g., helping in retail stores) for not more than 9 hours a week during the school year and 15 hours otherwise. Employment between ages 15 and 20 is strictly regulated. For example, youths may not work at night, on Sundays, or under hazardous or dangerous conditions. These laws are observed in practice and enforced through inspections by the Federal Office of Industry, Trades, and Labor.

There is no national minimum wage. Employer associations and unions negotiate industrial wages during the collective bargaining process. The Labor Act established a maximum 45-hour workweek for blue- and white-collar workers in industry, offices, and retail trades, and a 50-hour workweek for all other workers. The workweek for blue-collar workers in most industries is 43 hours and for white-collar workers 40 to 43 hours. Overtime is limited by law to 120 hours annually. The economy is normally at or near full employment. The resulting take-home pay provides Swiss workers and their families with a standard of living that is among the highest in the world.

The Labor Act and The Federal Code of Obligations contain extensive regulations to protect worker health and safety. The regulations are enforced, providing a high standard of worker health and safety. Female workers may not be employed in dangerous work, and women in industrial enterprises may not work at night or on Sundays. These special protections came under review in 1989. The Government proposed to eliminate restrictions against female Sunday or weekend work in its effort to remove sexist bias from the labor law. There were no allegations of worker rights abuses from any domestic or foreign source.

TURKEY

Turkey is a republic with a multiparty parliamentary system and a relatively strong presidency. The Grand National Assembly elected Prime Minister Turgut Ozal as President to succeed Kenan Evren in November. Yildirim Akbulut of the right-of-center Motherland Party, which won a 5-year mandate in national elections in 1987, became Prime Minister. In nationwide municipal elections held in March, the Motherland Party obtained 21 percent of the vote. Opposition parties have so far called unsuccessfully for early elections.

The Turkish National Police in the cities and the Jandarma in the countryside are responsible for maintaining public order. A legal "state of emergency" continues to exist in eight provinces in the southeast, where the Turkish Government is combatting Kurdish terrorists. The state of emergency allows the civilian governors to exercise certain quasi-martial law powers.

Turkey has a mixed economy with state-owned, publicly owned, and privately owned companies and a significant agricultural sector. The Government has liberalized the economy in recent years and given it a strong, free market, export orientation. Approximately 80 percent of 1989 exports were industrial goods. After several years of rapid growth, the economy has stalled, and the gross national product grew at a rate of less than 1 percent in 1989. Unemployment, running at approximately 15 percent, and inflation, which climbed to an annual rate of 75 percent in 1989, remain serious problems.

Although Turkey in 1988 ratified the United Nations and the European Conventions Against Torture, continuing instances of torture were the principal human rights problem in 1989. Other concerns included restrictions on incommunicado detention, use of excessive force against noncombatants in efforts to suppress Kurdish terrorists, freedom of expression, and various forms of discrimination against Kurds. Charges of torture persisted. Almost always, they arose out of police interrogations that took place during preliminary investigations when suspects were held in incommunicado detention and before they had been allowed access to counsel.

Draft legislation introduced in September to allow detainees access to legal counsel within 24 hours was preempted by a Prime Ministry circular ordering detainee access to attorneys, but most detainees do not receive immediate access in practice. Also in September, the Government submitted a bill to Parliament which would shorten the time a detainee may be held for investigatory interrogation. In November, the main opposition Social Democratic Populist Party submitted to Parliament draft legislation to repeal Articles 141, 142, and 163 (so-called thought crimes). The Justice Committee is currently considering it. At year's end, the Government was edging toward its own proposal to amend these three articles. The Government may ease some provisions but now appears unlikely to support full repeal. The Government announced its intention to consult with the two opposition parties represented in Parliament while drafting a proposal. The Government also announced that it would accept decisions of the European Court of Human Rights without reservation.

The press is active and criticizes the Government vigorously. But certain penal code articles and laws restrict full freedom of expression, both for individual persons and the press. In December President Ozal acknowledged publicly the need to change these laws but said time is needed to develop a national consensus. Prosecutors continue to apply these laws aggressively although court decisions in general continue to expand the scope of press and individual freedom of expression. Women enjoy full legal equality with men but continue to be subject to economic and other discrimination owing to traditional social attitudes.

The Government rejects the assertion of a separate cultural identity for Muslim groups, such as those of Kurdish ethnic origin. Publishing materials in Kurdish or writing about Kurdish history is prohibited and has resulted in imprisonment, and entertainers have been arrested for singing Kurdish songs in public performances. However, political leaders and the Parliament are now discussing Kurdish issues more openly. Parliamentarians of all parties, including some members of the ruling Motherland Party, have called for easing restrictions on speaking Kurdish and expressions of Kurdish culture. The opposition Social Democratic Populist Party introduced a repeal bill to Parliament in November, but no action had been taken by year's end.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known politically motivated, unlawful killings instigated by government or political opposition groups. There have been allegations of death by torture of detainees in police custody (see Section 1.c.). Kurdish terrorists active in the southeast murdered numerous fellow Turks of Kurdish origin; and Jandarma searches for Kurdish Workers Party (PKK) terrorists are alleged to have resulted in expulsions, beatings, torture, and arbitrary killings of innocent civilians (see Section 1.d.).

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances caused by government forces.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Article 17 of the 1982 Turkish Constitution states that "no one shall be subjected to torture or ill treatment incompatible with human dignity." In 1988 Turkey ratified both the Council of Europe Convention for the Prevention of Torture and the U.N. Convention Against Torture. However, credible allegations of torture continued in 1989. A carefully researched report by the New York Bar Association in 1989 concluded that torture was widespread in Turkish police stations and that the Government thus far has taken only limited steps to implement its obligations under pertinent international conventions. Suspects in common and political crimes frequently appear to be tortured by the police during initial interrogations while held incommunicado. Critics and former detainees accused the police of employing such methods as beatings on the soles of the feet, cold water hoses, electric shocks, and hanging by the arms. Where torture did not occur, they charged that beatings and psychological abuse were common. Contacts with former detainees and others indicate that these sorts of abuse did, in fact, occur.

TURKEY

Allegations of torture are difficult to prove or disprove since government-ordered medical examinations generally take place after signs of abuse would have disappeared. The Ankara Medical Association in June banned one doctor for 6 months because she had allegedly issued certificates saying detainees had not been tortured, when in fact they had.

In September the parliamentary Justice Committee, with the aid of experts from the Ministry of Justice, initiated draft legislation which could effectively eliminate the practice of incommunicado detention by allowing detainees prompt access to legal counsel and by permitting lawyers to be present during police interrogations. In September a Prime Ministry circular ordered prosecutors to allow detainees immediate access to counsel. According to the circular, suspects detained for individual crimes are allowed access to an attorney within 24 hours, and those detained for collective crimes are allowed such access within 48 hours. Thus far, few detainees have benefited from the circular because, in practice, the prosecutor's office must approve the suspect's request to see an attorney. In October the Ministry of Justice clarified the circular--although to what effect is unclear--stating that prosecutors should not deny detainees' requests to meet with their attorneys.

In September the Council of Ministers introduced a bill in Parliament to reduce the period a suspect could be detained prior to formal arraignment in State Security Court and criminal court cases from 15 to a maximum of 10 days. In "collective" or group conspiracy crimes, detention would last 4 days, extendable up to 10 days if requested by the prosecutor. Those accused of individual crimes could be held only 48 hours. The proposal would not take effect in the eight southeastern provinces currently under a state of emergency. Here authorities could continue to hold detainees up to 30 days. The Government also announced it would accept the European Court of Human Rights' decisions without reservation.

Government officials in 1989 still asserted that torture was neither widespread nor systematic. Compared to the nature and number of torture allegations, however, the number of actual prosecutions was low and the sentences disproportionately mild. In October two police officials from Hatay were sentenced to prison terms of 4 years and 3 months for a torture-death in 1985. Accused officials are generally allowed to work and draw salaries until convicted, and they may benefit from the Turkish law that reduces all sentences by one-third for good behavior.

It is unclear how many, if any, people died of torture during 1989. In one claim filed with the Turkish Human Rights Association, the petitioners asserted that Adem Satilmis, accused of theft, died in the Ankara Central Prison on May 30 as a result of torture administered in the course of an interrogation the week before. The examining doctor's report noted that the cause of death was "suspicious."

In February the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, trying to refute Amnesty International claims that more than 100 people died of torture while being detained in Turkish prisons in the 1980's, issued a statement that police had found evidence of torture in "only" 32 deaths, 3 of which occurred in 1988. In a later clarification, it declared that "only" 14 deaths could be ascribed to torture, though investigation into 12 other cases was continuing.

Torture is not practiced in Turkey's prisons. However, Jandarma and guards have beaten prisoners in the course of searches, particularly following the discovery of escape tunnels. Two prisoners who had been participating in an organized hunger strike died in the course of being transferred to another prison. The authorities ascribed their deaths to dehydration, but others allege the two had been beaten.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Except in limited circumstances, such as when a person is caught in the act of committing a crime, a prosecutor must issue a detention order. This can lead to 15 days of detention under present legislation. In provinces under a state of emergency (currently 8 in the southeast), the detention period may be extended to 30 days. Once formally charged, a detainee is arraigned before a judge and allowed to retain a lawyer.

Under existing legislation, a detainee's next of kin must normally be notified "in the shortest time" after arrest. A detainee does not have the right to bail; the arraigning judge may release the accused on presentation of an appropriate guarantee or order him held in preventive detention if the court determines that he is likely to flee or destroy evidence.

The Constitution specifies the right of detainees to request "speedy conclusion of arraignment and trial." Nevertheless, judges have ordered a significant number of persons detained while their cases progress, sometimes for a number of years. While many cases involve persons accused of violent crimes, others involve simple membership in illegal organizations.

There is no formal external exile. The Government has refused to renew the passports of a number of Turks working abroad who have refused to return home to face court charges or perform military service. These persons may apply to the Interior Ministry for permission to return to Turkey. Internal exile is legal but is rarely invoked.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Turkish court system and judicial procedures are modeled on Italian (criminal) and Swiss (civil) law codes. Defendants normally have the right to an open trial.

The Constitution declares that judges shall be independent in the discharge of their duties and provides for the security of their tenure. It also prohibits authorities from giving orders or recommendations concerning the exercise of judicial power. In many instances, charges brought by the prosecutors are dismissed by the courts.

Eight state security courts try defendants accused of terrorism or other offenses against the security of the State, including drug smuggling and membership in an illegal organization. The same standards of evidence and general rules of procedure are required as in ordinary courts. A conviction or acquittal in either system may be appealed. If an appeals court overturns a lower court's guilty verdict, the case is sent back to the lower courts for reconsideration. If the lower court insists on its original verdict, the case is returned to the appeals court for a binding opinion. The court provides counsel for indigents in all cases.

In some cases, particularly capital cases, appeals to the Supreme Court or to the High Court of Military Appeals are mandatory and automatic. If a death sentence is confirmed by an appeals court, it must be approved by the Council of Ministers, then by the Parliament, and finally by the President. No death sentence has been carried out since 1984.

Two martial law courts in Istanbul and Ankara are still conducting trials relating to arrests made during the martial law regime following the 1980 military takeover of power. Most of these arrests date from the early 1980's. At least one mass trial involving Dev-Sol (Revolutionary Left), with 1,400 defendants, is still continuing in Istanbul. The total number of defendants in detention being tried or awaiting trial in the martial law courts probably numbers several thousand.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of a person's domicile and the privacy of correspondence and communication. Government officials may enter a private residence and intercept or monitor private correspondence only upon issuance of a judicial warrant.

In the eight provinces under a state of emergency, the governor (or regional governor) may empower authorities to search residences or the premises of political parties, businesses, associations, and other organizations without a warrant. Authorities may also search, hold, or seize without warrant persons, letters, telegrams, and documents. There is some evidence that these powers have been used for political purposes, particularly against activists involved in opposition parties and the labor movement.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Since 1984 several thousand violent Kurdish separatists, mostly members of the illegal PKK, have conducted a campaign of terrorism in southeast Turkey against security forces as well as against fellow Turks of Kurdish origin who do not support them. According to November government figures, 193 security force members and 326 civilians have been killed in terrorist incidents in the southeast since July 1987. In the same period, security forces killed 308 terrorists. The summer of 1989 saw an expansion of PKK activity, despite extensive security operations and government efforts to create better economic conditions for the inhabitants of the region.

Attempts by security forces to evacuate some villages in order to facilitate operations were halted after well-publicized public outcries. Other villagers claimed that the activities of both the PKK and government security forces compelled them to leave their homes. Villagers complain that Jandarma searches for PKK terrorists and for evidence of local support for them have resulted in expulsions, beatings, torture, and arbitrary killings of innocent civilians. In January villagers in Yesilyurt in southeastern Turkey accused Jandarma members of having tortured them and having forced them to eat human excrement. A Jandarma major is currently on trial for his involvement in this incident.

In July opposition Social Democrat Populist Party deputy Fuat Atalay and the victim's family claimed that Osman Esendemir, a villager from Siirt province suspected of being a PKK member, had been tortured and killed by village guards under the command of local security forces.

In August the governor of a province under a legal state of emergency expelled eight people from the area for a period of up to 3 months. The action was extensively reported and criticized in the print media; the regional governor affirmed that it is unlikely this power will be invoked again and suggested the length of expulsion might be reduced.

In September the Government opened an investigation into the killing of six villagers by security forces near Silopi in southeastern Turkey. Villagers claimed that the six were innocent and not PKK terrorists as the security forces claimed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Turks are generally free to speak their mind. The press, which is in private hands and which reflects a wide spectrum of opinion, does not hesitate to criticize the Government. There is no government newspaper; all papers reflect opposition views to a greater or lesser extent.

Nonetheless, a number of restrictions on freedom of speech exist. The criminal code has longstanding prohibitions on speech or writing considered threatening to the democratic and secular system of government and the security of the State. These proscriptions apply to: advocacy or activities on behalf of a government based on class or racial domination (e.g., communism or fascism); the establishment of a theocratic state (e.g., Islamic fundamentalism); or the creation of a separate state on ethnic lines (e.g., Kurdish separatism). Violations of these articles may result in the death penalty, although in practice no one has been sentenced to death in recent years for violating Articles 141, 142, or 163. A government-sponsored bill in Parliament in September proposed that the death penalty no longer apply to such offenses.

While it is permissible to criticize government leaders or policies, the criminal code also provides penalties for those who "insult the President, the Parliament, and the Army," ranging from a 3-year minimum sentence for insulting the President to a 6-year maximum for insulting the other branches of government. Judges have generally been rigorous in examining the evidence and have dismissed many charges brought under these laws, but aggressive application of the law by prosecutors has resulted in arrest and long and expensive trials in many cases.

Public prosecutors have used these laws to harass dissidents, real or imagined. To cite one example, a 15-year-old high school student was detained for 3 months on a charge of having spread "Communist propaganda" by drawing a Soviet flag and writing "long live the workers" in his school notebook. The prosecutor asked for a sentence of 7 1/2 to 15 years. The student was acquitted by a court in October, but only after missing a year of school.

Publications must designate a "responsible editor" who is legally accountable for a publication's contents. Many have faced repeated criminal proceedings. Fatma Yazici, one-time responsible editor for the leftist magazine, Toward the Year Two Thousand, was sentenced in absentia to 6 years and 3 months in prison for publishing an article entitled "Decisions of the Kurdish Workers Party Conference." Ms. Yazici faces a total of 17 1/2 years' imprisonment for four convictions related to her editorial activities. She has not surrendered for sentencing and is presumed to have gone into hiding. On the other hand, the Istanbul State Security Court acquitted Milliyet reporter Mehmet Ali Birand and responsible editor Eren Guvener in April for having published a series of interviews in Syria with PKK leaders.

Obscenity laws have resulted in the confiscation and banning of numerous publications and films, among them a Turkish reissue of Henry Miller's "Tropic of Capricorn." Libel laws have halted newspaper articles critical of government leaders, including a series highly critical of then Prime Minister Ozal that appeared in the mass-circulation newspaper Sabah in April. At the same time, an equally critical book on the then Prime Minister has headed the Turkish bestseller list during the past year.

The number of people held under laws restricting speech and political activities is difficult to estimate but may total 5,000 at the current time. Further breakdowns are difficult to obtain. Some are held or convicted for their writings or ideas; others are held under these laws for being members of proscribed organizations or acting upon their ideas in a way deemed detrimental to the security of the State. According to a newspaper article appearing in February, 26 editors were currently serving sentences, and 2,792 writers, translators, and journalists had been prosecuted since the Motherland Party came to power in 1983. The vast majority of those held under these laws are leftist, but a number of rightwingers, generally religious conservatives, are being held as well.

Turkish radio and television (TRT) is a government monopoly. Opposition figures and many of their supporters believe that TRT's broadcasts and news coverage have a strong progovernment bias, despite coverage of opposition leaders and their parties. A government commission apportions party access to television and radio during election and referendum campaigns based on the percentage of parliamentary seats each party holds. Works of certain leftist writers and Kurdish performers are said to be banned from broadcast on TRT for political or cultural reasons.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Peaceful assemblies are permitted with prior approval from the authorities. Requests for such assemblies are generally granted, but assemblies are restricted to sites chosen by the authorities.

The law on associations reflects concern over the involvement of some organizations in the violence which preceded the military intervention of 1980. It prohibits associations from having ties to political parties or engaging in political activity. Associations must submit their charters for government approval before they are allowed to form.

The Constitution and the law governing political parties proscribe student and faculty involvement in political activities. Political parties may not form youth branches. Students and professors, however, may participate in politics and political parties as individuals, and a number of academicians have been elected to Parliament.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Turkey is a secular state. The Constitution provides for freedom of belief, freedom of worship (if in a public building, the building must be specifically designated for this purpose and approved of by the State), and private dissemination of one's religious ideas.

Turkey's population is overwhelmingly Muslim. Although Turkey is a secular state, religious instruction, heavily weighted toward Islamic prayer rituals, is compulsory for all students, Muslims and non-Muslims alike.

Prosecutors view proselytization and religious activism on the part of Islamic fundamentalists and Christian evangelicals with suspicion, especially when their activities are seen to have political overtones. Islamic fundamentalists have been charged with membership in illegal organizations or advocating a theocratic state. Courts dismissed all charges brought against Turkish and foreign evangelical Christians in 1988. The police, nevertheless, have on occasion refused to renew evangelicals' residence permits or have taken steps to expel them from the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Turkish citizens enjoy freedom of movement within Turkey and are generally free to travel abroad. The Constitution provides that a citizen's freedom to leave may be restricted on account of the national economic situation, civic obligations (generally military service), or criminal investigation or prosecution.

During the spring and summer of 1989, Turkey generously accepted an influx of over 300,000 Bulgarian Turks escaping a forcible assimilation policy in Bulgaria that denied them the right to use their names, their language, and their cultural identity. Turkey has pledged to receive and resettle, over time, all such people coming from Bulgaria. At year's end about 70,000 had returned to Bulgaria. Some 35,000 Iraqi Kurdish refugees who arrived in the late summer of 1988 remain in camps in the southeast. Of the 60,000 Iraqi Kurds who originally came, a few thousand have returned to Iraq; over 20,000 went to Iran; and slightly over 300 have been resettled in France. Several hundred thousand Iranians remain in Turkey. Turkey serves as a de facto country of first asylum and safe haven for many of them; it neither grants them legal refugee status nor requires visas.

TURKEY

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Turkish citizens have the right and ability to change their government peacefully, within certain legal constraints. Turkey has a multiparty, presidential parliamentary system. Three parties are represented in Parliament: the governing Motherland Party, and the opposition Social Democratic Populist and the Correct Way parties. The opposition parties are vigorous and outspoken. Elections for public office are on the basis of mandatory universal suffrage for those over 21 and a secret ballot.

Turkey's President is elected by Parliament for a single 7-year term. Prime Minister Turgut Ozal was elected President on October 31, 1989.

Parliamentary seats are allocated on a weighted proportional representation basis. Under a "barrage" system, the Turkish election law excludes parties obtaining less than 10 percent of the total national vote. This measure is intended to prevent political fragmentation and recurrence of the parliamentary paralysis of the late 1970's. The law is designed to allow a party which obtains a plurality of the popular vote to obtain a strong majority in Parliament. In the November 1987 parliamentary elections, a 36-percent plurality of the popular vote gave Prime Minister Ozal's Motherland Party 292 seats (65 percent) in the 450-member unicameral Parliament.

The Constitution provides equal political rights for men and women. Members of minorities, Muslim and non-Muslim, face no legal limitations on political participation.

There are no restrictions placed on representatives of private organizations who wish to monitor human rights in Turkey. They are free to speak with private citizens. The Government continues to be ambivalent toward these groups because of its belief that their reports are biased. Consequently, access to government officials or facilities may be refused or restricted. The Government refused to cooperate with a visit by Helsinki Watch representatives investigating Turkish prison conditions in March, but cooperated with a visit in May by a delegation from the New York City Bar Association investigating Turkey's compliance with the U.N. Convention Against Torture.

A nongovernmental Human Rights Association, officially approved in 1987, has branches in provincial cities and organizes discussions, publications, rallies, and petitions. The Social Democratic Populist Party, the principal opposition party, has a human rights committee and has actively pursued human rights issues in Parliament. Members of the main rightwing opposition party, the Correct Way Party, as well as leading figures in the ruling Motherland Party, have also spoken out against human rights abuses.

Under the European and U.N. Conventions against Torture, which Turkey has ratified, committees or rapporteurs are allowed to visit all places of detention at any time, following notification to the Government. In August Senators DeConcini and Lautenberg of the U.S. Commission of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe visited a prison in Ankara and interviewed a number of prisoners.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution proclaims Turkey to be a secular state, regards all Turkish citizens as equal, and prohibits discrimination on ethnic, religious, or racial grounds. The Treaty of Lausanne also guarantees the rights of Turkey's non-Muslim minorities. Among the non-Muslim religious groups, there are some 50,000 Armenians, 20,000 Jews, 20,000 Syriac Christians, 18,000 Arab Orthodox, 6,000 Greek Orthodox, and several thousand Roman Catholics and Chaldean Christians. Members of these minorities are heavily represented in business and the professions. These groups operate churches, monasteries, synagogues, schools, and charitable religious foundations, such as hospitals and orphanages, but have faced a number of restrictive bureaucratic policies and procedures governing their activities and institutions. The expropriation of church buildings and church-owned property, largely by municipal governments, has been a serious problem for several Christian communities in Hatay Province.

Since the attempted Allied partition of Turkey and a number of tribal rebellions in the eastern part of the country during and following the First World War, Turkish governments, beginning with Ataturk, have sought to assimilate the country's various ethnic groups into the mainstream of Turkish society. As a result, a variety of Turkish laws and practices make it difficult, especially for Muslim ethnic or sectarian minorities, to maintain fully distinct or separate identities within Turkish society. The Government believes that to permit such groups as the Kurds to do so could eventually bring the unity of the State into question. For the Government, the violent separatist demands of PKK terrorists dramatize such a threat.

Millions of Turkish Kurds have emigrated to industrialized cities in the western part of the country and are fully integrated into the political, economic, and social life of the nation. Most parliamentary representatives from southeastern Turkey are ethnic Kurds, whatever their party affiliation. So are a number of ministers, including Interior Minister Abdulkadir Aksu and State Minister Kamran Inan. While Prime Minister, President Ozal publicly referred to his Kurdish background.

Nevertheless, the Government's pursuit of full assimilation has led to the proscription of the publication of any book, newspaper, or other material in the Kurdish language. Neither are materials dealing with Kurdish history, culture, and ethnic identity permitted, and there have been instances of the arrest of entertainers for singing songs or performing in Kurdish. While some forms of cultural activity are permitted, the foregoing limits on cultural expression are a source of genuine discontent to many Turks of Kurdish origin, particularly in the economically less developed southeast, where they are in the majority.

There are no restrictions on the private use of Kurdish, and the regional governor of the southeast affirmed several times during 1989 that the use of Kurdish does not connote "separatism." In 1988 the Government began to permit

Kurdish-speaking prisoners to converse in Kurdish with their lawyers or visitors. However, court proceedings still must be conducted in Turkish, and the poor quality of court-provided translators sometimes disadvantages Kurdish defendants. The opposition Social Democrat Populist Party submitted a bill to Parliament that would eliminate restrictions on the use of Kurdish, including in publications, but at year's end prospects for its passage were poor.

The Government has long been a leader in promoting and protecting women's rights. Turkish women are accorded equal economic opportunity, and urban middle-class women benefit from a strong tradition of work outside the home. At the same time, poor women and those living in rural areas are more likely to be bound by discrimination based on tradition. Their marriage and property rights are guaranteed by laws based on the Swiss Civil Code. However, in many parts of Turkey, laws requiring civil marriage are ignored, and polygamy, under the form of Islamic marriage, is accepted but rarely practiced.

Violence against women, especially wife beating, is not uncommon. The police normally do not intervene in domestic disputes. Turks of either sex may file civil or criminal charges but rarely try to resolve family disputes in court. Turkish law makes no discrimination between the sexes in laws concerning violence or abuse, and courts make no distinction between men and women.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Most workers have the right to associate freely and form representative unions. Exceptions are public school teachers, civil servants, the police, and military personnel. The law prescribes that unions and confederations may be founded without prior authorization on the basis of a petition to the governor of the province where the union's headquarters are to be located.

Unions are independent of the Government and ruling party. However, unions, like other organizations, must have government permission to hold meetings or rallies. Unions must also allow the police to attend conventions and record the proceedings. Union officers may serve no more than eight consecutive 3-year terms in a given union position. The Constitution requires candidates for union office to have worked 10 years in the industry represented by the union. The Government protects the person and property of trade unionists.

The 1988 amendments to the 1983 labor law clarified the right of unions and their officers to express views on issues directly affecting members' economic and social interests, but did not undo constitutional prohibitions on any union role in party politics. Unions may not establish organic or financial connections with any political party or other association. In practice, union leaders and the executive board of the Turkish Confederation of Labor (Turk-Is) have been able to convey clearly in election and referendum campaigns their support for, or opposition to, given political parties without, however, citing parties or candidates by name.

The Government may not summarily dissolve a union. Prosecutors may request labor courts to order a trade union or confederation into liquidation only if the union has violated specified legal norms.

Except in stipulated industries such as public utilities, the petroleum sector, life and property protective services, sanitation services, and national defense, workers have the right to strike. Turkish law and the labor court system, however, require collective bargaining before a strike. The law specifies a series of steps a union must take before it may legally strike and a similar series of steps before an employer may engage in a lockout. Nonbinding mediation is the last of those steps. In those sectors in which strikes are prohibited, binding arbitration is the last step.

Once a strike is declared, unions are restricted in the actions pickets may take as well as the number of pickets they may place at each entrance and exit of a strike site. The struck employer may respond with a lockout. However, the employer is prohibited from hiring strikebreakers or using administrative personnel to perform jobs normally done by strikers. Unions are forbidden to engage in secondary (solidarity) strikes, wildcat strikes or general strikes.

In 1989 there were more than 118 strikes in Turkey involving some 35,000 workers. All were peaceful, and most were resolved by wage and benefit settlements approximating or exceeding Turkey's inflation rate of about 73.5 percent. There were two particularly long strikes, one for 130 days by about 10,200 workers against state papermaking enterprises, which was settled in January 1989; and a 137-day strike by some 22,000 workers against two state-owned steel mills, settled in September. These two long strikes contributed to a new Turkish record of over 2,000,000 lost worker-days in 1989.

Unions may form or join confederations and international bodies. The law requires governmental approval to do so and prohibits affiliations with organs hostile to Turkey or to freedom of religion or belief. Turk-Is, the major Turkish labor confederation, has 32 affiliates with a total of some 1.5 million workers. Turk-Is is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the European Trade Union Confederation. There are a number of smaller confederations, the most important of which is religiously oriented Hak-Is, comprised of approximately 170,000 workers in 6 unions in various fields. Independent unions also exist, for example, that of the steelworkers and the still larger automobile workers' union.

At its 1989 sessions, the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) of the International Labor Organization (ILO) extensively reconsidered the several cases filed against the Government alleging violations of ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. The cases, some of which go back to 1981, concern the dissolution of the trade union DISK and its affiliates and the trial and imprisonment of their leaders; certain provisions of the Turkish Constitution and labor laws which the CFA contends violate worker rights; and a more recent complaint involving pending charges against the President of the Turkish Automobile Workers' Union. Noting that the Government continues to cooperate in the proceedings, the CFA requested, among other things, that the Government expedite a decision on the appeals of the DISK defendants; modify the offending provisions of the Constitution and laws; and provide details of the charges against the automobile union president.

TURKEY

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

All industrial workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively, and most industrial activity and some public sector agricultural activities are organized. The law requires that, in order to become a bargaining agent, a union must have 10 percent of the workers in a given industry as members as well as 50 percent plus one of the workers at a given work site. This has the effect of favoring established unions. There is no agent election; the union submits its membership roll to the Labor Ministry and requests certification as the collective bargaining agent. Once certified, the union receives checkoff privileges, and compensatory payment from nonunion members. The employer must enter good-faith negotiations with the certified union.

In June the ILO Conference approved a special paragraph citing Turkey for violation of ILO Convention 111, which forbids discrimination against any particular class of workers (i.e., teachers). Under Turkish law, teachers employed by the State may not organize.

Organization and collective bargaining are permitted in newly established, duty-free zones at Mersin and Antalya, but workers in those zones will not be allowed to strike until 1994 (10 years after the zones were legally established). Until that date, settlements not otherwise reached will be determined by binding arbitration. Workers in firms within these zones are paid in foreign exchange rather than in Turkish currency, giving them a hedge against inflation as the Turkish currency depreciates.

In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts asserted that provisions of Turkish law requiring a union to organize a certain percentage of workers in order to negotiate an agreement, and giving the Government authority to postpone a strike and impose compulsory arbitration, are incompatible with Convention 98 on collective bargaining. The Committee asked the Government to indicate what measures had been taken to bring the legislation into compliance.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is prohibited by the Constitution and statutes, and it is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Constitution and labor laws forbid employment of children younger than 15 years of age. The Constitution also prohibits women and children from engaging in physically demanding jobs, such as underground mining, and from working at night. The laws are effectively enforced in the organized industrial area.

In practice, however, many children work in Turkey. Families frequently need the supplementary income their children can earn. Many young boys shine shoes and peddle sesame rolls and sandwiches on city streets. In family-owned businesses such as restaurants, boys visibly younger than 15 work long hours, for example, as busboys. In addition, there is an informal and essentially unsupervised apprentice system in which young boys work at low wages, e.g., in auto repair shops, in hopes of learning a trade. Girls are rarely seen in public in work circumstances, but many are kept out of school to work on indoor handicrafts, such as rug weaving, especially in rural areas.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Labor Ministry is legally obliged to set minimum wages at least every 2 years, through a minimum wage board. The latter is a tripartite government-industry-union body. On August 1, Turkey's minimum wage was increased to the equivalent of just over $100 monthly at the mid-September exchange rate. The previous minimum wage was $56 for industrial workers and $52 for agricultural workers; this year's changes established a unified rate for both categories. Minimum wage workers take home roughly $64 per month. The minimum wage is effectively enforced.

Without support from other sources, it would be difficult for a single worker and impossible for a family to live only on the minimum wage. The minimum wage is generally paid to persons new to the work force or providing temporary or part-time services. Most workers earn considerably more. It should also be noted that workers receive a hot meal daily (or a food allowance), transportation to and from work, a fuel allowance, and other fringe benefits which, according to the Turkish Employers Association, make basic wages alone only about 36 percent of total remuneration.

Labor law provides for a nominal 45-hour workweek and mandates a right to leisure. Most unions have bargained for fewer hours in the workweek, both to increase premium-pay overtime and to obtain more leisure time. Labor law limits the number of overtime hours a worker may be required to work to 3 hours a day for up to 90 days in a year.

Occupational safety and health regulations are mandated by law, but the Government has not carried out an effective inspection and enforcement program. In practice, financial constraints, limited safety awareness, carelessness, and fatalistic attitudes result in scant attention to occupational safety and health by workers and employers alike.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.) has been a one-party state, dominated by the leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). That leadership has been a self-perpetuating elite which, with the assistance of a powerful secret police apparatus, attempted to direct all aspects of public life. Although the Soviet Union is a multinational state, political power has always been highly centralized in Moscow.

The past year witnessed a remarkable opening up of the political process and improvements in human rights practices, although the Soviet Union has a considerable distance to go before it will meet the standards set forth in the Helsinki Final Act. In March, elections of deputies to the newly created Congress of People's Deputies were the freest since November 1917. Many old-line regional party bosses and machine candidates lost to reformers, some of whom were not party members. The Congress elected a legislature, the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet, that has shown some independence in confirming ministerial appointments and drafting legislation.

Though the Communist Party remains the sole recognized political party (with a few local exceptions), the leadership no longer rigidly controls all party members' expressions and actions. Clear differences between conservative and reformist party members have emerged in public. Party members in the Congress of People's Deputies and the Supreme Soviet have not voted a party line. Article 6 of the U.S.S.R. Constitution, which enshrines the Party's leading role in society, has come under fierce public attack.

Some important reforms have been institutionalized, including the creation of new legislative bodies and an election process that in many, if not all, cases allows a genuine choice between candidates. Local elections, scheduled for 1990, may contribute significantly to political decentralization. Legal reform, on the other hand, has proceeded slowly (although major steps are promised for 1990). The widely held view that President Mikhail Gorbachev's continued presence at the helm is critical to the success of reform suggests that the human rights improvements effected in recent years can still be reversed.

The Committee for State Security (KGB), police authorities, and prosecutors' offices are charged by the party leadership with enforcing the population's compliance with policy decisions, directives, and legislation. In some parts of the country, they have sought to intimidate dissenters and potential dissenters through short-term detention and administrative sentencing of demonstrators, summoning persons selectively for warning conversations, and harsh press attacks on dissidents. Unlike other government agencies, the KGB has been subjected to only a modicum of glasnost (openness) and perestroika (restructuring), although a media campaign has attempted to clean up its image and portray it as an agency that observes the law and protects citizens' rights.

In response to growing socioeconomic problems and in conjunction with a broader effort at reform, Soviet authorities have initiated the gradual decentralization of economic decisionmaking and authority. In October 1989, the Supreme Soviet took up a range of laws expanding earlier reforms and significantly revamping notions of property, land, and enterprise. This was aimed at introducing market elements into the economy. While private enterprise remains highly circumscribed, new scope was provided under perestroika for quasi-private activity by independent farmers and cooperatives.

In 1989, though the top leadership's approach to the exercise of power changed significantly, old authoritarian habits continued to pervade the governmental system at lower levels. There were frequent instances of the use of arbitrary authority, including the attempted intimidation of dissidents by the local police, particularly the KGB. The inability of these local officials to follow through with the ruthlessness that was once possible made their arbitrary actions increasingly ineffective.

Subject to the foregoing limitations, there is now general respect for freedom of expression, freedom of association, some freedom of the press and of assembly, and freedom of religion. The Ukrainian Catholic Church, the last denomination to suffer severe repression, was permitted to register its congregations in December. Government interference in religion has now been substantially reduced, and the Government's official sponsorship of atheism is now on the decline.

This generally positive picture, reflecting the intentions of the reform leadership, is marred, however, by the inability or unwillingness of lower ranks of the bureaucracy to adhere to the new standards. Thus, while severe punishment for dissent is now a matter of the past, petty harassment of citizens who offend the sensibilities of local bureaucrats continues.

Emigration from the Soviet Union increased dramatically during 1989. Ethnic Germans, Jews, Armenians, and other Soviet emigrants totaled about 200,000 during 1989, more than any other year in recent memory. More liberal bills on freedom of conscience and the press are expected to be introduced in 1990. Of the new laws adopted so far, one specifically allows strikes, although it forbids them in such key areas as transportation and energy.

Abroad, the Soviet Union ended its illegal occupation of Afghanistan by meeting the February 15, 1989, deadline for withdrawing all its troops.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known instances of political killing in 1989. However, Soviet security troops on April 9 used clubs and gas in Tbilisi to break up a peaceful nationalist demonstration resulting in 19 deaths and over 200 injuries requiring hospitalization.

b. Disappearance

There have been no known instances of prolonged or permanent disappearance in recent years.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Many Soviet prisoners suffer both mental and physical abuse and mistreatment during interrogation, trial, and confinement, according to a wide variety of reliable sources. Life in prison or labor camps continues to be marked by isolation, poor diet and malnutrition, compulsory hard labor, beatings, frequent incarceration in punishment cells for violations of camp rules, inadequate medical care, and harsh restrictions on family visits and correspondence.

Soviet officials report that violence, hostage-taking, and crime in Soviet prisons and camps rose sharply in 1989. However, numerous reforms on a trial basis are reportedly under way within Soviet prisons and camps. These include furloughs, increased visiting privileges by family and clergy, better food, less crowding, greater restrictions on the use of punishment cells, and rewards for productive workers in the form of financial incentives and early releases. Many of these reforms are expected to be included in the new draft penal code.

In March a team of U.S. psychiatrists and legal experts was permitted to visit Soviet psychiatric hospitals and examine patients. Prior to and during the team's visit, authorities released several psychiatric patients suspected of having been confined for political reasons. Since the visit, those patients whom the team examined and found healthy have been released. The U.S. delegation in its final report noted the continuation of practices that lend credence to continuing concerns about psychiatric abuse. The team's report, in addition to its discussion of the problem of psychiatric abuse, analyzed the state of psychiatry in the Soviet Union and offered recommendations. The Soviet authorities commented positively on the latter. Critics of past Soviet psychiatric practices, both within and outside the Soviet Union, have expressed concern that psychiatrists associated with psychiatric abuse have remained in positions of professional leadership.

There were no confirmed reports of new long-term hospitalizations of political dissidents. The year saw several instances of persons being temporarily confined in psychiatric hospitals for political reasons. All were released within a few months.

Soviet authorities claim to have removed over 1 1/2 million persons from the register of mentally ill in 1989 and intend further reductions in its scope and size. Approximately 6 million persons still remain on the register. Inclusion in the register of the mentally ill leads to many social and legal disadvantages, especially in obtaining residence permits and employment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In 1989 Article 190-1, which outlawed "the dissemination of deliberately hostile fabrications defaming the Soviet State and social system," was repealed. Article 70, which outlawed "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" without defining it, was amended in July by a decree of the Supreme Soviet. In its new form, the law outlaws only calls for the use of violence to overthrow the State.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

In general, however, reform of the Soviet Criminal Code is lagging behind schedule. The Code still includes Articles 142 and 227, which restrict the free exercise of religious beliefs. However, there were no known convictions under these religious articles in the last 3 years.

Sverdlovsk activist Sergey Kuznetsov was tried and convicted in 1989 on charges stemming from participating in a December 1988 rally marking International Human Rights Day. In early January 1990, Kuznetsov was released following a reduction of his 3-year sentence to time already served.

Some human rights activists in 1989 were detained under the provisions of a Supreme Soviet decree on meetings and demonstrations (see Section 2.b.). While a number of large demonstrations have been permitted under the provisions of that decree, most notably in the Baltic states and the Caucasus, many have been forbidden.

The Criminal Code provides Soviet authorities the power to detain citizens for 3 to 4 hours for questioning; after this period, detainees must either be charged or released. According to the Code of Criminal Procedure, pretrial detention can last as long as 9 months, and prisoners are not entitled to consult with a lawyer until shortly before trial. Prolonged pretrial detention thus can function as a form of preventive detention. Eleven members of the Karabakh Committee and two other leading Karabakh activists were detained without trial from December 1988 until their release in May 1989.

Internal exile has almost disappeared in the Soviet Union. The December 1988 draft of the "Principles of Criminal Legislation" called for the elimination of internal (and foreign) exile, but the new law has not yet been formally adopted. Nonetheless, almost all exiled prisoners had been released by the end of 1988, and there have been no known instances of persons being exiled since then. Since the end of 1988, no known political or religious prisoners have been serving sentences solely under Articles 70, 142, 190-1, or 227.

Questions remain about certain Soviet prisoners convicted on criminal charges whose actions would not now be considered crimes by the current Government, or where political considerations may have contributed to their conviction or sentencing. In July the Soviet Government accepted a U.S. proposal for an exchange of information on such criminal cases.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Communist Party control of society extends to the legal and judicial system and negates constitutional guarantees of the objectivity and independence of the judicial process. The Soviet press continues to expose problems in the Soviet judicial system. Some initial steps have been taken towards judicial reform. The Supreme Soviet passed a law aimed at increasing judicial independence which gives the judiciary control over the promotion of judges and establishes multicandidate elections for judges. In addition, the Government declared it will double judges' salaries.

Since there were few political trials in 1989, it is difficult to judge how perestroika may have contributed to reform in this area. However, in the case of Sverdlovsk activist Sergey

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Kuznetsov, Sverdlovsk court officials rejected two of his choices for lawyers and declared the trial closed to the public. Defense attorneys, like judges, are subject to political pressures and constraints applied by the security forces and the party. According to official statistics, about 60 percent of attorneys are party members. In this area, as with the press, limits have expanded but restrictions remain. For example, there have been charges that attorneys must have special clearance to act as a defendant's counsel in cases with political implications, although this may not now be the case.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government interference in personal life is pervasive. However, the authorities' view that it is a citizen's duty to inform on the unorthodox attitudes of family members, friends, and neighbors may be changing. For example, most government agencies now refuse to accept anonymous denunciations.

Security forces routinely monitor the residences and telephones of certain Soviet citizens and foreigners, despite constitutional guarantees of the inviolability of citizens' homes. The resolutions of the XIX Communist Party Conference specifically called for guaranteeing the privacy of private communications, but legislative changes in this area have not yet been accomplished. According to the law, no one may enter a home against the will of the resident "without legal grounds." In practice this provision has little restraining effect on investigative agencies. A new U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet decree provides a legal basis for Ministry of Internal Affairs troops to enter private homes in pursuit of a suspected criminal. There were virtually no house searches for political materials reported in 1989 until the end of the year, when house searches were conducted in Leningrad, Tbilisi, Saratov, and Sverdlovsk.

Through the control of mail and telephone circuits, the authorities can selectively restrict contact between citizens, intercepting mail or blocking telephone connections. While this has become much less frequent than in the past, it is still practiced when the authorities consider vital political interests to be affected. For example, Moscow-based human rights activists reported that they could not get calls through to their contacts in Tbilisi during the disturbances there in April and could not reach contacts in Ivanovo during the hunger strike there by religious activists.

Despite laws still on the books intended to discourage contacts with foreigners, there has been a dramatic decrease in government interference with such contacts. For example, foreigners who visited refuseniks or dissidents were harassed far less than in the past. It has also become much easier for Soviet citizens to invite American relatives and friends to visit the U.S.S.R. as private guests.

All jamming of Radio Liberty in Russian and other languages was halted in 1989, thus vastly increasing the range of foreign broadcasting to which Soviet citizens have easy access. Voice of America broadcasts also are not jammed.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press to the extent that it is in accordance with the "interests of the people and the strengthening and development of the Socialist system." During 1988 and 1989 that last phrase was interpreted more broadly. The degree of glasnost and the range of acceptable opinion have expanded considerably.

A dramatic and unprecedented example of glasnost in the Soviet media during 1989 was complete television broadcasts of the debates in the Congress of People's Deputies and Supreme Soviet on a host of formerly taboo topics.

Unofficial or independent publications continue to flourish in spite of occasional police harassment and a lack of access to reproduction supplies. Reportedly, there may be as many as 600 independent publications in the Russian language alone, representing a wide spectrum of political, religious, and cultural views. Although the independent press tends to be concentrated in Moscow and Leningrad, there also are many publications in the republics. As in the past, any independent publication may be closed down at the whim of the authorities because it is not legally recognized.

For the most part, the police look the other way when independent publications are distributed. From time to time, however, police have rounded up distributors of independent papers, as they did to several distributors during the second week of September in Moscow's Pushkin Square.

The new draft press law, currently under discussion in the Supreme Soviet, states: "The right to establish mass media belongs to state and public organizations, creative unions, religious, cooperative, and other affiliations of citizens created in accordance with the law, and also to work collectives and citizens of the U.S.S.R." Ostensibly, this means that anyone may start a newspaper, although an editor would presumably have to register with local government authorities. According to the draft, any publication which "promotes war, racism, or the violent overthrow of the Soviet Government, or advocates religious or ethnic intolerance" may be suspended by the authorities.

Working conditions for foreign journalists continued to improve in 1989, including access to newsmakers and policymakers, greater ease in reporting and transmitting news, and the virtual absence of harassment. There has been some limited travel by journalists to closed areas, but also restrictions or outright bans on travel to normally open areas in times of trouble, e.g., Tbilisi after the April massacre.

Most universities and research institutes continue to be operated by the State or the party; however, Soviet academics are exerting considerable pressure for more autonomy from central authorities. Some universities have gained more freedom to determine their own curriculums, particularly in the area of social sciences and history. Archival access continues to open up for Soviet scholars, although perhaps not fast enough to satisfy the most progressive.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

According to the provisions of the July 1988 Supreme Soviet decree on meetings, street marches, and demonstrations, organizers must apply to local officials 10 days before a meeting is scheduled, and officials must notify organizers of the decision at least 5 days before the scheduled date of the event. Civil and criminal penalties may be levied against those who participate in unauthorized demonstrations.

The corresponding law on demonstrations in the Russian Federated Soviet Socialist Republic has stiff penalties: participation in unauthorized demonstrations is punishable by fines of up to $495 and/or administrative arrest for up to 15 days. Repeat offenders may be fined up to $1,650, arrested for up to 15 days per offense, and/or sentenced to corrective labor for 30 to 60 days with a deduction of 20 percent of their earnings. If criminal responsibility is established, the law provides for deprivation of freedom for up to 6 months, corrective labor for up to 1 year, and a fine of up to $3,300. While many persons have received fines of up to $495 and sentences of up to 15 days, no one is reported to have been sentenced to the stiffer penalties. (The Soviet monthly mean wage is about $220 to $225.)

Implementation of the law on demonstrations varied widely between different regions in 1989. Authorities in the Baltic states gave permission to virtually all gatherings, including mass demonstrations on August 23 that marked the 40th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact.

Large, unauthorized demonstrations were held with increased frequency in 1989. There were numerous mass meetings and marches in the Caucasus, major nationalist demonstrations in Ukraine and Moldavia in the second half of 1989 and throughout the year in the Baltic states, and large unauthorized demonstrations by supporters of Boris Yel'tsin in Moscow in March.

Nonetheless, local authorities in several cities, including Moscow, used the July 1988 law on demonstrations selectively to deny many groups permission to hold gatherings. For example, organizations such as the Democratic Union, a group committed to the peaceful removal of the existing Soviet system of government, have consistently been refused permission to demonstrate, and their leaders have been subjected to repeated administrative punishment for violating regulations on demonstrations.

On April 9 in Tbilisi, Soviet security troops used clubs and gas to break up a peaceful nationalist demonstration, resulting in at least 19 deaths and over 200 injuries requiring hospitalization. An investigative commission of the Georgian Supreme Soviet concluded that the troops used toxic gas. In October it published a detailed report of the incident which asserted that the final decision to send in troops was made by Defense Minister Dmitri Yazov and former KGB Chief Viktor Chebrikov. The central Government has denied direct involvement in the incident. On December 24, Anatoliy Sobchak, Chairman of a special commission designated to investigate the Tbilisi incident, presented the commission's final report to the Second Congress of People's Deputies. The report concluded that the military had applied unnecessary force to put down the demonstration; had not acted with the authorization of proper authorities; and had used improperly two types of riot control gases.

On October 2 in L'vov, troops reportedly used plastic bullets against nationalist demonstrators, resulting in numerous injuries. The People's Front of Belorussia was forced to hold its founding conference on June 25 in Lithuania because Belorussian authorities would not allow the conference to take place in Minsk. On several occasions, interethnic violence in the Caucasus and Central Asia resulted in authorities declaring a state of emergency and banning all demonstrations.

The Constitution grants citizens the right to associate in public organizations "in accordance with the aim of building communism." Previously, public associations were organized by the authorities or subject to their strict control, and the Government suppressed independent associations. Beginning in 1987, thousands of unofficial or informal organizations were founded to provide a forum for discussion of political, social, ecological, and other issues. Many of these clubs produce journals or bulletins; most actively support perestroika. They exist in a legal twilight zone, however, if they are not registered with the State as required. Without registration--in some cases not sought and in others sought but not granted--a group may not have a bank account or a public meetingplace.

In several areas, particularly in the Baltic states, unofficial groups act increasingly like political parties. Many People's Front organization candidates in the Baltic states won election to the new Congress of People's Deputies. So-called People's Fronts have also emerged in Ukraine, Belorussia, Moldavia, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Moscow, and Leningrad.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Soviet Constitution guarantees the "right to profess or not to profess any religion and to conduct religious worship or atheistic propaganda." The right to conduct religious worship and the right to make atheistic propaganda are not equivalent, however, since the former right does not include the right to conduct "religious propaganda," i.e., to engage in public defense of religious values or to rebut official attacks on religion. Moreover, extensive legislation and administrative regulations on "religious cults" place additional restrictions on freedom of religion. This legislation is now under review, and less restrictive legislation is expected to be introduced to the Supreme Soviet in 1990.

The Government displayed a much more tolerant attitude toward religion in 1989 than in the past. Approximately 3,000 new Russian Orthodox institutions were registered, mostly parishes but also 10 monasteries and 2 new seminaries. Russian Orthodox priests were allowed to visit the ill in hospitals and the imprisoned in jails. Both the Russian Orthodox and the Baptists have become engaged in charity work, from which they were previously banned. Baptists report no problems with their ambitious new parish-building efforts.

In Central Asia, greater glasnost is revealing that Islam still has a strong hold on at least parts of the population. Moslems have been granted permission to open a number of new mosques and one theological school. A number of Moslems imprisoned for their religious beliefs were released in 1989.

Registration with the Soviet Council on Religious Affairs is still required for religious groups of 20 adults or more. The Council reportedly has yet to respond to 5,000 requests for the registration of new Russian Orthodox parishes. The State's refusal to grant registration has sometimes been used to deny legal status to entire religious denominations. Once registered, religious congregations must still theoretically accept strict regulations which prohibit proselytizing, religious discussion and Bible study groups, charitable activity, and formal religious training for children.

A number of groups of believers continue to refuse to register officially on the grounds that much of the legislation affecting "religious cults" contradicts the tenets of their religious beliefs. Unregistered believers, such as some Baptists, Jehovah's Witnesses, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Pentecostals, are subject to repressive measures, including harassment at school or place of employment, denial of access to housing, and dismissal from work. The press has reported, however, that the Government is considering registering the Jehovah's Witnesses. Although Pentecostals are still harassed, mainly in the form of fines, such harassment decreased in 1989.

In December the Ukrainian Council for Religious Affairs attached to the Ukrainian Council of Ministers officially announced a policy of permitting Ukrainian Catholic congregations to register. This action ended the illegal status of Ukrainian Catholic believers that has lasted since 1946. During 1989 Ukrainian Catholics had become much more assertive: they held a number of open-air masses attended by thousands of faithful, and some of their bishops and clergy came out of hiding. Several Ukrainian Catholic religious services were broken up by government forces, however, and Ukrainian Catholic priests continued to be fined for performing them, though to a lesser extent than in the past. By year's end, they reportedly controlled about 80 churches.

The practice of religion still is discouraged in various ways, including limitations on the number of sacred books, such as the Bible or the Koran, which may be printed. Only a few religious publications of controlled content, such as the Vestnik of the Russian Orthodox Patriarchate, are officially allowed to be published; however, some unofficial Orthodox publications, including "Bulletin of the Christian Community" and "Choice," have so far been tolerated.

In 1988 customs regulations restricting the importation of Bibles and religious literature were abolished, although laws against speculation continued to limit the numbers that could be imported. In practice, this meant that registered religious groups were able to import large quantities of Bibles, while travelers carrying more than one Bible ran the risk of confiscation at the border on the pretext that the Bibles were intended for speculation. Persons reported the delivery of small quantities of Bibles and other religious books through the mail, although many such packages continue to be seized or stolen in the mail. The Hare Krishnas are currently protesting the decision of the Council on Religious Affairs to withhold approval for the importation of 200,000 copies of Hare Krishna religious literature. The literature was impounded by Moscow customs officials in September.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

The number of clergymen and places of worship today is only a small fraction of the number which existed before the October 1917 Revolution. At the same time, Soviet officials recognize that over 70 million Soviet citizens adhere to some religion. Existing seminaries and other institutions of clerical education have been permitted to enroll a larger number of students, but they still do not provide a sufficient body of trained clergy for officially registered denominations, especially given the widespread interest in participating in religion observed in 1989.

The Communist Party is, according to its rules, an atheistic organization. Membership in the party, considered incompatible with religious belief, is in effect a requirement for advancement to most positions of authority or prestige in the country. Thus, the authorities have largely excluded practicing believers from positions of power. However, believers are no longer rigorously excluded from public activities or from access to the media.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is not guaranteed by law. Although citizens are generally free to move about within the country, travel in certain areas (e.g., frontier regions or areas of military significance) requires special permission. All adults are issued identity documents or internal passports which must be carried during travel and used to register visits of more than 3 days with the local authorities. Although approximately 20 percent of Soviet territory is formally closed to travel by foreigners, most territory outside of major urban centers is in practice difficult to visit or inaccessible and is therefore closed in effect to travel by foreigners.

The right to choose one's place of residence, although formally provided for by law, is subject to restrictions. Everyone is required to register his or her place of residence. The authorities limit the number of residence permits in several dozen large cities, including Moscow, Leningrad, and Kiev, where housing is at a premium.

Soviet authorities, in response to U.S. representations, now allow Soviet citizens to obtain exit permission while continuing to live in their homes, work at their jobs, and keep their children in school. The final checkout from Soviet society that requires them to relinquish these basics now will be allowed by Soviet authorities only after the applicant has shown a permit from another country to take up residence there.

To travel abroad, Soviet citizens must have a passport for foreign travel and an exit visa, usually valid for 6 months, specifying the destination for each trip. According to Soviet Foreign Ministry officials, more than one-half million Soviet passports were issued for external travel in 1989.

During 1989 many persons without relatives abroad were allowed to travel abroad to visit friends. However, Soviet citizens usually can travel on private visits to the West only if they receive an invitation from an individual who undertakes all financial responsibility for the trip. Currency regulations and requirements to purchase tickets in rubles also restrict travel opportunities, even if formal exit permission is granted.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

During 1989 thousands of Soviet citizens residing abroad permanently as well as former Soviet citizens were permitted to return on short family visits or for other reasons. This trend, which began in 1987 and continued in 1988, grew rapidly during 1989.

Currently, Soviet law does not recognize the right of citizens to emigrate by choice. The Soviet system continues to restrict emigration (with notable exceptions for some ethnic and religious groups) to those citizens who married a foreigner or desire reunification with immediate relatives abroad. In 1989 the Soviets drafted a new law on emigration which would provide broad legal guarantees on the right to travel abroad (with some restrictions). In November the draft law passed a first reading in the Supreme Soviet. Final passage is expected in 1990.

The most frequently used barrier to emigration, aside from the requirement of an invitation, is the requirement that prospective emigrants should have had no access to "secrets." In some cases, persons have been denied exit permission although they have had no access to "secrets" for more than 10 years. In a few cases, denial has been based on mere possession of a clearance, although there was never any access to classified information. The application of this restriction is often quite arbitrary. In 1989 the Soviets lifted the security restrictions on many persons and permitted their emigration.

Another barrier to emigration still in effect is the requirement that family members sign release forms for their children--meaning that they may refuse to release adult children from financial or moral commitments.

In 1989 it was rare that a person not employed in security-related work lost his job when submitting an emigration application. The vast majority of those applying for visas for the first time were approved, and social ostracism eased considerably for would-be emigrants. Jewish emigration in 1989 exceeded 72,000, the highest yearly total since the pre-World War I era, up considerably over the 1988 total of 19,292 and the 1987 figure of 8,155. The highest recent yearly total had occurred in 1979, when 51,000 Jews emigrated.

During 1989 more than 9,000 Soviet Armenians emigrated to the United States. More than 98,000 Soviet ethnic Germans were permitted to leave the Soviet Union in 1989 for the Federal Republic of Germany. This figure, again, represents a dramatic increase over the previous year's 45,000 departures.

Soviet authorities in 1989 continued to resolve a significant number of divided family cases affecting the United States, France, the United Kingdom, and Australia.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Soviet citizens do not have the right to change their system of government, although the reforms instituted during the past year have opened the way to increased popular participation in the political process. Multicandidate elections, political campaigning, and the secret ballot are becoming the norm. The Congress of People's Deputies and the Supreme Soviet engage in open, frequently televised debate. Separation of party and government has enabled special interest groups to exert more influence on government policy and structures.

Divisions within the CPSU continue to be clearly visible, as are the competing views of other parliamentary groups. Differences within the CPSU between central party authorities and those in the republics have also emerged sharply. The threat of the Lithuanian party that it may sever its ties with the CPSU and operate independently and the vote in two of the three Baltic states to eliminate the leading role of the CPSU severely test the ability of the CPSU to control all political decisionmaking. Furthermore, the threat of the Baltic states to declare their independence from the Soviet Union reflects the desire of their populations to seek by their own actions to change their system of government. The U.S. Government has not recognized the forcible incorporation of the Baltic states into the Soviet Union.

Soviet authorities have adopted a more forthcoming approach to foreign criticism of their human rights record, acknowledging problems and stating their desire to make their society more "humane." They have also acknowledged that the human rights situation in the U.S.S.R. is subject to discussion in official bilateral and multilateral contacts. During 1989 they held several meetings with U.S. officials on human rights issues.

The Soviet Government in 1989 began to permit foreigners, on a very limited, controlled basis, to examine the status of human rights in the U.S.S.R. In August the Soviets permitted U.S. Congressmen Frank Wolf and Christopher Smith to visit Perm Labor Camp 35 and interview more than 20 prisoners. They also permitted staff members of the Congressional Helsinki Commission to meet freely with dissidents, refuseniks, and others. The Soviet Union committed itself to permit private persons and nongovernmental organizations access to the human rights conference of the Helsinki signatory states scheduled to be held in Moscow in 1991. The Soviet Union is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

Unofficial Soviet human rights groups, however, complain that Soviet authorities ignore their inquiries on human rights issues and only answer questions posed by the Soviet Human Rights Commission, which officially is described as a nongovernmental organization but is clearly an officially organized body.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution provides for the equal status of all Soviet citizens, regardless of nationality, sex, or language. The Soviets recognize more than 100 nationalities in the U.S.S.R., and the Soviet federal system is based on nationality. Many ethnic groups have territorial and administrative entities. The 15 Soviet Republics, some of which were formerly independent countries, represent some of the largest and most developed nationalities. Other smaller nationalities have autonomous republics, oblasts, or districts, but some 55 million Soviets live outside their nationality's administrative region or belong to a nationality that has none. The national rights of those Soviet citizens have not been adequately addressed, as the party admitted at the CPSU Plenum on Nationalities in September.

During the Brezhnev period, a quota system was used extensively throughout the Soviet Union as part of a broader nationality policy. Some ethnic groups benefited significantly from that policy, as they obtained more positions in universities and middle-class occupations than they would have if merit had been the main criterion. Other groups suffered. President Gorbachev has opposed the quota system, in part out of the belief that it has fostered deep-seated corruption in many parts of the country. At the same time, those ethnic groups that benefited from Brezhnev's "affirmative action" program have begun to lose substantial privileges and opportunities.

Most minorities in the Soviet Union have suffered official government discrimination as a result of the policy of Russification or as a result of opposition to that policy. Perestroika has involved the transfer of increased power to the republics to decide internal questions. The republics have responded by putting greater emphasis on their local cultural and linguistic heritage. Members of ethnic minorities, especially non-Slavs, are rarely found at the highest level of nationwide organizations and academic or governmental bodies, though minorities tend to dominate their own local organizations, including those at the republic level. Developments regarding the rights of national minorities are described below:

Ukraine -- A number of unofficial groups that foster the Ukrainian language and culture organized and met during the year. The Ukrainian Popular Front, "Rukh," held its founding Congress September 8-10 in Kiev. The Congress proceeded without interruption by the authorities, although afterward several participants were harassed and threatened with arrest.

Unofficial Ukrainian groups continued to call for the establishment of Ukrainian as the official language of the Republic, and a draft law declaring Ukrainian the official language was published in September. The Ukrainian Communist Party leadership opposed this demand. They also tended to repress religious and nationalist dissent more harshly than did leaders in other republics. Nevertheless, the authorities allowed greater scope for Ukrainian cultural activity and tolerated a number of Ukrainian samizdat journals. The central Soviet leadership sharply criticized the Ukrainian leadership for its heavy-handedness, and, on September 20, Vladimir Shcherbitsky, a conservative holdover from the Brezhnev period of rule, lost his seat on the Politburo and his leadership of the Ukrainian party.

Moldavia -- National activism continued during 1989 with innumerable demonstrations against official government policy concerning cultural, economic, ecological, and religious rights. In May several unofficial groups formed the People's Front of Moldavia to protest the Moldavian Communist leadership's intransigence. Almost all unofficial groups were criticized by both the national and local official press.

In August and September, numerous strikes and demonstrations by both Russians and Moldavians were held, each side advancing its view of the content of the Republic's language law. In September the Moldavian Supreme Soviet passed a language law declaring Moldavian the official language of the Republic and Russian the language of interethnic communication. The Russians continued their strikes for weeks after the law was passed and was endorsed by a U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet Commission which had been sent to Moldavia to investigate the situation.

Armenia and Azerbaijan -- Violence continued between Azerbaijanis and Armenians over the Armenian enclave of Nagorno-Karabakh in Azerbaijan. In mid-September, an Azeri economic blockade against the Armenians resulted in severe shortages of food, fuel, and consumer goods.

In May Soviet authorities released all 11 members of the Karabakh committee, who had been held without trial since December 1988. Two other leading Karabakh activists, Khachik Stamboltsyan and Aleksandr Akopyan, were also released from detention.

In July a military order banning mass gatherings, meetings, and demonstrations was announced in Baku. Nevertheless, the Azerbaijan People's Front continues to organize regular mass rallies. A demonstration organized by the unofficial group "Birlik" was broken up by police, and about 40 people were detained.

Georgia -- The April 9 incident is described in Section 2.b. The Georgian Popular Front held its founding conference in Tbilisi in July. Violence broke out in August and September between Georgians and Abkhazians over the ethnic rights of Abkhazians. Tensions continue between the Christian Georgians and the Muslim Abkhazians and are increasingly acquiring religious overtones.

Central Asia -- In June Uzbeks in the Fergana Valley began attacking the local Meskhetian Turk population. Reportedly, local policemen assisted in the persecution of Meskhetians by providing Uzbeks with addresses.

In Kazakhstan, Tadzhikistan, and Kirgiziya, the Republic Supreme Soviets passed laws making the respective local languages the official language of each republic. Russian was declared the language of interethnic communication. These language laws will probably result in wider use of the local languages in everyday life. In Uzbekistan, a similar language law is currently under debate. Ethnically motivated attacks on local nonindigenous populations along with the language laws have led to a sizable exodus of Europeans and Caucasus peoples from these republics.

Germans -- A society of Soviet Germans called "Revival" (Vozrozhdeniye) was established in Alma Ata in June. The society plans to chronicle events that concern Soviet Germans, coordinate activities of recently established German sociopolitical clubs, and act as a cultural center for Soviet Germans in Kazakhstan. A special Supreme Soviet commission on the German problem is currently investigating ways to satisfy some German ethnic concerns.

Crimean Tatars -- In 1989 Crimean Tatars still encountered problems returning to their homeland, from which they were forcibly removed in 1944. However, their situation is improving somewhat, and a number of them have been able to return. Crimean Tatar activists were occasionally attacked by the official press. Recently, the Supreme Soviet officially exonerated this and all other ethnic groups deported by Stalin during World War II.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Jews -- Though the country's top leadership no longer fosters anti-Semitism and appears embarrassed by it, there has been a sharp increase in popular expressions of anti-Semitic attitudes. Jews have become increasingly concerned over the danger of violence. They view the activities of organizations such as "Pamyat" as particularly dangerous and are troubled by the failure of the leadership to speak out against anti-Semitism. On the other hand, the reform press has condemned anti-Semitism strongly and repeatedly. Jews have welcomed their increasing cultural and religious freedom, which includes the opportunity to study Hebrew. Toward the end of the year, a broadly representative meeting of Jewish activists took place and a countrywide representative Jewish organization was formed, the first such meeting and organization since the October Revolution.

Women nominally enjoy the same legal rights as men, including the right to participate in all areas of the social, political, and economic life of the Soviet Union. An extensive system of day-care service and maternity leave benefits allow women to retain employment after having borne children, which is a necessity as virtually all women have no economic choice but to work both inside and outside the home. Women bear the main brunt of the hardships of Soviet daily life, such as waiting in long lines for food products. Women's rights activists report that only about 20 percent of the demand for contraceptives is satisfied. The result is over 6 million abortions a year, with consequent dangers to women's health, given the poor hygienic conditions in most Soviet medical facilities.

Women rights activists report widespread domestic violence against women throughout all the republics of the U.S.S.R., often involving widespread male alcoholism. Wife beatings are a particularly pressing problem in the Central Asian Republics, where several cases of women committing suicide because of untenable living conditions with husbands and in-laws were reported in 1989. Statistics on this problem are as yet unavailable in the Soviet Union, though women activists are trying to compile them. The difficulty of women's lives in the Soviet Union continued to be discussed in the Soviet press in 1989. The Council of Ministers has established a special branch (with a woman at its head) to study the problems of women. One of the first subjects to be discussed by the Supreme Soviet was safety conditions for women engaged in manual labor, including restrictions on weights women could be assigned to lift and night-shift work.

Special privileges shield many members of the Soviet elite (the party, the military, the diplomatic service, the scientific-technical intelligentsia, and the cultural and sports establishments) to varying degrees from social and economic hardships. Privileges include access to better housing, schools, medical care, and foreign travel, as well as access to restricted stores with high quality food and imported consumer goods. The system of special privileges, already somewhat reduced in 1988 from earlier levels, came under sharp criticism in the new Supreme Soviet in the second half of 1989. Promises were made about reviewing and possibly closing the Health Ministry's so-called Fourth Department, which provides health services to senior party and government officials. As market elements have been introduced and quasi-private enterprise has spread, money and not just political influence has begun to provide broader access to amenities.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

In the Soviet Union, the right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO) does not formally exist, though in practice the authorities showed an increasingly liberal attitude toward the free association of workers in 1989. Approximately 30 functional trade unions, encompassing virtually the entire Soviet labor force, operate under the direction of the officially sponsored All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions (AUCCTU), a government umbrella mass organization which advances Soviet and Communist labor interests. The AUCCTU serves as a means of political indoctrination, propaganda, and management control of workers. It is not known ever to have taken an official position that differed significantly from the Communist Party's stand, and its officials work in close concert with their party counterparts at all levels. The AUCCTU funds and controls the Prague-based labor international known as the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), which seeks to promote Soviet political objectives among workers around the world.

Despite the AUCCTU's official omnipresence, independent organized labor activities emerged in 1989. In March workers began organizing a group which by summer became the "USSR Association of Socialist Trade Unions" (SOTSPROF), which loomed as an alternative all-Union federation to the AUCCTU. SOTSPROF has won limited legal status to conduct its activities. In early summer, two groups of independent workers groups met in Moscow, and an organizing committee emerged which reportedly seeks to pull together a congress of workers, with the goal of nominating candidates for local and republic elections in late 1989 and early 1990. In cities throughout the U.S.S.R., fledgling independent union movements have sprung up.

Hundreds of thousands of Soviet coal miners in virtually every coal-producing region of the country walked off the job in July for periods ranging from 1 or 2 days to much longer periods. Their demands included higher pay and better working and living conditions. Overnight, strike committees formed spontaneously at individual mines, and these committees ultimately combined into city, regional, and interregional bodies. Regional strike committees gained formal recognition when negotiators representing the local Communist Party, local government, and the AUCCTU signed agreements. The strike committees won a continuing role overseeing fulfillment of the strike accords and of the coal industry as a whole. By contrast, the AUCCTU demonstrated its role in the Soviet system by siding with the party and the Government against the interests of the workers that the AUCCTU claims to represent.

To avoid antagonizing the strikers, Soviet authorities have allowed these various nonofficial trade union activities to proceed unhindered, and have provided both a measure of recognition and even support to some. The AUCCTU, in particular, provided facilities to SOTSPROF organizers and coal miners' strike committee leaders. Some regarded this as an effort by the AUCCTU to associate itself with, or even co-opt, independent activities. Some independent workers' groups also established international contacts.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

In October the Supreme Soviet passed legislation on procedures for settling labor disputes. For the first time since 1917, this legislation formally established the right to strike for Soviet workers, albeit only after detailed and lengthy dispute-settlement procedures have been exhausted. The law also established a formal ban on strikes in transport, energy, communication, government, and the military services, and it included broad, undefined references to "essential services" which could be used to block strikes in virtually any part of the economy. However, all workers apparently enjoy the protection of the law's labor dispute-settlement procedures.

As it has in the past, the ILO's Committee of Experts in 1989 examined provisions of Soviet law and the Constitution which establish a system of trade union monopoly and a leading role for the Communist Party. Restrictions were lifted on the right of workers to meet only after prior authorization. But legislative measures do not exist which would ensure the right of workers to establish trade union organizations outside the existing trade union structure, and the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programs in full independence and without interference from the public authorities.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Virtually all Soviet workers automatically become members of an affiliate of the official trade union organization, the AUCCTU. There is no evidence that persons refusing to join the union have difficulty in finding jobs, although this was the case several years ago. Persons involved with SOTSPROF or with other new, independent labor organizations report no interference with their activities or discrimination against them at the workplace. Coal miners' strike committee leaders likewise report no adverse consequences from their activities.

Although reform legislation on organizing and collective bargaining is under consideration, it has not yet been passed. The Soviet Government has shown some willingness to deal with unofficial labor groups when forced by circumstances to do so, as in the case of the coal miners' strikes. Most day-to-day representation of Soviet workers' interests is conducted solely by officials of the AUCCTU, who remain subordinate to the Government and to the Communist Party, and thus do not necessarily represent workers' interests fully. Factory and enterprise Work Collective Councils also represent worker interests to a certain extent, but they exercise broad managerial functions and have not shown much inclination to challenge management or bargain for their members.

Substantial progress has been made toward setting up special economic zones in at least three areas of the country to attract foreign investment, but the formal, legal steps to accomplish this have not yet been taken.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Soviet law contains no prohibition on forced or compulsory labor; indeed, persons sentenced to deprivation of freedom are expected to work. Convicted criminals, including those confined for political offenses, work, often under difficult conditions, in labor camps or in local projects to assist in the production of primary and manufactured goods. Prisoners are theoretically paid the same wage as factory workers, but, according to the Corrective Labor Code of the R.S.F.S.R., up to 90 percent of this pay goes to prison authorities, supposedly to cover the costs of their maintenance.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Soviet law establishes a statutory minimum age of 16 for employment. No evidence of widespread violation of this law exists, though anecdotal reports have appeared of child labor in Central Asian Republics.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The government-established wage scale sets the base wage for the lowest level unskilled worker at $140. According to the Soviet State Statistical Committee, the average monthly wage for blue- and white-collar workers in mid-1989 was $373 and for collective farm workers $263 at the October 1989 official exchange rate. (The ruble is not a convertible currency, and its official value in terms of the U.S. dollar does not represent actual purchasing power for purposes of international comparison.) Soviet statistics put the mean wage at about $220 to $225 per month. Workers living in the harsh climates of Siberia and the far north, as well as those working in the Far East under similarly harsh conditions, receive bonuses doubling or even tripling their pay.

The standard workweek in the Soviet Union is 40 hours. In addition, many workers are required to work Saturdays and additional overtime at the discretion of local management. Most must also "donate" a working Saturday once a year for which they receive no pay. For blue-collar workers, this means an unpaid day at the factory; white-collar workers are called to help clean up neighborhoods and perform other social services. Many white collar workers are also sent at harvest time, on a paid and unpaid basis, to work in the fields of local collective and state farms that need additional manpower for the harvest. Soviet law provides for annual paid holidays for all workers. The actual time varies, but most Soviet citizens receive 4 weeks or more of paid vacation each year.

Soviet law establishes minimum conditions of workplace safety and worker health. These conditions are frequently violated and no effective mechanism for enforcing them exists. Workplace accidents are reportedly common. Workers file safety complaints mainly through their trade union organizations, which have proven relatively ineffectual in ameliorating conditions.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

The United Kingdom (U.K.) of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is a constitutional monarchy with a democratic government. As there is no written constitution, human rights are "residual," i.e., assumed unless limited by statute. Human rights traditionally have been respected and guarded by the people and their elected governments. Laws bar discrimination on the basis of race, religion, sex, or political opinion.

Conflict between the Protestant majority and Catholic minority communities in Northern Ireland continued in 1989 to require special measures for governing the region and providing for public security. Illegal paramilitary groups on both sides of the conflict continued their campaigns of violence. The Anglo-Irish Agreement (AIA), signed by the Governments of the U.K. and Ireland in 1985, affirms that the status of Northern Ireland as a part of the United Kingdom can only be changed with the consent of a majority in the North. It also provides for an intergovernmental conference to discuss the two Governments' views on Northern Ireland affairs. The conference has met regularly since its inception and has given particular attention to enhancing security cooperation.

Throughout the U.K. and Hong Kong, public order is maintained by civilian police forces. In Northern Ireland, because of terrorist violence, police of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) are supported by Army units.

The United Kingdom has a highly developed industrial economy. Persons may own property and pursue private economic interests. The Government provides comprehensive social welfare services.

Under a 1985 agreement between the U.K. and China, control of Hong Kong will revert to China in 1997. The agreement states that Hong Kong after 1997 will retain its social, legal, and free-market capitalist system and will continue to be nonsocialist. For now, Hong Kong's legal system closely parallels that of the U.K., and fundamental rights ultimately rest on oversight exercised by the British Parliament.

In the United Kingdom and in Hong Kong there continued to be widespread support for and protection of human rights in 1989. Both Governments continued to be responsive to popular pressures for changes in governance, and both took measures to bring regulations and practices into accord with the findings of domestic and international bodies which have recommended changes to improve legal and other human rights. However, U.K. policy toward refugees in Hong Kong generated international controversy.

Terrorist bombings and killings carried out by the illegal Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) in both Northern Ireland and Britain, and terrorist acts in Northern Ireland committed by similar groups claiming to represent parts of the Protestant community, constitute the single most dramatic threat to public order and security in the U.K. Actions of the security forces and the legal system were primarily responsible for keeping deaths caused by terrorism and the conflict between communities to far fewer than 100 in 1989, as in recent years. However, a public prosecutor's decision to overturn the 1975 conviction of the "Guildford Four" (three men and one woman) for murder by bombing (and widespread charges that the police falsified evidence in the case) underlined skepticism among Catholics in Northern Ireland about equality of justice there (see Section 1.d.).

There was controversy in the last months of 1989 because of revelations that security force documents identifying alleged PIRA suspects and others were allowed to come into the possession of Protestant terrorists who used them to identify targets for attacks. Tensions and long-held animosities between the two communities in Northern Ireland continued to mean that many Catholics were denied equality of some rights and opportunities despite government efforts to redress their grievances. New legislation approved in 1989 will strengthen government efforts to eliminate employment discrimination.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The British Government does not practice or condone killing for political motives.

By August 20, 1989, 2,755 people had died in 20 years of "the troubles" in Northern Ireland (which has a population of 1.5 million). In 1989, 62 persons were killed in incidents of terrorism in Northern Ireland, 23 of whom were members of the security forces (including the regular army, Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Defense Regiment). Thirty-nine persons were killed by security forces.

Security forces in Northern Ireland continued the use of plastic baton rounds (PBR's or plastic bullets) for riot control. One person was killed by a PBR in 1989.

b. Disappearance

Government authorities do not abduct, secretly arrest, or hold persons in clandestine confinement, nor do they sponsor or condone such activities. In 1989 there continued to be instances of persons abducted or illegally held hostage in terrorist incidents in Northern Ireland.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

British laws forbid torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment of prisoners and provide penalties for violations of those laws. Confessions obtained by such methods are not admissible as evidence in court.

In February 1988, Amnesty International (AI) called on the Government to review the convictions of those involved in an October 1985 riot at the Broadwater Farm housing estate in north London in which a police officer was killed. Several defendants claimed that they were denied access to lawyers and families during police interrogation and that they were threatened and forced to make admissions or sign statements under duress during interrogation. As of February 1989, results of an official investigation have not been made public, and no statement has been issued by the Police Complaints Authority, which has been supervising the investigation.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

New codes of practice regarding the questioning of suspects by security forces in Northern Ireland were mandated under the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989. They will come into effect in early 1990.

All complaints concerning the police made by members of the public in Northern Ireland are monitored by the independent Commission for Police Complaints. The Commission is independent of both the Government and the police and is charged with supervising police investigations into the most serious complaints.

There was controversy over the introduction of "genetic fingerprinting" in criminal investigations and as evidence in trials. The law in Northern Ireland allows police to use oral swabs for DNA testing of cells in cases of serious crime. In Northern Ireland, taking oral samples is considered "nonintimate" and may be done against a prisoner's will. In England and Wales, however, such samples are considered "intimate" and may be taken only with the written consent of the subject and then only by a medical practitioner.

Britain has ratified the Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons, by which prisoners may be sent to their home countries to serve their sentences. Within the United Kingdom, convicts are almost always required to serve their prison time in the general region where the crime was committed.

On August 24, the Hong Kong Government announced it would end in 1990 the practice of corporal punishment based on a review of obligations under international conventions and other factors. There were complaints by some nongovernmental organizations that the Hong Kong Government deliberately allowed living conditions in overcrowded Indochinese refugee camps to deteriorate and failed to provide adequate shelter, nutrition, and health care. The Government moved the asylum seekers to other centers, which also became very overcrowded (see Section 2.d.).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Police may make arrests without warrants in cases of reasonable cause to suspect criminal guilt. Those arrested without warrant must be released on bail unless brought before a magistrate's court within 24 hours. Generally, persons charged with nonserious offenses may be released on bail. In cases such as crimes of violence, however, magistrates have remanded persons for periods of up to 18 months before trial.

The law allows the Government, in an emergency situation and subject to review by Parliament, to restrict personal liberties.

Acting on the premise that the fundamental "right to life" has been in serious jeopardy due to the violence in Northern Ireland, the Government adopted the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts of 1978 and 1987 which are applicable only to Northern Ireland; and the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act of 1989 (originally enacted in 1974), almost all of which is applicable to the entire United Kingdom. Both Acts are subject to parliamentary review and require periodic renewal to remain in effect.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

The 1989 Prevention of Terrorism Act allows the police to arrest, without warrant, persons anywhere in the U.K. whom they reasonably suspect to be involved in terrorism. Such persons may be detained for up to 48 hours without judicial review, and up to a further 5 days on the authority of the Home Secretary or, in Northern Ireland, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

In November 1988, the European Commission of Human Rights ruled that, in the case of four men detained in 1984 under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, a detention of just over 4 days was excessive and violated the requirement contained in the European Convention on Human Rights that a person should be brought "promptly to court." In response to an adverse decision, the Government gave notice of its intention to derogate temporarily from the relevant articles of the European Convention on Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which govern detention. Although the Government has said it was seeking ways to bring U.K. practice into conformity, the 7-day detention power was retained in the Prevention of Terrorism Act of 1989.

In Northern Ireland police and military personnel, in dealing with cases of suspected terrorism, may enter and search without warrants, and members of the Armed Forces on duty may arrest without a warrant any person suspected of having committed or being about to commit any offense. Such persons may be held for up to 4 hours, after which they must be transferred to police custody or released.

In Northern Ireland persons arrested or detained have the right to a lawyer after 48 hours. There is credible evidence, however, that lawyers often encounter delays in access beyond the legal limit.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Fair trial is provided for by law and observed in practice in the United Kingdom in the vast majority of cases. An indigent defendant has the right to counsel of his choosing. All criminal proceedings must be conducted in public, with the exception of juvenile court cases and cases involving public decency or security. In a trial on charges under the Official Secrets Act, the court may be closed at the judge's discretion, but the sentence must be passed in public.

In October the U.K. Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) directed that the Government abandon its charges against the "Guildford Four" who had been convicted and imprisoned with life sentences in 1975, and the four were released from prison. The decision was taken before the court because DPP received information contrary to evidence used in prosecution. The State therefore sent the case for review by the Higher Appellate Court, which subsequently overturned the conviction. The Government also initiated corruption proceedings against police officers who had been involved in taking the case to court. New reviews of the cases of the "Birmingham Six" and "Maguire Seven", who had been imprisoned since 1974 also for murder by bombing, now appear likely.

The majority of criminal prosecutions in Great Britain which come to trial are heard by juries. In Northern Ireland, however, the right to trial by jury has been suspended for certain terrorist-related offenses because of the intimidation of juries by terrorists. "Diplock Courts," in which a single High Court judge presides over a trial without a jury, were established in Northern Ireland by legislation in 1973. While these courts have been criticized by some human rights groups, a report published by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York stated that Diplock Courts conform to the requirements of international standards of fair trials and that there has been no serious claim that a factually erroneous conviction has occurred in a Diplock Court.

The Government's ability to provide trials by multiple judges or with juries is limited in Northern Ireland because of PIRA terrorism against the judiciary. The PIRA has announced it will even attack workmen who perform services at the homes of judges. On July 31, a massive car bomb exploded outside the Royal Courts of Justice in Belfast causing extensive damage.

In November 1988, the general law on evidence in Northern Ireland, the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, was enacted. In part, the law affects the traditional right to silence of accused persons under British law by permitting the courts to draw whatever inference they deem proper, including an inference of guilt, if a subject remains silent during questioning. The provision was introduced as a means of dealing with the "wall of silence" encountered by the police when questioning suspected terrorists as well as with "ambush testimony" whereby a suspect does not speak until his trial when he presents a surprise alibi. The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights believes that unless such inferences are restricted in their application and incorporate appropriate safeguards, the law may lead to a lack of confidence in the administration of justice in Northern Ireland.

The Criminal Law Jurisdictions Act, enacted by both the U.K. Government (1975) and the Irish Government (1976), permits trial in either the Republic of Ireland or in the U.K. of those accused of certain terrorist offenses regardless of whether the offense was committed in the other country.

Minors convicted of murder may be subjected to indeterminate detention. In Northern Ireland, where public attention has focused on this issue, there were 30 minors serving indeterminate sentences at the end of 1989, including 17 prisoners who had served 8 or more years for murders committed while they were under the age of 18 and whose release dates had not been decided.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right of privacy is well respected in both law and custom. Warrants are generally required for a police search of private premises. However, under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1978, any member of the Armed Forces on duty or any constable may enter any premises or other place if he or she considers it necessary to do so to preserve peace or maintain order. Changes in the 1987 Emergency Provisions Act now require a standard of "reasonable grounds of suspicion" before a dwelling may be entered to search for munitions or transmitters.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Strongly held tradition, an independent press, and a democratic political system combine to secure freedom of speech and press. Viewpoints independent and critical of the Government are well represented.

In 1988 the Government banned radio and television broadcasts of live or recorded statements made by representatives of PIRA or other illegal terrorist organizations or of Sinn Fein, the legal political arm of the IRA, or by others who express views which "solicit, support, or invite support for such organizations." There are no restrictions on reporting their words. Exceptions are made for coverage of elections and parliamentary proceedings. The written media were not affected by the notices. The measures drew widespread criticism as undermining freedom of speech and press. The ban is being challenged in domestic courts on grounds it is unlawful under the Northern Ireland Constitution Act of 1973 and Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Hong Kong has traditions and practices of free speech and press similar to those in the U.K. Individuals and groups freely criticize the Hong Kong Government, and the media are free to air all views and opinions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Except in cases of extreme civil disorder, in which public safety is judged to be at risk, the authorities do not exercise their statutory right to limit the freedom of public assembly. However, some critics believe that the 1986 Public Order Law gives police too much discretion to restrict public assembly.

The Prevention of Terrorism Act of 1989 and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1978 include sections prohibiting membership in, or support of, organizations involved in terrorism. These organizations are specifically listed in the statutes. The lists do not include political parties.

The summer "marching season" in Northern Ireland presents special problems. These marches commemorate the traditions of opposing sectarian communities. Each community considers them a right, but they are controversial and have been a source of public disorder. Under the law, the police must be notified 7 days before a planned march and may impose conditions, including rerouting. No permits to march were denied in 1989, and there were no serious disorders during the 1989 marches.

Peaceful assembly and association are permitted and regularly practiced in Hong Kong.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Government policy and general practice ensure freedom of religion in Great Britain and Hong Kong. While both England and Scotland have established churches, the U.K. Government makes no direct financial contribution to them, and their existence does not limit the freedom or access to public life of members of other churches. The Government provides funds for church schools.

In Northern Ireland, the Constitution Act of 1973 specifically prohibits discrimination on the basis of religious belief or political opinion. There is no similar law in Great Britain. There are no religious bars to holding public office. The sovereign must be a member of the Church of England.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

U.K. citizens enjoy freedom of movement within the country and in foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation.

The Prevention of Terrorism Act includes one exception to this general principle. The Act gives the Home Secretary the authority to exclude or prevent from entering mainland Britain anyone he believes may be connected with terrorism related to Northern Ireland, unless that person was born in Great Britain or has been ordinarily resident there for 3 years. Similar authority is granted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to exclude persons not native to or resident in that province. Between November 1978 and March 1989, 287 persons were the subjects of exclusion orders in the U.K. As of March 1989, 143 of these orders still were in operation. The National Council for Civil Liberties has called exclusion orders a system of "internal exile" to exclude persons in Northern Ireland from entering Britain (which does not preclude travel outside of Britain). The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights objects to the continued availability of exclusion orders because the evidence used is not tested in any court. The Secretary of State must only be "satisfied" that a person is or has been involved in the commission, preparation, or instigation of acts of terrorism.

In Hong Kong, in response to the arrival of large numbers of people from Vietnam seeking asylum, the Government implemented a screening program in accord with an agreement concluded by the International Conference on Indochinese Refugees in Geneva in June 1989. Those who are determined by the screening process not to be eligible for refugee status are detained in camps pending determination of what will become of them. There were international complaints that the Government deliberately allowed living conditions in some camps to have inadequate standards of shelter, nutrition, and health care. At the same time, the widespread opinion of Hong Kong residents was that their Government should not expend any additional resources on the camps and asylum seekers.

On December 12, 51 Vietnamese were forcibly returned from Hong Kong to Vietnam on the grounds that they were found to be economic migrants, not genuine refugees. The ensuing public debate included the U.S. view opposing involuntary repatriation to Vietnam and favoring concerted international action to encourage voluntary repatriation of Vietnamese, on the one hand, and the U.K. view of the need to repatriate Vietnamese like other illegal immigrants, on the other hand. The U.K. Government undertook to monitor the treatment of the 51 returnees through periodic visits to their homes.

In the U.K., there were charges by human rights and immigration rights groups that the Government denied asylum to some who were entitled to recognition as refugees, among them Tamils and others from Sri Lanka.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Government is formed on the basis of a majority of seats in the House of Commons, won in freely contested elections held at intervals not longer than 5 years. Participation in the political process is open to all persons and parties, of which there are several, representing a broad range of political views. For parliamentary and local elections, all citizens 18 years of age and over have the franchise. Women have full rights of participation and are represented at all levels of British political life. Racial minorities comprise about 5 percent of the total population. There are several nonwhite members of Parliament, and there are nonwhite elected members of local governments.

Most British dependent territories have small populations, under 60,000, and are ruled by appointed governors or administrators assisted by executive councils (usually appointed) and legislative assemblies or councils (partly elected).

Hong Kong, with a population of over 5 million, is a free society with legally protected rights but without a broad democratic base. The Governor is appointed by the crown, and representative government with members selected by universal franchise exists only in rudimentary form and without formal political parties. The Hong Kong Government is committed to further democratization but elections, direct or indirect, determine only a minority of seats in municipal councils and the legislative assembly.

The Government maintains an open attitude toward international inquiries into alleged violations of human rights in the United Kingdom. It cooperates fully with the European Commission of Human Rights in investigations of complaints and has usually taken steps to rectify its own laws and policies when they were found not to be in conformity with the European Convention on Human Rights.

The United Kingdom is a party to several human rights conventions, participates in international and regional human rights bodies, and is the host country to international nongovernmental human rights organizations, including Amnesty International. In 1973 the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights was established to monitor human rights in Northern Ireland.

The Hong Kong Government has cooperated with international and nongovernmental organizations, for example, by providing access to its centers for Vietnamese asylum seekers.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Race Relations Act bars discrimination on the basis of race, color, nationality, or national or ethnic origin, and outlaws incitement to racial hatred. Various studies, however, have shown disproportionate unemployment, low educational achievement, and other problems for some minority groups. In 1984 a code of practice on employment, proposed by the Commission for Racial Equality and accepted by the Government, took effect but does not have the force of law.

The Government has made improvements in the legal protection offered women in employment as a result of test cases taken to the European Court of Justice which have claimed that British law did not conform to European Community legislation on equal rights. U.K. tax laws as of 1990 will treat married women more equally. Women have equal property rights and equal rights in divorce courts.

The Government's technical and vocational education initiative, covering all students aged 14 to 16, was launched to counter sex stereotyping in the school system and in career counseling. Equal opportunity commissions were established in Britain in 1975 and in Northern Ireland in 1976 to assist in the enforcement of equal opportunity legislation.

There are no conclusive statistics on the extent of violence against women in the U.K. Women increasingly report violence in the family to the police; offenders in such cases often are prosecuted and may be imprisoned. Women's shelters, operated by voluntary groups, provide refuge for battered wives, and local governments routinely provide counseling services. Rape victims receive similar support, and convicted rapists usually are imprisoned. It is not illegal, however, for a man to rape his wife.

In Hong Kong, violence against women, including wife beating, occurs but the extent of the problem is not known. There has not been a significant increase in reported cases in recent years, but cultural and other factors are believed to hinder reporting of incidents to the authorities. The Hong Kong Government passed a domestic violence ordinance in 1987 covering violence inflicted upon spouses, cohabitants, and those under 21. Domestic violence also may be prosecuted under criminal statutes. The Government enforces these laws and prosecutes violators. Professional counseling and medical services are available to victims, and there are some private shelters for battered women.

There is no evidence of governmental discrimination on religious grounds in Great Britain. In Northern Ireland, however, anti-Catholic discrimination involves a complex range of historical and social factors. The majority Protestant community historically has controlled much of the local economy and been more prosperous than the Catholic community. Since 1972, when direct British rule was introduced in Northern Ireland, specific measures have been taken to combat religious discrimination. These include reform of the electoral rolls, prohibition of religious or political discrimination by any level of government, appointment of a Commissioner for Complaints to deal with grievances against local government, appointment of a central housing authority to meet the problem of discrimination in housing, prohibition of discrimination in employment, and a special effort to recruit more Catholics into the police.

Since 1976 the Fair Employment Agency (FEA) has served as the focal point of the Government's efforts to end job discrimination in Northern Ireland. Within the Northern Ireland civil service, the proportion of Catholics under age

35 reflects their proportion in the population, but Protestants still dominate in the upper age groups. In Northern Ireland overall, the Catholic male unemployment rate is 2.5 times that of Protestant men.

The Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act, approved by Parliament in 1989, is intended to end employment discrimination and is aimed at outlawing even unintentional or "indirect" discrimination. All public sector employers and private firms with 25 or more workers must register with the new Commission, monitor the religious composition of their work force, supply annual monitoring reports to the Commission, and review their overall employment practice at least once every 3 years. Employers must have regard to the need for affirmative action measures to remedy underrepresentation and consider the setting of goals and timetables. They will face criminal penalties and loss of government contracts for failure to comply with the law. The Act also establishes a new Fair Employment Tribunal to adjudicate individual complaints of discrimination. While the legislation has been criticized by some for not proposing "strong and effective provisions for targets and timetables," in general it has been praised by leaders of the Catholic community.

PIRA assassinations and death threats have largely stymied government efforts to increase recruitment of Catholics, now around 10 percent, into the police force and related security fields. The PIRA has carried out a terror campaign not only against police officers but also against persons who provide services to the security forces. Since 1973, for example, 26 prison staff members were murdered while off duty.

In Hong Kong, the Chinese language has equal status with English in many government operations. Legislation is enacted on a bilingual basis, and Legislative Council proceedings are conducted in both languages. The Hong Kong Government actively promotes "localization" of the civil service by increasing the number of Hong Kong Chinese in top administrative and policymaking positions.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

U.K. workers have the right to associate freely, choose representatives, publish journals, openly promote their views, and elect representative assemblies to determine union policies and procedures. Workers in the dependency of Hong Kong have the same rights guaranteed by the Hong Kong trade union ordinance. British worker rights are underlined by U.K. ratification of relevant International Labor Organization (ILO) conventions which also apply in most instances to dependent territories, including Hong Kong.

U.K. unions are free of government control but must register their accounts with the government trade union certification officer. The law requires periodic selection of senior union officials by secret ballot. It also mandates secret ballots before strike calls, prohibits unions from disciplining persons who ignore strike calls, and establishes a procedure for trade union members to lodge complaints against their unions with a government-appointed ombudsman.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

There is no specific statutory "right to strike" in the U.K. or Hong Kong, and voluntary cessation of work may be considered a breach of contract. A system of immunities, however, protects unions and individuals from prosecution when engaged in legitimate disputes. Legislation adopted in the 1980's narrowed these immunities in the U.K. by excluding secondary strikes and those deemed to be political. Unions encouraging such strikes were fined in the courts and had assets seized. Where there is no right to strike, as with the police, there are alternative means to resolve disputes.

The British Trade Union Congress (TUC) lodged a complaint with the ILO, supported by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), about a series of legislative changes in the 1980's. The ILO's Committee of Experts (COE) in 1989 stated that it considers a number of aspects of the legislation are not compatible with the requirements of ILO Convention 87 on freedom of association. These include the concept of "unjustifiable discipline" by unions, the erosion of protection against civil liability for industrial action, and dismissals in connection with strikes and other industrial action.

The TUC also brought a separate complaint to the ILO about legislated restrictions in the U.K., charges which were repeated in a report of the ICFTU. The COE observed that the U.K. legislation was not compatible with ILO Conventions 87 and 98.

The TUC also complained to the ILO that the Government as an employer limited the freedom of association of public sector workers. The Government dismissed workers at a high-security communications facility who retained membership in a union after a government ban. The COE affirmed that the dismissals were in violation of Convention 87.

U.K. and Hong Kong unions maintain active affiliations with international organizations, although Hong Kong unions must first obtain government permission for such affiliations.

Politically, many major trade unions in the U.K. have traditionally had a close relationship with the Labour Party. The party and the unions pride themselves, however, on their independence. Unions are allowed to make political contributions if they have voted to establish separate political funds. Hong Kong unions, however, are not permitted to have political action funds and instead emphasize social and cultural activities.

b. The Right To Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize and bargain collectively is deeply rooted in common law. It is confirmed under appropriate ILO conventions ratified by the U.K. which also apply to Hong Kong. There is no legal obligation for employers to bargain with workers' representatives, but collective bargaining is extensively practiced in the U.K. and involves 10.5 million workers, about 40 percent of the work force. Approximately 17 percent of Hong Kong's work force is organized.

In 1987, after a prolonged period when the Government and teachers' unions failed to reach agreement, the Government abolished the negotiating forum for teachers' contracts and empowered the concerned Cabinet Minister to settle disputes after hearing the recommendations of an advisory body. The

Government said it will not establish a new negotiating procedure until 1991. The ILO, in response to a TUC complaint that this was contrary to Convention 98, asked the Government to ensure that new procedures would enable teachers to bargain collectively.

Hong Kong workers may appeal through industrial tribunals in cases of alleged antiunion discrimination. Remedies may include reinstatement, which rarely occurs, or indemnities, which are rarely imposed.

There are no export processing zones in the U.K. or its dependent territories and possessions.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited in the U.K. and its dependent territories and possessions and is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The compulsory school age in the U.K. is 16, and children under that age are prevented from doing industrial work unless part of an educational course. Educational authorities may prohibit or restrict other employment of children. Child labor is only rarely a problem in the U.K. Children in Hong Kong may do part-time work at age 13 and full-time work at age 15. The Labor Inspectorate effectively enforces Hong Kong law.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The U.K. and Hong Kong do not have legislated minimum wage rates. In some low-wage industries in the U.K., wage councils of employers and trade unionists establish wage rates which are enforceable for workers aged 21 or over. Minimum rates so established are substantially below national average wage figures. Trade unions expressed concern that a government proposal in December 1988 to abolish wage councils would leave U.K. workers without minimum wage protection.

The Health and Safety at Work Act of 1974 requires employers in the U.K. to ensure worker health and safety in ways that are "reasonably practicable." A Health and Safety Executive (HSE) enforces applicable regulations and may initiate criminal proceedings and issue enforcement notices. A Health and Safety Commission submits regulatory proposals to the Government, encourages research and training, and appoints investigatory committees. The law allows unions to name workers as safety representatives and requires employers to give paid leave for them to fulfill their functions. An employer must establish a safety committee if requested by two such representatives.

The U.K. system and practice for assuring health and safety is well regarded, but unions in 1988 said lack of staff and resources limit the abilities of the HSE. Oil rig workers expressed concern that the Department of Trade and Industry, not HSE, is responsible for safety on oil rigs.

Under legislation in Hong Kong the Labor Department's Factory Inspectorate promotes workers' safety and health in industry through education, publicity, and inspection. In 1988 it conducted nearly 70,000 inspections. The Occupational Health Division investigates occupational disease claims, conducts workplace environment testing, and provides medical examinations to workers handling hazardous materials.

YUGOSLAVIA

The Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is a multiethnic, federal state comprising six republics (one of which has two autonomous provinces); the Constitution terms the League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) the "leading organized political and ideological force."

The ideology and practice of Yugoslav "workers' self-management" socialism differ substantially from the traditional centralized Soviet model. In the highly decentralized system set up by the late President Tito, the locus of power resides with republic and provincial government and party authorities. This system was intended to preserve stability among Yugoslavia's contentious ethnic groups, but it has also impeded effective leadership at the national level.

State security and uniformed police are under the jurisdiction of Federal and Republic Secretaries for Internal Affairs. The armed forces are under Federal jurisdiction, although a controversial amendment to the constitution of the Republic of Slovenia is intended to restrict their use in that Republic.

In the economic system, workers' self-management is intended to allow workers to run their own enterprises through a system of elected workers' councils. In practice, however, political officials have traditionally exercised considerable, and often decisive, influence over the management of enterprises in areas under their jurisdiction. The Yugoslav Government is embarking on a major program of economic reform, intended to open the Yugoslav economy to market forces by reducing government regulation, reforming the banking system, expanding competition by making enterprises more independent, and encouraging private enterprise and foreign investment. Obstacles to reform include political and bureaucratic resistance and economic difficulties, such as an inflation rate which may reach 2,500 percent by year's end. Nearly 85 percent of agricultural land in Yugoslavia is privately owned, and there is a growing number of private enterprises in services and small-scale manufacturing, particularly in the Republics of Croatia, Slovenia, and Macedonia.

Political pressure to observe human rights continued in 1989, coming both from within Yugoslavia and from external sources. Freedom of speech and freedom of expression in the media and the publishing industry increased, "alternative" political associations were founded in several areas, and the first direct elections were held in four republics, using the secret ballot and multiple candidacies (all from the LCY) to choose representatives to the collective Federal Presidency. The Republic of Slovenia continued to lead the way toward democratic practices.

In some other regions of the country with different historical and cultural traditions, political and civil liberties, including freedom of speech, press, and assembly, and the right to a fair trial continue to be restricted to varying degrees. There were numerous arrests on charges of "hostile propaganda" and similar offenses, particularly in Kosovo and in Macedonia, where ethnic Albanians accused of "nationalism and separatism" were the primary victims. According to government reports released in 1989, of 436 persons officially acknowledged to have been sentenced for political offenses in Yugoslavia, 336 were in Kosovo. March demonstrations by ethnic Albanians protesting the Serbian effort to assert greater control over the Province of Kosovo led to at least 25 deaths, including those of two police officers.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reported instances of such killings in Yugoslavia.

b. Disappearance

No instances of prolonged or permanent disappearance were reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Yugoslav Constitution and the law forbid torture, and there were no reports of its practice. However, there were numerous credible reports that people were sometimes beaten, mistreated, or threatened during detention in Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav press reported that many Albanians subjected to "isolation" after March demonstrations in Kosovo (see Section 1.d.) were subjected to beating, deprivation of food and heat, and other forms of mistreatment. In October guards were indicted for beating Albanian prisoners in two Serbian prisons. At year's end, the trial was continuing.

There are also credible reports that use of psychiatry is abused in Yugoslavia. In 1989 the "Anatoliy Koryagin Committee" was formed to document and protest psychiatric abuse. The Koryagin Committee claims to have recorded at least 60 such cases. The Yugoslav Forum for Human Rights, a quasi-official body, in an appeal to the Yugoslav President, included psychiatric abuse as one of the serious human rights problems in the country. Legal experts believe that government regulations designed to safeguard against involuntary admission to mental hospitals are sometimes ignored.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Yugoslav criminal law and procedures are influenced by the Napoleonic and Soviet law codes. They include many provisions inconsistent with generally accepted civil and human rights. Yugoslav law provides for pretrial detention for up to 3 months, with a possible 3-month extension, which is often implemented. Access to prisoners in pretrial detention by family or legal counsel is sometimes restricted, ostensibly to prevent interference with investigations. Fikret Abdic, defendant in the highly publicized "Agrokomerc" financial scandal, was held in jail for over 2 years during his trial and pretrial investigation.

In March, as part of government measures to counter demonstrations by Albanians protesting Serbian efforts to expand Serbian influence in Kosovo Province (see Section 2.b.), Yugoslav authorities subjected 237 Albanians from Kosovo to a legal procedure known as "isolation" which had not previously been used in Yugoslavia in this fashion. These people were rounded up and held for up to 3 months, in most cases denied access to attorneys or to families. The majority were not held in Kosovo but in prisons in Serbia, where they were subjected to beatings, cold, inadequate food, and harsh interrogations. Isolated prisoners were reportedly detained under suspicion of belonging to illegal organizations, contact with "hostile" emigre groups, illegal arms trafficking, and organizing strikes and demonstrations. Of the 237 persons isolated, 41 were eventually charged with criminal offenses and 18 with misdemeanors. Yugoslav human rights activists consider the way the authorities employed isolation in Kosovo to be inconsistent with Yugoslav criminal procedures, which apparently allow such isolation through house arrest but not through imprisonment. The use of "isolation" in Kosovo was widely criticized in the Yugoslav press and even by the President of Yugoslavia, and by July the authorities said that no one was being held any longer in this condition.

In February Yugoslav authorities arrested Azem Vlasi, a former leader of the League of Communists of Kosovo, on suspicion of "counterrevolutionary activity." The trial of Vlasi and 14 others began in November and was still under way at year's end. Based on the charges brought forward by the prosecutor, however, Yugoslav human rights advocates have argued that the charges against Vlasi amount to holding him criminally liable for policies he carried out, while a leader in Kosovo, which ran counter to those of Serbia.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Each republic and province has its own criminal code and court system. Decisions by the highest republican and provincial courts, their supreme courts, may be appealed to the Federal Supreme Court, which seeks to ensure the uniform application of law. The Constitutional Court may rule on the constitutionality of laws and regulations. Offenses by those in the armed forces or offenses by civilians deemed to affect national security are tried in the military court system.

Defendants have the right to be present at their trials and to have an attorney, at public expense if needed. The majority of trials, including those on political charges, are conducted in accordance with Yugoslav legal norms, without overt interference by outside authorities. In some cases, however, Yugoslav courts may be influenced by political authorities. During debate in 1988 over a proposed constitutional amendment to remove the "moral-political" suitability test imposed for the election of judges of regular courts, considerable criticism emerged of political interference and other conditions (low pay, short terms of office, election by the local communities) which combine to make judges susceptible to outside influence.

In many political cases, the outcome is often predetermined by the political authorities. Moreover, the Yugoslav legal system contains numerous inequities toward the defendant, regardless of whether the trial is criminal or political.

Long periods of pretrial detention are allowed. The defense is sometimes restricted in the time allowed to prepare its case. While the prosecution can call as witnesses whomever it wants, the defendant has the right only to request the court to call witnesses, and the court has complete discretion whether or not to honor the request. The Supreme Court is considered to be more free of political interference than local or republic-level courts, according to some legal observers.

Although ordinary criminal trials are almost always open to the public, some political trials are not. In September observers from the International Helsinki Federation who sought to visit an "open" trial in Kosovo were told that foreigners could not attend.

The Federal Criminal Code defines a number of "political" criminal acts ranging from armed rebellion, terrorism, and espionage, to broad, imprecise categories such as hostile propaganda, "arousing national, racial, and religious hatred, dissension, or intolerance," and "damaging the reputation of Yugoslavia." In addition, the republic and provincial criminal codes cover a variety of misdemeanors considered political crimes, including "spreading false rumors and defaming the peoples and nationalities of Yugoslavia." Authorities frequently bring charges against those who make derogatory or inflammatory ethnic statements or other statements considered politically unacceptable. There is wide variation in local practice.

Yugoslav law permits the arrest and imprisonment of Yugoslav citizens for acts considered criminal offenses under Yugoslav law, even when they are committed abroad and are not crimes in the country in which they take place. Such cases are often based on the expression of views "hostile" to the Yugoslav Government or association with perceived anti-Yugoslav emigre groups. In February the Committee for Defense of Thought and Expression, a Belgrade-based human rights group, revealed that author Mihajlo Mihajlov's citizenship had been revoked by the Secretariat of Internal Affairs of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina because of critical statements he had made in the United States about the Yugoslav Government. Yugoslav law permits the revocation of citizenship if the defendant had another citizenship (in this case, U.S. citizenship) and if he "through work abroad causes damage to the international and other interests of Yugoslavia...."

The precise number of political prisoners in Yugoslavia is difficult to determine. In 1989 Amnesty International estimated that at least 200 political prisoners were being held in 1988. Yugoslav authorities sometimes release statistics on "political" prisoners, but these are often incomplete or misleading. Moreover, Yugoslav statistics on political prisoners generally appear to refer to persons sentenced for criminal offenses and do not include the larger number of people who receive misdemeanor sentences of 30 to 60 days for verbal crimes under republic or provincial laws.

After an amnesty in November in which 45 political prisoners were released, Yugoslav government figures indicated that 232 persons were still being held in Yugoslavia for political crimes. Government statistics for 1988, released in June 1989, revealed that, of 517 political charges filed nationwide, 43 percent of the defendants were ethnic Albanians from Kosovo, many accused of engaging in "separatist" activities. Albanians were tried in other republics as well as in Kosovo.

In the first half of 1989, charges for political crimes were filed against 174 people in Croatia, resulting in 36 convictions, according to the Yugoslav press. As of September 19, 1989, in Kosovo, which has the largest number of political prisoners in the country, 1,180 people had been indicted for misdemeanors, and 56 for more serious criminal acts in connection with the March demonstrations. Yugoslav authorities state that such repressive measures are intended to repel a threat to political stability which they believe is posed by Albanian "nationalism and separatism."

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Arbitrary interference in private life occurs most often in connection with government efforts to monitor opposition or dissident activity. Although the judicial system includes restrictions on arbitrary searches, these safeguards are sometimes ignored. Authorities eavesdrop on conversations, read private mail, and tap telephones in some cases. Yugoslav citizens are generally free to receive and read foreign publications; however, the publications of certain Yugoslav emigre groups, particularly those advocating the dissolution of the Yugoslav Federation or the redrawing of its internal political boundaries, are considered hostile in themselves, and their importation, possession, or sale is illegal. Possession or circulation of pamphlets advocating republic status for Kosovo in itself is considered a criminal offense. In April, for example, Ismail Sherifi was sentenced to 2 months' imprisonment for possessing photographs of symbols representing "Greater Albania," and many other Albanians have been similarly sentenced (see Section 2.a).

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

The continuing Serbian campaign to assert greater political control over the predominantly ethnic Albanian Province of Kosovo (an area within the Republic of Serbia that Serbs consider the historic cradle of their nation) led to demonstrations by Albanians in February and March. The Federal Government sent thousands of troops and police, introduced a curfew, and banned public meetings. After amendments to the Serbian Constitution were rammed through the Kosovo Provincial Assembly in March, youthful demonstrators began throwing stones at police, who responded with tear gas. On March 27, the demonstrations turned violent, resulting in the official toll of 25 deaths, including those of 2 police officers. According to official accounts, security forces did not begin firing until after one police officer had been killed by gunfire. Unofficial sources assert that the security forces used excessive force in dispersing the demonstrators, including by beating them, indiscriminately firing at them (sometimes from helicopters), and using ammunition designed to increase deaths and injuries. Unofficial and unsubstantiated reports assert that the number of demonstrators killed exceeded the officially admitted total. Government sources say 58,000 Albanians participated in the March demonstrations; they identified 1,665 of them and brought misdemeanor charges against 1,180 and criminal charges against 56. During demonstrations on November 2 and 3, at least three people were killed while protesting the trial of Azem Vlasi (see Section 1.d.), and 138 people were later convicted of misdemeanors in connection with the demonstrations.

YUGOSLAVIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Yugoslav Constitution and law affirm the freedom of speech and press, and there is a trend towards greater respect for these freedoms, both law and practice impose significant restrictions.

Arrests and convictions for what are called "verbal crimes" (most often charges involving "nationalism" or "hostile propaganda") continued in Kosovo Province and in Macedonia and also occurred in other parts of Yugoslavia. The charge is often used in combination with other charges such as "forming illegal hostile organizations." For example, in April Fikirye Musa was sentenced to 1 1/2 years' imprisonment in Pristina, Kosovo, for her unpublished writings, including pro-Albanian poetry, found in her possession. Ten others, all under the age of 22, were codefendants in the trial. Three defendants stated in court that they were exercising their freedom to express nonhostile and noncounterrevolutionary opinions. Nedzat Malichi and Hairedin Hiseni were sentenced to 5 years each, the heaviest sentences passed at the trial.

In March Muzafer Ljuti was sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment for shouting slogans in a restaurant and in a public square in Macedonia. In April Violtza Dushi, a bank director's secretary, was sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment for taking part in a demonstration in Urosevac, Serbia, where she shouted hostile slogans. Some months earlier, she allegedly had made a pro-Albanian speech to pupils at the local youth sports center.

Outbursts of nationalism from other ethnic groups also led to political trials. In July some 30 people were arrested and 6 convicted on misdemeanor charges of disrupting an official commemoration in Knin, Croatia, of the 600th anniversary of the Battle of Kosovo. One of these, Jovan Opacic, after serving his misdemeanor sentence, was indicted for the same actions under more serious criminal charges of "committing a criminal act against the Socialist self-management system and security of Yugoslavia" and "against the reputation of Yugoslavia." At his trial in September, the most severe charges against Opacic were dropped, and he was sentenced to 90 days' imprisonment on lesser charges.

All media are state owned, but the degree of official oversight varies from republic to republic. Government oversight of the media is carried out through publications boards, which include ranking party officials. There are important informal channels for official supervision of the press, including editorial staffs' use of self-censorship. Eighty-one percent of Yugoslav journalists in a recent poll said they were members of the League of Communists. If a story or press criticism displeases senior officials, journalists and editors may be reprimanded, removed, transferred, or encounter difficulty in future employment. In May local authorities in Bar, Montenegro, closed down Radio Bar because of its sympathetic coverage of a dockworkers' strike. Local authorities recommended that journalists covering the strike be disciplined, but republic authorities intervened on the strikers' behalf, and the station resumed broadcasting. Foreign broadcast media are easily received in Yugoslavia.

YUGOSLAVIA

Despite periodic bans on specific publications, the media have increased latitude to discuss and comment freely on a wide range of political and social topics. They directly criticize government and LCY officials at all levels, although, reflecting the political infighting among the republics, they prefer to target officials outside their own republics. Direct criticism of Tito is still rare and controversial. Albanians in Kosovo may well be jailed for calling for their Province to be given republic status within Yugoslavia, while in other parts of the country journalists or public figures may openly advocate this step. The first nonofficial newspaper since World War II began publication in 1989 in Slovenia.

Public prosecutors have the power to ban temporarily the publication and sale of books or periodicals if they think that the content is, for example, "false" or could "disturb" the public. However, a judge must review the temporary ban, and editors have the right to contest the prosecutor's decision at the hearing. In February Ratko Dimitrovic was sentenced to 3 months in jail for an article he had written in Politika, a Belgrade daily, in 1988. An issue of the magazine Nasi Dani was banned in April because it was found to be insulting to Bosnian officials. In 1989 at least nine magazine issues were banned, seven of them student publications. In three cases, the ban was later lifted by court order on appeal. Banning publications is usually done at the local or republic level. The criteria for such action varies from region to region; and criticism of the Federal Government was the most frequent reason cited for banning publications.

Indirect constraints can sometimes also be applied to publications. The Serbian youth magazine Non had its printing contract with the Politika publishing house canceled in November because of Non's criticism of Politika's stands in support of the Serbian leadership. Non was able to find another printer, however. In December Politika canceled the printing contracts of two other magazines, citing "technical reasons."

In book publishing, the authorities generally provide only loose oversight. The Yugoslav publishing industry puts out a wide range of U.S. and Western European books, including the works of Soviet and Eastern European dissidents. "The Satanic Verses" was published in both Macedonian and Serbo-Croatian in 1989, despite objections from Yugoslav Muslim groups.

Academic freedom was severely damaged in the Province of Kosovo when at least 30 instructors were expelled from the University of Pristina, and large numbers of teachers at all educational levels were disciplined or fired under suspicion of influencing students toward Albanian separatist views. At least 1,500 party members have been expelled in Kosovo for allegedly espousing separatist views, and Kosovo party officials have stated that those expelled should also be fired from "leading positions," including those in the managerial level of business enterprises.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Yugoslav Constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but this right traditionally has been severely circumscribed in practice. Public political demonstrations generally have been permitted only in support of official policies and by officially recognized organizations. All public gatherings must be registered by the authorities, who will often seek to ban those that run counter to official policies. In 1988 and 1989, however, thousands of discontented workers or farmers marched in peaceful but unauthorized protest demonstrations to Belgrade or republic capitals. The authorities generally met with the protesters and did not try to disperse them by force.

In 1989 there were a number of large demonstrations in Serbia, Kosovo, Montenegro, and elsewhere. Demonstrations by Serbs were tolerated or even encouraged if they coincided with the Serbian leadership's objectives. Albanian demonstrators in Yugoslavia, even if peaceful, faced possible use of force by police and dismissal from their jobs. Albanian demonstrations in Kosovo were banned and eventually dispersed by force. Demonstrations in Montenegro in January led to the overthrow of the Republic government. After a peaceful demonstration by several thousand Serbs on July 9 in the Croatian town of Knin, 6 persons were sentenced to 30 to 60 days' imprisonment on misdemeanor charges.

In Macedonia, Liman Jashari was sentenced to 10 years, and four others were sentenced to terms of from 6 to 8 years for organizing the August 1988 demonstration in Kumanovo of ethnic Albanians. In the Macedonian town of Bitolj, 10 ethnic Albanians were tried for "hostile propaganda," "association with the aim of carrying out hostile activities," and "counterrevolutionary acts." Eight ethnic Albanians in Macedonia were sentenced in 1989 to prison terms of from 5 to 11 years for participating in a demonstration on language rights.

In Kosovo, Yugoslav authorities reacted strongly to demonstrations and strikes in February and March (see Section 1.f.). Slovenian authorities banned a May 8 demonstration organized by nonofficial groups supporting the "Ljubljana 4," a group of journalists and one soldier convicted in 1988 on charges of revealing military secrets. The demonstration took place, however, when the official youth organization agreed to sponsor the event. Slovenian authorities banned a demonstration of Serbs and Montenegrins planned for December 1 in Ljubljana.

Freedom of association is guaranteed under the Yugoslav Constitution, and, although the scope of political association is limited by the monopoly of power of the LCY, many new nonofficial organizations have formed in the past year. To obtain legal status, organizations must register with the Government, but many do not, and the law is laxly enforced. In February the Association for a Yugoslav Democratic Initiative met for the first time in Zagreb. By the end of the year, the organization had chapters in many cities in Yugoslavia, including Belgrade, Sarajevo, and Titograd. A number of nonofficial organizations were founded in Croatia in 1989. In December the Croatian League of Communists agreed with a proposal by these groups for early republic elections in which all political groups could compete. Other new organizations include human rights groups and environmental groups in Montenegro and Serbia. In Slovenia, many alternative political associations formed in 1988 and 1989 will be competing for seats in the republic elections in the spring of 1990. Human rights organizations, for example the Yugoslav branch of the International Helsinki Federation, have unhampered contact with their international affiliates.

YUGOSLAVIA

Association for the purpose of hostile activities is a crime under Yugoslav criminal law, and this law has been used to prosecute ethnic Albanians who advocate republic status for Kosovo. In February 11 Albanians were convicted in Pristina, Kosovo, on this charge, receiving sentences of from 4 months to 8 years. In April, 10 ethnic Albanians were convicted in Prizren, Kosovo, on this charge, receiving sentences of from 1 to 5 years. Most of the accused belonged to an association called "Marxist-Leninists of Kosovo." A group of ethnic Albanian soldiers was convicted in January under this article for organizing a hostile association in their garrison in Nis in April 1988.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Yugoslav Constitution provides for freedom of religious practice but proscribes "abuse" of religion and religious activities for political purposes. Yugoslav authorities officially encourage atheism. Religious believers in Yugoslavia are not generally subject to overt persecution, but open practice of one's faith is normally a disqualification for high positions in government, business, the media, and academia. In practice, however, religious freedoms vary from republic to republic, depending in part on the political and historical role of the various religions. The largest faiths in Yugoslavia are Serbian Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Islamic. Since World War II, the Jewish community has numbered fewer than 10,000, but it is active and well organized. There is a small Protestant community which includes denominations such as Pentecostals, Baptists, and Jehovah's Witnesses.

In Serbia, the Serbian Orthodox Church has enjoyed unusually good relations with republic authorities over the past 2 years. The Serbian media in general have provided an unusually comprehensive and sympathetic view of religion. Belgrade television covered Christmas celebrations in Belgrade, Zagreb, and Ljubljana in 1988 and the dedication of the new Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade in June 1989.

In Slovenia, where most believers are Catholic, the authorities also have displayed a tolerant attitude toward religion. In 1989 December 25 became an official holiday in Slovenia. The authorities in Croatia, however, have a more reserved position toward the Catholic Church, in part stemming from a tradition of conflict between the Catholic Church and the Communist authorities that goes back to World War II. All Saints' Day (November 1) became an official holiday in Croatia in 1989.

Yugoslav authorities maintain restrictions on the public activities of religious communities, including limits on religious education, on publishing activity, and on the construction of new churches and other facilities. In recent years, the application of these rules has been more relaxed in keeping with a somewhat more tolerant approach by the authorities toward all nonofficial activity. As yet, however, there have been no changes in the rules themselves. Religious communities in Yugoslavia have vigorous publishing programs, although they do not have their own printing facilities. The construction of new places of worship requires the consent of local government authorities, who sometimes construct bureaucratic obstacles. The Serbian Orthodox Church in Split, Croatia, a predominantly Catholic area, is having difficulty in getting permission to complete its Church, and the Islamic communities in Belgrade and Split have had applications pending to build new mosques for many years. Authorities in Macedonia have been reluctant to issue permits for the construction of new mosques. In the Banat region of Vojvodina Province, authorities reportedly denied permission to begin the construction of churches in 1989. In Zagreb (Croatia), the Jewish community has received official permission to construct a new synagogue, which will be combined with a Jewish cultural center. Several new mosques were completed in Bosnia in 1989, but up to 500 requests for building permits for religious edifices remain unfulfilled in this republic, where Muslims account for about 40 percent of the population.

Primary education outside the state system is not permitted in Yugoslavia. There are some opportunities for religious education at the secondary and university level for all major faiths. The Catholic Church, for example, maintains 8 secondary schools (about 100 pupils each), 2 theological faculties, and 5 seminaries in Croatia and Slovenia. The Serbian Orthodox Church has four high schools and two theological faculties, one of which just opened in 1989. The Yugoslav Islamic Association runs three high schools in the Muslim areas of the country and one Islamic theological faculty in Sarajevo. The degrees offered by these institutions are not officially recognized by the Yugoslav authorities. Yugoslav religious communities, both Christian and Muslim, also make vigorous efforts to provide religious instruction outside of school for children and young people.

Religious believers are subject to restrictions while doing obligatory military service. Active duty military personnel may not attend religious services or have religious materials in their possession. In April the Federal Presidency amended the law on military service to permit conscientious objectors to serve in the military without bearing arms for a period of 24 months, twice as long as the standard conscription period.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within the country is provided for by the Constitution and generally permitted in practice. No exit permits are required to visit the more than 135 countries with which Yugoslavia has diplomatic or consular relations. Passports are routinely available to most Yugoslavs, and roughly half of Yugoslavia's population has passports for foreign travel. Approximately 700,000 Yugoslavs are employed as "guest workers" in Western Europe.

The Yugoslav authorities have sometimes denied passports to well-known dissidents, but recently prominent critics, such as Milovan Djilas and Dobroslav Paraga, have received passports and traveled abroad. In Croatia, human rights activists demonstrated in front of the Croatian Parliament in early 1989 to seek reinstatement of passports for the approximately 50 Croats who have had their passports confiscated or denied on political grounds.

In 1989, however, the authorities began to deny passports to Albanians and Gypsies, in large part because so many of them were seeking asylum in the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG). In 1988, 20,800 Yugoslavs sought asylum in the FRG. According to press reports, FRG authorities threatened to require visas for all Yugoslavs entering the FRG, which would have created a hardship for the approximately 600,000 Yugoslavs already living there. The Yugoslav Government responded by denying passports to several thousand people, mostly in Kosovo and Macedonia.

The law on the entry of foreigners into Yugoslavia notes the right of permanent asylum and provides for government assistance to persons granted that right. Yugoslavia extends temporary asylum to refugees who, with the assistance of the Belgrade office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), seek permanent resettlement in third countries. According to UNHCR figures, in the first 11 months of 1989, a total of 4,401 new cases were registered with UNHCR in Yugoslavia, and 4,171 cases were resolved by permanent settlement outside Yugoslavia. As of November 30, 1989, there were 1,081 people residing in Yugoslavia who had been accepted by the UNHCR refugee program but whose permanent settlement had yet to be arranged. Of those interviewed by UNHCR during this period, one-third were denied refugee status and returned by Yugoslav authorities to their country of origin.

Romania is the source of most refugees in Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav Government says it screens out what it considers "undesirables:" criminals, mentally ill people, and unaccompanied minors are sent back to Romania without the opportunity to be interviewed by the UNHCR. The number of Romanians seeking asylum who are returned to Romania without being interviewed by the UNHCR is a matter of some dispute. In October, about 30 Romanians (out of several hundred asylum-seekers held in a Yugoslav detention facility) were involuntarily returned to Romania following their participation in a hunger strike protesting the action of the Yugoslav authorities to force them to depart the country without being interviewed by the UNHCR. After the toppling of the Ceausescu regime, some of the Romanian asylum-seekers in Yugoslavia voluntarily returned to Romania.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Yugoslav citizens do not have the right to change the basic system of government. The 2-million-member League of Communists of Yugoslavia (LCY) formally maintains a monopoly on political power. The party's authority at the Federal level, however, is greatly dispersed and diluted because of the decentralization of decisionmaking power to the parties in the six republics and two provinces. With few exceptions, no major initiatives, including constitutional amendments, may be adopted by the Federal Government without the unanimous consent of the republics and provinces. Autonomous political "associations" proliferated in 1988 and 1989, reflecting a growing demand at the grassroots level.

The collective State Presidency (Chief of State) is responsible for overall policy direction. The Federal Executive Council (Cabinet), headed by the Prime Minister, is responsible for running the governmental machinery and proposing specific legislation. The terms of government officials are from 1 to 5 years, with a possible extension for one additional term.

The Federal Assembly, responsible for enacting legislation, operates sometimes by majority vote and sometimes by consensus among delegations representing the country's eight Federal units. Although over 99 percent of the assembly delegates are members of the LCY, the Assembly has been active and contentious in recent years and has several times rejected or drastically altered proposals endorsed by the Presidency and Cabinet. Its debates generally are fully reported in the media. As a result of 1988 constitutional amendments, in the spring of 1990 one house of the bicameral Federal Assembly will for the first time be chosen by direct election using secret ballots and multiple candidacies.

In 1989, for the first time, members of the Federal Presidency from Slovenia, Montenegro, Bosnia-Hercegovina, and Macedonia were elected in their republics in competitive elections by secret ballot. All the candidates were members of the LCY, and government organs controlled the list of candidates.

There are about 20 "alternative movements" in Yugoslavia, some of which are registered as official organizations and some of which are not. Some of the "alternatives" operate under the umbrella of the Socialist Alliance of Working People, a party-approved mass organization. Others openly advocate competition with the LCY and, in Slovenia, have indicated their intention to put forth lists of candidates in the 1990 spring elections. Independent groups in Croatia may do so as well. The national daily Borba printed the platforms of 16 alternative groups in June. Among the groups founded in 1989 were the Croatian Social-Liberal Alliance, the Alliance of Workers, the Social Democratic Union of Slovenia, and the Association for a Yugoslav Democratic Initiative. An old established organization, the Serbian Writers Association, issued a public statement in May calling for an independent judiciary, a free press, and the introduction of a multiparty system in Yugoslavia.

In the past, the Government criticized Western charges of human rights violations within Yugoslavia as interference in Yugoslav internal affairs and as efforts to bring pressure on Yugoslavia to alter its social, economic, or political system. In recent years, the Government has been somewhat more willing to acknowledge human rights as a legitimate topic for other governments. It is still reserved about discussing specific instances of human rights violations, particularly alleged violations in Kosovo. A fact-finding mission from the European Parliament in June was denied a meeting with political prisoners and was harshly criticized in the press. A September delegation from the International Helsinki Federation met unofficially with ethnic Albanians and Serbs but was denied any meetings with government officials. The group returned in October for meetings with government officials, including the President, the first time an official of that rank had met with human rights activists. Yugoslavia is a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Of the domestic human rights groups, the largest is the Forum for Human Rights, established by the Socialist Alliance to monitor domestic human rights trends and foster understanding of Yugoslavia's international commitments to human rights. The Forum has presented findings and suggestions for changes in the legal code to the Federal Presidency and the Federal

Ministry of Justice, including elimination of "verbal crimes" and the practice of isolating prisoners.

Helsinki Watch has a branch in Yugoslavia, and several independent human rights groups have sprung up among the "alternative movements." In April, 30 human rights organizations from all over Yugoslavia met for the first time in Sarajevo, Bosnia. They founded a joint committee, the Sarajevo Trial Working Group, which on December 11 published a letter in the national daily Borba criticizing human rights abuses in a 1983 trial of Muslim fundamentalists.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Constitution provides for the equality of citizens regardless of sex, and the Government is officially opposed to racial discrimination. Despite government efforts, however, some social prejudice continues to exist, particularly with regard to ethnic Albanians and Gypsies, who constitute 8 and 0.7 percent respectively of Yugoslavia's population. On the other hand, the Serbian minority in the Autonomous Province of Kosovo has complained sharply of physical mistreatment and discriminatory practices on the part of the Albanian majority (over 90 percent of Kosovo's population).

Ethnic Albanians are concerned about anti-Albanian sentiment in the country as a whole. There is legitimate suspicion that certain government policies on family subsidies are specifically aimed at ethnic Albanians, who have the highest birthrate in Europe. Macedonia already limits "social welfare" payments to the first three children in a family; Serbia is considering plans to follow suit. Macedonian authorities have manipulated building code regulations governing the height of walls to justify the bulldozing of walls that traditionally surround Albanian homes in the Republic.

In an effort to reverse the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins from Kosovo, Serbia restricts all sales of real property in Kosovo by Serbs and Montenegrins to Albanians. Prospective sales must be submitted to a review board which determines whether or not the sale was "coerced" by the Albanian purchaser. In practice, this amounts to a ban on purchase of Serbian and Montenegrin property in Kosovo by Albanians. Some try to avoid the restriction by engaging in "secret sales," which is a criminal offense. In September two ethnic Albanians were sentenced to 60-day jail terms for secretly buying Serbian property in Vucitrn. It appears that only Albanian buyers are prosecuted for such transactions, not Serbian sellers.

Similarly, jobs and housing are reserved for ethnic Serbs who wish to move back to Kosovo. Some Albanians were fired simply to make room for returning Serbs. In one instance, the nephew of the former Kosovo party chief Azem Vlasi was fired because "his presence was an irritant to the Serbs in the workplace," according to the Yugoslav press.

There is legal equality of the sexes under Yugoslav law. Maternity leave for employed women is routinely granted for periods between 9 and 12 months. Working mothers are given day-care allowances based on their salaries and the number of children to be cared for. Also, a working mother may take sick leave when her child is ill (up until 2 years after its birth), and the father may do so when the mother is ill.

Statistics on the prevalence of violence against women are not readily available, but spouse abuse is not uncommon in the lesser developed parts of Yugoslavia. Legal penalties for spousal abuse are the same as those for assault of any person; however, the abused spouse must make out a complaint, and this is seldom done. Data collected by feminist hotlines in Zagreb, Belgrade, and Ljubljana over the past 2 years recorded 6,000 women who reported wife abuse. The same source reported that women's lives were endangered in one case out of five. The official Yugoslav Women's Organization has begun a legal initiative to exact harsher legal penalties for wife abuse and rape and to make the Slovene Republic law against rape within marriage also a Federal law. Federal marriage laws allow the woman to keep her maiden name, to continue working if she wishes, and to have "equal input in the decision as to where the couple will live." There are feminist groups in the larger cities of Slovenia, Croatia, and Serbia (including Vojvodina) campaigning for improvements in women's rights.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Since 1950 Yugoslavia has had a unique industrial relations system in which most enterprises are neither privately owned nor owned by the state, but are defined as socially owned. Neither the Yugoslav Constitution nor the law prohibit the formation of unions outside the structure of the sole labor central known as the Council of Trade Unions of Yugoslavia (CTUY). However, the CTUY is accorded various rights and responsibilities under legislation, and the Constitution also provides that unions shall pursue the objective of building and defending a self-managing Socialist society.

Trade unions are organized geographically by republic and province and by craft at all levels. Workers are not required to join the official unions, but virtually all workers (93 percent) in the socially owned sector of the economy do. The trade unions are formally independent of the Government and the LCY but unquestionably are influenced by political leaders. The degree of political influence appears to vary considerably by region and level. Trade union independence in general appears to be growing, as reflected in the increasing frequency of strikes and strike threats organized by the unions. (A majority of strikes in 1989 were organized by union bodies.)

Federal law makes no provision for the free formation of independent trade unions, although there is no specific ban either. At the republic level, an amendment to the constitution of Slovenia adopted in September provides for free trade union association. In Croatia, the Republic Presidency and official union organization have both publicly backed the free formation of independent unions. Moreover, workers in that Republic established their own railroad union in November, and Yugoslavia's commercial pilots formed an independent union in December. The issue has not become relevant for small private firms to date, and the rights of the trade unions to organize in the private sector are guaranteed by the new law on labor relations.

Yugoslav workers have had a constitutionally guaranteed right to strike since November 1988, although strikes have been commonplace for years. A law on strikes is currently under debate in the Federal Assembly. The right to strike includes, and is exercised by, workers in socially owned firms and the Government. Preliminary figures indicate some 1,900 strikes occurred during 1989, involving 470,000 workers.

Strikes are resolved through negotiations between the workers' strike committee and a combination of management, the workers' council, and (at times) politicians. The position of the trade union generally depends on the activism of the union local. In Slovenia, Croatia, and Macedonia, official union policy enjoins locals to support or sponsor strikes favored by a majority of workers.

Although not a participating member of the World Confederation of Labor since 1950, the CTUY has good cooperation with that organization, as well as with the European Trade Union Confederation. The CTUY, although not a member of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), has also begun cooperation with the WFTU at the craft union level.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Western-style collective bargaining has not existed in Yugoslavia. The new law on labor relations introduces the concept of "collective agreements" to be negotiated between the unions and Chambers of Economy (semiofficial Chambers of Commerce), but the system remained untested in 1989. Workers at present continue to protect their interests through the self-management system.

All large firms in Yugoslavia are socially rather than privately owned. All the employees at any one enterprise belong to the same trade union, which also includes the managers. Under Yugoslav law, workers elect their council (a body separate from the trade unions) which has a voice in selecting management and must approve by majority vote major (and sometimes minor) business decisions, including wage levels, by the enterprise. Enterprise managers are increasingly bound by law to more Western-style standards of business discipline. Yugoslavia has no economic incentive zones, nor are there any special industries where labor standards differed from those elsewhere in the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by the Yugoslav Constitution and is generally not practiced. However, many Yugoslavs were surprised to learn during the State's enforcement of "special measures" (i.e., a state of emergency) in troubled Kosovo Province that the Government may impose a "work obligation" on workers in industries of "broader social significance." The "work obligation" was also invoked during the September strike of railroad workers in Croatia, despite the fact that no state of emergency was in place at the time. Violation of the "work obligation" may be punished by criminal and administrative penalties.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment of children is 16 years. Of those unemployed in Yugoslavia, 78 percent are under the age of 30, and in practice, young people often must wait years for their first job.

YUGOSLAVIA

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Yugoslavia has an official 42-hour workweek, with generous vacation time and sick leave benefits. The republics set minimum wage levels, which vary widely in keeping with varied levels of economic development and prices. The August minimum monthly wage in more developed Slovenia, for example, was roughly the equivalent of $170, while in poorer Montenegro it was roughly $35. Wage levels were raised frequently during the reporting period. The trade unions point out that minimum wages lag behind inflation, leaving workers who earn only the minimum at or below "the poverty line."

Yugoslavia has extensive federal and republic laws and regulations on worker safety. Occasional press reports and informal observations of many Yugoslav workplaces suggest that enforcement of work safety rules is lax.

NEAR EAST, NORTH AFRICA, AND SOUTH ASIA

AFGHANISTAN*

The Peoples' Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) came to power in a coup in 1978 and imposed a totalitarian system backed by a Soviet invasion in 1979. Since its establishment, the regime has faced continuous armed opposition--supported by a large portion of the population. Unable to subdue the resistance of tens of thousands of armed "mujahidin" fighters, the Soviet Government began a 9-month troop withdrawal which was completed on February 15, 1989. The regime's control has been reduced to Kabul and other population centers, garrisons to protect them, and some lines of communication if the regime uses sufficient military force to protect them. While the regime has been able to stave off a final victory by mujahidin troops, it has been unable to expand its area of control. In February the regime declared a state of emergency and put political power in the hands of a 20-member Supreme Military Council for the Defense of the Homeland. Fighting between regime and resistance forces continued throughout 1989.

During its war of occupation, the Soviet Union employed massive air and artillery bombardments and emplaced millions of mines. The fighting generated over 5 million refugees, one-third of Afghanistan's prewar population. International observers estimate that over 1 million Afghans have died as a direct consequence of the war.

For its part, the resistance has sought to attain a greater degree of political unity and offer an alternate form of government while continuing its efforts to oust the Kabul regime. Disunity among resistance groups, however, has contributed to the regime's ability to survive. In February 1989, representatives of the major resistance parties formed the Afghan Interim Government (AIG) to oversee a transfer of power. Since its establishment, the AIG has been organizing its ministries and seeking to broaden its support, although by year's end much work remained to be done.

Internal security functions in regime-controlled areas are performed primarily by the secret police under the Ministry of State Security (WAD). More than 25,000 Afghans are thought to work for the Ministry, with Soviet security advisers.

The Afghan economy is basically agricultural, with land tenure in the hands of individuals or family/tribal groups. An entrepreneurial/trading class and some small scale manufacturing exist. Continued fighting through 1989 added to the already tremendous dislocation suffered by the economy in the war. As a result of war damage, as well as abandonment and neglect, the economic infrastructure will require years to recover.

There was little change in the human rights situation in 1989. On the one hand, the regime allowed a political group, the National Salvation Society, to form, and published a list, with profound apologies, of the names of 11,000 people executed during the first 20 months following the coup in

*Since the American Embassy in Kabul was closed for security reasons in January 1989, the United States has no official observers in Afghanistan. This report therefore draws to a large extent on unofficial sources.

AFGHANISTAN

1978. On the other hand, the February state of emergency limited still further freedom of expression and public assembly and the right to privacy. Virtually all of the categories of human rights discussed in this report are denied outright or are severely restricted. The U.N.'s Special Rapporteur, in his report issued on October 30, 1989, sets the number of political prisoners at 3,000, with the conditions of prisoners awaiting trial or verdict described as deplorable.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Arbitrary killing and other acts of violence against suspected opponents of the Kabul regime were commonplace. Executions continued in Afghan prisons, often following summary trial and conviction--sometimes for political offenses--by special courts. Reportedly, regime forces and some mujahidin groups have executed prisoners in the field. The fierce fighting early in the year around the city of Jalalabad involved reported mujahidin executions of regime troops who had surrendered.

There have also been murders of Afghans both inside and outside Afghanistan which have been ascribed to mujahidin groups as well as to WAD agents.

b. Disappearance

Disappearances continued in areas under regime control. This is frequently the result of the impressment into military service of males as young as 13 years old. Some persons also disappear as a result of the action of mujahidin, who have been reported to have abducted or captured regime military and civilian cadre and suspected regime collaborators.

In its October report, Asia Watch cites five cases of disappearances of intellectuals and alleges that throughout the conflict the distribution of arms and aid has been an important factor in the conflict among resistance groups and that aid workers and intellectuals have been a frequent target of attack.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Regime authorities frequently use torture to punish or to extract information or confessions. The practice is sufficiently widespread to indicate that it has official sanction. Torture techniques include both physical and psychological abuse; the use of electric shock to sensitive areas of the body, immersion in water, and beatings are common forms of abuse reported by victims and witnesses. Threats of abuse against family members and prolonged sleep deprivation are typical forms of psychological torture. Some reports describe cases of mental disturbances induced by torture in regime prisons.

In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, Amnesty International (AI) noted that it had continued to receive reports of the torture and ill-treatment of prisoners, although again, as noted in its 1988 report, on a smaller scale than in previous years.

AFGHANISTAN

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no legal safeguards to prevent arbitrary arrest or detention. Afghans living in areas controlled by the regime face unwarranted seizure by security personnel. Often, detainees are either not told of the charges against them before trial or are simply not brought to trial. Arrest warrants are not issued, and the right to judicial determination of the legality of detention is not accorded. Detainees typically are held incommunicado, sometimes for years, as is the case with several hundred prisoners held in the WAD sections of Pol-e-Charkhi prison. Although bail is sometimes granted, it is not a standard feature of the regime's legal procedures. Formal charges may come only after months of interrogation.

There were continuing instances of arbitrary detention in 1989, principally as a result of the impressment of civilians into military service in Kabul and, to a lesser extent, in other cities controlled by the regime. The Kabul regime's military and secret police continue to impress large numbers of underage boys into the military, taking them from the street and sometimes from classrooms and homes. The authorities do not inform the parents of the young men of their impressment. Relatives of soldiers who desert are often arrested by the regime to punish the deserters and deter others from deserting. Since the Soviet departure, regime impressments have been stepped up.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

All courts are controlled by the ruling PDPA, and defendants may be denied their legal rights because of charges regarding their political beliefs. Most persons accused of nonpolitical crimes are tried in the ordinary criminal court system under the norms of judicial codes in existence before the PDPA coup of 1978. Those political detainees who are charged and brought to trial are usually arraigned on allegations of treason, espionage, or terrorism and are tried and sentenced in secret. As a rule, they must provide their own defense, without benefit of counsel.

Death sentences generally are carried out quickly after a perfunctory review by the authorities. There is no mechanism to appeal a death sentence. The U.N.'s Special Rapporteur for Afghanistan, in his report of October 30, 1989, notes this as a contradiction to Article 14(5) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Afghanistan is a party. According to the 1987 Constitution, death sentences are carried out after the approval of the President. In areas not controlled by the regime, civil and criminal cases are tried by Islamic judges (qazis) and community elders under Islamic, or Shari'a, law and according to Afghan custom. Asia Watch reports that trials of Afghan prisoners by mujahidin parties during the war do not conform to internationally recognized standards of fair trial.

No precise estimate is available on the number of political prisoners held by the regime, but observers agree that it is at least 3,000. The mujahidin are not known to hold political prisoners, although they do detain Soviet and regime personnel for extended periods. An unknown number of Soviets, captured prior to the withdrawal, are still being held by the resistance in the hope of exchanging them for prisoners held by the regime and, the resistance claims, by the U.S.S.R.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Constitutional protections were suspended by the February 17 declaration of a state of emergency. Afghans complain that regime forces routinely employ sweeps through residential areas and confiscate property, including homes. Telephones are frequently tapped and correspondence monitored.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Prior to its withdrawal in mid-February, the Soviet Union launched an intense campaign of bombardment along supply and evacuation routes as well as in areas where regime garrisons were hard pressed by resistance forces. These attacks caused large numbers of casualties indiscriminately among the civilian population. Following Soviet withdrawal, the Kabul regime continued high altitude bombing and began frequent launches of inaccurate yet powerful Scud surface-to-surface missiles. At least 1,000 Scuds were launched between February and late October, causing, together with bombings and artillery barrages, hundreds of additional civilian deaths and injuries. Regime and Soviet forces placed millions of landmines around fortifications or scattered them by artillery or aircraft during the Soviet occupation. More have been used by the regime since the Soviets left (and a lesser number of mines, especially antitank mines, have been sown by the mujahidin). Nothing has been done by the Soviets or the regime to remove them or help the U.N. accomplish the task. Although the U.N. has sponsored a program to detect and remove mines, the mines will pose a significant hazard to civilians for years.

Mujahidin rocket attacks against airfields and military positions under government control have also caused numerous civilian casualties. Asia Watch, in a report published in November, focused on allegations of human rights abuses perpetrated by various resistance groups, most frequently the Hezb-e-Islami of Gulbuddin Hekmatyar. These included politically motivated murders and kidnappings of Afghan refugee intellectuals, killing of prisoners, and indiscriminate attacks on government-controlled civilian targets.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional provisions regarding freedom of expression were suspended under the February 17 declaration of a state of emergency. The regime tolerates almost no criticism in the public media, and private criticism can result in detention and arrest. Afghans are guarded in their conversations lest antiregime comments be reported to the secret police. There is no academic freedom, leading to a continuing exodus of academics and intellectuals, and the educational infrastructure is seriously at risk. All media are owned and controlled by the regime and tightly supervised. The press, radio, and television are used exclusively to convey the regime's policy and interpretation of world events. The unlicensed import and sale of non-Soviet video and audio tapes, magazines, books, and posters are forbidden, although this ban is generally ineffective. Western radio broadcasts in local languages are frequently jammed, although some programs do get through.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There is no freedom of peaceful assembly and association in areas controlled by the regime. The February declaration of a state of emergency put further limits on constitutional rights to assemble. A 1987 party decree passed by the Revolutionary Council theoretically provided for the expression of political views at variance with those of the PDPA, but the party continues to set the bounds for acceptable dissent. While political demonstrations do occur, they are invariably staged by the Government. Attempts to hold unauthorized peaceful assemblies are dealt with forcefully. Large numbers of people from the upper and middle classes have fled the country because of severe restrictions on political and social activity.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The population of Afghanistan is overwhelmingly Muslim. Although Sunnis predominate, with 80 to 90 percent of the population, there is an important Shi'a minority primarily concentrated in the Hazarajat region of central Afghanistan and, since the war began, in Kabul. Small enclaves of Hindus and Sikhs traditionally have lived peacefully alongside their Muslim neighbors.

Since the 1978 coup, the regime has sought, with marginal success, to supervise strictly all religious organizations. The regime's policy pronouncements, including statements by President Najibullah, routinely invoke religious terminology in what is seen by most Afghans as a cynical effort to appeal to the populace. The regime has made some effort to win support from Muslims through the construction and repair of mosques and religious schools. Within the last year, the regime has declared its dedication to Islamic ideals and does not interfere with the practice of religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Domestic travel remains severely restricted by wartime conditions. In 1988 the regime reportedly loosened its requirements and lowered the charge for obtaining a passport for foreign travel.

The large numbers of mines remaining from the Soviet occupation and additional mining by regime forces, since the Soviet withdrawal, of the principal overland routes and passes (as well as the smaller number of mines sown by the mujahidin) have caused a large number of casualties among the civilian population and creates serious risks for returning refugees who travel over these routes.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Afghan citizens have neither the right nor the ability peacefully to change their government. The regime-controlled areas of Afghanistan have a totalitarian government under the control of the PDPA, which is kept in power by the Soviet Union. The ruling PDPA is modeled closely on the Soviet Communist Party. Under military pressure from the resistance, the PDPA has presented proposals for various ways to change the country's form of government, including creation of a coalition transition government. However, under these proposals, the PDPA would continue to hold the reins of real power.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The regime's relationships with international humanitarian organizations investigating human rights practices in Afghanistan is now less obstructionist than in the past. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was granted permission in 1988 to visit persons detained by the Government, and such visits are now taking place. The ICRC also continues to conduct a medical program in Kabul.

The U.N. Special Rapporteur on Afghanistan, Felix Ermacora, visited Kabul in September, at the invitation of the Government, to gather material for his fourth report on human rights in Afghanistan which he submitted in an interim form in October. His report covers a wide range of human rights abuses and issues on both sides and offers a series of recommendations. In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI noted that in April it had appealed to President Najibullah and to Soviet authorities to ensure that allegations of torture and extrajudicial executions would be fully investigated and that those found responsible be brought to justice; there was no indication that a response had been made.

Some mujahidin groups have permitted the ICRC and journalists sporadically to visit some Soviet and Afghan prisoners held by them. In June leaders of the Afghan Interim Government (AIG) met with a group of private citizens from the U.S.S.R., which included relatives of Soviet soldiers missing in action. During the year other private individuals and organizations met with AIG leaders on the prisoner-of-war (POW) issue. In November two Soviet POW's were released to their families and returned to the Soviet Union.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, and Social Status

In traditional Afghan society, the participation of women in activities beyond the home and field is limited by long established beliefs, customs, and religious practices. The social position of some women, generally those residing in Kabul, has improved somewhat over the past decade. The disruption of the war and diversion of large numbers of males to military service and combat have affected the lives of women living in areas controlled by both the regime and the resistance. Under the regime, the role of women in some nontraditional occupations such as banking, the media, and the civil service has expanded. Women have suffered because of social and ideological pressures in the refugee community in Pakistan. What little freedom they had before has been greatly circumscribed. Attitudes towards women's roles remain a subject of debate within the resistance, including assertions by some fundamentalist parties that there should be further restrictions on public appearances by women. But even among fundamentalists some change is detectable. One of the fundamentalist parties, Gulbuddin Hekmatyar's Hezbi-e-Islami, has issued membership cards conferring voting rights on females. The Special Rapporteur noted in his report that a special matter of concern is the abduction and mistreatment of Afghan women.

Violence against women is known to occur in Afghanistan, but little is known about its extent. Abuse within the family is seldom mentioned publicly in this traditional society, and the regime does not acknowledge the existence of a problem. There are no official statistics on the subject.

Afghanistan is home to several religious sects and a number of ethnic, tribal, and linguistic groups whose relations to one another have traditionally been marked by rivalry and occasionally by hostilities, both within the regime and the resistance. Local loyalties often override those to the nation as a whole. A particularly strong line of cleavage along religious, ethnic, and geographic lines lies between the minority Shi'a and the traditionally dominant Sunni Afghans. Internal regime politics reflect these rivalries, but the PDPA also tries to take advantage of them for its own purposes. This includes dispatching troops belonging to one ethnic group to other parts of the country where they are not normally present. This continues a longstanding practice--which predates the Communist takeover--aimed at making it easier to repress the local population and to prevent military defections, but it also heightens hostilities between groups and sparks frequent violence. Shi'a Muslim resistance groups are not represented in the seven-party resistance Alliance, in part because of traditional antipathy and discrimination on the part of Afghan Sunnis toward their Shi'a countrymen.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution and the labor law (enacted in 1987) assert that individual workers have the right to form trade unions, and such unions are theoretically independent of state organs. In practice, however, the structure of union organization is modeled on that of the Soviet Union, individual unions are overseen by the Central Council of Trade Unions, an umbrella organization controlled by the ruling PDPA, and there is no evidence of worker participation in decisionmaking. There is no provision in law for the right to organize independent unions, and there is no right to strike. Workers have been threatened with loss of jobs or imprisonment for refusal to join party organizations. The Central Council of Trade Unions is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. Afghanistan has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1934 but has ratified neither ILO convention 87 regarding Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Within the constraints mentioned above, workers have the theoretical right to organize and bargain collectively. According to labor law, in large economic organizations at the end of each Afghan year, a new collective contract is signed following negotiations between the management and the councils of representatives of the trade union organizations at the primary level with the consensus of the workers' collective:

AFGHANISTAN

In practice, there is no genuine labor-management bargaining and the workers' collective rubber stamps decisions taken by officials. There has been some discussion about setting up labor courts and other mechanisms for the resolution of disputes, but no action has been taken.

There is no indication that there are any special economic or export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution forbids the imposition of forced labor, but notes that the "performance of compulsory labor in wartime, natural calamity, and other states of emergency which threaten public life and order shall be excluded from this." Given that wartime conditions exist, and that the regime imposed a state of emergency in February, this constitutional provision is, in effect, superseded. The most frequent manifestation of the use of forced labor is the "voluntary" labor engaged in by students for short periods for construction projects during their annual vacations, during a time when they are seconded to the military.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The labor law specifies the conditions of work for adolescents, noting that persons aged 13 to 15 should work a maximum of 30 hours a week, and those aged 16 to 17 should not work more than 35 hours a week. The law also specifies that adolescents should receive the same pay as persons 18 and older.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The labor law stipulates that the usual hours of work on average should not exceed 40 hours a week, and that on Thursdays working time should not exceed 5 hours. Provision is made for time off for prayers, meals, holidays, weekends, annual leave, sick leave, and emergency leave. No information on any statutory minimum wage is available. There are general provisions which set out the employer's responsibility to ensure healthy and safe conditions of work, and accident compensation. There appear to be no effective enforcement mechanisms to ensure fair and safe labor practices. The State Committee on Labor and Social Security is understaffed and, like most ministries and state committees of the current regime, not very active.

ALGERIA

Following several years of deteriorating economic conditions and an eruption of urban riots in October 1988, Algeria took steps toward a more open, multiparty political system in 1989. The approval of a revised Constitution in February formally converted Algeria from a Socialist state, in which power had been invested in a single party, the National Liberation Front (FLN), to a multiparty system. However, President Chadli Bendjedid, as Minister of Defense and Chairman of the still dominant FLN, continued to hold decisive political power. The FLN remained the only party represented in the National Assembly.

Internal security is maintained on a day-to-day basis by the urban police (Surete) and the rural police (Gendarmerie), which generally adhere to constitutional guarantees against arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. When major breakdowns of internal security occur, as happened in October 1988, the security forces (General Delegation for Documentation and Security) and the armed forces assume important roles in restoring internal order. In the past, they have been known to ignore constitutional protections.

The Government continued to pursue an economic structural reform program that emphasized the development of agriculture, job creation, and decentralization of economic decisionmaking. Low oil prices, high population growth, and inflation hampered the Government's efforts to meet social needs. Popular discontent focused on massive unemployment, inadequate housing, below-standard education, and chronic scarcity of consumer goods.

The Government took a number of steps in 1989 which advanced human rights in Algeria and provided the potential for additional improvement. The new Constitution provides for the right to form political parties and civic associations and to strike, and reinforces the rights to freedom of expression, opinion, and assembly as well as the independence of the judiciary. The Government also abolished the State Security Court, legalized 14 political parties, and significantly reduced restrictions on the press.

The Government's failure, however, to arrest and prosecute those in the police and security services who killed and tortured several hundred people during the October 1988 riots remained an important human rights concern. In an atmosphere of rising Islamic activism, significant societal and legal discrimination against women also remained a major problem, but received increasing attention from many of the newly organized political parties and civic associations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings in 1989, in contrast to 1988 when the army killed several hundred persons during widespread urban rioting.

ALGERIA

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abductions, secret arrests, or clandestine detention in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The National Committee Against Torture alleged in June that there were incidents of excessive police force in 1989, including two cases in which suspects were reportedly blinded while in detention. There was no independent confirmation of these charges; the Algerian League of Human Rights (ALHR) contended that there had been no credible reports of torture since October 1988.

President Bendjedid promised in November 1988 to launch an investigation into reports, generally accepted as true, that the police and military security services used systematic torture during the October 1988 riots. He also promised to punish the guilty. His promise followed the publication of accounts of six cases of torture reported in the French-language weekly Algerie-actualite and the release of an ALHR report on 51 torture cases, both of which contained graphic accounts of the methods of torture employed (see the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1988). According to the ALHR report, one victim died as a result of torture.

There was no evidence in 1989 that the President's promise to prosecute torturers had been kept. The Government has not carried out an investigation into charges of torture, nor have any dismissals of police or security service personnel linked to torture charges been made public. Even though the National Assembly in 1989 ratified the 1984 U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the Assembly never publicly questioned the practice of torture inside Algeria.

In October 1989 the National Committee against Torture published a so-called black book on torture. Printed by a state-owned printing firm, the report contained 87 accounts (some previously published) of police abuse or torture alleged to have occurred during or shortly after the October riots. According to these accounts, the police, Gendarmerie, and military security all employed torture. The accounts alleged that, for persons suspected of having participated in rioting and looting, the police used torture as much to effect summary punishment as to produce confessions, and that for those suspected of holding unorthodox political opinions, torture was used as a last resort by the security services to extract information on clandestine political activities. Throughout 1989 the Committee and the Association of Families of the Victims of October pressed the Government to prosecute police and security force personnel involved in torture and for compensation for victims. The ALHR reported that the Government paid indemnities to some of the families of persons killed in the October riots.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution states that no one may be held, arrested, or prosecuted except as provided by law. It also provides that detention for questioning in criminal investigation cases cannot exceed 48 hours, after which the suspect must be charged or released. This period can be extended to 4 days.

ALGERIA

Detainees must be informed immediately of charges against them. Once charged, a person may be held under preventive detention indefinitely while his case is being investigated. There is no bail system. Lawyers are entitled to access to their clients at any time. Meetings are supervised visually by a guard.

In previous years, Amnesty International (AI) has noted its concern about cases of prolonged incommunicado detention, and leaders of the ALHR declared in 1987 that elimination of this abuse, as well as the practice of "administrative" or technical house arrest, was their first priority. The ALHR has not forcefully pursued this issue. An ALHR report on preventive detention, promised for 1989, has not been issued.

Exile is not a legal form of punishment in Algeria. A number of opposition figures live abroad, however, to escape arrest and trial, ostensibly on criminal charges. At least two well-known opposition figures, Socialist Forces Front leaders Hocine Ait Ahmed and Abdelhafid Yaha, returned to Algeria during 1989 with the express intention of participating in political life, with apparent government acquiescence.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

As part of its political reform program, the Government, by means of a vote in the National Popular Assembly (APN), abolished the State Security Court in April 1989. The State Security Court never sat in permanent session but had been called into existence periodically only to hear specific cases involving "national security."

The judicial system is divided into civil and military courts. There are no Islamic courts in Algeria. The new Constitution emphasizes the independence of the judiciary, and Justice Minister Benflis has been a strong proponent of efforts to bolster the judiciary's independence. Civil courts have always been generally, but not entirely, free of executive or military control; during 1989, judges reportedly became more determined in asserting their independence of outside, i.e., government influence. Judges are appointed by the Ministry of Justice. Military courts deal directly with espionage and offenses committed by military personnel.

Defendants in civil courts have unrestricted access to counsel; there is no harassment of defense counsel. The Algerian Bar Association has a pool of lawyers who provide free services to defendants who cannot afford counsel. As far as can be determined, criminal defendants are made fully aware of the charges against them at the time they are bound over for trial. Defendants have the right to confront witnesses and present evidence. Trials are public, although generally not publicized, and defendants have the right of appeal.

During the October 1988 riots, as many as 4,000 people were arrested on civil disturbance charges. Some of those detained were tortured or otherwise mistreated while in custody. Many were released soon after order was restored; the rest were released on provisional liberty November 1, 1988, including some who had been tried and convicted. There were no reports that any detainees, including those released provisionally, were rearrested or brought to trial in 1989.

ALGERIA

In its 1989 Report covering 1988, AI reported that over 180 political prisoners remained in jail. There was no evidence that there were political prisoners being held at the end of 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of the home, and it is generally respected, except in cases involving the security forces. Police may not enter a house without a warrant from the local prosecutor or investigating magistrate, and may not enter a residence during the night hours. The police and security services are believed to use telephone monitoring systems, reportedly without prior court authorization, as required by law.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Algeria made significant progress toward freedom of expression during 1989, although restrictions remain. Following the October 1988 riots, a number of citizens' associations emerged, many to protest the use of torture by the police and army during the unrest. The public meetings and outdoor rallies launched by these groups broke ground for the 30-odd political parties that became active in the period after January 1989. Although these groups were technically illegal at the time of their creation (before the revised Constitution and implementing legislation were approved), the Government did not seek to suppress them. For the first time since independence, Algerians were able to speak their minds relatively freely and publicly and were able openly to criticize the Government and national leaders.

The Algerian press tried in 1989 to redefine its role vis-a-vis the Government. Algeria's 1982 information code, which labeled journalists "agents of the State," was already under attack at the time of the October 1988 riots. In the aftermath of the disturbances, journalists demanded a new code that would stipulate their rights and duties, set out legal procedures by which the Government could call them to account for their views, and provide for protection from coercion into false reporting. An information code adopted by the National Popular Assembly in July without participation by professional journalists merely set out a series of punitive measures for articles that blasphemed Islam and other religions or were in some way contrary to the "national interest." President Bendjedid, who viewed the bill as too restrictive, sent it back to the Assembly for reconsideration, which was completed in November when the bill was finally rejected by the APN. At the end of the year the Government had not yet introduced alternative legislation. In September the newly appointed Prime Minister, Mouloud Hamrouche, announced that he would not name a Minister of Information, arguing that governmental control of the information sector at the cabinet level was inconsistent with the liberal spirit of the revised Constitution.

Although censorship had not been formally abolished at year's end, the print media enjoyed a far greater degree of editorial freedom than they had at any period since independence. Although the ruling FLN party continued to receive the lion's share of coverage, the viewpoints of other political parties appeared regularly. Individual Algerians, writing as columnists, often expressed opinions contrary to those of the Government. Criticism of government economic and social policies and management appeared relatively often in the established, government-controlled press, and was frequently seen in the publications of various political parties, the legal distribution of which began in September. Radio and television, which have always been under government control, also enjoyed a greater freedom, but to a lesser extent than the print media.

Some foreign publications are openly sold, although in limited numbers only because of the scarcity of foreign exchange. The French-language Paris weekly Jeune Afrique is proscribed, however, because it is seen as hostile to Algerian interests, and the French daily Le Monde is occasionally seized. The growing number of satellite dish antennas in Algeria provides a large and varied sector of the population with access to European television news and constitutes the greatest single outside source of information for Algerians. European and other North African radio broadcasts are easily received in Algeria.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The new Constitution provides for the rights to assembly and association without reservation. Implementing legislation adopted during the spring set out procedures for obtaining permits to hold public gatherings. As far as can be determined, the Government has routinely granted such permits. A political rally held in May, however, was broken up by the authorities on the grounds that the organizers had not received a permit. Prior to the first anniversary of the October riots, the Government announced that groups intending to hold public meetings in commemoration of the anniversary need not apply in advance for a permit but were required to supply the name of the organization sponsoring the meeting, its time and place, and number of expected participants. This policy was respected by the Government.

In early 1989, the National Committee Against Torture and the Association of Families of the Victims of October, neither of which had received formal government authorization to exist and hold meetings, were allowed to hold several rallies and meetings without interference. The Government did, however, ban a mock "torture trial" in December 1988 and prohibited an antitorture student demonstration in early 1989.

According to the July 1989 Political Associations Law, membership in political organizations is permitted for all Algerians except judges, army and security service personnel, and members of the Constitutional Council. All nongovernmental associations must be approved by the Interior Ministry. A 1987 amendment to an earlier law on civic associations, however, allowed some citizens' groups to begin operating without advance approval. ALHR set the precedent in 1987 as the first important association allowed to exist outside government or FLN control. Other associations, such as the Algerian Consumer Association and the Family Planning Association, followed shortly thereafter. Following the October 1988 riots, however, the number of citizens' groups proliferated, but many did not comply with the Ministry's approval procedure. These associations ranged in purpose from antitorture protest groups to professional associations intended as alternatives to the established, FLN-linked unions. Except for two instances in late December 1988 and early January 1989, when antitorture protests were banned, the Government did not interfere with the activities of these groups. In July the Interior Ministry approved the application of the Algerian League for the Defense of Human Rights (LADDH), a group which had existed illegally since 1985 under the leadership of reputed Berber nationalist Abdenour Ali Yahia. In a November announcement, the National Committee Against Torture asserted that the Interior Ministry's failure to consider its application for legal status within 3 months constituted a rejection of the application.

Mass organizations for youth, women, farmers, veterans, and workers and professional groups were in the past all tightly controlled by the FLN. At its sixth party congress in November 1988, the FLN decided to lessen its ties with these organizations, for example, by dropping the requirement that they be headed by FLN members. Although they were intended to play key political roles in mobilizing popular support for government programs, the mass organizations failed to do so. The organizations for youth and women became increasingly irrelevant, while the more narrowly focused farmers, veterans, and workers organizations had somewhat greater success in presenting the views of their constituencies to the government.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution declares Islam to be the state religion, but also prohibits discrimination based on "opinion or any other personal or social circumstance or condition." The Government protects the rights of the very small Christian and Jewish populations and includes leaders of these communities at ceremonial state functions. There is little evidence of individual prejudice. The Christian clergy focuses its activities on the foreign community since both society and government strongly discourage conversion from Islam. The Jewish population numbers less than 300; it maintains a synagogue in central Algiers. The Islamic clergy is government trained and the Ministry of Religious Affairs assigns imams to state-funded mosques. Privately funded mosques, however, can choose their own religious leaders. During the early months of 1989, certain mosques were used by leaders of Islamic fundamentalist political movements as operational headquarters. The Ministry of Religious Affairs subsequently issued an order prohibiting the use of places of worship for political purposes.

d. Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom to travel within Algeria and abroad and to emigrate is provided for by law and generally is respected in practice. In order to leave the country, an exit visa is no longer required, but men who are 19 years of age or older must have proof of completion of mandatory military service, and employees of state organizations, who are paying back educational scholarships through work, also need authorization. Because of bureaucratic inefficiency, passports sometimes take months to acquire, although this situation is improving. The amount of hard currency which Algerians may obtain in Algeria to carry abroad (the equivalent of $200 once every 4 years) had been the primary limitation on foreign travel. In late 1988, the Government suspended even that meager allowance as part of stringent economic austerity measures imposed to cope with a significant drop in export revenues. The allowance was not reinstated during 1989.

Foreign diplomats must apply for permission to travel farther than 50 kilometers from Algiers. The 50-kilometer limit for diplomats is not strictly enforced, however, and permission to travel farther is quickly granted upon application. Travel within Algeria for other visitors is generally unrestricted, except in areas designated as "military zones." Visitors must register with local police if they are staying overnight. Gendarmerie checkpoints in the countryside routinely inspect vehicle registrations and occasionally search vehicles.

The Constitution provides for the right of political asylum. It is estimated that more than 100,000 refugees from the Western Sahara live in camps in southwestern Algeria. They are largely supported by the Government and, to a much lesser extent, by the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Algeria continues to provide refuge and support to drought victims from Niger and Mali located in four camps near Tamanrasset. In 1989 Algeria, Niger, and Mali reached an agreement on a gradual repatriation of these refugees, whose number in 1989 rose to an unprecedented 20,000, following the expulsion of Nigerien and Malian workers from Libya.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Algeria's one-party political system, in place from independence until February 1989, did not permit citizens to change their government. The FLN chose all candidates for public office and public debate was restricted to officially sanctioned forums and issues. The constitutional revisions and implementing legislation adopted in 1989, however, put in place the framework of a multiparty system which has the potential to allow citizens to change their government. However, by year's end, the new system remained untested, since elections were not held during 1989.

The key component of political reform in 1989 was the approval in February of a greatly revised Constitution that recognized the "right to create associations of a political character." The political associations law adopted in July was broadly interpreted by the Interior Ministry, which approved applications from political parties ranging from Communist (Socialist Vanguard Party) to Islamic fundamentalist (Islamic Salvation Front). In addition to the FLN, there were 14 legalized political parties in Algeria as of late 1989. A new electoral code, revised to accommodate multiparty elections, included some elements of proportional representation. Prime Minister Hamrouche announced in October, however, that the new electoral code favored the FLN and that his Government would seek to amend it to include a greater degree of proportional representation. Elections for local and provincial-level assemblies, originally scheduled for late 1989, were postponed until the first half of 1990, ostensibly to give new political parties more time to organize. National Assembly elections have yet to be scheduled. At year's end the FLN, which had been the only legal party from independence until 1989, held a distinct advantage in resources and organization over most of the newly legalized parties.

ALGERIA

At year's end, Algeria's basic political institutions remained the same, although their interrelationships had been altered by constitutional revisions. The President, charged with assuring national defense and conducting foreign policy, could appoint and dismiss the Prime Minister, whose selections for government ministers were subject to presidential approval. The Government presented its program to the National Popular Assembly for debate and approval. The Assembly could reject the program once, forcing the Government to resign; a second rejection would result in both the dismissal of the Government and the dissolution of the legislature.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Algerian Government normally does not readily discuss its human rights record with outside governmental or nongovernmental organizations. The Government is extremely sensitive to criticism, particularly, but not exclusively, to allegations of human rights violations which appear in the European press, and sometimes publishes its own pointed rejoinders to critical articles.

There are two legally established local human rights leagues; as of 1989, both had observer status at the International Federation for Human Rights in Paris. The Algerian League of Human Rights (ALHR) was established in 1987 and received the Interior Ministry's approval the same year. It represented Algeria in the Maghreb Human Rights Association, created in February 1989. In 1989 the ALHR had about 1,200 members and regional offices in 36 of the country's 48 provincial districts. In February a much smaller human rights league led by an Algiers attorney was subsumed into the ALHR. With several successes to its credit, notably its role in helping to promote the release of almost all political prisoners in 1988, the ALHR participated actively during 1989 in debates on constitutional reform, a new information code, torture, and the Islamic fundamentalist prisoners serving extended sentences for having participated in a 1985 uprising.

The second group, the Algerian League for the Defense of Human Rights (ALDHR) received the Interior Ministry's approval to operate in July 1989. Established in June 1985, the ALDHR had operated illegally for 4 years under the leadership of attorney Abdenour Ali Yahia, who was also known for his involvement in Berber nationalist causes. The ALDHR held its first open meeting in June 1989, at which it declared its right to champion human rights causes under the revised Constitution. At this meeting, however, former founding members who objected to Ali Yahia's leadership style split off from the ALDHR and claimed to have constituted their own league. At the end of 1989, this new organization had not yet received the Interior Ministry's approval.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The 1989 Constitution specifically prohibits discrimination based on birth, race, sex, opinion, or any other personal or social condition or circumstance. It omits, however, the specific guarantees for women's political, economic, social, and cultural rights that had been included in the 1976 version. It does not appear that minority groups are treated unfairly in access to jobs, housing, education, and health care. The Government's difficulties in meeting social needs in these areas are mostly caused by the country's extremely rapid population growth and significant drop in oil revenues, and minorities seem to fare no better or worse than the Arab majority.

Berber ethnic consciousness remains strong and is fueled primarily by the Berbers' desire to preserve their distinctive cultural identity and language in the face of the Government's emphasis on the development of Algeria's Arab identity. Berber spokesmen assert that the Government seeks to repress the distinct Berber culture, including the teaching and propagation of the Amazight (Berber) language. Although Amazight has never been taught in primary and secondary schools, until 1980 it was taught at Tizi Ouzou University. Following rioting in the region in 1980, the University's chair for Amazight studies was abolished and has not been reinstated. In 1989 two Berberist political parties, the Rally for Culture and Democracy and the Socialist Forces Front, both of which promote the preservation of Berber culture, were legalized by the Interior Ministry.

Women face significant discrimination in Algerian society, which has been subject to rising Islamic fundamentalist activism. Under Algeria's 1984 family code, inspired by Islamic law, women are perpetual minors who, regardless of their age or civil status, remain under the legal guardianship of a husband, father, or brother. The code also permits polygamy, makes it more difficult for a woman than a man to obtain a divorce, and awards only 4 months of alimony to the woman regardless of the husband's means and the circumstances of the divorce. Because Islamic law and the family code forbid Algerian Muslim women from marrying non-Muslims, Algerian women engaged to non-Muslim men sometimes are subjected to harassment, including passport confiscation, by authorities upon entering or leaving the country.

Culture and tradition relegate the Algerian woman to inferior status. Violence against women is known to occur, but little is known about its extent. Wife beating and sister beating are presumed to occur frequently; both are condoned as acceptable practices by local authorities, in particular, and society in general. Abuse within the family is seldom mentioned publicly because of the value attached to family honor in this conservative society, and the Government does not acknowledge the existence of a problem. Wives who are victims of wife beating may file criminal charges or sue for divorce, but the filing of such cases is believed to be rare.

In Algeria's Muslim context, and despite the country's postindependence rhetoric about female equality, some Algerian women find themselves pressured to wear Islamic dress (usually the hidjab--a headcovering with an ankle-length overdress) by husbands and fathers jealous of the family's reputation. Whether they are motivated by family pressure, personal piety, or a desire to avoid harassment on the street, the number of young women wearing Islamic dress in cities as well as in rural areas has risen dramatically over the last several years.

With the rise of Islamic fundamentalism in Algeria, many women regard themselves as increasingly under attack from proponents of Shari'a (Islamic) law and those who blame male unemployment on female participation in the workplace. A backlash against these attitudes found expression in a spirited march organized by women's groups to celebrate International Women's Day on March 8. Some 3,000 men and women demonstrated in front of the National Assembly to demand the abrogation of the 1984 family code. The demonstrators also voiced their opposition to the introduction of Shari'a law and demanded governmental assurances that constitutional guarantees against discrimination would be upheld. The then Prime Minister, Kasdi Merbah, and Assembly Speaker Bitat reportedly assured a delegation of demonstrators that both the letter and spirit of the Constitution would be strictly applied. Governmental assurances notwithstanding, in 1989 women's groups in Algeria still saw fundamentalist pressures and the 1984 family code as the greatest threats to women's rights.

It is estimated that about 500,000 Algerian women work outside the home, and an increasing number are trained and employed in the professions. Women serve in the armed forces. According to government statistics, girls represent 44 percent of all children enrolled in primary and secondary schools. According to 1985 statistics, (the latest available) 72 percent of all school-age girls were enrolled in 1985. Islamic fundamentalist efforts to end coeducational classes so far have been unsuccessful.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

From independence until 1989, workers and professionals did not have the right to form autonomous labor unions. In 1987 the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts reported that the single trade union system in Algeria was reinforced by legislation and acted to deny workers the possibility of establishing and joining organizations of their own choosing. Since 1962, the right to organize and represent workers had been the prerogative of the general union of Algerian workers (UGTA), an FLN-linked mass organization. During 1989, however, at least two independent professional unions were established with tacit government approval. These were the Movement of Algerian Journalists (MJA) and the Union of Algerian Engineers. Also during 1989, doctors in both Algiers and Oran worked to create their own professional associations independent of the UGTA-linked union of Algerian Physicians.

Blue-collar workers did not succeed during 1989 in their efforts to establish independent labor unions despite challenges by factory level activists to the UGTA's authority. The July 1988 law that reinforced the UGTA's status as sole labor representative remained on the books, although it was generally accepted, even by the Government, that the law had been overtaken by post-October 1988 events. The Government tolerated an extended series of strikes without making reference to the 1988 law. The Government announced plans to submit a new draft law but had not done so by the end of the year. During 1989, in response to a more volatile labor environment, the UGTA loosened its ties to the FLN and pursued the activist role it had assumed in 1988. In particular, the UGTA sought to protect wages and job security as the effects of the Government's austerity program were increasingly felt.

The Constitution as revised in 1989 recognizes the right to strike but stipulates that it must be exercised within the framework of the law. Previous legislation prohibits strikes in the public sector, and the Government has not yet introduced legislation to supersede that law. Nevertheless, spontaneous, illegal strikes occurred frequently during 1989, as workers demanded higher wages and increased benefits or protested various management practices. Although the law prescribed prison sentences for illegal strikers, the Government apparently chose not to enforce that provision.

In 1989 the UGTA represented Algeria in the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and in the Maghreb Arab Union Regional Association.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Pending the adoption of new legislation to implement constitutional revisions, the July 1988 labor law remains technically in effect. That law, like its predecessors, maintains the UGTA's status as the sole authorized workers' representative, while providing for full representation and unrestricted organizing under UGTA auspices, collective bargaining, access to the workplace, unrestricted issuance of union publications, and time off for official union activities. Antiunion discrimination is illegal and unions are granted the right to initiate collective and individual court cases on employer-related grievances. Labor laws are applied uniformly throughout the country, but enforcement is lax. There are no export processing zones in Algeria.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum employment age is 18 years. The minimum age is enforced in the state sector, the country's largest employment sector. It is unregulated in the small private sector, but violations are not widespread. With continuing economic hardship, however, there was an increase in the number of children occupied in informal employment, such as in street vending.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Algeria has a 44-hour workweek and strict occupational and health regulations, but enforcement is generally lax. The legal minimum wage is very low--$190 per month at the official exchange rate--and not adequate to provide a worker and his family with a decent standard of living. It was not known whether the minimum wage was enforced in the informal sector.

BAHRAIN

The extended family of the Al Khalifa has ruled Bahrain since the late 18th century and dominates its society and government. The Constitution confirms the Amir as hereditary ruler. The current Amir, Shaikh Isa bin Sulman Al Khalifa, governs Bahrain with the assistance of his brother, the Prime Minister; his son, the Crown Prince; and an appointed Cabinet of Ministers. The Government has suspended some provisions of Bahrain's 1973 Constitution, including those articles relating to the National Assembly which the Government disbanded in 1975. There are few judicial checks on the Amir and his Government.

Bahrain is one of the more heterogeneous societies in the Gulf, where social ties and interpersonal associations are formed in a complex web of family, tribal, economic, and religious affiliations. Bahrain is divided between the Shi'a and Sunni sects of Islam, with the Shi'a comprising over two-thirds of the indigenous population. There are important sectarian divisions among the Shi'a. Despite their numerical disadvantage, the Sunnis predominate because the ruling family, supported by powerful merchant families, is Sunni. Two clandestine fundamentalist political groups with links to Iran, drawing support from some Shi'a, and two underground, secular, leftist groups advocate violent political change. Recently, there has been a splintering of the latter, accompanied by an increase in fundamentalist rhetoric from those groups supported by Iran, the main source of anti-Bahrain subversion and terrorist actions.

The Ministry of Interior is responsible for public security. Under its auspices the police force and the Security and Intelligence Service (SIS), with approximately 8,000 to 10,000 employees combined, are responsible for maintaining internal order and preventing sectarian violence and terrorist actions.

Bahrain's leaders seek to foster the open social and commercial environment needed to attract international business, while protecting the ruling family's preeminence, preventing sectarian violence, and thwarting externally inspired subversion. Faced with limited oil resources, Bahrain has diversified its financial base, attracting companies doing business in financial services, petrochemicals, and light manufacturing. Bahrain has used its oil revenues to build an advanced infrastructure in transportation and telecommunications, and has become a leading regional financial center. The economy benefited from the region's economic boom in the 1970's and early 1980's, but suffered from the decline in oil prices beginning in 1986.

The human rights situation in Bahrain was basically unchanged in 1989, and civil liberties remain greatly restricted. Major human rights concerns include arbitrary detention and alleged abuse of detainees held on security grounds, lack of fair trials in security cases, and restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, women's rights, and the right of citizens to change their government. Expatriate workers from developing countries tolerate limited trade union rights for fear of loss of employment and deportation.

BAHRAIN

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law, and there is no evidence of a policy of systematic physical mistreatment of criminal offenders. There were several unconfirmed reports in 1989 charging mistreatment and torture at the hands of the SIS. There are no reliable reports about what happens during detention in security prisons (where questioning may continue after sentencing) since visits by nongovernment persons are generally prohibited. In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, Amnesty International (AI) noted that it had received new allegations of physical and psychological torture and ill-treatment of detainees, apparently to obtain confessions. It said that, in a number of cases, detainees were reportedly made to stand upright for many hours, were deprived of sleep for long periods, beaten or suspended, and threatened while detained incommunicado and in lengthy solitary confinement.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Political activity is strictly controlled by the security forces, and persons are sometimes detained and arrested arbitrarily on suspicion of antiregime activity. Activities that could lead, under provisions of the security law, to detention, questioning, warnings, or arrest include membership in subversive, illegal organizations; painting antiregime slogans on walls; joining antigovernment demonstrations; possessing or circulating antiregime writings; preaching sermons with an extreme fundamentalist or a radical political tone; or harboring or associating with persons committing such acts.

According to the State Security Act of 1974, persons may be detained for a period not to exceed 3 years. Detained persons have the right to appeal after a period of 3 months, and, if the appeal is denied, every 6 months thereafter from the date of the original detention. According to AI, some Shi'a were detained briefly before Shi'a religious occasions; others reportedly were detained after 'Ashoura (a Shi'a commemoration of the martyrdom of Husayn) or other religious gatherings at which antigovernment or anti-American political statements were made. In the past, detainees have sometimes been held incommunicado for lengthy periods, although family members can usually find out where the detainee is being held. Confessions following such detention are common. Persons imprisoned for political offenses are sometimes released on the condition that they immediately go into exile.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

BAHRAIN

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A person arrested may be tried in either an ordinary criminal court or the Security Court. Civil trials provide procedural guarantees including open trial, the right to counsel (with legal aid available when necessary), and the right to appeal. Security cases, however, are tried directly by the Supreme Court of Appeal, sitting as the Security Court. Such trials are held in secret, there is no right to judicial review of the legality of arrests, and the court is exempted from adhering to the procedural guarantees of the penal code. All records pertaining to trials by the Security Court are regarded as state secrets. Sentences imposed by the Security Court can, at the discretion of the Court, be referred to the Amir for clemency.

The Bahrain Defense Force (BDF) maintains a separate court system for military personnel accused of offenses under the military code. These courts do not review cases involving civilian criminal or security offenses.

Some estimates indicate that fewer than 50 persons are now being held for political reasons. In its 1989 Report, AI estimated the number of political prisoners at well over 100. Among them were 14 alleged supporters of the banned Bahrain National Liberation Front and 18 alleged supporters of the Islamic Enlightenment Society.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Interior Ministry can authorize entry into private premises without judicial authorization. Telephone calls and correspondence are subject to monitoring by the SIS. Police informer networks exist.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for the right "to express and propagate opinions," but in practice Bahrainis cannot freely challenge the legitimacy of the regime in speech or writing. Political meetings are not permitted; gatherings which might take on a political tone are monitored through informers. Criticism of government policies and programs in such areas as municipal services, unemployment, and education is tolerated and commonly seen in the press.

The Information Ministry exercises wide powers over the local media, and the press generally follows official policy closely. In the past, minor deviations have brought closure of the offending newspapers. In 1989 an Arabic-language daily was closed for 3 days for printing articles found to be insulting to Islam; the paper reported the lurid details of a divorce case, which the Minister of Justice had denied occurred. Bahrain is generally open to international media, but the Government does not condone unfavorable coverage of its domestic affairs; it is not uncommon for the Government to revoke the press credentials of foreign journalists. Since the Ministry of Information also sponsors the journalists' residency permits, such actions are tantamount to deportation.

The State owns all radio and television stations and blocks, as do all its Gulf neighbors, Iranian television broadcasts.

BAHRAIN

Only senior government officials may own and use satellite dishes. All newspapers are privately owned and exercise self-censorship in reporting on antiregime activities and in criticizing the Government. Former Information Ministry officials serve as editors of the two Arabic daily papers, which are regarded as semiofficial.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Constitution affirms the right of free assembly, public political demonstrations or meetings are prohibited. Professional organizations are permitted. The large number of social and sports clubs have traditionally served as forums for discreet political discussion. The Government monitors the activities of these organizations, which are generally small and limited in scope. Groups seeking to hold meetings in public places must obtain permits. Permits for religious ceremonies, including those of the Shi'a, are routinely granted.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to trade unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The population is overwhelmingly Muslim, and Islam is the state religion. Christians and other non-Muslims, including Jews, Hindus, and Baha'is, enjoy considerable freedom to practice their religion. Some maintain places of worship, but some small groups practice in their homes. Religious tracts of all Islamic sects and publications of other religions are readily available in bookstores.

Proselytizing is not encouraged, and anti-Islamic writings are prohibited. Both Sunni and Shi'a sects are subject to government control and monitoring, but there is no interference with routine worship or religious activities. Public religious events, most notably commemorative marches by the Shi'a, are permitted but are closely watched by the police. There appear to be no restrictions on the number of Bahrainis permitted to make pilgrimages to Shi'a shrines and holy sites in Iraq. However, religious study in and pilgrimages to Iran are strongly discouraged. Conversions from Islam to another religion are tolerated.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Bahrainis are free to move within the country and change their place of residence or work. Passports can be denied on political grounds. Bahrainis living abroad who are suspected of political offenses may face imprisonment without public trial upon return to Bahrain. Refugees are not repatriated to countries they have fled, but are obliged to depart Bahrain immediately. There are some Iranian emigres who have fled Iran since 1979 and have permission to remain in Bahrain, but they have not been granted citizenship. Travel to Iran, especially by Shi'a, is discouraged by the Government.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right or ability peacefully to change their government or their political system. With the abolition of the National Assembly, there are no formal democratic institutions, and neither political parties nor opposition organizations are permitted. Bahrain is ruled by the Al Khalifa family, headed by the Amir. All government positions are appointive. About one-third of the cabinet ministers are Shi'a, although they do not hold key portfolios. The average Bahraini can attempt to influence government decisions only through the submission of written petitions and informal contact with senior officials, including appeals to the Amir at his regular public audiences.

Four clandestine political groups agitate for change in Bahrain. The Islamic Front for the Liberation of Bahrain, the group responsible for the 1981 coup attempt, is almost exclusively militant Shi'a in its makeup. It calls for violent revolution. The Islamic Call Party advocates a relatively moderate form of populist Islam and demands reforms in the social and economic structure of Bahrain. Both have ties to Iran, call for the establishment of an Islamic Republic, and attract some support from the younger, disaffected Shi'a. Public displays of their activism have decreased. Two underground, secular leftist groups, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Bahrain and the pro-Soviet National Front for the Liberation of Bahrain, have ties with radical Arab regimes and Arab nationalist organizations. Their influence in Bahrain appears to have decreased in recent years.

No internal human rights organizations exist. No nongovernmental investigations occurred in 1989. AI notes in its 1989 report that it proposed in 1988 a follow-up visit to one it conducted in 1987 and that it provided recommendations for improvements in human rights practices. The Government did not respond.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status.

Although there are notable exceptions, Sunni Muslims enjoy a more favored status in Bahrain than the Shi'a, who form approximately two-thirds of the population. Sunnis receive preference for employment in sensitive positions, including in the Bahraini Defense Force and the managerial ranks of the public sector. Statistics are unavailable, but Shi'a tend to be employed in lower paid, lesser skilled jobs. Social and municipal services in most Shi'a neighborhoods, particularly in rural villages, are markedly inferior to those found in Sunni urban communities. The Government has tried to remedy social discrimination, improve living conditions for the Shi'a, and encourage sectarian integration through the development of government-subsidized housing complexes, open to all Bahrainis on the basis of financial need.

Legal rights of concern to women are subject to Islamic law. Specific rights vary according to Shi'a or Sunni precedent, as determined by the person's faith. Bahraini women have the freedom to wear the clothing of their choice (a large percentage wear Western dress outside the home), to work outside the home, to drive a car without escorts, and to travel outside the country.

Islamic law (Shari'a) governs the legal rights of Bahraini women. Specific rights vary according to Shi'a or Sunni interpretations of Islamic law, as determined by the person's faith or the court in which various contracts have been made--as in the case of marriage. In distinction to Sunni women, Shi'a women do have the right to initiate a divorce and are, theoretically, equal to men in all other respects. Women of either sect may own and inherit property. Women may represent their own interests in all public and legal matters. According to Islamic tradition, a woman generally loses custody of her children after they reach the age of 7, but, in the case of proven incompetence on the husband's part, this is not applied. According to national custom, a non-Bahraini woman automatically loses custody of her children if she is married to, and divorces, a Bahraini man. Women can obtain passports without permission of a male head of the household and can exit the country without permission.

With the development of the Bahrain economy, women have increasingly taken jobs previously reserved for men. Women now constitute about 18 percent of the Bahraini work force. The Government has encouraged the hiring of women, has enacted special laws to promote female entry into the work force, and is itself a leading employer of women. Generally, women work outside the home during the years between secondary school or university and marriage. Women make up the majority of students at Bahrain's universities.

The status of women is a continuing subject of debate. There are women's organizations which have as a goal the betterment of the status of women under both civil and Islamic law. These organizations are supported by the Government.

There is little information available regarding violence against Bahraini women. More evidence exists regarding violence against expatriate women working in Bahrain as domestics. Cases of domestics beaten badly enough to require hospitalization have been reported to the police and in the newspapers. Although many victims of employer violence may fear dismissal and deportation, cases of successful complaints by employees abused by their sponsor are on record.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Although the Constitution recognizes the right of workers to organize, there are no trade unions, primarily because the Government actively discourages them. Strikes are not permitted. In response to labor unrest in the mid-1950's and in 1965 and 1974, the Government encouraged--and now closely controls--the formation of elected workers' committees in major companies. Since 1982, when the Government granted permission to form the first Joint Labor Management Consultative Committee (JCC), 12 JCC's have been established in the major industries. The JCC's represent close to 70 percent of the island's labor force. Nonindustrial expatriate workers, about 60 percent of the work force, are denied even these limited "rights." Bahrain has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1977 but has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There are no collective bargaining units or contracts. As noted above, in 12 key industries employing significant numbers of Bahrainis, the Government has sanctioned the formation of Joint Consultative Committees comprised of representatives from management and employees. These JCC's are empowered to resolve labor disputes, organize workers' services, and discuss wages, working conditions, and raising productivity. But the workers have no independent, recognized vehicle for addressing these or other labor-related issues. Labor law and practice are uniform throughout the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Government prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labor. The press, however, regularly reports instances where private-sector employers compel expatriate workers from developing nations to perform work not specified in their contracts. Once a complaint has been lodged by a worker with a grievance, the Labor Ministry opens an investigation and often takes appropriate action.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age for employment is 14 years. Juveniles between the ages of 14 and 16 receive special protection under the labor laws. They may not be employed in hazardous conditions or at night and may not work over 6 hours per day or on a piecework basis. Child labor laws are enforced.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Bahrain's labor law, enforced by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, provides for acceptable conditions of work for all adult workers, including adequate standards regarding hours of work (maximum 48 hours per week), and occupational safety and health. Minimum wage scales, which exist for both private and public sector employees, generally afford a decent standard of living for a worker and his family.

In practice, however, expatriate workers are seriously disadvantaged by the requirement that all foreigners must be sponsored by Bahrainis or Bahrain-based institutions and companies in order to work. Under this system, sponsors can cancel the residence permit of any person under their sponsorship and thereby blacklist individuals so that they cannot obtain entry or residence visas from another sponsor. Such power contains the potential for exploitation since foreign workers are often unwilling to report abuses of their rights for fear of forced repatriation. Instances of expatriate workers being denied their guaranteed holidays, days off, and vacations without compensation, have been reported by the English-language daily, which serves as an unofficial ombudsman for expatriate workers. In 1989 some expatriate housemaids charged their employers with sexual harassment.

The Government has initiated a plan to replace 20,000 expatriate workers in the private sector. The official unemployment rate in 1987 was 3.2 percent; however, a Ministry of Labor official announced in May 1989 that the indigenous unemployment rate was about 10 percent.

Bahrain's labor law does not recognize the concept of equal pay for equal work. Asian workers are paid lower wages than their Bahraini counterparts. Westerners and Bahraini workers are paid comparable wages; women are generally paid less than men. However, women are entitled to 60 days of paid maternity leave and nursing periods during the day.

BANGLADESH

The Bangladesh Constitution provides for a presidential form of government and a unicameral Parliament of 300 members. The President appoints the ministers, 20 percent of whom do not have to be members of Parliament. The Prime Minister, also appointed by the President, serves more as the leader of the parliamentary majority than as leader of the Government. H.M. Ershad, then the Army Chief of Staff, took power in 1982 in a bloodless coup and, after retiring from the military, was elected President in 1986 in elections boycotted by the major opposition parties.

The present Parliament, composed of 252 members from the President's Jatiyo Party and 48 members from smaller parties, was formed in elections held in March 1988 which were marred by the absence of major opposition parties, sporadic violence, low voter turnout, and fraudulent vote counts. Parliament held two sessions in 1989 and passed limited autonomy legislation for the three Chittagong Hill Tracts (CHT) districts and a Ninth Constitutional Amendment which provides for an elected Vice President and limits both the President's and Vice President's tenure to two consecutive 5-year terms. In view of continued questioning of the current Parliament's representative character, the Government has offered to hold midterm parliamentary elections, but the major opposition parties have refused to participate because they do not believe there can be free and fair elections under President Ershad.

The police and paramilitary forces, all of which are controlled by the Home Affairs Ministry, bear primary responsibility for maintaining internal security. Paramilitary forces include the Bangladesh Rifles (BDR), which guards the borders, the Bangladesh Ansars (a home guard which assists the police in maintaining law and order), and the Village Defense Parties (VDP), a uniformed but normally unarmed local militia. The army plays an internal security role in the CHT, where attacks by tribal insurgents against security forces, Bengali settlers, and other tribals continued in 1989. Tribals have accused security forces of participating in or instigating attacks by settlers. Despite these accusations, there were no confirmed reports in 1989 of retaliation by army troops in the area.

Bangladesh is one of the world's poorest and most densely populated countries. The Government's key programs aim at economic development through reduced population growth, increased crop yields, decentralization of administration, and development of the private sector. The economy recovered somewhat from the devastating floods of 1988, and below-normal rainfall prevented serious flooding in 1989.

Overall, there were no major changes in the human rights situation in 1989. The internally divided opposition's inability to remount its campaign to oust the present Government brought a year of relative political stability, with fewer reported instances of human rights abuses than in 1988. Municipal elections conducted during the year were relatively peaceful, as were local government council elections in June in the three CHT districts. However, a parliamentary by-election in September was marred by allegations of voting irregularities. Significant restrictions remained on the ability of citizens to change their government, freedom of the press, and a variety of women's rights, and there remained concerns regarding abuse of prisoners and detainees and arbitrary detentions.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

While January elections in 80 of Bangladesh's 86 municipalities were relatively peaceful, sporadic violence resulted in at least 6 deaths and over 500 injuries, including injuries to a number of law enforcement officials. Police fired above the heads of crowds to disperse them, but apparently no fatalities were inflicted by law enforcement authorities. There was also violence on university campuses throughout the year as student wings of various political parties clashed repeatedly. These encounters often caused injuries and sometimes resulted in deaths.

For a discussion of killings related to the CHT insurgency, see Section 1.g.

b. Disappearance

There were no confirmed reports of disappearance resulting from official actions in 1989. As in the past, however, armed tribal insurgents in the CHT kidnaped a number of persons in raids on Bengali villages.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution forbids torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment or treatment. Despite several allegations, there were no confirmed reports of such incidents in the CHT in 1989, but Amnesty International (AI) and local human rights groups continue to monitor this area and to encourage the Government to safeguard the rights of tribal people. In response to previous requests, the Government submitted a report to AI on several alleged instances of torture in the Hill Tracts dating from 1986.

Police treatment of accused criminals is usually rough and can include abusive interrogations and beatings. Reports of fatalities from such treatment are relatively rare; however, local human rights groups have begun increasingly to investigate individual cases and confirmed five such deaths in 1989. The Government has not interfered in such investigations. In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI noted that it had renewed reports of torture of criminal suspects in police custody, several of whom were alleged to have died as a result. Mistreatment of ordinary citizens frequently goes unpunished, but police and jail officials involved in mistreating prisoners are sometimes disciplined in cases where the victim or his family and friends can attract publicity or persuade human rights groups to investigate the allegations.

There are also occasional reports of abusive treatment of citizens by a variety of lower level government officials, party bosses, and labor leaders--who intimidate others through violence or threats of violence.

BANGLADESH

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Special Powers Act of 1974 (SPA), the Government can detain an individual without charge for an initial period of 30 days to prevent the commission of "any prejudicial act" as defined in the legislation. The Government is obligated to charge the detainee formally by the end of this period or release him if it fails to file a charge. The individual can legally be held until completion of an investigation if the Government brings a charge. In practice, though not in the law, the detainee has 15 days to respond to the specific charge in writing to the Home Affairs Ministry, which can grant early release. Detentions under the SPA are not subject to judicial review until after 6 months, at which time a committee of three jurists examines the case to ascertain whether there is sufficient reason to continue the detention. Although the detainee is theoretically entitled to see a lawyer at the time he is detained, in practice a lawyer is generally not allowed to see the detainee until a specific charge has been filed.

Forty alleged activists in a Hindu separatist movement were detained under the SPA in the early part of 1989. Twenty-six remain incarcerated. Human rights activists fear that the SPA is increasingly used against political opponents in rural areas and to detain indefinitely suspected criminals against whom the Government has insufficient evidence for a formal charge. Human rights activists and some press accounts note that the Government often issues new detention orders against individuals as soon as the original detention has expired or been vacated by the courts.

The Government put the number of SPA detainees at 2,157 as of April 30, although human rights groups believe the actual figure is higher. Persons detained under the SPA are often subsequently charged under criminal statutes.

The right of a detainee to a judicial determination of the legality of his detention exists in local law. Bangladeshi legal and human rights organizations, however, continued to report cases of suspects who were arrested on minor charges but who remained in jail for long periods without trial. There were no reports of persons being exiled in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Supreme Court is generally considered independent, although pressure is sometimes brought to bear in political or security cases. Civilian courts hear civil and criminal cases in public trials, and the right of counsel is respected. Though generally considered fair, civil courts are overburdened and effectively available only to those who can afford representation. In addition, the time-consuming and expensive process of pursuing cases discourages many from seeking redress through the courts. There are few legal aid programs to assist litigants and no public defenders. Although the legal time limit for disposal of criminal cases is 240 days at the district level and 120 days at the magistrate level, a shortage of judges and a backlog of over 500,000 criminal and civil cases makes longer delays a common occurrence. The continuation of a 1-day-a-week boycott of the Supreme Court by barristers who oppose several court-related government decisions hampered the timely dispensation of justice even further. A relatively small number of the cases in the backlog involves detainees.

A Bangladeshi nonprofit human rights group, with funding from The Asia Foundation (TAF), has established a training program for new lawyers. A TAF training program for judges has to date trained 255 assistant judges and 45 midlevel judges, and TAF continues to support the legal outreach program of a local human rights group.

The Government claims to hold no political prisoners. Bangladesh human rights groups assert, however, that some persons detained under the SPA are actually political prisoners. Currently such groups do not maintain statistics on the number of political prisoners in the country, and estimates vary considerably.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Bangladesh law requires a judicial warrant before authorities enter a home, and courts require evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion before issuing a warrant. However, the SPA permits authorities to search premises without a warrant under certain circumstances, and authorities have in the past entered the homes of opposition leaders, detained individuals, and searched their premises without warrants. The Government's civilian and military intelligence services are widely believed to monitor the opposition by such means as selective wiretaps and interception of mail.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Despite government efforts to address tribal grievances in 1989 through limited autonomy legislation for the CHT, the longstanding Shanti Bahini (Peace Force) insurgent movement remained active. This insurgency began in the early 1970's and has been sustained by the tribal people's fears that their traditional way of life and special status in the hill areas are being undermined by settlers from the overpopulated plains. During the past 4 years, government policy has discouraged settlement in the Hill Tracts. Some 300,000 ethnic Bengalis remain in the 3 hill districts along with approximately 500,000 tribals.

Due to restricted access to the Hill Tracts, the veracity of accusations of atrocities committed by the tribals or security forces cannot be confirmed. Shanti Bahini attacks on Bengali settlements, military personnel, and tribals, many of which resulted in deaths and destruction of property, continued in 1989 and escalated in late July following the June CHT local government council elections. Precise figures are not available, but the Government estimates that these attacks killed at least 300 persons by mid-September and drove more than 1,500 tribals to refugee camps in neighboring India. Others put the number of new refugees at a much higher level. A number of tribals alleged to be Shanti Bahini insurgents also died in clashes in 1989 with military personnel. In addition, between 16 and 36 tribals were killed and approximately 500 were injured in May when the alleged Shanti Bahini assassination of a county council chairman provoked reprisals by settlers against tribals. Although some sources charge that government security forces instigated the reprisals, or at least were slow to restore order, there is no evidence of military complicity in the Bengali settlers' attacks on the tribals. In 1989 there was no confirmed evidence that the security forces disobeyed strict government orders to avoid reprisals against the tribal people and to prevent others from such retaliations. Complaints of human rights violations in the Hill Tracts continued to be far fewer than those received as recently as 1987, and despite Shanti Bahini threats to kill candidates and voters, June elections to fill seats on the newly created CHT district councils were for the most part peaceful. The Government offered amnesty to Shanti Bahini insurgents on two occasions in 1989.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and expression and freedom of the press, subject to "reasonable restrictions" in the interest of national security, international relations, and public order, decency, and morality. In practice, the Government has a variety of means to attempt to control the press, including formal and informal censorship, "guidance" from the Press Information Department, temporary closures of newspapers, and arrest or intimidation of journalists. The SPA allows the Government to ban domestic publications, to hold any newspaper employee responsible for the paper's content, and to compel journalists to reveal news sources. Most publications are heavily dependent upon advertisements from the Government or government-owned corporations; these advertisements reportedly account for as much as 75 percent of advertising revenues. Although all newspapers are theoretically eligible to receive public sector advertising if they meet minimum circulation requirements, publishers complain that the placing and withholding of advertising, as well as payment for it, are often used as a means of influencing the press.

In 1989 several Bengali-language weeklies--which tend to be censored more heavily than dailies--were banned for "objectionable" statements or commentary. A number of other publications banned between 1984 and 1988 remained closed in 1989. Bans on these newspapers have been in effect for varying lengths of time, with some appearing to be permanent.

The Government owns and operates all radio and television facilities. In the print media, it owns two Dhaka newspapers, including one English-language daily and one Rajshahi daily. The Government also owns BSS, the national news service. Two wire services, Eastern News Agency and the United News of Bangladesh, are privately owned.

Bangladesh has 74 dailies and 290 weeklies and periodicals. Three of the Dhaka English-language dailies and most Bengali-language periodicals and newspapers are privately owned and reflect the views of various political parties. All major newspapers report on both government and opposition activities, although coverage of the opposition is less extensive in the government-owned publications. Articles and editorials critical of the Government appear, but criticism of President Ershad, his family, or the armed forces is not tolerated. The weekly Robbar, banned in June 1988 for printing commentary critical of the President, remained closed in 1989, and hearings on a legal challenge filed by Robbar's publisher were repeatedly postponed.

BANGLADESH

Three journalists were detained in 1989. The editor of the Bengali-language daily Shakti was arrested in June for publishing an "objectionable report." He was released on bail the following day. The chairman of Purabi and the editor of Runner, two Jessore dailies, were arrested and held for 3 days in September for publishing a "defamatory report" on the State Minister for Religious Affairs.

Opposition political parties also exert pressure on newspapers and magazines hostile to them in efforts to intimidate them. Tactics include anonymous threatening telephone calls and threats of arson.

Although 56 foreign publications (18 dailies and 38 periodicals) are generally available in Bangladesh, the Government has sometimes used the Customs Act of 1969 to prevent the importation of foreign publications critical of President Ershad. The Government invoked the Act in 1989 to ban one issue of the London-based weekly Natun Din for printing an "undesirable" article. The Government also banned the book "The Satanic Verses" and issues of foreign publications dealing with the controversy for a few weeks. No foreign journalists were arrested, barred from entry, or expelled in 1989. In June, foreign journalists were invited to cover the CHT district council elections under government escort.

The Government retains the authority to require drama groups to obtain certificates of approval to perform. No drama group in Dhaka bothers to apply for such authorization in practice, but the law is enforced outside the capital. Drama groups are required to submit scripts to the district commissioner, and actors who perform in unauthorized plays are theoretically subject to arrest.

The Government censors films primarily to ban pornography. All films from South Africa and Israel are prohibited.

Students are generally free to express a wide range of political opinion through campus organizations and publications, and opposition parties sometimes use student fronts to organize antigovernment demonstrations.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution assures every citizen the right to form associations, subject to "reasonable restrictions" in the interest of morality or public order. In practice, individuals are free to join private organizations and associations, and permits are usually not required for public meetings. There are no restrictions on affiliation with international organizations.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Bangladesh, 87 percent of whose people are Muslims, has recognized Islam as its state religion since the passage in June 1988 of the Eighth Constitutional Amendment. This amendment also states that all other religions may be freely practiced. Although conversion is possible, there is strong social resistance to conversion from Islam. Members of religious minorities have also reported being questioned by the security service about conversion activity. Proselytizing by Bangladeshi citizens, which is permitted by the Constitution, is mostly directed toward such minority groups as Hindus and tribal people.

Government policy continues to permit various religions to establish places of worship, train clergy, travel for religious purposes, and maintain links with coreligionists abroad. Missionaries, including foreign clergy who serve expatriate congregations, are permitted but they may not proselytize Muslims. Some missionaries perceive the various bureaucratic obstacles they face, including lengthy delays in obtaining or renewing security clearances and residence visas, as intended to curb Christian influence by reducing the number of missionaries and limiting their humanitarian activities. Appeals to the Government have sometimes been successful in removing such obstacles.

Despite official assurances of freedom of religion and equality of treatment, the establishment of Islam as the state religion continued to cause concern in 1989 among the Hindu, Christian, and Buddhist minorities. Some minority group members complain that this constitutional change has emboldened Muslim fanatics and criminal elements hostile to the minorities. As in 1988, there were reports of harassment, robbery, vandalism, and encroachment on property owned by non-Muslims.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Bangladeshi citizens are free to move about within the country, except in designated areas of the CHT. Travel by foreigners is also restricted in the CHT and some other border areas. Bangladeshis are generally free to visit and emigrate abroad, subject to foreign exchange controls, but civil servants wishing to travel abroad must obtain permission from the Government. In some instances, persons considered to be security risks are barred from traveling abroad. One former minister was barred twice from leaving the country. Though the Government rarely hinders citizens wishing to return from abroad, in 1989 a Bangladeshi student was detained upon arrival in Dhaka from London, reportedly on the grounds that he had engaged in "anti-Bangladeshi activities." The right of repatriation is observed.

Approximately 250,000 non-Bengali Muslims, known as Biharis or "stranded Pakistanis," remain in Bangladesh pending resettlement in Pakistan. After independence in 1971, these persons opted for Pakistani citizenship and Pakistan agreed to accept them, provided financing for resettlement costs was made available from outside sources. A Saudi Arabia-based social organization has been trying for several years to raise money for this purpose and claims that sufficient funds could be found if permission was granted for the Biharis to resettle. The main obstacle to resettlement is communal tensions and recurrent violence between Biharis already in Pakistan and other ethnic groups, which makes the addition of 250,000 more Biharis a politically difficult issue for the Government of Pakistan at this time. Anti-Bihari demonstrations in Pakistan delayed indefinitely a modest repatriation effort by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) planned for January. This contributed to increased frustration in the Bihari community and prompted a hunger strike and other demonstrations during the summer months.

The Biharis, most of whom still reside in 66 camps throughout Bangladesh, may seek employment and conduct other activities, but they face disadvantages as noncitizens. Biharis may apply for Bangladeshi citizenship at any time, and those who do so are granted full rights of citizenship.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The governing party's dominance of the electoral process and the fraud and violence which have characterized national elections in recent years raise serious doubts about the ability of Bangladeshi citizens to change their government peacefully and democratically. In addition, the political polarization between the Government and the opposition and internal divisions within the opposition continued to prevent agreement on the holding of parliamentary elections.

After assuming power in a bloodless military coup in 1982, Bangladesh's current leader, H.M. Ershad, assumed the presidency in December 1983. He was elected to the presidency in an election in 1986 which the major opposition groupings, including the Awami League/Eight Party Alliance, the Bangladesh Nationalist Party, and the Islamic fundamentalist Jamaat-E-Islami, boycotted.

Bangladesh's present Parliament was elected in March 1988 elections that were marred by a boycott by major opposition parties, sporadic violence, low voter turnout, and voting fraud. The Parliament passed most legislation by wide margins and with little debate.

The Constitution does not require new parliamentary elections before 1993. The Government has publicly stated its willingness to hold midterm parliamentary elections, but the major opposition parties have thus far refused to participate as long as President Ershad remains in power. The Government has met with human rights activists to discuss ways to hold free and fair elections; however, human rights observers, while welcoming such meetings as a positive step, remain doubtful of the Government's sincerity about ensuring the holding of such elections. In September the Government began updating its 1983 electoral rolls.

The Government is sensitive to international opinion regarding human rights issues. Although there were no visits to Bangladesh in 1989 by AI or similar groups, the Government made efforts to respond to outside inquiries by submitting reports to AI on its investigation into several allegations of mistreatment dating from 1986. The Government also shared with AI its findings on the settler reprisals which took place in Langdu in the CHT in May (described in Section 1.g.). In addition, the Government invited and provided facilities for members of the diplomatic community and foreign press who observed the CHT local government council elections in June. International human rights organizations represented in Bangladesh include the International League for Human Rights, The Law Association for Asia and the Western Pacific, and The

BANGLADESH

International Commission of Jurists. There are also a number of local human rights organizations which monitor developments through their rural branches, investigate allegations of abuse, and seek to prosecute human rights violators. Human rights groups are also active in promoting awareness of human rights and the law among the country's largely uneducated rural majority. The Government generally does not hamper these groups' activities.

Bangladesh is an active member of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights. In August the U.N. Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities dropped all cases against Bangladesh regarding alleged human rights abuses in the CHT and decided unanimously to "thank the Government of Bangladesh for its cooperation and express its satisfaction with the progress made in respect to the treatment of its tribal population."

By custom and Islamic tradition, women occupy a subordinate place in society and a family's ability to seclude its women is a symbol of middle or high social status. These underlying attitudes and social barriers circumscribing the participation of women in activities beyond the home are strongly entrenched and show few signs of weakening. For the approximately 86 percent of Bangladeshi women who live in rural areas, early marriage, high childbearing rates, and long hours of household and farm labor leave little opportunity for nonfamily interests or outside employment. Even in urban areas and among the affluent, the traditional social system makes women economically dependent upon their husbands and other male relatives. Except in the export-oriented garment industry, women are virtually absent from the cash-earning work force.

The daily press testifies to a pattern of domestic violence against women: murder, rape and other physical abuse, breach of matrimonial contract, denial of inheritance rights, and desertion. The suicide rate among women is reportedly almost three times higher than among men. Laws to protect women include the Anti-Dowry Prohibition Act of 1980; the Cruelty to Women Act of 1983; the Child Marriage Restraint Act of 1984; and the Illegal Trafficking of Women Act of 1988, but enforcement of these laws is lax. It is a capital offense to traffic in women, to kill a woman in the course of rape, or to murder a woman for dowry. Even so, dowry killings, in which the husband or his family attack and sometimes murder the bride for nonpayment of a supposedly promised dowry, are believed to occur frequently in rural areas. Although newspapers frequently print reports in which a husband accused of dowry killing is tried and punished, the vast majority of these cases are believed to go unreported. The recently created National Advisory Committee Against Repression of Women plans to set up local branches in rural areas to address the problems of abused women, but there is still little recourse for victims of crimes committed within the family or home.

Members of minority religious groups are disadvantaged in practice, though not in the law, in their access to government jobs and political office. In the years immediately following Bangladesh's independence, members of some minorities, principally Hindus, lost or had serious difficulty retaining their properties as a result of the prejudicial administration of vested property laws. These laws permitted the Government to use or even sell property belonging to persons who left what is now Bangladesh between 1965 and 1971. Although the President in July reiterated a 1984 executive order requiring the return of such property to the original owners, some human rights activists contend that property is still occasionally seized under these laws.

Discrimination against the tribal people in the CHT with respect to property rights has been a persistent issue. Until 1985, tribal land, for which there is frequently no deed, was parceled out by authorities to Bengali Muslim settlers in the CHT. Tribal peoples' property rights were also violated by the issuance of false deeds, physical attacks, actions taken following the failure to meet mortgage payments, or confiscation by the army in areas where the tribal insurgency is active. There were no reports of such violations in 1989, and the Government's CHT local government councils legislation, which grants land allocation and regulation authority to elected, tribal-dominated district councils, affirmed the tribals' land rights. The legislation also gives the councils authority over local law enforcement, housing, health, and educational facilities. Even so, concern over these issues lingers among many of the hill people.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for the right of association, subject to restrictions imposed by law. The Constitution also provides for the right to form labor unions, subject to governmental approval. Although the Government has the legal right to suspend unions, it took no such action in 1989.

Workers in trade associations or unions may draw up their own constitution and rules, elect officers, develop programs, and conduct business without government interference. There are no restrictions on joining confederations or affiliating with international organizations. However, union members need governmental clearance to travel to international labor meetings. No such clearances were withheld in 1989.

The right to strike is not specifically recognized in the law but is an accepted form of protest in Bangladesh. Numerous strikes were held in 1989. The Essential Services Ordinance of 1958 permits the Government to bar strikes for 3 months in any sector deemed "essential." Labor unions represent only 3 percent of the work force, a reflection of the low level of industrialization. Nevertheless, unions are powerful and important in such sectors as jute, tea, and transportation. There are several national labor centrals in Bangladesh. Most labor unions and federations are associated with a political party. The Workers-Employees United Council (SKOP), the largest trade union federation, is sympathetic to the opposition.

The Committee of Experts (COE) of the International Labor Organization in 1989 noted that Bangladesh's law contains a number of defects affecting freedom of association and collective bargaining rights, including restrictions as to the range of persons who can hold office in trade unions, wide-ranging supervisory powers vested in the registrar of trade unions, and a rule requiring that a union organize at least 30 percent of the workers in an establishment before it can be registered.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

By law, workers have a limited right to collective bargaining. Public sector employees cannot form unions or bargain collectively. There is no formal process of mediation. Except in the Chittagong Export Processing Zone, unions in the private sector can generally bargain collectively without government interference. The Government suspended union activity in the Chittagong Export Processing Zone in 1985 and the suspension remains in effect.

Workers have participatory rights in union business in theory, but both union leaders and employers often violate them in practice. Union leaders allegedly make decisions without first consulting members, and allegations have been lodged of irregularities in union elections. For their part, employers frequently ignore laws prohibiting antiunion discrimination, a practice which is particularly prevalent in the garment industry, where the work force is predominantly female. Employers have also been accused of harassing union leaders and of firing workers for union activities. Although laws against such practices exist, the difficulties of prosecuting a court case against an employer discourage union attempts to have them enforced.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor. Although this prohibition is substantially respected, there have been unsubstantiated reports of bonded labor on some tea and rubber plantations. The Government actively seeks to prevent the trafficking of bonded laborers into other South Asian countries.

The COE in 1989 requested the Government to repeal a law of 1952 (which the Government said was no longer operable) making it a punishable offense for a government employee to terminate employment without the consent of the employer. The COE also asked the Government to correct a law dealing with the forcible conveyance of seamen on board ship to perform their duties.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Employment of Children Act prohibits the offering of employment to any person under the age of 14, but the act is not enforced. Sanctioned by tradition and encouraged by dire economic necessity, child labor is a serious problem. Legal minimum ages for various types of employment, which range from 12 to 17, are seldom enforced, and the country's poverty is such that children are regularly engaged in all available jobs. There is no compulsory education. The Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated the number of child laborers at approximately 3 million in 1986. These children pedaled rickshaws, served as domestic servants, worked as helpers in transport services, carried loads at railway stations and river terminals, labored at construction sites, and were employed in great numbers in agriculture.

BANGLADESH

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Regulations regarding minimum wage rates, hours of work, and occupational safety and health are not strictly enforced. Income levels, which average $1 to $2 per day with the minimum wage at approximately $.07 per hour, are not sufficient to sustain a decent standard of living. The Factories Act of 1965 and the Shops and Establishments Act of 1965 limit normal working hours to a maximum of 8 hours per day and 48 hours per week. With overtime, the workweek may not legally exceed 60 hours. Although the law stipulates that overtime work is to be compensated by double the hourly rate, overtime pay practices do not conform to these requirements. Safety equipment and precautions are largely unknown, and the small number of safety inspectors are frequently untrained and underpaid.

BHUTAN*

Bhutan has been ruled since 1907 by the Wangchuck dynasty of hereditary monarchs. Isolated in the Himalayas between India and Tibet, the small Kingdom (about the combined size of Vermont and New Hampshire, with a population of about 1.5 million) has been able to escape external domination since the 10th century. It was not until the rule of King Jigme Dorji Wangchuck (1952-72) that a Bhutanese ruler took steps to move the Kingdom from centuries of medieval seclusion toward a more representative political system and a better integrated, more productive economy. Although he retained strong executive powers, the King created several important institutions, including the National Assembly (1953), the Royal Advisory Council (1965), and the Council of Ministers (1968), to provide broader participation in the Government. The King, however, still plays the predominant role in decisionmaking. Serfdom was abolished, land reform introduced, laws codified, and the judiciary separated from the executive. There is no written constitution or bill of rights. The present monarch, Jigme Singye Wangchuck, has been in power since 1974 and has continued Bhutan's social and political evolution, although progress has been seriously handicapped by the Kingdom's limited administrative capacity and resources.

Internal security is maintained by the Royal Bhutan Police. It is assisted by the Royal Bhutan Army, which consists of 8,000 lightly armed men.

Bhutan remains, at least in terms of national income statistics, the poorest country in South Asia, with a per capita income half that of its neighbor India; this figure is deceptive, however, since the largely rural population grows much of its own food. Bhutan remains one of the most traditional and least developed countries in the world. The large majority of the population is illiterate and rural, living on subsistence agriculture and pastoral pursuits in a largely barter economy. Economic growth takes second place to self-sufficiency in national policy objectives. Over the past several years, Bhutan has successfully reduced its almost total economic dependence on India. It continues to restrict access by the outside world in the hope of minimizing the spread of foreign influences. This has not been completely successful, however, as a large majority of the development labor is foreign. The number of tourists is strictly limited to 3,000 a year. The Bhutanese have closed Buddhist monasteries to tourism to maintain the "religious purity" of those shrines.

Knowledgeable Bhutanese report no major violations of human rights in 1989. Although the Government is still essentially autocratic, most observers agree that Bhutan suffers few of the problems of disaffection and repression that afflict many third world countries undergoing more rapid change. The Government is concerned about the dangers of ethnic strife and has adopted policies that encourage ethnic integration.

*Bhutan and the United States have not exchanged diplomatic representatives, and U.S. officials travel there infrequently. Since few scholars have published studies on the contemporary Bhutanese polity or society, information on Bhutanese practices which bear on human rights is neither readily available nor complete.

BHUTAN

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known political or other extrajudicial killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There was no evidence of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Serious crimes are still rare, although reportedly there has been a trend toward more criminal activity in recent years with the growth of a foreign labor force in the country, widening economic disparities, and greater contact with foreign cultural values. Mutilation was outlawed in 1965.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no special or preventive detention, and arrests can be made only under legal authority. As far as is known, exile is not employed as a form of punishment.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Criminal cases and a variety of civil matters are adjudicated under an 18th century legal code revised in 1957. Familial questions are resolved according to the traditional religious norms of the two major religious groups in the country. Buddhist law governs the majority of Bhutanese, and Hindu law is applied in areas where persons of Nepali origin predominate.

The Kingdom's legal system does not provide for juries, the right to be represented by legal counsel, or due process in the Western sense. However, trials are public and are usually carried out expeditiously. There are generally no prosecuting or defense attorneys because the number of lawyers in the country is insufficient to serve in these capacities. Judges, appointed by and accountable to the King, are responsible for all aspects of a case, including investigation, filing of charges, prosecution, and judgment of the defendant. A separate judiciary was established in 1968 which provides for local, district, and national courts with original and appellate jurisdiction. Final appeals may be made to the King.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There are no written guarantees of privacy, but tradition has bolstered the concept. In practice, the Government does not generally intervene arbitrarily or unreasonably in the lives of the people. Buttressing the nation's traditional culture, however, is a priority for the Government. In 1989, by royal decree, the wearing of national dress was made compulsory for all citizens in order to preserve and promote the Kingdom's unique identity. Bhutanese found violating the decree are fined $10 or sentenced to jail for a week. From all reports, the decree is not being rigorously enforced.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

With an adult literacy rate of around 12 percent, Bhutan's population is relatively unaffected by the print media. The Government's weekly newspaper is the country's only regular publication. Indian and other foreign newspapers and publications are distributed without apparent government control. Bhutan has no television. In 1989 the Government ordered the dismantling of all television antennas to prevent the people from watching foreign programs. The government radio station broadcasts for 3 hours daily in the four major national languages. Criticism of the King is permitted in the National Assembly but not in the public media.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While no written guarantees of these freedoms exist, Bhutanese generally enjoy the freedom of peaceful assembly and association. There are no private voluntary social, communal, or economic associations and no professional or trade organizations. For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Buddhism is the state religion of Bhutan. The Government subsidizes monasteries and shrines and provides aid to about half of the Kingdom's 12,000 monks. The monastic establishment enjoys statutory representation in the National Assembly and Royal Advisory Council and is an influential voice on public policy. Citizens of other faiths, who are mainly Hindus of Nepali origin, enjoy freedom of worship. In an effort to encourage national cultural integration, the King has declared major Hindu festivals to be national holidays, and the royal family participates in them. Foreign missionaries may live in Bhutan if they have some other functional capacity, but they are not permitted to proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement within Bhutan for all Bhutanese citizens and no bar on emigration or foreign travel. For many years, Bhutanese traveled little inside or outside the Kingdom, but the recent construction of roads and the establishment of air links with New Delhi, Calcutta, Dhaka, Kathmandu, and Bangkok have encouraged travel. A policy introduced in the 1950's, which prohibited the exiled leaders of an outlawed Nepali-Bhutanese political party from returning to the country, has been liberalized to allow them to return.

Since 1986, Bhutan has been conducting a drive to identify people without work permits. In this process, about 1,000 foreigners have been expelled from the Kingdom, of which over 900 were largely Nepalis with some Bangladeshis; 93 were Indians. The Indian press reported in 1989 that the number of establishments run by Indian nationals in Bhutan is gradually declining with the termination of their trading licenses.

BHUTAN

Bhutan traditionally has welcomed refugees and exiles from other countries in the region. Some 6,000 Tibetans sought refuge in Bhutan in 1959, joining approximately 4,000 Tibetans already in the country. Because it perceived threats to its national security from the Tibetan refugees' suspected lack of allegiance to Bhutan, the Government required in 1979-80 that they either accept Bhutanese citizenship or face expulsion. A considerable number sought refuge in India. Those Tibetans in Bhutan who accepted Bhutanese citizenship have been assured by the Government that they will be free to return to their homeland. The Government decided not to carry out its threat to deport those who did not apply for Bhutanese citizenship. It is government policy not to accept new refugees from Tibet, although a handful of refugees have come across the border since the imposition in March of martial law there.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The citizens of Bhutan do not have the right to change their government. Bhutan is a traditional monarchy, with sovereign power vested in the King. It is a highly elitist system, with decisionmaking centered in the palace and involving only a small number of officials in the civil and religious establishments. Although the present King and his father have endeavored to integrate women and southerners (Nepali ethnics) into the body politic, the system is still dominated by the male members of an aristocracy of Tibetan Buddhist ancestry.

Political parties do not exist, and their formation is discouraged. Local administration is carried out by centrally appointed government officials. Villages, however, have the traditional right to elect by consensus their own headmen, who form the lowest rung of the administrative hierarchy. The Government is in the process of administrative decentralization as a means of bringing the administration of the country closer to the people and giving them a more direct role in governance. When the King is touring outlying districts of the Kingdom (which he does frequently), any citizen can flag down his car and present an aide with a written petition, which is assured an official response.

The 150-member National Assembly is composed of 105 members elected by limited franchise (heads of family in Hindu areas, village headmen in Buddhist regions), 12 elected by the monastic establishment, and 33 high-level officials of the government administration appointed by the King. Its principal functions are to enact laws, approve senior appointments in the Government, and advise the King on matters of national importance. It also provides a forum for presenting grievances and rectifying cases of maladministration. Voting is by secret ballot, with a simple majority needed to pass a measure.

The King cannot formally veto legislation passed by the Assembly, but he can refer bills back to it for further consideration. The Assembly occasionally has rejected the King's recommendations or delayed their implementation, but the King has always had enough influence to persuade the Assembly to approve any legislation he considers essential or to withdraw any proposed legislation he opposes. Government officials may be questioned by the body, and ministers can be forced to resign by a two-thirds vote of no confidence.

BHUTAN

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international agency or group is known to have sought entry into Bhutan to investigate human rights conditions. No nongovernmental human rights groups are known to exist in Bhutan, nor do human rights appear to be a subject of domestic political debate.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

In contrast with some of its neighbors, Bhutan has not developed either a rigid caste system or customs which sequester or disenfranchise women. Boys tend to outnumber girls by about two to one in primary school, and seven to one at secondary level, but family land is divided equally between sons and daughters. Bhutanese traditionally place girls in a lower status than boys because of their lesser importance to the family economy. Girls receive poorer nutrition and lesser medical attention than boys. The disparity between the higher mortality rates of female versus male infants has resulted in an overall ratio in the population of 97.2 females per 100 males, one of the lowest in the world.

The sexes mix relatively freely, marriages can be arranged by partners themselves as well as by their parents, and divorce is common. A man is allowed by law to have three wives, but polyandry is not sanctioned. Legislation has been enacted in recent years making marriage registration compulsory and favoring women in matters of alimony. Although violence against women is known to occur, no information is available on its extent. In 1989 some 10 percent of the persons employed by the various government ministries and departments were women.

Potentially the most divisive issue in Bhutan is, how to accommodate the large (estimated at 20-30 percent) segment of the population of Nepali Hindu origin. The country's Buddhist majority has long been concerned about being outnumbered by immigrants from Nepal, as occurred in neighboring Sikkim. In the past, the Government responded to this concern by tightly limiting immigration and restricting residence and employment of the Nepali population to the southern part of the country. More recently, the Government has liberalized its policy toward the Nepali minority. The Government now encourages intermarriage, educates some students in regions other than their own, and gives higher priority to economic development of the south. By law, southerners may own land and establish business in the north and vice versa, but reportedly it is sometimes still difficult for non-Buddhist Bhutanese (except government officials) to buy property in Buddhist areas.

More and more young Bhutanese of Nepali origin are entering public economic and administrative bodies, and laws concerning land tenure and taxation in the south are being liberalized. Although the language of instruction is English, there is a requirement that Dzongkha, the language of the western highlands, be taught in all schools, and this requirement is said to disadvantage students from other areas. In general, however, the Government appears to be sensitive to the problems of national integration and is attempting to eliminate the factors which, in the past, led some Nepali Bhutanese to describe themselves as second-class citizens.

BHUTAN

Families with ties to the palace and senior levels of the Government are strongly favored in their access to state scholarships for foreign education. Nevertheless, the King is making a serious effort to draw qualified persons from a broader range of social and ethnic backgrounds into the prestigious civil bureaucracy. Among the non-Drukpa (ruling elite) officials is the Minister of Trade, who is of Nepalese origin.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Trade unionism is not permitted and Bhutan has no labor unions. Bhutan is not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no collective bargaining nor legislation addressing labor-related issues pertaining to the small industrial work force, which makes up less than 1 percent of the population.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

As far as is known, there is no law prohibiting forced or compulsory labor but it is not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There are no laws governing the employment of children. However, children are not employed in industrial labor.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

As noted above, there is no legislation addressing labor issues. There is no legislated minimum wage, standard workweek, or health and safety standards. The shortage of labor in Bhutan is such that the larger industrial firms, all of which were established relatively recently, are organized along modern lines and incorporate a considerable amount of labor-saving technology. No industrial plant employs more than 60 to 70 workers, and most of these are guest workers from Nepal. Apart from a few larger plants, the entire industrial sector consists of home-based handicrafts and some 60 privately owned small or medium-scale factories producing consumer goods.

EGYPT

Egypt is a republic in which the President and his party, the National Democratic Party (NDP), are the dominant political forces. The NDP, in power since 1978, commands large majorities in the two Parliamentary bodies, the People's Assembly and the Shura (Consultative) Council; three of the five legal opposition parties have some representation in the Parliament. The Cabinet is headed by a Prime Minister appointed by and responsible to the President. Mohammed Hosni Mubarak was elected President by the People's Assembly in 1981 and reelected to a second 6-year term in July 1987. In accordance with the Constitution, his reelection was affirmed by a popular referendum.

Internal security is the responsibility of several different organizations. Of the three intelligence services, the General Directorate for State Security Investigations (GDSSI), which reports to the Interior Ministry, is the main agency responsible for domestic security, although there are several other police services, including the Central Security Force which protects public buildings, facilities, and foreign missions. Investigations pertaining to national security may be undertaken by any of the three intelligence agencies, depending on the nature of the case. GDSSI conducts most undercover investigations of domestic opponents of the regime, and also carries out interrogations of suspects arrested under Egypt's state of emergency legislation. It has been linked to many of the reports of torture and abuse of prisoners and detainees.

Egypt's economy has diversified over the past two decades as industries such as petroleum and services such as tourism have grown in importance. An inefficient public sector dominates the economy, and the Government also maintains an extensive network of subsidies and regulations as part of a social contract perceived by major segments of the population as essential to their economic security. Severe economic problems--sluggish growth, rising inflation, and shortages of foreign exchange--led the Government to design a reform plan aimed at reducing the Government's large budget deficit and increasing the role of market forces in the economy. Implementation of this plan continues to be held back, however, by deep-seated social and political resistance.

Human rights remained significantly restricted in 1989. The primary problems continued to be torture of detainees, with apparently ineffective efforts to investigate, try, and punish perpetrators of such abuses, an emergency law that permits prolonged detentions without due process, and various restrictions on political activities, which call into question the ability of citizens to change their government by democratic means. The Government continued its use of emergency law authority--currently in effect until 1991--to detain a wide variety of persons suspected of involvement in subversive activities. The number of political detainees is higher than last year's level, as at least 1,500 persons, including Islamic activists, alleged Communists, and strike participants were detained. Most of these were subsequently released. Those most likely to suffer from human rights abuses are Muslim activists or other groups perceived to be a threat to the Government. Women are likely to suffer from discrimination and abuses sanctioned by tradition.

EGYPT

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no confirmed reports of unlawful government-instigated killings for political reasons, nor were there any reported political killings by underground groups. Twenty persons have been indicted for their role in the "Egypt's Revolution" organization, accused of killing two Israeli diplomats and attempting to kill a number of other Israeli and American Embassy personnel in a series of attacks in 1984-87. The trial, which began in November 1988, continued throughout 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no confirmed reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture and other forms of mistreatment are forbidden by the Constitution and the law, convincing reports indicate they continue to be practiced by police and security officials, and punishment of such actions is rare. Egyptian courts will not accept confessions or testimony considered to have been obtained under torture and have ordered the release of defendants in a number of state security trials because of reports by forensic medical examiners that the defendants had been tortured. Detainees and prisoners who claim to have been tortured can and do appeal for redress to the courts and public prosecutor. In rare cases the courts award financial compensation to torture victims. The law also provides for jail sentences ranging from 3 to 10 years for officials convicted of torture, and first degree murder charges may be brought against those who inflict torture resulting in the victim's death. In August a court ordered Interior Minister Zaki Badr to pay the nominal compensation of about $40 to one victim's family in a case in 1988 in which police officers tortured to death a son who refused to testify against his father. There were no instances in 1989 of police being tried and punished for such actions.

In a report issued in May on arbitrary detention and torture under the Egyptian Government's emergency powers, Amnesty International (AI) concluded that the "seriousness of the allegations, medical evidence and consistency of detail" of detainee mistreatment have convinced it that a "pattern of torture" exists in Egypt.

Egyptian human rights activists note that most torture allegations involve members of the Islamic Gamaat, while other political detainees usually are not subjected to similar treatment. In August, however, security forces broke up a labor strike at an iron and steel complex in Helwan and detained up to several hundred workers. According to a report written by members of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights (EOHR), arrestees were subjected to mistreatment including verbal abuse, systematic beatings, and threats of sexual violence, as well as the denial of medical assistance. In late August, security forces detained 52 persons, including four members of the EOHR, on suspicion of belonging to a

"Communist Workers' Party." There is reliable evidence that members of this group were also tortured while under detention. There is no evidence that the authorities brought charges against those accused of torture or mistreatment. In early January 1990, EOHR published a second report charging that torture and sexual abuse of prisoners has become so widespread that it appeared to be a matter of policy by security forces holding those detained both for political and nonpolitical reasons.

The Arab Human Rights Organization, in its 1989 annual report, states that many cases of torture have been disclosed and that reports have been submitted to the prosecutor's office requesting full investigation. It does not say whether the Government has responded to these submissions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Two systems of criminal procedure are in effect: ordinary criminal procedures and the emergency law. Under ordinary procedures, arrests follow investigations, and arrested persons are charged with violations of specific laws. With the important exception of certain applications of the emergency legislation, preventive detention is not practiced. Arrested persons have the right to a judicial determination of the legality of detention, and there is a system of bail. The ordinary law states that a detained suspect must be brought before a magistrate and formally charged within 48 hours of his arrest or be released. By and large, there is careful observance of constitutional and legal safeguards in the arrest and pretrial custody stages. Arrests occur openly and with warrants, and the accused are brought before an independent judiciary.

The major exceptions to the normal procedures arise when the emergency law, which gives the Government extraordinary powers, is applied. The Constitution and the emergency law empower the President, when national security or public order are thought to be in peril, to invoke emergency powers authorizing the arrest and detention of persons suspected of being dangerous to national security, irrespective of provisions of the penal code. Egyptian law specifies a wide range of offenses, deemed harmful to national security, which may be tried before a parallel system of state security courts under the emergency legislation. Despite a provision of the Constitution which states that a state of emergency may only be imposed in case of war, foreign invasion, civil strife, or natural disaster, a state of emergency has been imposed almost without interruption for the last 41 years and continuously since the assassination of President Sadat in 1981.

Under the emergency law a person may be held without charge or due process while an investigation is conducted. Within 30 days the detainee may petition the State Security Court to review his detention. The Court has 15 days to review the case, following which it may order the detainee's release. The Interior Minister then has 15 days to offer objection to the Court's decision, following which another State Security Court has a further 15 days to review the Minister's objection. If the second Court upholds the decision to release the detainee, the decision must be implemented. The Interior Minister, however, may simply order the detainee arrested again, in effect allowing the Government the right of indefinite detention of suspects in state security cases.

EGYPT

During the People's Assembly debate in 1988 over the extension of the emergency law, the Government argued that the law is only applied against "terrorists, drug pushers, and illegal currency traders." In fact, the emergency law is used against those categories of suspected criminals, but it was also applied in 1989 to detain, among others, striking iron and steel workers, student demonstrators, Islamic student activists, and relatives (including young children) of suspects sought for questioning.

The Egyptian Minister of Interior acknowledged detaining 1,500 Islamic fundamentalists during April and May after a clash between fundamentalists and police in Fayyoun. In a wave of arrests in August and September, police detained some 300 more Islamic fundamentalists, 20 members of the Muslim Brotherhood (on charges of indoctrinating young children against the regime), and some 40 alleged Shi'ite Muslims on charges of plotting against the Government. Police also detained striking iron and steel workers and 52 persons (including four human rights advocates) on suspicion of belonging to a "Communist Workers Party." In December 300 fundamentalist students were detained after a clash between police and the students at Assyut University. In most cases, detainees are released after interrogation and never brought to trial. In fact, AI noted that "in recent years, only about 5 percent of those arrested for investigation in connection with security-related offenses have ever been brought to trial, suggesting that the great majority of such prisoners are held in the absence of any real evidence incriminating them in the offenses they are alleged to have committed."

Detainees are sometimes held incommunicado. According to AI's report, "in practice, political detainees' first access to legal counsel has been delayed for days or even weeks at a time. Many individuals are arrested without being allowed to inform their relatives of their detention."

Exile is forbidden by law and is not practiced. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Egyptian judiciary includes four types of regular courts: Summary Courts, Primary Courts, Appeals Courts, and the Court of Cassations (Supreme Court), and two kinds of special courts, the Court of Ethics and the State Security Courts. The courts are independent of the executive branch of government.

The provisions in Egyptian law for public trial do not apply in state security cases. Persons accused of certain security-related offenses, which may trigger emergency law provisions at the Interior Ministry's discretion, are usually tried in public sessions in the State Security Courts. These Courts have less independence than other courts because their decisions may be challenged by the executive. However, the State Security Courts have procedural safeguards (including the right of the defendant to be represented by an attorney, the attorney's access to the prosecutor's investigation, and a prohibition against secret testimony), and their judges are drawn from the ranks of the senior judiciary. The judgments of the State Security Courts may be appealed to the Higher State Security Court.

Under the emergency law, only the President may amend, commute, or cancel a sentence or order a retrial. The law also grants the President the authority to approve or reject all rulings of the State Security Court system. In some cases, the President may order defendants in state security cases to be tried before military courts, although the applicability of this provision to civilian defendants is repeatedly challenged on constitutional grounds. In July counsel for the defense challenged the original 1986 referral of a case involving defendants accused of burning video clubs to military court. The Egyptian Code of Criminal Procedures states that court hearings should be conducted publicly, but permits the Court to order part or all of the hearing to be conducted in secret session or to restrict access to the court "in order to preserve public order or morals." The court trying the Egypt's Revolution case has not ordered the hearings to be held in secret session, but has restricted access to the courtroom to those who have obtained special permits from the court. The proceedings have been covered thoroughly in the press.

No reliable statistics exist on the number of political prisoners. Opponents of the regime are not arrested for criticizing government leaders or policies. The Interior Ministry has drawn a distinction between indoor opposition meetings, rallies, and discussions, which are tolerated, and public demonstrations, which are not. For the most part, those tried and convicted for their political activities have been members of groups advocating the violent overthrow of the regime, but many people have been detained for questioning under the emergency law for varying periods without ever coming to trial.

The High Judicial Council is empowered to override decisions by the Ministry of Justice regarding judicial appointments, promotions, and other personnel matters. The Council of State, a court system having jurisdiction over disputes between private citizens and government agencies, is independent of the Ministry of Justice and is effectively safeguarded against arbitrary dismissal of its members.

In August the Higher State Security Court ordered the release of 50-odd members of an Islamic organization accused of inciting religious strife and trying to undermine government authority. In September several persons charged with being members of a "Communist Worker's Party" were released on their own recognizance after several days of detention.

Two judicial institutions sometimes criticized by the opposition as superfluous and potentially dangerous to the judicial system are the Court of Ethics and its investigating agency, the Office of the Socialist Prosecutor. Created in 1980, while Sadat was seeking to counter public criticism of widespread corruption in government, the Court is charged with trying offenders of "Socialist values," meaning investigations of allegations of corruption and illegal business activities. The other tasks of the Office of the Socialist Prosecutor include approving candidates for elective positions in the trade union movement, professional syndicates, and local government councils, as well as performing security checks on appointees to senior government positions. The Socialist Prosecutor may impose travel bans on officials under investigation. The Socialist Prosecutor and Court of Ethics were involved in a number of recent cases, including those involving Islamic investment companies. The Socialist Prosecutor referred 13 Islamic investment companies to the Financial and Commercial Affairs Prosecutor, and the Court of Ethics placed the money of some Islamic investment company owners under sequestration.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for freedom from arbitrary interference in private life by the State or by political organizations, but this freedom is significantly abridged in cases under the emergency law. Ordinarily, police must obtain a warrant from the Public Prosecutor before undertaking arrests, searches, or seizures. On occasion the courts have dismissed cases when they determined warrants were issued without sufficient cause. Police officials who conduct searches without proper warrants are subject to criminal penalties. However, the emergency law empowers the President, or the Minister of the Interior acting as his deputy, to authorize searches of persons or premises without following normal procedures. The internal security services have the capability to monitor telephone and other private conversations of the political opposition and a broad range of citizens suspected of illegal or subversive activity. There are persistent and credible reports of routine screening of, and in some cases interference with, correspondence and especially international mail. As with search warrants, telephone taps and mail screening normally require the prior authorization of the Public Prosecutor, but normal procedures do not prevail when the emergency law is invoked. GDSSI and the other domestic intelligence agencies engage routinely in surveillance of opposition politicians, political or social activists, foreign diplomats, and suspected subversives. Employees of most government facilities, public sector factories, and foreign embassies presume that their activities are monitored by government informants.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and of the press, and in general the Government has provided press freedom and resisted curbs on political expression. Egyptians openly express their views without fear of retribution on a wide variety of political and social issues, sometimes airing vigorous criticism of the Government. A lively debate of national issues and criticism of government officials is evident in the media and the theater. Much commentary reflecting differences of opinion appears regularly in the major government-owned dailies and magazines. Radio and television are state owned and all broadcasts are closely supervised by the Government. National newspapers are corporately independent and therefore less controlled, but they still essentially answer to the Government.

The opposition papers are free to publish stories supporting the political inclinations of their sponsoring organizations. Journalists and other persons slandered or maligned in the press may sue in court or, in the case of journalists, raise the matter with the press syndicate. By virtue of their positions, the President and members of the People's Assembly and the Shura Council may not sue for libel. There have been repeated moves to strip opposition Members of Parliament of their parliamentary immunity so that they could be sued for articles appearing in their parties' newspapers.

EGYPT

The Government occasionally exercises influence on the national dailies and magazines, the editors in chief of which are appointed by the presidency and can be dismissed by the NDP-dominated Shura Council. The Council supervises the press to some extent through the Higher Press Council, a 45-member body chaired by the Speaker of the Shura Council and composed of senior press figures. One of the Higher Press Council's functions is to approve applications for new publications. No applications to publish independently owned journals were approved in 1989. The Council's approval, however, is only required for publications appearing regularly.

There is no overt censorship, with the exception of press bans occasionally imposed by the State Security Prosecutor on stories which might affect the course of investigations under way in State Security Court cases. In September allegations that suspected Communists arrested in August were tortured while detained were aired extensively in the opposition press. Nevertheless, journalists and editors working for the government-supported newspapers are sometimes given guidance by officials about the treatment of specific issues. This guidance is given informally to senior editors and board chairmen by senior officials such as the Information Minister. This does not happen routinely; usually the editors know the policy and are aware of the limits which they are expected to observe. Opposition press coverage of the arrests of Islamic extremists and suspected Communists, strikes, and public demonstrations was not censored.

In August 1988, the Government closed down the Nasserist opposition newspaper Sawt al-Arab following a controversial attack by the paper's editor on the Saudi ruling family. That was the only instance of government action to silence an opposition newspaper in recent years. Supporters of the newspaper lost an appeal in 1989 to resume publication in Egypt and are publishing Sawt al-Arab abroad.

The universities enjoy a considerable degree of academic freedom. In the past, faculty clubs at several universities, especially the Universities of Alexandria and Assiut, have held political discussions which led to friction with the Minister of Interior and threats to dissolve the clubs. Faculty members are more likely to feel social pressure to conform than any actual interference in their publications or research. Controversial books by Egyptian authors are published freely in Egypt but are sometimes banned from overseas distribution by the Government. A wide variety of foreign reading matter in Arabic and other languages is available at newsstands and major hotels, although there are isolated reports of the seizure or censorship of foreign publications.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Under the emergency law, the Government can and does place limitations on the constitutionally assured right of assembly.

Permission is required from the Ministry of Interior to hold public meetings, mass political rallies, and protest marches. In September the Governor of Ismailiyya banned a meeting of the Lawyer's Syndicate during which arbitrary arrest, torture, and human rights abuses were to be featured as topics. Also in September, security forces arrested several Islamic activists who participated in a press conference sponsored by the Physicians' Syndicate to denounce arrests and alleged torture ordered by the Interior Ministry. In October the Ministry is reported to have acted to prevent the holding of a seminar, sponsored by the Islamist-dominated Engineers' Syndicate, intended to promote a campaign against torture. Generally, however, the Minister of Interior permits protest rallies on the campuses and at the facilities of professional associations, particularly the Bar Association. Street demonstrations, however, have been banned on the grounds that they are a likely source of violent disturbances. Islamic organizations are permitted to organize public religious ceremonies, often attended by tens of thousands of people, on major holidays, but persons regarded as Islamic radicals may still be denied permission to organize public assemblies.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

According to the Constitution, Egypt is an Islamic state which provides for freedom of religious expression and equality before the law, regardless of religion. Egypt has a tradition of religious tolerance, and, with some notable exceptions, the authorities generally uphold the rights of religious minorities and the rights of individuals to practice their religion. In accordance with Islamic law, only Islam, Judaism, and Christianity are fully recognized as religions with laws, traditions, and rites which must be respected. The overwhelming majority of Egyptians practice Sunni Islam or Coptic Christianity.

Coptic Orthodox Christians, the most significant religious minority, may constitute 10 percent of the population, although their numbers are a subject of controversy. Coptic-Muslim relations continued to be generally good in 1989, with no increase in incidents of sectarian violence from the level of 1988.

While most Egyptian Jews emigrated in the 1950's and 1960's, those few who remain appear to practice their faith without restriction or harassment.

Various Protestant denominations operate, some with significant Egyptian membership, while others have a small, largely expatriate following. Members of recognized religions may maintain links with coreligionists abroad. Other small religious groups continue to face difficulties.

Significant problems are encountered by those who convert from Islam to Christianity. Christian missionaries who engage in proselytizing Muslim Egyptians may be prosecuted under the penal code or under the broad terms of the Law of National Unity, even though missionary work is not specifically banned. This represents a major departure from the traditional Islamic practice in which proselytizing Muslims would be considered a capital offense. Conversion from Islam, while officially not restricted or penalized, is discouraged by the Government, and even more so by social pressure. In a number of cases involving converts from Islam, the security authorities have used the state of emergency legislation to arrest and detain converts, without bringing specific charges, on the grounds that converts threaten social peace and intercommunal relations. Those who convert cannot have the religion category changed on their national identity cards or other legal documentation.

All recognized faiths can, in principle, establish places of worship, run schools, and train enough clergy to serve believers. Synagogues and churches routinely receive police protection. Under a law dating back to the Ottoman era, however, non-Muslims must obtain a series of permits culminating in a presidential decree to build or repair places of worship. Obtaining authorization can take years and is often not granted. This is a point of contention, especially among Coptic Christians.

Egyptian law prohibits the use of places of worship to criticize the State. The courts have not yet ruled on a challenge to the constitutionality of this restriction. Although the Government maintains that sermons by Islamic and Coptic religious figures are not censored, Muslim prayer leaders are occasionally detained and questioned for delivering allegedly inflammatory sermons in their mosques. The Ministry of Religious Endowments has also been known to substitute its prayer leaders at mosques for preachers it regards as troublesome, as well as to take over the administration of some privately run mosques considered to be centers of antigovernment activity.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Egyptians are free to move within Egypt, except in well-defined military districts; there are additional restricted areas to which foreigners may not travel. Exceptions to freedom of foreign travel and emigration apply to males who have not completed compulsory military service, unmarried women under 21 or married women who must obtain their father's or husband's permission to obtain a passport, and persons under investigation for criminal offenses or whose travel is banned by emergency law provisions. Citizens who leave the country have the right to return. There are no known cases of citizenship being revoked for political reasons. Under the state of emergency, the Prime Minister has authority, which he may delegate to the Interior Minister, to restrict foreign or domestic travel. The total number of persons denied the right to travel abroad is relatively small, and travel bans are generally applied according to normal legal procedures.

Egypt's record on granting political asylum generally has been good, and the extradition of those granted political asylum is prohibited by the Constitution. Several thousand non-Egyptian Arabs residing in Egypt, including many Libyan dissidents, have been granted political asylum. Egypt also allows the children of some African refugees awaiting resettlement to study in Egyptian schools and grants residence to a number of elderly persons who have remained stateless since the Second World War.

Although there were two well publicized cases of deportation in 1988, there were no known deportations in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Although the right exists theoretically, as a practical matter citizens do not have the ability to change the government by democratic means. Since the 1952 revolution, Egypt has had a political system characterized by a strong presidency. Four former military officers, including Mubarak, have served as president in that period, but civilian government has become increasingly separated from military influence. Nasser ruled a one-party state, Sadat created an embryonic multiparty system, and Mubarak has liberalized the political atmosphere by expanding the range of legal opposition activities. While Mubarak's National Democratic Party (NDP) dominates the political scene, there are now five legal opposition parties which are allowed to organize, hold rallies, publish their views, and enter candidates for election to the People's Assembly, the Shura Council, and local councils. Still, the political process remains significantly restricted, and in 1989 there was some slowing of the general trend of the last several years toward increasing political liberties and a widening scope for legal opposition participation in the political system.

The NDP is a nonideological party which groups together a range of political camps, some of which support the statist and Arab nationalist policies promoted by former President Nasser, while others support the more liberal economic and pro-Western foreign policies promoted by Sadat. Still others are Mubarak supporters of little fixed ideological commitment. It has a dominant role in most party-based institutions in the country. It holds almost every seat in the Shura Council, as well as virtually all the seats in the 1,300 local popular councils across the country.

According to the Constitution, the President is elected by the People's Assembly; his election is then ratified by popular referendum. Both of President Mubarak's elections to 6-year terms of office, most recently in 1987, followed these constitutional provisions. These procedures, in principle, allow the Egyptian people to exercise their right to change their government. The opposition argues that the Constitution should be amended to allow for direct popular election of the President. President Mubarak has countered that he is "administering democracy by doses" and that the public is not prepared for full democracy.

The People's Assembly comprises 458 members, of whom 448 are elected. The remaining 10 are appointed by the President. The Constitution reserves half of the elected seats for worker and farmer deputies. In the 1987 elections, the NDP won 348 seats, plus the 10 appointed seats. The two principal opposition groups, the Socialist Labor Party (in alliance with the Muslim Brotherhood) and the New Wafd, won 56 and 25 seats respectively. The Assembly debates and passes laws and must approve the Government's general policies and civilian budget. The military budget is not subject to parliamentary review. Assembly members can and do, however, call for parliamentary investigations and interpellate ministers. This often vigorous questioning is broadcast on television and covered in the press.

The opposition parties continue to make credible complaints about electoral fraud by the Government and about the method of calculating election results used by the Ministry of Interior. NDP candidates won all of the elected seats in the June Shura Council elections and a September by-election in Port Said. The 1987 postelection ruling by the State Council Administrative Court that the NDP should give up 39 seats to the Wafd and the Islamic alliance was never implemented. The ruling remains under discussion in both the State Council and Constitutional Court systems.

The opposition parties and some within the NDP and government leadership also object to the "party list system" used to calculate election results in the People's Assembly, arguing that direct election of individual candidates is fairer to smaller parties than is proportional representation and would assure better qualified candidates and popular participation. However, the outcome of the Shura Council elections, which were contested on an individual basis, have tended to focus debate on the larger issue of electoral fairness. Some regime critics argue that the political system is designed to ensure that the NDP and the Government retain control of all state institutions. Government supporters argue, however, that President Mubarak has firmly established at least an elementary multiparty system in order to create checks and balances and give expression to a broad range of political views.

The Government has not responded to most of the queries from Amnesty International and other international groups about human rights concerns. However, in 1988 it received two AI delegations, including one headed by the organization's Secretary General, to discuss human rights. These visits resulted in a report submitted to the Government which included a number of recommendations (June 1988). The Government provided some preliminary comments in response.

Human rights groups in Egypt continue actively to promote domestic and foreign human rights issues, even though they have not been accorded official recognition by the Government. The Egyptian Chapter of the Arab Organization for Human Rights (AOHR), which has been active for several years, was denied permission by the Social Affairs Ministry to establish itself as a legally recognized organization on the grounds that its activities were political in nature. Local human rights observers believe the Interior Ministry detained and reportedly tortured four persons in late August because of their activities as members of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights. The Government has also denied recognition to the larger AOHR and refused permission for the establishment of a local chapter of AI. Nevertheless, the AOHR continues to maintain regional offices in Cairo and publishes its newsletters and annual review of the human rights situation in the Arab world without interference.

The AOHR has sought and been denied access to prison facilities to inspect conditions and meet with prisoners.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Egyptian law provides for equality of the sexes, but aspects of the law and many traditional practices are discriminatory against women. Marriage and personal status are primarily based on the religious law of the individual concerned, which for most Egyptians is Islamic law. Under Egyptian law a married woman must have her husband's permission to obtain a passport, and he may stop her from traveling for any reason. A child must have his or her father's permission to obtain a passport, and even if the parents are divorced and the mother has custody, the child's mother need not be informed if the child obtains a passport or travels outside of Egypt.

The Revised Family Status Law, enacted in July 1985 to replace a 1979 law declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Constitutional Court, amplified the legal basis for equality of the sexes beyond rights contained in Islamic law. It largely ensures a woman's right to divorce and preserves the wife's child custody and property rights. A second marriage by the husband (multiple marriage for men is acceptable practice in Islam) is grounds for the first wife to divorce, if it is shown that the marriage had caused her material psychological harm, or if the husband fails to declare such subsequent marriages. A wife has the option of retaining the family residence or receiving financial compensation. These aspects of the family status law only apply to Muslims. Christians do not practice plural marriage, and the Coptic Church permits divorce only in unusual circumstances.

Under Islamic law, which is applied in personal status matters, female heirs are entitled to one-half the amount of inheritance that male heirs can receive. However, only male heirs have a duty to provide for all the members of the family who need assistance.

Economic necessity as well as changing attitudes are drawing more and more women into the work force. They are increasingly well represented in medicine, law, and education. Within more traditional communities, prevailing cultural values make it more difficult for women to work outside the home. Some jobs are advertised for males only.

Despite the legal stipulation of equality, women living in more traditional areas occupy a subordinate and dependent role in the household. Women's rights advocates also note that some traditional attitudes and practices--particularly female circumcision, Islamic legal attitudes toward divorce and plural marriage, and the male relatives' responsibility to punish even to the point of death their female relatives who bring dishonor to the family by actual or presumed violation of the strict traditional code of sexual conduct--are highly discriminatory toward women. Some of these acts are illegal. Most of these traditional practices are disappearing from the cities but are still practiced to varying degrees in the countryside. Although violence against women is known to occur, little is known about its extent. There are no reliable statistics on the subject. Abuse within the family, such as wife beating, is seldom discussed publicly owing to the value attached to privacy in family matters in this traditional society. .

Reliable statistics are not available for female circumcision in Egypt. While it is not against Egyptian law, the law prohibits doctors from performing it in government hospitals. One doctor who has done extensive research on this subject maintains 80 per cent of women in Egypt's rural areas receive the milder form of excision/circumcision, although in parts of Upper Egypt the more drastic infibulation is practiced. In the larger cities the rate decreases to 50 percent in the less educated classes and almost zero in the middle and upper classes.

Coptic Christians work in all career fields, occupying many leadership positions in the business and professional communities. Copts continue to enjoy access to public employment, although there appears to be some discrimination against young Copts seeking to obtain employment in the government or public sectors. Coptic representation at the highest levels of government increased slightly in 1987--from 2 to 3 of the total of 33 cabinet ministers and from 9 to 11 of 458 People's Assembly deputies--following the People's Assembly elections and a minor cabinet reshuffle. Copts seldom advance to the senior ranks of the military (there are no Coptic generals), security, or diplomatic services, nor are there any serving Coptic governors (26 states) or security directors of governorates.

Some Copts allege that they are discriminated against in admissions to some fields of medical study, particularly obstetrics and gynecology. Islamic activists have objected to the prevalence of Copts in the medical and pharmacological professions, arguing that Muslim women should not be treated by Coptic doctors or go to Coptic pharmacists. There are also reports that universities have effectively blocked Coptic professors from becoming administrators and chairmen of certain departments. Copts note that Arabic language classes use the Koran as the major text.

Although religious minorities face social prejudice and individual acts of discrimination from some Muslims, there is no evidence that these acts are officially inspired or condoned. President Mubarak has emphasized publicly the full equality of Copts and other religious minorities. The courts' application of Islamic law to personal status matters among Muslims, and the Islamic influences elsewhere in the legal system, have not affected the constitutionally assured freedoms of Copts and other minorities. Coptic observers have alleged that it is Islamic fundamentalists who contribute most heavily to the discrimination experienced by the Copts, but that government officials, reluctant to antagonize the fundamentalists, fail to rectify situations created by their anti-Coptic actions.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The law provides for the workers' right to join local committees of workers. About 20 to 25 percent of the work force is unionized. Any establishment employing 50 or more workers must allow them the right to organize a local committee if the workers so desire. These locals are affiliated with national trade unions, organized along sectoral lines, all 23 of which are required to affiliate with the single labor federation, the Egyptian Trade Union Federation (ETUF). There have been complaints to the International Labor Organization (ILO) that requiring all national trade unions to join a single federation infringes upon workers' freedom of association. In its 1989 report, the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) again asserted that the law institutionalizes a single trade union system, contrary to Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. The Government has shown no sign that it intends to accept the establishment of more than one federation. The leadership of the Federation asserts that it actively promotes workers' interests and that there is no need for another federation.

ETUF is a member of The Organization of African Trade Union Unity and was readmitted to the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions in March (from which it was expelled in 1978). ETUF sends observer delegations to International Confederation of Free Trade Unions' and World Federation of Trade Unions' conferences, but, in an effort to maintain its nonaligned status, has not joined either one.

EGYPT

The ETUF is dominated by the NDP and therefore works, at the least, in close concert with the Government. The ETUF, which has a pyramidal structure, holds its elections periodically, with each level electing the leadership of the next level. Candidates for offices are approved by the Office of the Socialist Prosecutor. A council of national union presidents elects the ETUF Council, which in turn elects the President of the Federation from among its ranks. The trade union movement takes pride in the relative independence of its electoral procedures; a large number of union presidents were not reelected in 1987. The person and property of union leaders are not threatened by the Government or nongovernmental antiunion forces. The 1989 report of the ILO COE, while noting some positive developments, repeated its request that the Government not interfere in the internal affairs of the unions and allow these matters to be determined by union rules.

The labor law provides for a system of arbitration to resolve disputes about wages and working condition. While the labor law and labor unions are silent on the right to strike, the larger body of Egyptian law, in fact, restricts workers' right to strike. The Criminal Code provides criminal penalties of up to 2 years in jail for civil servants or public sector employees who strike and more severe penalties for those who incite others to strike. The National Security and Unity Law of 1977 punish workers by hard labor if they participate in a strike that "constitutes a threat to the national economy" or in a gathering or sit-in that "endangers the public peace." The Government has occasionally reacted harshly to strikes in the public sector. In August the security forces allegedly beat and detained hundreds of workers who participated in a strike at the Helwan Iron and Steel Complex. One worker was killed. Detainees subsequently complained of mistreatment and torture while held in prison.

The strongest antistrike provision is contained in the Law of National Unity which prohibits strikes that threaten the national economy. The full implications of this law are not yet clear. In 1987 the State Security Court ruled in the case of a 1986 train conductors' strike that the Government is obligated as a signatory to the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights to allow workers the right to strike peacefully. However, a presidential review panel refused to accept the Court's decision, and the issue remains unresolved. In August participants in the strike at the Helwan Iron and Steel Complex were arrested under the same law. The 1989 report of the ILO COE called on the Government to bring its legislation into conformance with Convention 87 by eliminating the existing broad restrictions on the right to strike.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The law provides for the workers' right to organize. Establishments employing 50 or more workers must allow them to organize a local committee. Collective bargaining is permitted in the private sector (including in export processing zones) but not in the public sector where most union members are employed. For the most part, private sector wages and benefits are higher than those in the public sector.

EGYPT

Trade union leaders note that there is a distinction between the unions' function in negotiating with the public sector and the private sector. Public sector wages and benefits are set by law at the national level. Trade unionists point to the constitutional provision that half the members of the People's Assembly must be workers and farmers and claim that the struggle to protect workers' interests in the public sector takes place in the legislature. ETUF also says that it holds regular private discussions with senior government officials, in which the Federation promotes the interests of the workers. The 1989 report of the ILO COE again cited provisions of the Labor Code directing labor and management to conform to national economic interests as being at odds with the provisions of Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Constitution prohibits forced labor. There are no reports of forced or compulsory labor.

d. Minimum Age of Employment for Children

The minimum age for employment is 12 years (which is also the age at which a child has completed compulsory education). The law permits children between the ages of 12 and 16 to work up to 6 hours a day with 1 hour of rest but prohibits them from working after 10 p.m. or from engaging in certain forms of dangerous or heavy labor, such as mining. There is considerable evidence, however, that underage children continue to perform full-time jobs, particularly in rural areas. Growing numbers of urban children are also working as families are forced by economic necessity to increase their sources of income. Newspaper articles in both the progovernment and opposition press have charged that several million children may be working full-time in violation of the labor law. Informal private sector workshops and cottage industries appear to be the main urban users of child labor. Representatives of both government and labor argue that such unregulated industries cannot be supervised. It is also the case, however, that larger private textile factories also employ large numbers of young girls, who may work up to 12-hour shifts. No consistent attempt is made to enforce the law regarding child labor.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Employers are required by law to provide acceptable terms and conditions of employment for their workers. Working conditions are discussed between union representatives and management in public sector companies. The minimum wage of approximately $10 a month is low but is part of a social contract which includes generous government subsidies of foodstuffs and other basic necessities. Within the local context, most workers are able to maintain a decent standard of living for themselves and their families. The minimum wage law is enforced where government labor inspectors have access, but there are enclaves of labor activity, especially in the rural areas, where government inspectors have no access. The regular workweek is fixed at 48 hours for factory workers. Many workers increase their incomes by working overtime or at second jobs.

Employers are legally required to meet worker safety and health norms, which are modeled on the ILO's suggested standards. There are special provisions for women workers, including generous maternity leave. Employers who violate wage, hour, and safety and health provisions face civil and criminal penalties. Labor inspectors enforce these provisions with varying degrees of success. Employers are seldom prosecuted, but reliable sources confirm that the courts occasionally impose fines on offending companies. The worst violators of the legal provisions on conditions of labor are small workshop owners in the informal sector whose operations are not subject to supervision or inspection.

INDIA

India, a secular republic, is the world's largest democracy. Its multiparty political structure is a composite of Indian political traditions and aspects of the British parliamentary system. Free elections are held regularly at national and state levels. National elections held the last week of November resulted in the replacement of the former Congress (I) Government with a minority National Front Government supported from outside by rightwing and leftwing parties. Prime Minister V.P. Singh's National Front holds 26 percent of seats in the Lok Sabha (lower house) against 36 percent held by former Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's Congress (I) party. The National Front holds 17 percent of the seats in the Rajya Sabha (upper house) against 56 percent held by Congress (I). Congress (I) still controls the legislatures of 14 of the 25 states and participates in the ruling coalition of 2 more. The National Front controls the legislatures of 4 states. State Assembly elections in 10 states are due in early 1990. By the end of 1989, "President's rule" (direct rule from New Delhi) was in force only in the state of Punjab.

The internal security apparatus includes both national and state-controlled paramilitary and police forces. While the 25 states have the primary role in maintaining law and order, the central Government has responsibility for protecting the fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution, both in law and practice. The Union Ministry for Home Affairs controls the nationwide Indian Police Force, the paramilitary forces, and the intelligence bureaus. The state governments control their own police forces, the provincial armed constabularies, and some specialized police forces. Over the past four decades since India's independence, control of law and order operations has moved increasingly under the Home Ministry. This tendency stems in part from the rapid growth of the intelligence bureaus, which function with little reference to the state governments, and in part from the increased use of paramilitary forces against armed radicals in disturbed areas. These forces are deployed in the northeast states, Punjab, and Kashmir.

In India's mixed economy, agriculture, nonfinancial services, consumer-goods manufacture, and some heavy industry are private. The states or the central Government own and run banking and insurance, air and rail transport, public utilities, and key heavy industries. Regulation of private economic activity is being relaxed, but resource and balance of payments constraints pose problems for rapid deregulation. India's 800 million population is growing at over 2 percent annually. According to a 1989 United Nations Children's Fund report, 40 percent of the urban population and 51 percent of the rural population live below the poverty level.

Positive human rights developments during the year included the release of most Golden Temple detainees from Jodhpur jail; the release of a number of prominent Sikh political figures who had been held in detention for several years without trial; the lifting of restrictions on travel by foreigners to Punjab; the peaceful holding of national elections in Punjab; and the initiation of negotiations between Bodo revolutionaries and the Government. At year's end, the new Government initiated several positive human rights measures that demonstrated a willingness to seek a negotiated solution to the Punjab crisis. India is a basically democratic polity with strong and legally sanctioned safeguards for individuals, a vigorous free press, and action-oriented voluntary organizations. Nonetheless, significant human rights abuses, many of them generated by severe social tensions (including casteism and often violent ethnic, sectarian, linguistic, or tribal communal politics), remained. The severity of human rights problems varied considerably from state to state. Problem areas included: extrajudicial "encounter" killings by the police (see Section 1.a.), particularly in Punjab and Andhra Pradesh; incommunicado detention for prolonged periods without charge under antiterrorist laws; torture and deaths of suspects in police custody; lack of prosecution of police accused of abusing and raping detainees; uneven implementation of laws affecting women's rights; the increase of "dowry deaths" (wife murder); the significant exploitation of indentured and child labor; separatist terrorism in Punjab and Kashmir; and unchecked intercaste and communal violence, notably in Bihar.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Government does not condone political killing, and stringent law and order policies were pursued, particularly in the states of Punjab and Kashmir and in the northeast, to curb political or communal violence. On the other hand, local political leaders in various parts of India were often involved openly in communal or caste-related violence that resulted in killings.

Law and order in the Indian system is primarily each state's responsibility. The willingness of authorities to institute judicial proceedings in cases of politically related violence and the evenhandedness of the police, however, vary from state to state. While the Government enhanced law and order measures in some areas in the face of violent radicals or communal tensions, human rights groups in India continued to attribute political and extrajudicial killings to the suppression of legal safeguards contained in security laws and the failure to institute criminal proceedings against police personnel accused of misdeeds. Critics have accused the police throughout India, particularly in the northeast, Andhra Pradesh, and Punjab, of staging fake "encounters" with terrorists to cover up deaths in detention and of wrongly attributing causes of deaths of persons in police custody. Such killings are so widespread that the Human Rights Watch and the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, in a report issued in 1989, characterized them as constituting a "pattern of extrajudicial killings." No security officials, as far as can be ascertained, were convicted of "encounter" killings or deaths in custody during 1989.

Punjab remained the most intractable of India's ethnic regional problems. While complete government statistics are unavailable, the press reported fewer deaths by separatist terrorists in Punjab in 1989 than the previous year; human rights observers, however, believe the figures may in fact be higher than the 1988 figures. Press statistics compiled from January to late September show 1,255 deaths by terrorist violence, 595 terrorists killed, and 1,584 arrested. In addition, 89 security force deaths were recorded. The Government reported that, in the 6 months ending June 1989, 564 persons had been killed as a result of terrorist violence,

INDIA

336 terrorists killed, and 1,593 arrested. Most central security forces in Punjab are non-Sikhs; the majority of state police are Sikhs, as are the militants. Most victims of the violence are unarmed Sikhs, although a number of Hindu civilians have also been caught in crossfire.

In the 6 weeks following the January 6 execution by hanging of Kehar Singh, convicted of conspiring to assassinate Indira Gandhi, 169 persons were killed in Punjab, including 12 persons hanged to death by terrorists, according to a government statement. Prominent politicians killed by terrorists in 1989 include Rajinder Kaur, the leading woman political figure in Punjab. In June terrorists shot and killed 19 members of a militant Hindu group who were meeting at a park in the Faridkot district. Two security personnel were killed in a subsequent bomb explosion at the site.

In Punjab, separating deaths caused by politically motivated terrorists from deaths as a result of common crime is difficult, because neither the press nor the Government makes a careful distinction between the two. Police at the local level have been accused by critics of subsuming common crime under terrorist crime to avoid or delay investigations of police actions. The Government publicly admitted that police officials in the most terrorist-prone districts have been heavyhanded.

The Government announced it was taking steps to prosecute those involved in the anti-Sikh riots centered in New Delhi that followed Mrs. Gandhi's assassination in October 1984, in which an estimated 3,000 persons died. Formal charges were filed against 2,300 persons in 225 cases. More than half of these cases remain before the courts. In the 11 cases decided, 80 persons were sentenced to prison, 6 for life. Critics charge, however, that the principal instigators of the riots are protected from prosecution by their high political office and that none of those arrested were major figures in the anti-Sikh rioting.

Political militancy in India's only Muslim majority state, Kashmir, rose markedly in 1989. In mid-1989, two major terrorist organizations, the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF) and the People's League, began killing moderate politicians, including three major political figures. In December the JKLF kidnaped the medical-student daughter of the new Home Minister and only released her when five jailed Kashmiri militants were released in exchange. Terrorists also stepped up use of bombs in public places. The militants' grievances had both political and economic roots. Augmented powers given to the police aimed at controlling the violence appeared instead to escalate it. In August paramilitary troops entered the Jama Masjid, Srinagar's largest mosque, after they were allegedly shot at by militants who fled into the mosque complex. According to journalists, four people were killed in the shooting that ensued. Press reports indicated that about 150 of those arrested remain in interrogation centers. On August 27 in Leh, Kashmir state, police opened fire on a crowd of rock-throwing Buddhists agitating against the state government's administration. Three local people were killed and two dozen wounded.

In the eastern state of Bihar, communal and intercaste killings continued, despite state deployment of paramilitary forces. In April in Hazaribagh, Bihar, at least 19 people were killed after a religious procession inflamed communal tensions. Press reports cited Bihar police complicity in attacks by Hindus on Muslims. On July 18, the government of Bihar rejected a demand for a judicial inquiry into the Hazaribagh riots.

In late October, processions of Hindu fundamentalist groups in Bhagalpur, Bihar, triggered communal violence that resulted in hundreds of casualties over the following days. Official figures give the death toll as 404, but press figures indicate over 1,000 bodies were found in Bhagalpur and 150 surrounding villages. For 3 days, until the Army took over, the violence continued while local, overwhelmingly Hindu police stood back. At nearby Chandeli village, nearly 100 Muslims believed to be under police protection disappeared overnight. Press sources report the villagers were murdered by criminal elements and their bodies thrown into a river. At least 25 bodies were found in the village well. In the wake of the killings, 35,000 persons were evacuated to relief camps. A citizens' group filed a writ petition in the Patna high court accusing the superintendent of Bhagalpur police of failing to use the police to protect the victims. The superintendent of police was transferred. The Chief Minister of Bihar announced on December 16 that two high court judges would run special courts to deal with the 500 criminal cases registered by victims of the Bhagalpur riots. In addition, a commission of inquiry has begun work to probe the killings.

Links between politicians, criminal gangs, and landlords prevail in rural areas of such states as Bihar, where "senas" (private armies) and local police are used to resist demands for social and economic reform. In central Bihar and in a few tribal areas, some "Naxalites" (a loosely applied term for several leftist militant groups) joined the electoral process through association with the Indian People's Front (IPF). This contributed to a lessening of violence. The IPF won one seat in the Lok Sabha in the November national elections. The Bihar police confront a difficult situation in which political violence and counterviolence are commonplace. Police personnel implicated in excesses are rarely identified or brought to justice.

In Assam, to the northeast, where ethnic and communal rivalries continued to fester, the United Tribal Nationalists Liberation Front (UTNLF) in September called for a judicial inquiry into the massacre of 29 tribal people at Borkajuh. The UTNLF claims the killings were planned by nontribal criminal elements in connivance with local police. The judicial inquiry was rejected, and the results of an official investigation were not released by year's end.

Throughout the year, violence broke out as nontribal Assamese encroached on Bodo tribal lands. The All Bodo Students' Union (ABSU), agitating for a separate state for the plains tribals of Assam, was accused of calculated killings of nontribals, including functionaries of the ruling Asom Gana Parishad. The ABSU denied involvement. Strong police countermeasures resulted in the killing of an unknown number of Bodo civilians, many of whom reportedly had nothing to do with the agitation. No charges have been lodged in the deaths.

Tripartite talks initiated on August 28 in New Delhi between the Indian Government, the ABSU, and the Assam government reached agreement on several issues. A panel was appointed to look into the grievances of the Bodos in Assam. The state began to release 1,500 detained Bodo militants (the ABSU claims 5,000 Bodo militants are in detention) and announced a policy of "minimum force" against the militants as a measure to normalize the situation. The militants have responded by suspending their agitation.

Politically motivated killings showed an upward trend in West Bengal. The Director General of West Bengal police is reported to have said that almost all major political parties are involved in the violence.

The largest riot in western India occurred in February in Bombay, Maharashtra, over Salman Rushdie's book "Satanic Verses." Though the Government had banned the book to avoid violence, young male Muslims took to the streets, destroying property. The police restored order at a cost of at least 12 dead and over 100 injured. The Chief Minister and media commended the police for preventing further violence.

In the southern state of Andhra Pradesh, police and Naxalites continued to engage in violence and counterviolence. The most militant of the Andhra Naxalites, the People's War Group (PWG), escalated its attacks on rural state government functionaries in 1989. In June it kidnaped and subsequently murdered a popular official of the ruling Telegu Desam Party (TDP) in retaliation for the detention and disappearance of two PWG members. At the same time, the Andhra Civil Liberties Committee, a private group, accused the police and the TDP of staging over 200 fake "encounters" with Naxalites to cover up deaths in police custody. In June the state government, in an effort to reduce violence, declared a virtual amnesty for Naxalites who surrendered to state authorities. Approximately 240 took advantage of the Government's offer, although the hard-core Naxalite strength remained intact.

In Madhya Pradesh in October, a procession of about 30,000 Muslims celebrating the birth of Mohammed turned violent, leaving more than 50 persons dead. The communal rioting in the city of Indore razed a portion of the Hindu commercial center and several nearby Muslim ghettos.

Indian law provides safeguards against disappearance by requiring an arrested person to be brought before a magistrate within 24 hours of arrest. These safeguards are not always applied in practice. In addition, they do not apply to persons arrested under national security laws. The right to judicial determination of the legality of the detention can be sought from the higher courts to redress unlawful detention but is often unavailable to the families of poor or uneducated victims. Reports of disappearance in Punjab and elsewhere remain difficult to investigate because access to independent observers is severely restricted. Amnesty International (AI) stated in a July 1989 report, "India: Some Recent Reports of Disappearances," which covered 1987-88, that disappearances in India are frequently not reported. The report noted that several dozen cases remain unresolved.

A May editorial in a national daily noted frequent reports in Punjab of young men being arbitrarily detained, interrogated under duress, and held incommunicado for weeks at a time without notification of relatives. The AI report on disappearances cited the case of Manjit Singh and Jatinder Pal Singh, arrested by plainclothesmen in Mohali, Punjab, in early

January and subsequently seen in detention at the end of the month by other detainees. Police informed relatives that the two were not in police custody; persistent attempts to establish their whereabouts have yielded no information to date.

In January 1989, the U.N. Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearance recorded it had informed the Indian Government of 33 cases of disappearance, many of which concerned the May 1987 events in Meerut, Uttar Pradesh, in which 80 unarmed men, women, and children were killed. The state paid compensation to the families of 13 of the victims of the killings, but officials continue to deny that the Provincial Armed Constabulary was responsible for the deaths and refused to publish the findings of the official inquiry into the deaths and disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel treatment or punishment are prohibited by law in India. Confessions or information extracted by force cannot, by law, be admitted in court. Significantly, however, under Section 15 of the Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act (TADA) of 1987, a confession made to a police officer is admissible in evidence, provided the police have "reason to believe that it is being made voluntarily." The frequent press accounts of police brutality in obtaining confessions from detainees under this law have fed widespread charges of police excesses.

The press and human rights groups continued in 1989 to document allegations of abuse of detainees by police in many Indian states. In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI referred to widespread reports of torture in India and noted that in a few cases the courts had granted compensation to torture victims. The Minister of Home Affairs reported March 9 that five persons had died in police custody in Delhi in the previous year. He said that in at least one case police officials, including the station house officer, were found responsible for causing injuries that resulted in the detainee's death. The case was pending trial in the court at year's end. He also stated 13 cases of beatings of detainees by police personnel in Delhi had been reported during the current year. In one case, a policeman was transferred to a nonsensitive post, and, in another, three policemen were placed under suspension.

The Association for the Protection of Democratic Rights reported a number of lockup deaths in the state of West Bengal (19 in 1988). In Bihar, there were 50 such deaths in the past 4 years. Since the majority of those allegedly killed belonged to poor or socially backward sections of society, without political affiliation, their deaths did not raise a public furor. Following the death in Hasnabad jail on June 3 of an active Communist Party member under indictment, the officer-in-charge of the Hasnabad police station was arrested on charges of murder, then released on bail. By year's end, he had not yet been brought to trial.

In the northeast, the police and paramilitary have been accused of torturing suspected radicals in Assam. Under the Armed Forces (Special Powers) Act in force in the northeast, security personnel are not held accountable under civil law for their acts. In the state of Manipur, AI expressed concern over continuing police intimidation and torture of witnesses and a lawyer now involved in court hearings. The court is examining evidence about earlier allegations of torture and reprisal killings by members of the paramilitary Assam Rifles, who deny all allegations.

Scheduled castes and tribes (the lowest levels of Indian society, listed on "schedules" to receive special protections and safeguards under the Indian Constitution) are particularly vulnerable to police violence. A report in July by the People's Union for Civil Liberties estimated that approximately 90 villages in Bastar, Madhya Pradesh, were raided from 1985 to May 1989 by armed police. The report states the tribal possessions were looted, villagers killed, and over 250 persons detained. There have been numerous allegations of the mass rape of female members of the scheduled castes and tribes by the police. An officer accused of such actions is rarely tried but more commonly is suspended temporarily or reassigned to another post. In May the All Bodo Students' Association claimed that about 100 tribal women, including teenage girls, were gang-raped by Assam police. The Bodo People's Action Committee submitted a complaint to the governor, but there was no official inquiry and no arrests.

Press reports about prison conditions include charges of sexual abuse of prisoners and the use of prisoners by prison officials for domestic labor. At least 20,000 children and youngsters under 18 years old are reported to be in jail, comprising nearly one-eighth of the prison population. Although Parliament passed the Children's Law in 1960 to safeguard young prisoners against abuse and exploitation, most states have not followed suit with their own laws to implement it; consequently, nearly 40 percent of the 390 districts in India are without a children's law. The Supreme Court has criticized the states for not providing separate facilities for children in jails and for not constructing reformatory institutions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires that an arrested person be informed of the grounds for arrest, given the right to be represented by counsel, and produced before a magistrate within 24 hours of arrest. At this initial appearance, the accused must either be remanded for further investigation or released. These provisions have been upheld by the Supreme Court and are generally respected.

Despite such legal safeguards, there were continuing reports in 1989 of arbitrary arrest or detention. A well-known human rights activist, Dr. K. Balagopal, General Secretary of the Andhra Pradesh Civil Liberties Committees (APCLC), was abducted in August by plainclothesmen, reportedly as a hostage for two policemen held by the People's War Group. Indian press reports commented that his arrest was prompted by the prominent role he played in the APCLC exposure of police excesses. Dr. Balagopal was released several days later, following a public outcry. He stated he had been held by the Special Task police forces but was not brought before a magistrate or charged.

The Constitution permits the enactment of preventive detention laws in the event of threats to public welfare and national security. Such laws provide for limits on the length of detention (up to 2 years) and for judicial review of such detention. Several laws of this type remain in effect.

The National Security Act (NSA) permits detention of security risks; police anywhere in India can charge suspects under NSA provisions. For a detainee to be released under this law, a court must determine that all grounds for detention are invalid. Under the NSA's strong special and preventive detention provisions, a person may be detained for up to one year without charge or trial (2 years in Punjab) on loosely defined security grounds, but must be brought before a Defense Ministry advisory board within 7 days of arrest; at this time the detainee may be released on the basis of "insufficient grounds." No official figures were available on the number of people in detention under NSA provisions in 1989. Human rights groups claim that no accurate record is kept of the many people held without charges, so they have no way of making accurate estimates of the numbers of persons in detention. A large number of detainees were, however, released in 1989.

The TADA, though enacted to fight terrorism in Punjab, is applicable throughout India. Fourteen state governments currently have invoked the TADA. In designated areas, incommunicado detention is permitted pursuant to the TADA. The Act permits maximum detention of 2 years but also provides the right of review and access to legal counsel. The Home Minister announced that between the Act's institution in 1987 and March 1989, 7,969 persons had been arrested under the TADA in Punjab. Following application of the TADA to Gujarat in 1987, 4,491 people were arrested under the Act through June 1989. As with the NSA, accurate estimates for all detentions under the TADA are not available.

In early March, the Prime Minister proposed a special package of measures to help normalize the political situation in nine districts of Punjab. The package included the release of the 187 remaining detainees held in Jodhpur jail since 1984 on charges of waging war against the State. Seventy-eight were subsequently rearrested on criminal charges; 4 remained in jail at the end of 1989. In addition, the Government announced the withdrawal with respect to the nondisturbed areas of Punjab of the special detention provisions of the National Security Act and the removal of restrictions on travel by foreigners to the region. Before leaving office, Gandhi ordered all charges to be dropped against S.S. Mann and three others accused of conspiracy in the assassination of former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. (Mann had spent 5 years in detention awaiting legal action on earlier charges of subversive activities.) At the same time, former Punjab Chief Minister P.S. Badal and the president of a major Sikh political-religious organization, G.S. Tohra, were also released after several years in detention. In one of his first acts after taking office, Prime Minister V.P. Singh paid an informal visit to the Sikh Golden Temple in Amritsar along with senior members of his Cabinet to indicate that resolving Punjab tensions is a high priority for the new Government. He followed up with an all-party meeting of leaders across the political spectrum aimed at shaping a national consensus for a political solution to the Punjab situation.

The Lok Sabha of the Parliament voted on December 28 to repeal the controversial 59th Amendment to the Constitution. The opposition voted with the Government, and Raja Sabha approval is likely to follow quickly. The amendment had annulled the Constitution's guarantees of the right to life and liberty during an emergency and permitted President's rule in any state for up to 3 years without prior parliamentary approval. Exile is not practiced as a punishment in India.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Indian Criminal Procedure Code provides for open trial in most cases but allows the judiciary, under certain circumstances, to hold closed proceedings. Such circumstances include proceedings involving official secrets, trials in which statements prejudicial to the safety of the State might be made, or trials under provisions of national security legislation such as the TADA. Sentences must, however, be announced in public.

India's legal procedures generally assure a fair trial, but the process can be drawn out and inaccessible to the poor. Defendants have the right to choose counsel from an Indian bar that is fully independent of the Government. The Indian bar has a record of vigorously protesting infringements of human rights. Effective appeal channels exist at all levels of the judicial system.

The judiciary is independent from the executive branch. Judges are selected by the Law Ministry following consultations with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Some aspects of personal law, such as marriage, divorce, succession, and child custody, are regulated by the traditional laws and practices of the Hindu, Muslim, Parsi (Zoroastrian), Christian, and Jewish religions. The Government's declared policy is not to interfere in the personal laws, particularly of the minority communities, with the effect that discriminatory personal laws, often against women, are upheld.

The Terrorist Affected Areas (Special Courts) Act of Parliament (TAAA) permits the establishment of special courts sitting in camera and allows the identity of witnesses testifying before a special court to be kept secret. Under an unusual provision of the TAAA, a defendant charged with "waging war" carries the burden of proving his innocence. Civil rights groups charge that these special rules are contrary to the presumption of innocence customary in Indian law.

In 1989 the judicial authorities in Punjab failed to bring to trial a number of alleged terrorists who had been charged, as well as some police offenders. As justification for continued detention, Government officials claim they are unable to find witnesses to testify against terrorists.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under Indian law, warrants are normally required for searches and seizures. In a criminal investigation, police may conduct searches without a warrant if obtaining a warrant would cause undue delay, but they must justify such searches in writing. Under the Disturbed Areas legislation, the authorities continue to have special powers in Punjab to search and arrest without a warrant and to shoot to kill under certain circumstances. They have also been granted a significant expansion of telephone surveillance powers.

Surveillance of communications, including tapping of telephones and intercepting personal mail without judicial warrant, is authorized under the Indian Telegraph Act "on the occurrence of any public emergency or in the interest of the public safety or tranquillity." These powers have been used by every state government, generally in a low-key manner and specifically, rather than generally, targeted. The Postal (Amendment) Bill, passed by Parliament but never signed into law, empowers the Government to censor mail in certain circumstances, such as in a public emergency. At year's end, the new Government promised to withdraw the Postal Bill.

Section 2. Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Free speech and expression are protected by the Constitution, and newspapers vigorously reflect a variety of public, social, and economic beliefs. The Government controls the allocation of newsprint and the placement of Government and public sector advertisements, however, and has been accused of using these means to exert influence over the press. National television and radio, which are government monopolies, are frequently accused of manipulating the news to the benefit of the Government. At year's end, the Government announced it will introduce legislation to give statutory autonomy to radio and television.

Under the Official Secrets Act, the Government can restrict publication of the most sensitive security stories. Several major national publications regularly publish investigative reports and allegations of government wrongdoing, and the press as a whole champions human rights causes and criticizes perceived government lapses. At year's end, the Government said it will amend the Official Secrets Act to give people greater access to information.

An event widely perceived as threatening press freedom was the Kashmir government's effort in August to enact the "Special Powers (Press) Bill, 1989." Concerned about growing violence and press coverage of terrorists, the state government claimed that the bill was necessary to prevent the press from publishing secessionist writing in the state. The bill would give power to the state assembly "to regulate and control printing and publication of certain materials in the interest of public order and the security of the State," with penalties of up to 1 year in prison and stiff fines. The bill was passed by the State Assembly in August, but action by the second house, the State Legislative Council, was deferred following strong public criticism. The proposal was referred ultimately to the Press Council for its recommendations. In October the state government withdrew the bill, accepting the Council's view that the government had sufficient powers to deal with cases of objectionable writing.

Journalists in Bihar have had a running feud with the local police, whose misdeeds they attempted to bring into the open. In July the Dhanbad police allegedly beat up members of the press after charging them with offenses ranging up to "attempted murder." The journalists were produced handcuffed in court, and those sent for medical treatment were shackled to their hospital beds. All were subsequently released by order of the Bihar Chief Minister. A 2-day bandh (strike) organized in August in protest succeeded in focusing public attention on police ill-treatment of the journalists.

In Punjab there have been occasional reports of journalists being harassed and intimidated by terrorists, local leaders, and special interest groups. Several vendors of the Hind Samachar group of publications were killed by terrorists who objected to the group's editorial policies which condemned extremism.

Films are reviewed by the film censorship board before being licensed for distribution. The board deletes material deemed offensive to either public morals or religious or communal sentiment.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution protects the right of peaceful assembly and the right to form associations. These rights are respected. Government authorities sometimes require permits and notification prior to permitting parades and demonstrations. At times of civil tension, local governments can ban public assemblies and impose a curfew. Ordinarily, local governments respect the right to protest peacefully, including such traditional Indian forms of protest as "gherao," in which an official or his office is surrounded by protesters who allow no movement, and sitdowns blocking public thoroughfare.

In Sukinda Valley, Orissa, mine workers of the largest chrome ore deposit in Asia have alleged police harassment of their peaceful protests against mechanization. AI has expressed concern with regard to the situation of those workers.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

India remains a religious mixing bowl, with all faiths enjoying freedom of worship. Government policy does not favor any religious group. Nevertheless, communal tensions over religious differences continue to be a social problem and pose challenges to the secular nature of the Indian polity. For example, the Bombay-based Shiv Sena has made militant Hinduism its only political plank.

There is no bar to proselytizing by Indian Christians, but the Government limits the number of foreign missionaries and laws in some states discourage them from openly proselytizing. In Bihar, confrontations have persisted between Christian missionaries and Hindu fundamentalists. Indian religious organizations may maintain communications with coreligionists abroad. Financial contributions from abroad are subject to scrutiny and licensing by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Despite laws in various states removing obstructions to the exercise of religious freedom, Harijans (the lowest, formerly "untouchable," level of Indian society) are still prevented from entering Hindu temples in some areas.

The Religious Institutions (Prevention of Misuse) Ordinance makes it an offense to use any religious site for political purposes or the use of temples for harboring persons accused or convicted of any crime. While specifically designed to deal with Sikh places of worship in the Punjab, the ordinance technically applies to all religious sites. In general, the Government has been careful to avoid placing restrictions on Sikh religious practices or on the management of Sikh places of worship.

A full bench of the high court in Lucknow, Uttar Pradesh, has been called to decide five suits relating to the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid dispute, which centers on whether Hindus can build a temple on a sacred site where a Muslim mosque now stands. Court proceedings over who rightfully controls the disputed site were continuing at year's end. Prime Minister V.P. Singh placed a settlement, either judicial or negotiated, as one of his Government's highest priorities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Indian citizens enjoy full freedom of movement within the country, except in certain border areas where, for security reasons, special permits are required. Foreign travel and emigration are without political restrictions. Millions of people of Indian origin live abroad. Foreigners (including diplomats) must obtain special permission to visit Assam and other sensitive border areas. In March Prime Minister Gandhi reopened Punjab to foreigners in general. (It had previously been open to accredited foreign journalists.)

India admitted millions of refugees and displaced persons at the time of partition in 1947 and granted them citizenship, integrating them fully into Indian society. Subsequent migration to India has largely been the result of upheavals in nearby countries, and some of the refugees in these migrations have not been granted citizenship or fully integrated. In some cases, both the refugees and their hosts consider their stay temporary, although it may be for a long time.

The most recent migrations have been of Chakmas and other tribals and nontribals from Bangladesh (estimated at about 70,000 by the Government) into the northeastern states, especially Tripura, and Tamils from Sri Lanka into Tamil Nadu. Chakmas who have been offered the opportunity to return to Bangladesh have generally chosen not to do so, despite reports of scarce resources in the camps located in Tripura. Elsewhere in the northeast, the Assam state government is committed to identifying "foreigners" who have entered that state from neighboring Bangladesh with a view towards repatriating them, though to date it has forced few to leave.

Tamils from Sri Lanka in Tamil Nadu are provided shelter and subsistence by the Government. The 1987 accord between India and Sri Lanka, aimed at settling the Sri Lankan ethnic conflict, calls for repatriation of these refugees. Under the repatriation scheme, some 40,000 refugees were returned to Sri Lanka by 1989; another 12,000 are estimated to have returned on their own. Over 80,000 are still in India, however, according to the Minister of State for Home Affairs. There are reports of a renewed flight of some Tamils to India now that agreement has been reached for a staged total withdrawal of the Indian Peacekeeping Force (IPKF) from northeast Sri Lanka. These Tamils fear that disorder will follow the departure of the IPKF.

Several thousand Afghans have entered India since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979. Many have been resettled elsewhere, outside India. In 1989 the refugee population more than doubled when fears of war in Kabul impelled Afghans to leave for India after the Soviet withdrawal. About 5,000 currently are being protected and assisted by the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

In addition, nearly 2,000 Iranian refugees are under the UNHCR's protection. Many were studying in India when the Iranian revolution came in 1979, but most had either arrived from Iran on tourist visas or fled on fraudulent documents to join Zoroastrian, Baha'i, or Christian communities in India. Although India is not a signatory to the U.N. Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, the Government allows the UNHCR to operate normally, grants the refugees renewable residence permits, and otherwise behaves as a signatory.

India continues to provide humanitarian assistance and protection to the large Tibetan refugee communities in Himachal Pradesh, Karnataka, and elsewhere in India, whose members number in excess of 90,000.

There are reports that the Government, after initially offering sanctuary to Burmese students fleeing the political turmoil in Burma in 1988, may have subsequently deported some of the refugees. Many have returned voluntarily, but the border is porous and access to the border area is restricted, making it difficult for observers to assess the present situation.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

India is governed under a complicated but democratic parliamentary system. The Constitution provides for full adult suffrage; the voting age was lowered from 21 to 18 in 1989. Elections are held regularly, involving multiple parties. A parliament can be constituted for not more than 5 years, except under constitutionally defined emergency situations.

On the advice of the Prime Minister, the President can declare President's rule, or a state of emergency, in any state in the event of war, external oppression, internal disruption, or collapse of the constitutional machinery in the state. Under President's rule, the central Government, through the Parliament and the President, directly administers the state by replacing the elected state government with an appointed governor. President's rule is for 6 months and must give way to new elections, unless it is extended by Parliament for an additional 6 months. In 1989 Tamil Nadu, Mizoram, and Nagaland held state elections and are no longer under central control. In August the Government declared President's rule in Karnataka, where the ruling opposition party lost a significant part of its support in the state assembly; central control ended following state elections held in November.

The central Government, while tolerant of dissent within India, is sensitive to international allegations of human rights violations. India's ambassador to the United States stated in May that, "as a sovereign and democratic nation, India cannot permit investigations by foreign governments or organizations into any aspect of her domestic affairs." Despite the reopening of Punjab to foreigners, AI representatives continue to be denied permission to investigate human rights problems there. In September India invited a U.S. congressional delegation to visit Punjab for first-hand information on human rights.

In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI said that it had informed the U.N. Special Rapporteur on Torture and Special Rapporteur on Summary and Arbitrary Executions of its concerns regarding India and that its reports were also submitted to the Indian Government but that it had not replied. The Indian Government stated in March that it was examining AI's report on human rights violations in Bihar; various incidents of alleged human rights violations were being investigated, and appropriate action has been taken by the law enforcement agencies, according to the Government spokesman. Also in March, then Minister of State for External Affairs Natwar Singh reacted publicly to the State Department's 1988 Human Rights Report on India to the U.S. Congress, stating that the Government does not accept the veracity of all the Report's findings.

Independent Indian human rights organizations are active and vocal. They include Citizens for Democracy, the People's Union for Civil Liberties, the People's Union for Democratic Rights, and the Indian People's Human Rights Commission, all of which send out teams to study specific allegations of human rights abuses and publish reports on their findings.

India is a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission. It will host the World Congress on Human Rights in April 1990, the first time the conference will be held in Asia.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Several provisions in the Constitution promise equality before the law and prohibit discrimination on the basis of gender. Legally sanctioned gender discrimination is manifested, however, in various family, marriage, and inheritance laws. In recent years, several changes have been made in personal, criminal, and labor laws governing women, including the Dowry Prohibition Act, the Equal Remuneration Act, the Prevention of Immoral Traffic Act, and the Sati (Prevention) Act. Deeply rooted traditions, often tied to religious or social practice, mean, however, that these laws are unevenly enforced (more enforced in urban areas, less in the countryside). An estimated 80 percent of India's women for whom these laws are designed live and work in the rural areas. According to a government-sponsored report by the National Commission on Self-employed Women ("Shramshakti"), most rural women are employed as agricultural labor in the unorganized sector, where they are vulnerable to exploitation. Traditional practices relating to asset and land ownership give women little control over land use, retention, or sale. The Hindu Succession Act provides equal inheritance rights for Hindu women, although in practice married daughters are not always given a share in parental property. Inheritance rights for Muslim women are regulated by traditional Islamic law, which provide less than what a male heir would receive; in practice, women seldom get even that portion. Under the tribal land system, notably in Bihar, tribal women do not have the right to own land; the practice of putting women to death there as "witches" is closely linked to the denial of property rights.

INDIA

Female bondage, forced prostitution, child marriage, and relative neglect of female children still remain common in parts of Indian society.

The Government has under consideration a draft National Perspectives Plan for Women whose main objectives would be to remove gender bias in the law. Among other proposals, it suggests more emphasis on the training of women and includes recommendations on matrimonial property issues.

Women's rights groups point out that the burden of providing an adequate dowry for girls is a factor in making female births less desirable to the parents. There is some evidence that female infanticide may be practiced in some sectors of the society. Health care and nutrition for female infants tends to be of a lower priority than for boys. The marked disparity between the lower mortality rates of male versus female infants in the 0-5 age group has resulted in the unusually low ratio in the Indian population of 933 females per 1,000 males (the ratio varies considerably among the states).

An Indian government study shows that violence against women, including molestation, rape, kidnaping, and wife murder, has followed an upward trend in the past decade. This may be due, in part, to growing consciousness by women of their legal rights so that more report crime. The claim that dowry deaths (usually by burning) of young married women result from their inability to meet their husbands' families' property demands has been challenged by women's rights groups, who state that insufficient dowry is often used as an excuse for societally condoned violence against married women. Dowry crimes are a complex issue involving attitudes of parents to daughters, the social and economic status of women, defects in the law, and the failure of police to implement existing law. Figures given in the lower house of Parliament in July 1989 indicate that between 1986 and 1988, registered cases of dowry deaths nearly doubled, from 1,319 to 2,152, despite the strengthening of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The actual total may be substantially higher as much domestic violence goes unreported or is not registered by the police, according to women's groups. By law, every unnatural death of a woman which occurs in the first 7 years of marriage must be investigated by the police and a magistrate. However, a member of the Indian police on the Union Public Service Commission stated in March that about 95 percent of registered cases of dowry death end in acquittal as corrupt police and medical officers tamper with crucial evidence.

The "Shamshakti" report notes that 94 percent of Indian women work in the unorganized sector, not controlled by labor laws. In spite of a statutory minimum wage fixed in each state, contractors set their own lower wage when employing women. This is so even though one-third of all households are supported solely by women, while in another third, they make 50 percent of the financial contribution. The report points out that even those women covered by labor laws are not adequately protected because the laws are unevenly enforced.

About 150 women's organizations in India are active in working for social justice and economic advancement of women and in linking women's problems to larger social concerns.

The Government has initiated programs to improve the lot of the lower-caste Hindus who make up 15 percent of the population and the tribal minorities who constitute a further 7 percent. The reservation system, whereby lower castes ("scheduled castes," "scheduled tribes," and "other backward communities") are offered preference in areas of employment and admission to educational institutions, attempts to strengthen the legal protection accorded to these underprivileged and often victimized groups. The system has met with limited success. The overall literacy rate among scheduled castes and tribes is 21 percent. The literacy rate among scheduled caste women is much lower; in some regions it is estimated at less than 2 percent.

In some cases, higher-caste communities have mobilized against policies of reserving jobs and other privileges for the disadvantaged, with violence sometimes resulting. Political controversy surrounds the question of whether lower castes, tribes, and classes should be given preference in education, employment, and housing when the program is perceived as threatening the economic position of higher-caste groups. In several states, the system of reservations for disadvantaged groups is manipulated for political gain by local party leaders; preference is sometimes given illegally to persons who are not disadvantaged.

The number of crimes reported against Harijans and tribals was recorded up to 1986 at an annual rate of 15,000 a year, although this figure is low, as most such crimes go unreported. The Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act, 1989, adds to the 1976 Civil Rights Protection Act by specifying a new range of offenses and by providing stiffer sanctions and special courts. The Act obligates all states to take actions to prevent atrocities and to restore the feeling of security among the scheduled groups. Such humiliating actions as forced feeding of obnoxious matter, public parading of unclothed victims, forcible eviction from abodes, and denial of access to public places now legally constitute atrocities punishable by a jail sentence of up to 5 years. Economic offenses such as bonded labor and dispossession of lands are also criminalized. Assault against women in the scheduled groups is an offense, as is use of force to affect voting behavior. Special courts are empowered to try cases under the new act.

Notwithstanding legal provisions for their welfare and protection, tribal people are frequently uprooted from forests to make way for various development projects, e.g., dam building, or following flooding, and are not provided with proper recovery assistance.

Minority religious groups continue to charge that they are victims of discrimination. Terrorist actions have increased violence and distrust between Hindu and Sikh communities in Punjab. Although they are treated equally under the law, Sikhs, particularly young males, continue to be subjected to more rigorous security precautions than others in certain circumstances.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Indian workers have the full constitutional right of association as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO). Indian workers are guaranteed the right to form and join unions of their own choosing, including in export processing zones. Trade unions have the legally protected right to strike. Unions represent less than 25 percent of the total of industrial workers. Most Indian workers (estimated at over 70 percent) are in the agricultural sector, traditionally unorganized, although recently trade unions have begun organizing efforts in that sector as well. Indian trade unions are independent of the Government. Most trade unions have some form of ties to a political party, national or local. Nevertheless, trade unions are usually adamant about preserving their formal independence from political parties, and in practice they have been known to differ from their respective political parties on labor-related issues. Major trade union organizations are affiliated with recognized international confederations, such as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Workers enjoy the right to strike in principle but, under the Essential Services Maintenance Act, the Government can ban strikes and require conciliation or arbitration in specified essential industries. Legal mechanisms exist for challenging the assertion that a given dispute falls within the scope of this act. The only major industrial strike in 1989 was conducted by the port and dock workers. According to provisional government figures, there were 750 strikes from January to September, accounting for 9.6 million man-days lost. Figures for the last 10 years show the number of strikes and lockouts have been declining.

The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) in early 1989 reported on allegations by a Communist trade union federation that management had incited police and thug repression of union members on Assam tea and plywood estates. Another case, brought by the same complainant, alleging violence against union members in Tripura, was considered by the CFA at its May-June session. The Government, which denied all the allegations, was urged to promote a climate free from violence, pressure, or threats against trade unionists.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to organize (including protection against antiunion discrimination) and to bargain collectively has existed in Indian law for decades. Trade unions carry out these activities independently and without government or, in general, employer attempts to interfere. Police and judicial authorities are generally quick to protect peaceful union activities. However, as noted in Section 2.b., mine workers in Sukinda Valley, Orissa, alleged harassment by the police of their peaceful protests against mechanization.

In addition to the availability of normal civil and criminal courts, a system of specialized labor courts exists to hear and adjudicate labor-related complaints. New legislation seeking to modernize and streamline the bargaining process and the internal organization of unions was introduced in the Parliament in 1988, but, pending consultations with trade union and employers' organizations, it has not been acted upon.

Collective bargaining is the normal means of reaching industrial relations agreements and settling disputes, and trade unions are usually vigorous in defending worker interests in this process. Where collective bargaining fails to establish locally equitable wage levels, the Government may set up tripartite boards, including trade union representation, to determine them. Export processing zones exist at several locations in India but are not particularly active at present. Physical access to such zones is ordinarily limited, including to union organizers. Unions do not appear to be active in the zones, but collective bargaining rights apply within them.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is prohibited by the Indian Constitution, and legislation passed in 1976 specifically bans the practice of "bonded labor." A Supreme Court decision has defined "forced labor" as work at less than the minimum wage (minimum wages are usually set by the states, not the central Government). Under this unique definition, "forced labor" is widespread throughout India, particularly in rural areas. "Bonded labor," although illegal (subject to imprisonment for up to 3 years) and actively opposed by the Government, also occurs in agriculture and construction. It is the result of a private, contractual relationship whereby a worker incurs or inherits debts to a contractor and then must work off the debt, plus extensive interest. Since most of these workers are illiterate, these bonds may continue indefinitely, especially if the contractor lends them subsequent small amounts "on account."

The Government estimates, based on reports from the states as of March 31, 1989, that there were 242,532 bonded workers in the country, of whom 218,272 had been "rehabilitated" by government authorities. The Gandhi Peace Foundation, however, estimates the number at 10 times the government figure. Private social organizations, such as the Council for Advancement of Peoples' Action and Rural Technology (CAPART) and Action for Welfare and Awakening in Rural Environments (AWARE), and some trade unions are active in identifying cases of bondage and pursuing them with relevant (usually state) officials. Even with better coordination and greatly increased resources to overcome the complicated jurisdictional division between the state governments and the central Government, the eradication of bonded labor is likely to be slow. ILO committees have also examined the issue of bonded labor and have requested the Government to continue its efforts to put its practices in conformity with ILO Convention 29 on Forced Labor, which India ratified in 1954.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

It has been estimated that one-quarter of the world's child labor is attributable to India, where poverty and the lack of compulsory education make it an especially serious problem. According to a Labor Ministry survey, 1 out of 4 Indian children between the ages of 5 and 15 is working. Government statistics put the total at 17.5 million in 1985. Other figures put it as high as 44 million.

In 1986 legislation was enacted banning the employment of children under 14 in hazardous occupations and regulating their employment in others, and in 1987 the Labor Ministry announced a crackdown in 10 of the most blatantly abused sectors. In 1988 the Parliament's Public Accounts Committee requested that the Government consult with outside experts to set up educational programs for child workers and to change parental attitudes, to carry out "exemplary punishment" of erring employers, and to harmonize the various existing legislative controls on the practice. In 1989 the Prime Minister proposed a special tax on employers of child labor.

INDIA

Five hundred new child welfare projects were inaugurated in 1989, including health and nutritional programs. A Small Child Labor Division within the Labor Ministry has been created. Nevertheless, progress has been slow. Some employers of child labor have been openly defiant about continuation of the practice and resisted attempts by the Labor Ministry at enforcement. As in the case of bonded labor, the central Government often points to the division of jurisdiction between the state governments and the central Government in dealing with the practice, and urges private organizations (including trade unions) to do more. Although almost all child labor abuses occur in sectors outside the traditional reach of labor organizations, trade unions have recently become more active in this field, often concentrating on "consciousness-raising" among women workers who work alongside their children. Despite all these efforts, enforcement of existing law appears inadequate to cope with the dimensions of the problem. The 1989 central government budget allowed only $2 million for all child welfare programs.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

While the basic minimum wage, and its enforcement, varies according to the state and sector of industry, most "organized" workers receive much more than the minimum wage, especially when legislatively mandated bonuses and other benefits are included. The prescribed minimum wage in the unorganized sector for Delhi is about $50 per month for unskilled workers. Daily wage rates for construction workers range from $1.74 for unskilled workers to $2.34 for skilled workers. The minimum wage, without bonuses or benefits, is considered adequate only for the most minimal standard of living.

The Factories Act establishes an 8-hour workday, a 48-hour workweek, and various standards for working conditions. These standards are generally enforced and accepted (indeed, improved upon by various enlightened employers and aggressive unions) in the modern industrial sectors but are less often observed in older, smaller, and less economically robust industries.

Occupational safety and health measures also vary widely, although this is an area in which both Government and trade unions have become more active. Governmental resources devoted to inspection and enforcement of standards are generally recognized to be inadequate. Several international organizations and foreign government agencies, including the U.S. Agency for International Development, are working with the Government of India on various occupational safety and health projects.

IRAN*

Iran is an Islamic Republic under the leadership of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who succeeded Grand Ayatollah Khomeini after Khomeini's death in June. The formal system of government, based on a Constitution approved in 1980 by popular referendum and revised in July 1989, features a parliament and a president elected from among multiple candidates by universal suffrage. However, all candidates must meet highly restrictive religious and political criteria imposed by the Council of Guardians, and as a result the choice offered to voters is narrow. The Government is dominated by a political elite composed of Shi'a Muslim clerics and of laymen allied with these clerics which attempts to impose its views on political and socioreligious orthodoxy. However, there are significant factional differences on important economic and political issues, such as private property ownership and relations with the West.

The Government's hold on power is reinforced through arrests, summary trials and executions, and other forms of intimidation implemented by an extensive internal security system. Political arrests are made by the Revolutionary Guards or, less commonly, by revolutionary committees (komitehs), local neighborhood groups which once were quasi-official but which have now been subsumed under the Ministry of Interior. In practice, these groups retain a certain amount of autonomy, particularly in the provinces, and the central Government is sometimes unable to control their activities fully.

The disruptions of the revolution, the devastation of the Iran-Iraq war, and government mismanagement have caused serious economic deterioration in Iran. Inflation is probably above 50 percent, while unemployment is about 40 percent of the work force. Many industries are operating at less than half capacity. Corruption and black market activities are rife. The Government has not yet made many key decisions regarding reconstruction strategy and economic development; these include the nature and level of foreign participation in reconstruction, the role of the private sector, and government versus private control of foreign trade.

Iran continued in 1989 to be a major violator of human rights. Abuses included summary executions of political opponents; widespread torture; repression of the freedoms of speech, press, assembly and association; arbitrary detentions; lack of fair trials; continuing repression of the Baha'i religious community; denial of the right of citizens to change their government; and severe restrictions on women's and worker rights. In his inaugural speech in July, President Rafsanjani pledged that the Government would respect the "freedom and dignity of individuals." Although the Government implemented a series of steps to regularize judicial procedures and bring the security forces under closer supervision, by year's end it was not apparent that the pattern of abuses noted above had been significantly altered.

Both Amnesty International (AI), in its 1989 Report covering 1988, and the U.N.'s Special Rapporteur for Iran, Reynaldo Galindo Pohl, cited instances of torture, execution after

*Because of the absence of a United States Mission in Iran, this report draws heavily on unofficial sources.

IRAN

summary proceedings, and the holding of political prisoners as among continuing human rights abuses in Iran. According to Galindo Pohl, the Government of Iran acknowledged the large-scale executions which took place during the last several months of 1988. He concluded that "acts are being committed in Iran that are incompatible with international human rights instruments that are binding on the Iranian Government."

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The total number of people killed for political reasons in 1989 is unknown. Given the lack of basic procedural safeguards in political trials, most of the executions ordered each year in such cases amount to summary executions. Moreover, the Government often cloaks political charges with accusations of criminal activity, e.g., narcotics trafficking.

A rash of political executions which began in the late summer of 1988--and claimed between several hundred and several thousand lives--subsided in early 1989. Under a new antidrug law announced in late 1988, the Government executed hundreds of accused drug traffickers throughout the year, a number of whom, according to a variety of sources, were actually political detainees.

In August AI reported that 851 persons had been executed for alleged drug-related offenses, out of a total of over 1,200 executions during the year for criminal offenses. Many of those killed were hanged en masse in cities around the country, some from construction cranes.

In its 1989 Report, AI also charged that secret executions of political prisoners was common.

The Government has sought to reduce the time between commission of a capital crime and the execution of the accused to a period of 10 days. In a February statement, the country's highest judicial authority stated that the new directives were being followed and prisoners were being executed within a very few days.

b. Disappearance

The number of disappearances in 1989 is unknown.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Accounts of torture in Iran's prisons continued to be received in 1989 and included a wide range of inhuman practices. According to various human rights groups and eyewitness accounts, floggings, mock executions, and suspension from the ceiling are common methods of torture, as are threats of sexual abuse of female prisoners and female relatives of male prisoners. AI reports that relatives of political suspects have been imprisoned to pressure the suspects to give themselves up. Guards have threatened to torture family members of detainees, and relatives or other prisoners have occasionally been forced to watch torture. A number of prisoners, including young children, have been raped by Revolutionary Guards. According to the United Nations Special Rapporteur, one eyewitness reported the torture of women prisoners immediately after giving birth.

Beatings of all kinds, both by single guards and by several guards at once, are common. Allegedly, prisoners are flogged on the soles of their feet until they can no longer walk. Brutal common criminals have reportedly been introduced among political prisoners and incited to torture and rape the other prisoners.

The U.N. Special Rapporteur, in a report issued in 1988, noted that torture in Iranian prisons has become more sophisticated. Steps allegedly have been taken to eliminate traces of physical torture, including the use of new types of cables to beat prisoners, and the physical separation of tortured prisoners from other inmates until all marks of abuse have disappeared. A machine is reportedly used to perforate the soles of feet after they have been flogged to reduce the swelling.

Prisoner protests against the inhuman conditions in Iranian prisons have reportedly been met with beatings, denial of medical care, and, in some cases, execution.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests for expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government were known to occur in the past, but it is not known how many may have occurred in 1989.

In the past, some persons have been arrested on trumped-up criminal charges when their actual "offenses" were political. Individuals were taken into custody on vague charges such as "corruption on earth" or "crimes against God." The lack of fair trials and other procedural safeguards encourage such practices.

No judicial determination of the legality of detention exists in Iranian law. There is reportedly no legal time limit on incommunicado detention. Suspects are held for questioning at local Revolutionary Guard offices or in jails.

There have been reports that children often have been taken into custody with their mothers. Some women have been imprisoned solely because they have associated with men who are political suspects.

In February the Government announced an amnesty for imprisoned members of banned opposition organizations that applied to 2,600 persons out of a total of 3,500 the Government admitted had been imprisoned for political activities. According to the Government, the amnesty did not apply to those who committed serious crimes in the course of these activities. The Government claimed that all 2,600 were released but there was no independent confirmation, and opposition elements have claimed that few of those supposedly amnestied have returned home. In October the Chief of the Judicial Branch announced another amnesty and a reduction in the sentences of those who were convicted by "public, military, and Islamic revolutionary courts." The program, which was made subject to numerous conditions, has not been fully implemented, and no figures are available on the number released.

IRAN

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are essentially two different court systems. The civilian courts deal with criminal offenses, and the revolutionary courts, established in 1979, try "political" offenses.

No trial by a revolutionary court can be called fair or public in the usual sense. If the trial is staged publicly, it is generally because the prisoner has already been forced to confess to a crime. Individuals tried for political offenses enjoy virtually no procedural or substantive safeguards.

The U.N. Special Rapporteur noted in a special report in 1989 that reports continued to be received about the lack of many basic procedural guarantees. Defendants reportedly did not have access to a defense lawyer, were unable to call witnesses on their behalf, and were unable to appeal. Some persons have been blindfolded during their trial. AI has reported that many convictions are based on confessions extracted under torture during incommunicado pretrial detention. Some individuals have been imprisoned beyond the limit of their sentence, and even executed after the formal expiration of their prison term.

Restraints on arbitrary actions of the revolutionary courts were reportedly severely weakened in 1985 by a government decision to limit the review authority of the Supreme Court. The judicial system is further weakened by the fact that revolutionary courts can consider cases formally under the jurisdiction of the civil and criminal courts. Assignment of cases to regular rather than revolutionary courts is haphazard and apparently occurs mainly when arrests are made by regular police. Revolutionary courts can also overturn the decisions of civilian courts.

For common criminal offenses, many elements of the prerevolutionary judicial system survive, and the accused often have the right to a public trial with benefit of lawyers of their own choosing, assuming they can afford the fee. Even this judiciary is not fully independent, however. Many of the former judges were retired after the revolution, and new judges selected. One criterion for new judges is grounding in Islamic law, and political acceptability is a requirement for any government position. Favorable verdicts reportedly can often be "purchased" from the judges serving on civil and criminal courts and to a lesser degree from judges of the revolutionary courts.

No reliable estimate is available on the number of political prisoners. In its 1989 Report, AI, noting that 1,200 political prisoners had been executed, estimated that "thousands of others" remained in prison.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government rejects the Western distinction between a public sphere which the state may control and a sphere of private life (religion, culture, thought, and private behavior) which the State may not properly control.

IRAN

Authorities still enter homes, tap phones, and open mail, but these activities seem to occur less frequently now than in previous years.

Special Revolutionary Guard units and neighborhood komitehs check on social activities. Women whose clothing does not completely cover the hair and all of the body except hands and face, or who wear makeup, are technically subject to arrest. In the past, men have also been required to dress "modestly," eschewing, for example, short-sleeved shirts. In 1989 the social climate reportedly became somewhat more tolerant after the death of Khomeini; the komitehs were said to be much less in evidence on the streets. As the year ended, however, there were some reports that the momentum seemed to have changed, and there was closer application of Islamic standards of dress and conduct.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution states that "publications and the press may express ideas freely, except when they are contrary to Islamic principles, or are detrimental to public rights." In practice, most publications are controlled by the Government; independent publishers run the risk not only of press shutdowns and confiscation of publications and equipment but of arrest and summary punishment if they are overly critical of the Government.

All books must be submitted to the Ministry of Islamic Guidance for censorship before they can be published. Publishers, authors, and printers also engage in substantial self-censorship before submitting books to the Ministry in an effort to avoid the substantial penalties, including economic losses, incurred when books are rejected.

Newspapers, which are usually associated with various government factions, reflect a variety of viewpoints. Officials and government policies are often subjected to public criticism, but newspapers are forbidden to criticize the concept of the Islamic republic, or to promote ethnic minority rights. Nevertheless, some independent publishers out of favor with the Government continue to survive, and some books and pamphlets critical of the Government are published without reprisal. Foreign books, newspapers, and magazines may be imported only after they have been censored.

All broadcasting facilities are government owned.

The severity of restrictions on academic freedom has been relaxed somewhat in recent years. However, course content is still monitored, and there is little genuine critical discussion of issues. To achieve tenure, professors reportedly must cooperate with government authorities over a period of years. All textbooks proposed for use at the universities are reviewed by government authorities to determine their acceptability.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution permits unarmed assemblies and marches "provided they do not violate the principles of Islam." The only ones permitted in practice are those sponsored by the Government, such as Friday prayers and sermons and parades on official occasions.

The Constitution allows the formation of political parties, groups, and professional associations, as well as Islamic and some minority religious associations, provided they do not violate the principles of "freedom, sovereignty, [and] national unity" or question Islam or the Islamic Republic. In practice, most independent organizations have either been banned, co-opted by the Government, or are moribund.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

In Iran religion is almost inseparable from government. The President and many other top officials are mullahs (Islamic clergymen), as are the Speaker of the Parliament and nearly half the deputies in Parliament.

Approximately 90 percent of Iranians are Shi'a Muslims. Aside from slightly over 1 percent who are non-Muslims (Baha'is, Christians, Zoroastrians, and Jews), the rest are Sunni Muslims. The Sunnis are mostly Kurds, Arabs, Turkomans, Baluch, and other ethnic minorities whose political influence is very limited. The Constitution declares that "the official religion of Iran is Islam and the sect followed is Ja'fari Shi'ism," but it also states that "other Islamic denominations shall enjoy complete respect."

The small Christian, Jewish, and Zoroastrian (the pre-Islamic religion of Iran) populations are concentrated mainly in urban areas. Their religions are recognized by the Constitution, and they elect representatives to seats reserved for them in the Parliament. They are permitted to practice their religions, to instruct their children, and--although with a great deal of disruptive interference--to maintain schools.

The Government continues to discriminate against the Baha'i community, Iran's largest non-Muslim minority (300,000 to 350,000 members). The Special Representative stated in his 1989 Report that information he received indicated that Baha'is are still being harassed for their faith. The Baha'i religion, an offshoot of Islam, is considered a "misguided sect" by the authorities and is not officially recognized. Between 1979 and 1988 the Baha'is suffered severe persecution, mainly government directed and aimed at the religious leadership.

In 1983 the Prosecutor General issued an order that effectively banned all Baha'i religious activity and provided the legal foundation on which virtually all members of the faith can be charged with crimes. Baha'i property was confiscated, shrines demolished, businesses disbanded or confiscated, and known Baha'is denied public sector employment and social services. Baha'i marriages are still not recognized. Baha'is are forbidden to participate in social welfare organizations, their businesses are outlawed, and they may not teach their faith. Baha'i national leaders dissolved the community's organizations in obedience to the Prosecutor General's edict, but they subsequently were arrested, and at least some were executed. Many ordinary Baha'is were also arrested on vague charges.

IRAN

In some important respects, the Government has ameliorated its treatment of Baha'is. No Baha'is were reported to have been arrested or executed in 1989; the number of Baha'is held in prison fell to fewer than 15. A small number of Bahai's have been issued visas to leave the country. Some Baha'i property confiscated by the Government was returned, although the amount represents a fraction of the total seized. Baha'i children are now permitted to attend grade school and high school (although Baha'is cannot attend college or be employed on college faculties). Some Baha'is were allowed quietly to reopen their businesses.

The Government has not officially abandoned its anti-Baha'i policies; widespread discrimination against, and persecution of, the community persists. The Government continues to attack the Baha'i community as a front for political and espionage activities, and prohibits the community from electing leaders or conducting religious activities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Iranians may travel to any part of Iran, although there have been restrictions on travel to Kurdish areas at times of heavy fighting. Persons may change their place of residence without obtaining permission.

Travel outside Iran is considerably easier now than before 1983. Khomeini's decree of December 1982 established the right to travel abroad; prior to that time passports and exit visas had been difficult to obtain. In 1989, however, there was evidence that airport departure procedures were again tightened, and the exit tax was increased sharply.

Males of draft age are not issued exit visas except for approved courses of study, and Iranians who are suspect politically, such as some retired military officers and high-level public officials under the former regime, are not able to leave. Persons who have not repaid loans obtained from development banks under the old government also are denied exit visas. Reportedly some Iranians, particularly those whose skills are in short supply and who were educated at government expense, must post bonds to obtain exit visas.

Iranian Jews are permitted to obtain passports and to travel, but they are normally denied the multiple-exit visas given to most Iranians and must make a fresh application (with a fresh fee) for each planned trip. Permission is not normally granted for all members of a Jewish family to travel outside Iran at the same time.

Iranians are generally able to return to Iran after long periods abroad without reprisal. Since the cease-fire, the Government has encouraged the many thousands of skilled Iranians living abroad to return to help rebuild the country. Of those who have gone back in recent years, a number have been able to pursue, through the Iranian judicial system, the return of their properties. However, many exiles complain that formal legal guarantees of their safety have not yet been provided, and as a result, many remain reluctant to return.

There are some categories of individuals who may be in danger if they return to Iran. Some of those with close ties to the former regime, draft evaders, and those who departed the country illegally face possible arrest upon their return.

IRAN

Members or sympathizers with the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran, an opposition group, are subject to imprisonment and torture or even execution should they return. Nevertheless, immediate relatives of persons wanted by the Government are often able to live in Iran, travel outside, and return without undue difficulty.

Iranian passports have always been stamped "not valid for emigration," but the Government does not make a clear distinction between legal residence in another country and emigration. According to the regulations, Iranians with a legal residence outside Iran may be issued passports and advance exit visas by the Iranian embassy, consulate, or interests section in their country of residence. Iranians who have acquired U.S. citizenship are considered Iranian (in effect dual nationals) unless they have formally renounced their Iranian citizenship in accordance with Iranian law.

Dual nationals have complained that the Iranian Interests Section in Washington will neither give them visas in their U.S. passports nor issue them Iranian passports and exit visas on the grounds that their residence in the United States is not legal because, according to Iranian law, they emigrated illegally. Although such services may be denied, there are no known instances of the denial of Iranian citizenship to Iranians who left Iran, or to those who have remained there.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Iran is ruled by a group of religious leaders (mullahs) and their lay associates who share a belief in the legitimacy of a theocratic state based on Ayatollah Khomeini's interpretation of Shi'a Islam. Citizens are not free to question or to change this form of government.

The revolutionary Government has held elections at fairly regular intervals for president, Parliament deputies, members of the Council of Experts (responsible for choosing Khomeini's successor), and members of local government councils. Presidential elections were held in July, and by-elections for Parliament were contested in December. All elections have been hard fought, generally with several candidates for every position. Voting is by universal suffrage. All candidates must be approved by the Council of Guardians, however, and only those meeting the Council's vaguely described political and religious criteria may run. In practice, only supporters of the theocratic state are accepted.

Although the Ministry of Interior announced in December 1988 that political parties would be allowed to form, provided they met the Government's religious and political criteria, only one was licensed. After Khomeini's death, the movement toward legalization of more political parties appeared to end.

The independence of the Parliament is established in the Constitution and exists to a large degree in practice. While Parliament deputies are typically allied with various powerful political and religious officials, they may speak and vote independently and may shift from one faction to another. Vigorous parliamentary debates--normally covered extensively in the press--cover a wide variety of issues. Harsh criticism of government officials is often heard in these debates, and, in some cases, laws proposed by the executive branch have been voted down.

IRAN

The Constitution provides for a Council of Guardians composed of 12 members: 6 clerics unilaterally appointed by the Leader, and 6 lay members well grounded in Islamic law who are nominated by the head of the Judicial Council, subject to the Parliament's approval. The Council of Guardians must certify all bills passed by the Parliament as being in accordance with Islamic law and the Constitution. If bills fail to be certified, they are sent back to the Parliament for revision. They cannot become law until passed by the Parliament and certified by the Council.

The Council has rejected various important bills and portions of bills passed by the Parliament, including legislation on land reform, foreign trade, private enterprise, the press code, and reform of the civil code.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been uncooperative with foreign human rights groups, whether government sponsored or independent, regarding their activities as interference in the country's internal affairs. Foreign diplomats stationed in Tehran who attempt to develop information about human rights abuses face strong interference from Iranian authorities. There are no internal human rights groups.

In its 1989 Report, AI said that during 1988 it had repeatedly asked the Government for information about charges against persons sentenced to death or executed, and asked about trial procedures followed in cases involving the death penalty. It also called for an end to political executions, flogging and amputations, the release of political prisoners, and guarantees of fair trials within a reasonable time. AI also asked the Government several times to allow a delegation to visit Iran to discuss human rights concerns. AI said the Government did not respond to any of these inquiries.

The Government has opposed efforts in the United Nations to criticize its record on human rights. Nevertheless, resolutions expressing the United Nations' concern about human rights abuses in Iran have passed annually in the General Assembly and in meetings of the U.N. Human Rights Commission (UNHRC). In referring to the finding of his 1988 Report, the U.N. Special Representative stated in his 1989 interim Report that he maintains his conviction that acts are being committed in Iran that are incompatible with international human rights instruments that are binding on the Iranian Government.

Since 1984 the Government has refused to allow a UNHRC Special Representative to enter Iran to prepare his reports and has not commented on human rights violations submitted for its consideration. However, in November Iran's Permanent Representative to the U.N. presented a letter to the Special Representative inviting him to visit Iran to prepare a report on the human rights situation there. The report is scheduled to be presented to the 46th session of the UNHRC in February. However, the modalities of the visit have yet to be worked out.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Women, always the object of discriminatory practices in Iran's conservative society, have faced even more discrimination since the revolution. Witnesses who presented testimony to the U.N. Special Representative reported the torture and execution of women detainees, some of whom were raped before execution. Ultraconservative dress, entirely hiding the hair and all of the body except the face and hands, is a requirement for all women, regardless of their religion, national origin, or citizenship. In the past, women have been harassed, detained, or physically attacked if they appeared in public in clothing which official or self-appointed guardians of public morality deemed insufficiently modest. However, as noted in Section 1.f., women in 1989 reportedly enjoyed somewhat greater freedom in dress and appearance although proponents of orthodoxy remained strong.

The Family Protection Act, passed under the Shah, was revoked by the Islamic Government and replaced by a civil code reflecting Islamic law. A bill passed in mid-1983 did give women the right to divorce their husbands, and regulations announced in 1984 substantially broadened to 12 the number of grounds for which a woman may seek divorce. A husband may obtain a divorce without having to state a reason or go to court. The new marriage regulations provide for improved financial settlements for wives whose husbands divorce them. Although violence against women is known to occur in Iran, little is known about its extent. Abuse within the family is considered a private matter in this conservative society and is seldom discussed publicly. There are no official statistics on the subject.

The Christian, Jewish, Zoroastrian, and Baha'i minorities suffer varying degrees of officially sanctioned discrimination in a number of areas, particularly with respect to employment, education, and public accommodations. Muslims who have converted to Christianity are similarly discriminated against. For example, one requirement of university admission is passing a test on Islamic theology, which has the effect of excluding most religious minorities from higher education. Applicants for public sector employment are similarly screened for adherence to standards of Islamic orthodoxy, with much the same effect. There have also been reports that religious minorities have suffered discrimination in the legal system, such as receiving lower awards in injury and death lawsuits, and of suffering heavier punishments than those imposed on Muslims. Although Sunnis have encountered religious discrimination on the local level, the Government has made efforts to reduce Shi'a-Sunni antagonism.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

There are no real labor unions. A national organization known as the "Labor House," founded in 1982 as the labor branch of the now defunct Islamic Republican Party, is the only authorized national labor organization. It works closely with the Islamic societies and "Islamic labor councils" set up in most Iranian factories. Labor House is headed by Hossein Kamali, the Minister of Labor; as such, it is largely a conduit of government influence, not a trade union founded by workers to represent their interests.

The officially sanctioned Islamic labor councils also are instruments of government control and not bodies created and controlled by workers to advance their own interests, although they have frequently been able to block layoffs or the firing of workers.

There is also a system of "guild unions," which operates on a regional basis. These guild unions issue vocational licenses, fund financial cooperatives to assist members, and help workers to find jobs. The guild unions operate with the cooperation of the Government.

No information is available on the right of workers in Iran to strike. No strikes are known to have taken place in 1989.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

In practice, the right of workers to organize independently and bargain collectively is extremely limited.

It is not known whether labor legislation and practice in the export processing zones differ in any significant respect from the rest of the country.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE), said in its 1989 report that it looked forward to learning of the repeal of Section 273 of the Penal Code. In its previous comments, the COE had stated that this provision, which compelled able-bodied citizens to engage in gainful occupation, was incompatible with the ILO Convention on Forced Labor and should be amended. The Government indicated that the Penal Code, which would abolish this section, has been adopted by the Council of Ministers and presented to the Parliament for final approval.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Iranian labor law, which exempts agriculture, domestic service, family businesses, and, to some extent, other small businesses, forbids employment of minors under 12 years and places special restrictions on the employment of minors under 18. In addition, women and minors may not be used for hard labor or, in general, for night work. The extent to which these regulations are enforced is not known.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The labor law establishes a 6-day workweek of 48 hours maximum (except for overtime at premium rates), with 1 day of rest (normally Friday) per week as well as at least 12 days per year of leave with pay and a number of paid public holidays. There are also legal provisions with respect to minimum wages and health and safety in workplaces. Further information on these laws is not available.

Given the large segments of the economy exempted from the labor law, the State's still unresolved administrative disorganization resulting from the revolution, the effects of the war with Iraq, and the general lack of effective labor unions, it is unclear to what extent the provisions of Iran's labor law affect most of the labor force.

IRAQ

Iraq is in effect a one-party state governed by the Arab Ba'ath Socialist Party (ABSP) through a Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) which has both executive and legislative authority under the provisional Constitution of 1968. Saddam Hussein holds decisive power as President of the Republic, Chairman of the RCC, and Secretary-General of the Regional Command of the ABSP. Two other small parties are essentially support groups for the Government. In 1989 the Government announced its intention to adopt a multiparty system enshrined in a new constitution. Elections for the National Assembly--which has few powers--were held April 1. A draft constitution which would reportedly allow a multiparty system was completed in 1989 and is expected to be put to a referendum in early 1990. It remains to be seen, however, whether this will dilute the monopoly of power held by Saddam Hussein and the ABSP. Iraq's population comprises many disparate groups, most notably Shi'a and Sunni Muslim Arabs, Kurds, Turcomans, and various Christian sects, predominantly Assyrians and Chaldeans.

Iraq's military is large and well trained, and parts of it, notably the Fursan, or Kurdish tribal levies, have responsibility for security within the Kurdish autonomous region. The National Police is responsible for civil order.

The Government exerts a high degree of control over the economy, dominated by the petroleum sector, and owns all major industries. The Government has been carrying out a program of divestiture and privatization in agriculture, tourism, services, and light industry, and is trying to attract investor capital and expertise in the operation of the economy. However, close government regulation of economic activity is expected to continue.

Iraq's human rights record remained abysmal in 1989. Effective opposition to government policy is stifled; the intelligence services engage in extensive surveillance and utilize extralegal means, including torture and summary execution, to deal with antiregime activity. The civil rights of Iraqi citizens continue to be sharply limited, and Iraqis do not have the right to change their government. The freedoms of speech and press and of assembly and association are virtually nonexistent. Other important human rights problems include continuing disappearances and arbitrary detentions, lack of fair trial, widespread interference with privacy, excessive use of force against Kurdish civilians, and an almost total lack of worker rights. In addition to the repressive domestic controls that predate the war with Iran, tight wartime controls, including travel restrictions, remain in effect despite the August 1988 cease-fire with Iran.

An armed Kurdish insurgency continued in 1989, but at a reduced level. Although there were no allegations that the Government used chemical weapons against Kurdish civilians in 1989, as it did in 1988, in its efforts to crush the rebellion, it continued to violate the human rights of elements of the Kurdish population. The Government announced in June that in its campaign to suppress the rebellion it has pursued a program since 1987 of establishing a depopulated security zone along the full length of Iraq's borders with Iran and Turkey. Under this program, the Government has destroyed villages within a 30-kilometer-wide zone and relocated approximately 500,000 Kurdish and Assyrian inhabitants into more easily controlled and protected towns, cities, and newly constructed settlements in traditional Kurdish areas.

IRAQ

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

For years execution has been an established Iraqi method for dealing with perceived political and military opponents of the government, including, but not limited to, members of the outlawed Da'wa organization (an Iran-supported fundamentalist Shi'a Muslim group that has engaged in acts of international terrorism). In some cases, a family only learns that one of its members has been executed when the security services return the body and require the family to pay a fine.

Amnesty International (AI), in its presentation before the U.N. Subcommittee on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities in August, stated that it had received allegations that some 80 army deserters were executed in December 1988 and charged that the Government executed 11 of its Kurdish opponents in March and April 1989.

In its February report, "Iraq: Children: Innocent Victims of Political Repression," AI stated that it receives allegations of hundreds of executions in Iraq each year. AI cited the case of 29 Kurdish children and youths allegedly executed in January 1987. In addition, AI, in its 1989 Report covering 1988, cited allegations that hundreds of civilians, including women and children, were executed at Tanjaro Military Garrison, Sulaimaniya province. Independent information to confirm the allegations cited in AI reports is not available.

b. Disappearance

In the February report, AI asserted that thousands of people arrested over the years by Iraqi security or intelligence forces reportedly have "disappeared" while in detention, with many feared executed. In its August presentation to the U.N. Subcommittee, AI reported the disappearance in mid-April of Mulla Muhammad Dalgayi, described as the imam of Qal'at Diza, who was among delegates from Kurdistan who reportedly met with government officials to appeal against forced settlement of the Kurds at Qal'at Diza. He was reportedly arrested in Baghdad and has since disappeared. An Assyrian organization based in the United States charged in March that the whereabouts of 33 Assyrians, who took advantage of the amnesty issued by the Government and returned to Iraq from Iran and Turkey, were unknown.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and prescribes stiff punishment for it, but it is clear that both physical and psychological torture are used by the authorities, especially the security police. Given the rigid chain of command within the Government and the security services, torture could not be practiced without the knowledge or authorization of senior officials.

IRAQ

Emigre groups and former prisoners assert that persons detained by the security police for political or security-related matters are frequently tortured and mistreated. Treatment is reported to be worst immediately following arrest and during the period of interrogation and investigation, which can last for months. Torture and brutal treatment are not limited to political cases.

Security-related offenses are broadly defined and include such routine criminal matters as currency violations.

In its 1989 Report, AI stated that the routine torture and ill-treatment of prisoners continued to be widely reported. It said the victims included detainees below the age of 18 who were reportedly beaten, whipped, given electric shocks, and deprived of food. The Government categorically denied any use of torture against children as an official policy or as a practice, and stated its readiness to consider fully any individual allegation with a view to bringing perpetrators to justice. Impartial observers have so far been unable to look into these allegations.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

While the Constitution and legal code provide for the rights of citizens and place checks on police powers in such areas as arrest, detention, imprisonment, and search, these provisions have virtually no weight in political or national security cases, although they are generally respected in ordinary criminal cases. Security police not only make arbitrary arrests but also secretly detain suspects, whose fate sometimes becomes known only after they have been executed. Security charges have included espionage, treason, and conspiracy against Iraq, often in collaboration with unnamed foreign enemies.

The relocation of 500,000 Kurdish villagers to other areas of Kurdistan since 1987 may be considered a form of internal exile. The Government declared in June 1989 that it was creating an uninhabited security zone to ensure the safety and security of citizens in the border regions (who were subjected to shelling and military operations during the war with Iran) and to provide better services to the villagers.

Although the Government has ceased expelling Iraqis of supposed Iranian descent, most of the few remaining Iranians have been imprisoned or live under the fear of deportation or incarceration. Spouses of Iraqis of Iranian origin are required to obtain a divorce or suffer the same consequences. Moreover, other Iraqis, whose grandparents are shown not to be of Iraqi origin, are subject to arbitrary detention and deportation.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Iraq's legal system provides for investigation by police and then by an inquiry judge who may refer a case to the courts or dismiss it. Judges try criminal cases; there are no juries. Convictions may be appealed to the Court of Appeal and then to the Court of Cassation, the supreme court. There are no Shari'a courts per se in Iraq; however, family courts administer Shari'a law modified by Iraqi custom.

IRAQ

Trials of ordinary cases are held in civil, criminal, and religious courts and are open. Defendants are entitled to counsel--at government expense if the defendant is indigent. Charges and evidence are available for review by the lawyer. Appellate courts hear cases not under the jurisdiction of the Revolutionary Courts.

In contrast to ordinary cases, security cases are handled by the Revolutionary Courts, which usually hold closed trials. Security cases include espionage, treason, smuggling, currency exchange violations and drug trafficking. The right of defense in such courts is said to be severely restricted. The "special courts" constituted by the RCC for specific incidents, such as the reported conspiracy against the regime in 1979, are also closed. These special tribunals are apparently exempt from constitutional safeguards of defendants' rights; defendants are held incommunicado, and confessions extracted by torture are admissible. Appeals can be taken only to the chairman of the RCC. However, the utility of this appeal is questionable, since there are reports that executions take place shortly after trial.

Political dissent in Iraq is taken by the authorities to encompass a wide range of activities and, in an environment where public acknowledgement of arrest or imprisonment is rare, it is extremely difficult to estimate the number of political prisoners. In its 1989 Report, AI stated that "thousands" of political prisoners continued to be arbitrarily arrested and detained, especially members of prohibited political parties, Army deserters, and draft resisters. Relatives, including children of suspects, are said to be held as hostages to compel confessions.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides protections for the inviolability of the home, and strong cultural values reinforce these protections. Police must obtain a search warrant before entering the home of a criminal suspect. However, warrants are not required for the arrest of security suspects. Although most arrests occur outside the home, there have been reports of forced entry and arrest by the security police, particularly of suspected members of the outlawed Da'wa organization.

Although the Constitution provides for the confidentiality of mail and telegraphic and telephone correspondence, many Iraqis believe that the monitoring of telephones is a common practice and that all mail is subject to review by censors. The security services and Ba'ath Party maintain pervasive networks of informers. The Government maintains a close watch against Iranian attempts to exploit dissatisfaction among Iraqi Shi'a, who adhere to the branch of Islam prevalent in Iran.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Elements of Iraq's Kurdish population have engaged in armed struggle with all governments of Iraq periodically since the 1920's. The outbreak of the Iran-Iraq war in 1980 sparked a new antigovernment insurgency by Kurdish elements, many of whom fought with or aided Iran during the war. From 1981 to 1989, the Government's efforts to crush the rebellion militarily resulted in approximately 8,000 deaths, many of them civilians killed indiscriminately by chemical weapons in 1988.

Although the fighting was at a reduced level in 1989, Kurdish military operations continued, as did government measures to contain them. Kurdish rebels continued to announce their hostility towards the central Government. On August 29, 1989, the leader of one group of insurgents stated to the press in Geneva that his group would target foreign interests in Iraq supporting the Iraqi regime. At year's end, the cycle of Kurdish rebellion and government repression remained unresolved.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The freedoms of speech and press are not respected. The Constitution prohibits "any act aimed at undermining the national unity of the people, provoking racial, sectarian, and regional bigotry, or violating gains and achievements of the country." The Government views political dissent as a threat to its security and strictly controls speech and all information media. All publications are subject to censorship. The Government and the Ba'ath Party own and operate the press, radio, and television. The media do not criticize the Government, and news reporting is strongly biased. There is no presentation of opposition viewpoints.

Few foreign periodicals reach Iraq and those that do may be censored. Western newspapers are not sold. Foreign visitors' magazines, newspapers, cassettes, cameras, and video cassettes may be confiscated at the airport. To control the dissemination of political leaflets, word processors and computers must be registered. Failure to register is a criminal offense. Iraqis no longer need to register their typewriters or photocopiers, but foreigners in Iraq must do so. Taking photographs of military installations, government buildings, or areas near sensitive locations is forbidden and punishable by imprisonment. Journalists and photographers visiting Iraq at the invitation of the Government are required to present film taken in Iraq for inspection by the authorities.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are severely limited. Public meetings may only be organized under the auspices of the Government or the Ba'ath Party. Association for nonreligious purposes and demonstrations without government approval have met with severe repression. Professional organizations are subject to control by the Ba'ath Party Central Vocational Bureau.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Iraq is an ethnically and religiously diverse society. Since its rise to power in 1968, the Ba'ath Government, while carefully controlling religious groups, has enforced tolerance of religious diversity, seeking to submerge religious differences in the promotion of secular nationalism. A 1981 law gave the Ministry of Endowments and Religious Affairs the authority to promulgate laws and regulations governing places of worship, appointment of clergy, publication of religious literature, and participation in religious councils and meetings. Muslim religious leaders operate under close government supervision, are considered government employees, and receive their salaries through the Government. The Government administers the principal Muslim shrines and mosques and has provided allotments to them and to churches for maintenance and refurbishing. There are no penalties under Iraqi law for changing one's religion, although there is a social stigma for Muslims who convert to another faith.

While the Government has assumed much greater authority in Islamic religious affairs since 1981, it has been less intrusive into the religious affairs of Iraq's Christians, who number more than 500,000 and constitute nearly 4 percent of the population. Their freedom of worship in churches of established denominations is legally protected, but they are not permitted to proselytize or to hold meetings outside church premises. Convents and monasteries exist, and some new churches have been constructed, in some cases with government financial support. The Jewish community has decreased from 150,000 following World War II to under 400. There is no evidence of recent persecution. One synagogue in Baghdad still functions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Iraqis are generally free to travel within the country and to change their residences or workplaces. However, they are likely to be constrained by social, cultural, and religious traditions which define the areas occupied by the various ethnic and religious groups. Sensitive border and other security areas are off limits. There are police checkpoints on highways and outside major towns, but Iraqis and nondiplomatic foreigners travel freely in nonrestricted areas.

The Government's harsh campaign to suppress Kurdish rebels, involving mass relocations of Kurdish villagers, has nullified the right of hundreds of thousands of Kurds to choose their place of residence. Since the Government began its program of forced relocation in 1987, an estimated 500,000 people have been uprooted. Since traditional Kurdish culture has been deeply embedded in the rural village, the forced removals and razing of villages has had a destructive impact on the lives of some half a million Kurds.

Most foreigners who remain in the country for more than 30 days and all Iraqis must obtain exit permission. Travel has been severely limited since September 1986, when the Government imposed tight restrictions on currency exchange. These restrictions were eased somewhat in 1989, but the most an Iraqi may exchange is 1,000 dinars ($3,220). Because of the drain on the economy caused by the war and reconstruction, permission to travel abroad is restricted to a few categories of Iraqis, including officials, businessmen, government-approved students, and persons needing medical treatment. In 1989 the Government eased restrictions to permit one parent to visit his or her offspring who is studying or working abroad.

While permission for medical treatment abroad may be granted, permission to transfer hard currency abroad to pay for it may not be. In cases of those desiring medical treatment in the United States, the Government now requires a bond to be posted by an American friend or relative with the Iraqi embassy in Washington before exit permission is granted. The minimum amount of this bond is $10,000. The Government sometimes limits the countries an Iraqi traveler may visit and, should the traveler visit a nonauthorized country, a small fine may be levied upon his return. Iraqis who have residences abroad may depart the country, provided they originally left before the war began. A married woman must have the permission of her husband to travel abroad.

The Government can require a prospective traveler to post a substantial bond to assure his return. The RCC decreed in 1987 that Iraqi students abroad who refuse to return to Iraq must reimburse the Government for all education received in Iraq or abroad at government expense. The decree is applicable retroactively to students who have refused to return since May 16, 1983, the date the Government began requiring employees leaving government jobs before 20 years of service to reimburse the State for the cost of their education. Amounts due can be recovered by confiscation; nonpayment may result in imprisonment. Each student must provide a guarantor before traveling abroad. This guarantor and the student's parents may be held liable if the student fails to return.

There is no specific ban on emigration or special restrictions for members of minority groups; however, emigration is discouraged. For the past several years, almost all of those given permission to emigrate have been Christian Iraqi wives of former Iraqi citizens now living abroad as citizens of another country. Prospective emigrants have had travel permission delayed and have been harassed. Many emigrants leave behind substantial property because of the difficulty of exporting assets. Currency exchange violations are considered national security offenses, and penalties can be severe.

Non-Iraqi spouses of Iraqi citizens who have resided in Iraq for 5 years are required to take Iraqi nationality or leave Iraq. Many people, including several Americans, have thus been obliged to accept Iraqi citizenship and are therefore subject to the present travel restrictions. In March 1984, an order by the RCC reduced the residency period before naturalization to 1 year for the spouses of Iraqi citizens employed in government offices. The Iraqi spouse faces penalties for noncompliance, including loss of job, a fine of approximately $10,000, and repayment of the costs of education. Iraq does not recognize the concept of dual nationality, and many Iraqi "dual nationals," especially the children of an Iraqi father and a mother of non-Iraqi birth, have been denied permission to leave Iraq to visit the country of their other nationality.

In recent years, the Government has instituted special programs to encourage repatriation of qualified professionals. Aliens of Iraqi origin can apply for a document permitting them to enter and exit from Iraq without a visa.

Other persons of Iraqi origin are permitted to return, including many persons who were admitted to other countries as refugees. A number of such people, especially Assyrian Christians, have returned on temporary visits. They are free to come and go, within the limits of the present travel restrictions, since they are not considered to have violated Iraqi laws. However, those who emigrated only after the beginning of the Iran-Iraq war, including several U.S.

IRAQ

permanent resident aliens, have been unable to depart from Iraq after returning. In September and November 1988 and in February and March 1989, the Government announced amnesties for Kurds who fled the country for any reason. Approximately 2,000 have voluntarily returned from refugee camps in Turkey.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Iraqi citizens do not have the ability peacefully to change their government. President Saddam Hussein and the RCC rule Iraq through the Ba'ath Party. It reportedly has some 1.5 million adherents, representing about 9 percent of the population.

There are two other small legal political parties, both Kurdish. They and the Ba'ath Party constitute the Patriotic and Progressive National Front, essentially a vehicle of support for the Government. Members of the military or security services may engage in political activities only within the Ba'ath Party. Association with the party is not required for appointment to senior government positions or military ranks or election to the National Assembly, but is normally necessary to attain political influence. Opposition groups, including various Kurdish groups and splinter parties, are severely repressed. The Communist Party was removed from the National Front and declared illegal in 1979. The Da'wa organization, a violent Shi'ite group, is still proscribed, and its members are subject to incarceration and execution, as are members of other parties believed to be cooperating with Iran. Plans the Government announced in 1988 to permit legal formation of opposition parties were not implemented in 1989.

General elections were held for the 250-seat National Assembly in April. Though in theory possessing a wide range of official duties, the Assembly exercises little real authority. The majority of the more than 900 candidates were independents, although all supported current government policies. The elections by secret ballot were more open than in the past, and some high-ranking Baath party officials were defeated.

The biennial elections for the Legislative Assembly of the Kurdish Autonomous Region were held in September 1989. All 174 candidates, from the three legal parties and independents, had to satisfy the same requirements as National Assembly candidates. The Legislative Assembly does not exercise meaningful authority.

In October 1989, an Experts Commission finished drafting a new Constitution to replace the Provisional Constitution of 1970. Iraqi officials assert that the new Constitution will provide more guarantees of human rights. However, the new Constitution has not yet been made public pending approval by President Saddam Hussein and the RCC.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government allows one human rights group to operate inside Iraq, but this is largely under government control. The Government has rarely cooperated with private foreign groups or international organizations in investigating events or practices in Iraq.

The Government denies charges that it violates human rights, and claims that the information on which AI and other human rights groups base their charges comes from pro-Iranian and Kurdish Iraqi exile groups in London and Paris. In its 1989 report on children in Iraq, AI cited several instances in which Iraqi authorities had commented on AI reports or responded to AI inquiries, but in each case these authorities had defended the Government's actions as justifiable or denied the accuracy of AI's information. A resolution before the U.N. Subcommission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities in August 1989, recommending that the U.N. Commission on Human Rights study the human rights situation in Iraq, was narrowly defeated.

Iraq does cooperate with the International Committee of the Red Cross in efforts to resettle Iranian civilian refugees in third countries, and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees has had a permanent representative in Iraq since April 1988 who registers Iranian refugees and works for their resettlement.

The Ba'ath Party is committed to the equality of the sexes, and a series of laws since it came to power in 1968 has steadily improved the status of women. There have been laws to protect women from exploitation in the workplace; grant subsidized maternity leave; permit women to join the regular army, popular army, and police forces; and equalize women's rights in divorce, land ownership, taxation, suffrage, and election to the National Assembly. In the 1970's, the Government imposed legal penalties on families that opposed sending their women to literacy schools, and on men who were seen harassing women. While the application of these laws has resulted in significant tangible improvements for women, a number of problems remain. Married women may still travel abroad only with the permission of their husbands. School enrollment of females has been increasing in recent years, reaching 45 percent in elementary schools and 36 percent in secondary schools in 1985-86.

Women represent about 47 percent of agricultural workers and about 25 percent of the total work force. The war accelerated the Government's drive to elevate the status of women, and it appears to have significantly reduced, if not removed, barriers to the acceptance of women in traditional male roles. Women are increasingly employed as architects, construction engineers, oil engineers, air traffic controllers, and factory and farm managers. Their role in the armed forces is limited to the medical field.

Violence against women, such as wife beating and rape, is known to occur but little is known about its extent. Such abuse is customarily dealt with within the tightly knit Iraqi family structure because of the value attached to personal privacy in this conservative society. Consequently, there is no public discussion of the subject, and there are no official statistics. Excessive violence against women would be grounds for divorce and criminal charges, but suits brought on these charges in Iraq are believed to be rare.

IRAQ

The use of minority languages is unrestricted. Kurdish is an official language used in schools and media in Kurdish areas. Turcomans publish in their dialect of Turkish, and Christians often use Aramaic as well as Arabic.

The Shi'a, who make up roughly 55 percent of the population, have historically been economically, politically, and socially disadvantaged throughout much of the Middle East. The Government has a declared policy to raise their living standards and equalize opportunities for their economic and professional advancement. For four centuries, political power in Iraq has been concentrated in the hands of the Sunni minority. Sunni Arabs, who comprise 20 to 25 percent of Iraq's population, dominate the RCC, the Regional Command of the Ba'ath Party, and the Cabinet. However, increasing numbers of Shi'as hold prominent positions, and the economic status of the Shi'a has improved through intensive government investment in the economic and educational infrastructure of southern Iraq.

Although Christians sometimes allege discrimination in education and jobs, adherence to their religion has not prevented many from obtaining wealth and professional advancement. The Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, a Chaldean Christian, has represented Iraq at meetings of the foreign ministers of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. Other Christians hold important official and private positions.

Citizens considered to be of Iranian origin carry special identification. They are often precluded from desirable employment and their advancement may be impeded. Many "Iranian" families have been in Iraq for generations. The two holiest shrines of Shi'a Islam, the prevalent sect in Iran, are located in Iraq. For generations Iranians have come to Najaf and Karbala on pilgrimage or to study in the seminaries, and many settled there. Some "Iranians" say their forebears were not from Iran but claimed Iranian nationality to evade Ottoman military conscription.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Trade unions independent of government control do not exist in Iraq. Under the trade union organization law of June 2, 1987, a new single trade union structure was prescribed for organized labor. Workers in private and mixed enterprises and in cooperatives--but not public employees or workers in state enterprises--have the right to join a local union committee. The committees form trade unions which in turn are part of provincial trade union federations. At the top is an umbrella organization, the Iraqi General Federation of Trade Unions, which is organically linked to the Ba'ath Party and required to promote party principles and policies among union members. The General Federation is affiliated with the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. It is also active in the tripartite Arab Labor Organization, headquartered in Baghdad.

Although workers legally have the right to strike, after providing notice to the Labor Ministry, no such strikes were reported in 1989. There was a 1-day wildcat walkout by Egyptian workers protesting excessive work hours.

IRAQ

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right to bargain collectively is not recognized. Salaries for public sector workers (i.e. the bulk of the employed) are set by the Government. Wages in the private sector are set by the employers or negotiated individually with workers.

Iraq, which has ratified International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively, was criticized by the ILO's Committee of Experts (COE) in 1989 for the fact that its new labor code of 1987 fails to provide workers with protection against antiunion discrimination. The COE also expressed regret that the 1987 Act on trade union organizations did not provide for collective bargaining.

There are no export processing zones in Iraq.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Although compulsory labor is prohibited by law, during and shortly after the war with Iran the Popular Army, the militia of the Ba'ath Party, employed press-gang methods to draft recruits. However, these activities ceased in November 1988, and the Popular Army was for the most part demobilized in 1989.

ILO supervisory bodies again in 1989 expressed concern that the Penal Code permits the punishment of civil servants with imprisonment, including compulsory prison labor, for breaches of labor discipline, which include resigning from one's job. A November cabinet meeting, reported in the government-directed press, quoted the remark of a minister that resignation from government jobs should be free, confirming that heretofore civil servants have had to buy their way out of government service.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children are frequently encouraged to work as necessary to support the family, but the employment of children under age 14 is forbidden in all enterprises other than small-scale family enterprises. Children between the ages of 14 and 18 who are employed are protected by law: they work fewer hours and have more privileges than adult workers.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The workweek in urban areas is 6 days, 7 to 8 hours a day, for workers in the private and mixed sectors. These provisions do not apply to agricultural workers whose workweek and hours of work per day can vary according to individual employer-employee agreements. Hours for government employees are set by the head of the ministry for which the employee works. Many government employees routinely work longer than 8 hours a day, some of them as much as 12 hours per day.

Occupational safety programs are in effect in state-run enterprises, and inspectors make visits irregularly to private establishments. Enforcement varies widely. A government decree to extend occupational safety and health protection was issued and subsequently withdrawn in December 1988, reportedly resulting in the dismissal of the Labor Minister.

A special problem arose after the Government decided in June to reduce drastically the amount of hard currency foreign workers could remit. It is widely believed that the Government took this measure to "encourage" foreign workers to leave the country, thus freeing jobs for demobilized Iraqi soldiers. Workers not on contract were particularly hard hit. Most of the over 2 million Egyptian workers in Iraq were manual laborers. When they learned they would be able to transfer only $32 per month, they began to leave Iraq in droves, an estimated 2,000 per day by air alone. Egyptian and other foreign workers in Iraq have claimed that some Iraqi employers forced them to work 12 to 15 hours a day for 8 hours' pay or refused to pay wages. The Government has admitted that Iraqi banks have been slow to pay remittances. Egyptian workers are in fact receiving their savings a year after leaving Iraq.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES*

Israel is a parliamentary democracy with a multiparty political system and free elections. There is no constitution, but a series of basic laws defines the responsibilities of government institutions. The legislature (the Knesset) can limit the government and force its dissolution. Israel has an independent judiciary. Public debate on issues of concern to Israelis is open and lively. A vigorous free press scrutinizes all aspects of Israeli life and politics.

Since Israel's founding in 1948, it has been in a formal state of war with most of its Arab neighbors, except Egypt, with which it concluded a peace treaty in 1979. As a result of the 1967 war, Israel has occupied the territories of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the eastern sector of Jerusalem, and the Golan Heights.

Since its founding, Israel has experienced numerous terrorist incidents, within and outside its borders. In this atmosphere of hostility and threat, Israel has relied heavily on its military and related services for security and has retained many of the security-related emergency regulations from the preindependence British mandate period.

Internal security is the responsibility of the general security service (Shin Bet), which is under the authority of the Prime Minister's office. The police are under the authority of a separate minister. The Israeli Defense Forces (IDF)--which include a significant portion of the Israeli adult population in either active duty or reserve status --also plays a role in maintaining internal security. The IDF is under the authority of a civilian Minister of Defense. The Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee reviews the activities of the IDF and the Shin Bet.

Israel enjoys a relatively high standard of living. It has a predominantly market economy with substantial government regulation and subsidies for basic commodities. Economic policy has a strong social welfare orientation.

Israeli citizens have a range of civil and other rights generally comparable to those in advanced Western democracies. Israel's Arab citizens have nonetheless not shared fully in the rights granted to, and the duties levied on, Jewish citizens.

In 1989, as in 1988, Israel's most significant human rights problem has been its practices in confronting the Palestinian uprising in the occupied territories. (For detailed discussion, see the separate report on the occupied territories.)

*Because the legal status of the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem and the political and human rights conditions differ sharply from those in Israel, the situation there is dealt with in a separate report following the report for Israel.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political killings in Israel are neither practiced nor sanctioned by Israeli authorities. In 1989 nearly 20 Israeli civilians were killed within pre-1967 Israel by Palestinians in circumstances that appeared to be related to the ongoing political conflict in the occupied territories. Approximately five Palestinians from the territories were killed within Israel by Israeli private citizens in what may have been indirect retaliation for these incidents. Palestinians and Israelis apprehended for these acts were dealt with through the normal process of Israeli law.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of government-condoned disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Israeli laws and administrative regulations prohibit, and provide specific penalties for, such activities. However, where security concerns predominate, these strictures have been violated. (See the occupied territories report for a discussion of allegations of mistreatment of prisoners.)

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Israeli law and practice guarantee against arbitrary arrest or imprisonment. Writs of habeas corpus and other procedural and substantive safeguards are available. Defendants are considered innocent until proven guilty.

Administrative detention, with no formal charge or trial, has in the past been imposed on Israeli citizens for security reasons under emergency regulations. Two Israeli Arabs were administratively detained in 1989. The Minister of Defense may issue a detention order for a maximum of 6 months. Within 48 hours of issuance of such an order, a district judge must review the case and may confirm, shorten, or overturn the detention order. Failing review within the designated time period, the detainee must be released. The detainee may be represented by counsel and may appeal to the Supreme Court. The Government may withhold evidence from the detainee and counsel on security grounds.

In 1989 Israel continued to hold most administrative detainees from the occupied territories in detention centers inside Israel. (For a full discussion of administrative detention of Palestinians, see the separate report on the occupied territories.)

Israel does not exile its citizens.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a hearing by an impartial tribunal with representation by counsel is guaranteed by law. The judiciary is independent and effectively insulated from political interference. All nonsecurity trials are open. According to the Ministry of Justice, security cases may be tried before a military court or a civil court and may be partly or wholly closed to the public. The burden of justifying nonpublic proceedings falls to the prosecution. Defense counsel is present, even during closed proceedings, but may be denied access to some evidence on security grounds. According to the Ministry of Justice, in security cases in which access to some evidence is denied, that evidence is not presented to the court.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Privacy of the individual and the home are protected by law within Israel. Emergency regulations permit mail to be stopped, opened, and even destroyed on security grounds. A 1979 law allows tapping of telephones for security reasons, with confirmation by the Prime Minister or Defense Minister. Interference with mail and the tapping of telephones are practiced infrequently.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

(See the separate report on the occupied territories.)

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Individuals, organizations, the press, and the electronic media freely debate a wide range of public issues and criticize government officials and policies, except where sensitive security-based considerations or other censorship provisions apply. Press articles dealing with security-related matters must be submitted to the military censor. Israel's Arabic-language press is censored more strictly than the Hebrew-language press. In 1989 a High Court of Justice ruling narrowed the range of material that could be censored on security grounds. Movies are occasionally censored if deemed pornographic, offensive to religion or social mores, or likely to disturb public order. Theater censorship was ended in 1989 for a 2-year test period. All newspapers are privately owned and managed. Most of the electronic media are run by the independent Israel Broadcast Authority, whose chief is appointed by the Government.

Security regulations make it illegal to possess or distribute literature of an outlawed organization for purposes of encouraging support for that organization or its cause or publicly to express support for such an organization. There was no indication that anyone was prosecuted under this law in 1989. Provisions against maintaining contact with, or accepting support from, an outlawed organization apply to the media as well as individuals. In 1989 the license of an Arabic-language newspaper was revoked on the grounds of links to an outlawed organization.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Israelis representing almost any point of view are free to assemble and associate. The law and court rulings protect these rights. However, security regulations prohibit membership in, or contact with, outlawed organizations, their subdivisions, or their individual members. In 1989 an Israeli peace activist was jailed for meeting with Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) leader Yasser Arafat, eight Israelis were charged with meeting PLO members, and the 1988 convictions of four others for a similar offense were under appeal. A Knesset member met publicly with Yasser Arafat, but his Knesset immunity protected him from prosecution.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

c. Freedom of Religion

Israel is a democracy. There are strong guarantees of freedom for all religious faiths. Approximately 82 percent of its citizens are Jewish. Muslims, Christians, and Druze, and members of other minority religions make up the remaining 18 percent. Travel to visit religious sites or perform religious obligations in and outside Israel is widely permitted. In 1989 Israel facilitated the pilgrimage to Mecca of over 5,000 Israeli Muslims.

Each recognized religious community in Israel has legal authority over its members in matters of marriage, legitimacy, inheritance, and conversion. Orthodox religious authorities have exclusive control over these matters in all sectors of the Jewish community, whether or not they are Orthodox.

Missionaries are allowed to work in Israel. A 1977 antiproselytizing law, prohibiting the offering and receipt of material benefits as an inducement to conversion, has not been employed.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Israeli citizens can move freely within Israel except in military or security zones, or in cases where they may be confined to their neighborhood or village by administrative order under emergency regulations. In 1989 two Israeli Arabs were confined in this fashion, but were later released.

Israeli citizens are free to travel within the occupied territories, except in those sections temporarily declared closed military areas. (See the occupied territories report regarding the effect of Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians' freedom of travel.)

Israeli citizens are free to travel abroad and to emigrate, provided they have no outstanding military obligations or are not restricted by administrative order. In 1989 the Israeli Government renewed restrictions on the travel of one Israeli Arab political activist, without giving an official reason.

Israel welcomes Jewish immigrants, including Jewish refugees, to whom it gives automatic citizenship and residence rights. It accepts back Israeli citizens who have emigrated. Israel has allowed the return of some Palestinians on the principle of family reunification but has rejected the great majority of requests for return.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Israel is a parliamentary democracy, with a multitude of parties representing a wide range of political views. Relatively small parties regularly win seats in the Knesset. All adult Israeli citizens have the right to participate in the political process and to vote by secret ballot.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Participation of eligible voters, including Israeli Arabs, in national elections is high by Western standards. In the 1988 national elections, Israeli Arabs won 6 of 120 Knesset seats. Israeli citizens, including Israeli Arabs, actively participated in the 1989 local (municipal) elections.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

Israel is responsive to international and nongovernmental interest in its human rights situation. It hosts and works with a delegation of the International Committee for the Red Cross. It permits regular visits by a wide range of private and international organizations concerned about human rights such as Amnesty International (AI), the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, the International Labor Organization (ILO), and others. The Government routinely investigates and responds to human rights inquiries by such organizations as AI. The Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs have human rights offices.

The number of local human rights and political action groups, already very active, expanded in 1989, primarily in response to the continuing uprising in the territories.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status.

Women's rights in Israel are protected by the equal opportunity law, which forbids sex discrimination. For example, it requires employers to pay male and female workers equal wages for equal work. Other laws and regulations give protection to women employees regarding pregnancy, childbirth, and child care. The Government includes a senior adviser on the status of women, and the Civil Service Commission and several government ministries have officers responsible for women's rights. Nongovernmental women's organizations work actively in promoting women's rights and welfare. Women are drafted into the army but do not fill combat-related positions.

Domination of personal status law by religious courts means that women are subject to restrictive interpretations of their rights in such crucial areas as marriage, divorce, and inheritance.

The courts in Israel deal firmly with persons convicted of violence, including violence against women. Human rights groups, especially women's groups, are increasingly active in dealing with the issue of domestic violence against women, and the Government provides some funding for intervention activities.

Israeli Arabs, who comprise approximately 18 percent of Israel's population, have made substantial educational and material progress since the founding of Israel. A few have risen to responsible positions in the civil service, generally in the Arab departments of government ministries. The year saw the appointment of the first Arab woman judge. The Arabic-speaking community has access to local and foreign Arabic newspapers and magazines, internal and external Arabic television programming, and Arabic-language radio services. However, Israeli Arabs have not attained the same quality of education, housing, or other services as Israeli Jews.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Relative to their numbers, they are underrepresented in the student body of most universities, and in higher level professional, academic, and business ranks.

The Israeli Druze and Circassian communities, at their initiative, are subject to Israel's military draft, and some Bedouin Arabs serve voluntarily in special units. However, most Israeli Arabs are not subject to the draft, and few volunteer. Consequently, they have less access than do other Israelis to such social and economic benefits as housing and new-household subsidies, and government or security-related industrial employment, for which military service is either a prerequisite or an advantage.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Israeli workers and employers have freely established organizations of their own choosing. Israel has a powerful free trade union movement, the General Federation of Labor in Israel (Histadrut), and a much smaller rival federation. About 80 percent of employed Israelis (including 70 percent of employed Israeli Arabs) are members of Histadrut trade unions or are covered by its collective bargaining agreements. Histadrut is a vast service organization which also runs industries, banks, cooperatives and the country's largest health and child care systems. Histadrut's position as the preeminent representative of Israeli labor predates the establishment of the State of Israel and is not imposed by law. Histadrut's members democratically elect their national and local officers and those of its affiliated trade unions and women's organization, choosing between political party lists. Plant or enterprise committee members are elected individually.

The right to strike is exercised frequently. There is a legal obligation to give 15 days' notice prior to a strike or lockout, unless otherwise specified in the collective bargaining agreement. Strikes often erupt without prior notice or Histadrut authorization, although Histadrut tries to maintain discipline with a central strike fund. The Government occasionally appeals to labor courts for back-to-work orders to restore essential public services while negotiations continue, but these orders are temporary and not always granted. Labor courts include employer and employee representatives. Strike activity in 1989 was relatively low; among the more important strikes were those by employees of Histadrut's health care system and by employees of the Histadrut-owned KOOR Industries.

Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem have the same rights of labor association. While a number of such residents are members of Histadrut, at least 14 Arab unions independent of Histadrut also operate.

Approximately 100,000 nonresident workers work in Israel. Most of them are Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza. While the total number of Palestinians working in Israel appears not to have changed significantly from 1988, a number of factors--entry permits required of Gaza workers, general strikes in the territories, and Israeli-imposed curfews--have had serious short-term effects on daily workers and have probably depressed the weekly average of hours worked per worker.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Nonresident workers cannot be members of Histadrut. They are nonetheless entitled to union representation, and can join, vote for, and be elected to shop-level workers' committees in establishments where they number at least 20 or comprise at least 10 percent of the work force.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right of Israelis to organize and bargain collectively is enshrined in law and freely exercised. The majority union (generally Histadrut) is the exclusive bargaining agent. Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem have the same rights under Israeli law. The Arab unions operating in East Jerusalem conduct their own collective bargaining.

Nonresident workers (primarily Palestinians) may not organize and bargain collectively on their own in Israel, but those that work in the organized sector are entitled to the protection of collective bargaining agreements and representation by the bargaining agent. The majority of these workers, however, work outside the legal hiring mechanism and lack this protection.

There are no export processing zones in Israel.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Israeli citizens are not subject to forced or compulsory labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

By law, children under age 15 may not be employed. Those aged 15 may not be employed if subject to compulsory education, except during vacations, or in apprenticeships, or with a permit from the Labor Minister under special conditions. The Minister may also allow an artistic performance by a child under 15, with safeguards. Employment of children aged 16 to 18 is restricted to ensure time for rest and education. A Labor Inspection Service enforces these provisions, but enforcement may be lax in smaller, unorganized enterprises. Israeli labor exchanges in the West Bank and Gaza do not permit Palestinians under 17 to be employed in Israel.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Wage income in Israel is generally sufficient to provide workers and their families a decent standard of living. Legislation in 1986 established a minimum wage at 45 percent of the average salary, calculated periodically. An October 1989 adjustment raised it to $447 a month. Most wages and salaries are established in collective bargaining agreements. The Labor Minister frequently uses the 1957 collective agreements law to extend private-sector wage settlements to the public sector and sectoral wage settlements to other, uncovered enterprises. Along with union representation, the Labor Inspection Service effectively enforces labor, health, and safety standards in the workplace.

By law, maximum hours of work at regular pay are 47 hours per week, 8 per day, and 7 the day before the weekly rest, which must be at least 36 consecutive hours and should include the Sabbath. Exceptions may be approved by the Labor Ministry but may not exceed 10 hours per day, or an average of 47 hours per week. By national collective agreements, the public sector moved to a 5-day, 42.5-hour week in April 1989, while the private sector established a maximum 45-hour week in August 1988 and an April 1990 deadline for all firms to institute the 5-day week.

Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem have the same rights under Israeli law and union contracts and are entitled to the same working conditions as Israelis.

About 33,000 of the West Bank and Gaza Palestinians working in Israel enter the job market legally through Israeli employment service labor exchanges in the West Bank and Gaza. Employers pay wages and social contributions for these workers to the service, which deducts taxes, employee social contributions, and a 1-percent union fee, and pays the balance to the workers. The same percentage is deducted from the pay of Palestinians working legally in Israel as is deducted from the pay of Israeli workers for social contributions. However, they do not receive the same benefits from the National Insurance Institute (NII, similar to U.S. social security), because many NII benefits require residence in Israel. The NII provides commuting workers with workers' compensation for occupational injury or illness and employer bankruptcy insurance. These workers are also entitled to maternity benefits, including free hospital care and 12 weeks' paid maternity leave, but only for births in hospitals in Israel. Nonresidents are ineligible for NII old-age, survivors', and disability pensions, unemployment compensation, or insurance for long-term care or injury in nonoccupational accidents. They are also ineligible for NII children's allowances, funded only by employer contributions, and for NII-administered welfare programs funded by Israeli taxpayers through the budget.

Because of these restrictions, only 1.2 percent of nonresident Palestinian workers' pay goes to the NII, compared to 5.35 percent for an Israeli. The other 4.15 percent is an equalization deduction which was established to keep labor costs equivalent. This amount goes to a special finance ministry fund to be earmarked for social and development expenditures in the West Bank and Gaza. Palestinians estimate that this amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars since 1970 and claim that the Government of Israel has not accounted for its use of the funds. Expenditures for the territories are reviewed by the Knesset Joint Committee for Defense and Finances, but are not made public.

A report issued in December by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) on the social and economic conditions of West Bank and Gaza workers recommends that the social security system be revamped so that those who work in Israel are able to receive full social benefits or else be reimbursed for the value of their contributions which are deducted from gross wages.

Nonresident Palestinian workers who are legally hired are covered by the minimum wage law and by the larger system of social benefits granted through collective bargaining agreements. They are entitled to receive a pension through the Labor Ministry at age 65 after at least 10 years' employment in Israel, based on earnings and years worked, which is equivalent to Histadrut pensions granted to Israelis. They are also entitled to sick leave, severance pay, and paid vacations of 14 to 28 days per year, by law as well as by Histadrut contract.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Histadrut has sought to defend the rights of nonresident Palestinians who were dismissed for absences during the uprising, maintaining that military curfews and community-wide strikes are beyond their control. Histadrut has not been able to get large numbers reinstated but has worked to get many their severance pay. The labor federation has used plant-site visits, Arab-language broadcasts, fliers, and workplace posters to inform nonresident Palestinians of their legal rights and benefits. Histadrut began holding seminars on worker rights in 1988 for employees recruited through West Bank and Gaza labor exchanges.

The majority of the nonresident Palestinians who work in Israel bypass the employment service hiring system, thereby losing social benefits but also avoiding taxes and social contributions for themselves and their employers. Their wages and working conditions are often below Israeli legal standards, particularly in seasonal agriculture and small restaurants, garages, and construction sites where many work. Enforcement of minimum wage laws is not stringent. In 1989 the employment service carried out stricter enforcement of the requirement that they be hired through labor exchanges, but this has not halted the trend toward more Palestinians working in the informal sector. Employment service inspectors have begun fining employers $250 per illegally hired worker as an alternative to long drawn-out criminal court complaints.

According to the regulations, nonresident Palestinian workers are not allowed to stay overnight in Israel without a permit. The pressures of strikes in the territories, the occasional closure of the territories, and Palestinian activist efforts in Gaza to resist Israeli imposition of entry permits for all Gaza workers have induced more Palestinian workers to stay overnight in Israel illegally, often in substandard conditions. In practice, relatively few of the estimated thousands who regularly stay overnight are detained by the police. However, police have recently stepped up efforts to enforce the law against those workers who lack overnight and entry permits.

The 1989 report of the ILO Director General reviewed the situation of nonresident Palestinian workers in Israel. It reiterated its recommendations for action to combat illegal employment and eliminate inequalities with respect to benefits, working conditions, and job security. It called for restructuring the system of benefits so that workers' contributions would be used strictly for social security programs and not for other purposes.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

This report differs from most other reports contained in this volume in one fundamental respect: whereas other reports describe the relationship between the government and the governed in countries over which the governments in question exercise sovereignty, this report deals with lands under foreign military occupation. The lands now known as the "occupied territories" were occupied by Israel in the 1967 War. Israel has not been recognized to have sovereign rights over any of the occupied territories: the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Golan Heights, and East Jerusalem. Regarding East Jerusalem, Israel has asserted sovereignty and annexed it. The West Bank and the Gaza Strip are governed under Jordanian and British law, as modified by military orders. Israeli law and civilian administration have been extended to the Golan Heights.

The United States considers Israel's occupation to be governed by the Hague Regulations of 1907 and the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. Israel denies the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the West Bank and Gaza, but states that it observes the Convention's humanitarian provisions in those areas.

Since 1967, there have been episodic but sometimes intense outbreaks of violence within the occupied territories, reflecting Palestinian opposition to the occupation. In December 1987, there was a dramatic outburst of civilian unrest and violence. This has continued throughout 1989 and has been far more widespread and intensive than at any time heretofore. This has led to a severe crackdown by the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF).

The human rights situation in the occupied territories remains a source of deep concern to the United States. Overall, there were more Palestinian deaths in 1989 than in 1988. A total of 432 Palestinians were killed in intifada-related violence in 1989, of whom 304 were killed by Israeli security forces and settlers and 128 by other Palestinians; 13 Israelis, soldiers and civilians, were killed by Palestinians during 1989.

This unrest and violence, known as the intifada, has as its minimum goal the end of Israeli occupation, a goal strongly supported by Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. The leadership of the uprising, known as the United National Leadership of the Uprising (UNLU), attempts to direct and coordinate intifada activities. As it developed, groups of young people which have formed in individual localities but are loosely associated with each other and coordinate their tactics have, throughout the occupied territories, enforced business shut-downs and strikes, and directed attacks at Israeli military patrols and Israeli travelers, particularly settlers, whose cars are routinely pelted with stones. Occasionally firebombs have been thrown. The security forces have responded with tear gas, rubber and plastic bullets, and metal bullets.

Israeli occupation authorities have sought to end the intifada through widescale arrests, detention, raids on homes in which suspects were thought to reside, and more severe forms of punishment, including deportation. The rules of engagement of the Israeli Defense Forces provide for the use of force in case of self-defense in life-threatening situations, in the arrest of a suspect to a crime if the suspect resists, and dispersing a violent riot which endangers public order or the safety of soldiers. The rules allow the use of live fire only as a last resort and under defined procedures in these circumstances. The guidelines for the use of force stipulate that once force is no longer needed, it should no longer be applied. The Government of Israel makes clear to all forces serving in the occupied territories the need to adhere to the rules of engagement. However, violations of these rules have resulted in death and injuries. Only a relatively small number of such incidents have resulted in prosecution, and the sentences meted out have tended to be light.

An important aspect of the situation in the occupied territories in 1989 has been the significant increase in violence by Palestinians directed at other Palestinians. This has taken a number of forms, including assassinations, other acts of violence, and threats of violence. This took place in an environment influenced by some statements by various Palestinian leaders and the Unified Command promoting violence (e.g., a call by one UNLU leaflet to use knives, hatchets, and Molotov cocktails), tough Israeli security measures, the breakdown in law enforcement against conventional crime, and factional differences among Palestinians. The Unified Command has not disassociated itself from the phenomenon of intra-Palestinian violence but has sought to curb that element not under its control.

The strength of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement has contributed to this intra-Palestinian violence and atmosphere of intimidation. Hamas opposes any reconciliation with Israel, and it would appear that its appeal, albeit still limited to a minority of the Palestinian population, has also shaped intra-Palestinian tensions.

Israel's open, democratic society enables widespread access to data on and investigations of human rights in the territories, notwithstanding IDF restraints applied there. Israel has designated officials in the Ministry of Defense with whom U.S. officials discuss specific allegations of human rights violations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political killing is not condoned by Israel. However, in 1989 there were allegations that Palestinian activists were intentionally killed by Israeli security forces or Palestinians working for them. Israel categorically denied these charges.

Israeli settlers killed 11 Palestinians during marches, patrols, retaliatory raids, and other incidents. The IDF condemned such vigilantism and attempted to stop it. Charges were brought against one settler leader in 1989 for the 1988 slaying of a Palestinian, and he has been on trial. Suspects in other killings were released for lack of evidence after they failed to cooperate with police.

Palestinian attacks against Israeli soldiers and civilians in 1989 resulted in 13 deaths and 196 injuries. The authorities investigated these cases and prosecuted suspects in some of them.

During 1989, 128 Palestinians were killed by other Palestinians. Many were also wounded. There has been intimidation against some of those who are employed by the Civil Administration, and, in some cases, against some of those who have expounded the need for political compromise. Among those killed this year were a number of Arab policemen or local Arab village officials. Israelis state that a number of the victims of intra-Palestinian violence have been killed for seeking to express moderate views. Many of the victims were working with the Israeli security authorities, and Palestinians claim that some of them were armed and provided information leading to arrests of uprising activists. Palestinians state that other victims were habitual criminals or people killed due to private disputes.

Some of these attacks and acts of intimidation were carried out by young Palestinian activists, often masked, who were members of the "strike forces" which enforce directives relating to the conduct of the uprising. However, some attackers were members of self-styled Palestinian gangs which operated autonomously. The emergence of gangs called the Red Eagles and Black Panthers in Nablus in the northern West Bank has been a new development of concern both to Israelis and to most of the Palestinian community; these gangs and other individuals have also engaged in acts of violence as vendettas or as settling scores not connected with the intifada.

(For further discussion of casualties, see Sections l.c. and l.g.)

b. Disappearance

Israel does not sponsor or condone disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by Israeli law, and Israeli authorities assert they do not condone its use in the occupied territories. IDF orders forbid the use of force after the detention of a suspect and the cessation of violent resistance. Nevertheless, reports continue of harsh and demeaning treatment of prisoners and detainees, as well as allegations of beatings of suspects and detainees, including beating during house searches, which is contrary to IDF rules. At least 10 deaths can be attributed to beatings. Palestinians and international human rights groups claim that other cruel practices--including enforced standing in one position for prolonged periods, hooding, sleep deprivation, and cold showers--have continued since being confirmed in the 1987 report of the Landau judicial commission referred to in the 1988 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices. Physical and psychological pressures are particularly severe in incommunicado detention during investigation and interrogation.

Most convictions in security cases are based on confessions. An attorney is normally not allowed to see a client until after interrogation is completed and a confession, if obtained, has been made. Individuals may be held up to 14 days after arrest before the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is permitted access, which is often delayed.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

According to IDF figures, 9,138 Palestinians were being held in IDF prison facilities as of January 1, 1990. Two military detention centers were added to the nine existing facilities. The Ketziot detention facility was expanded and improved, but serious overcrowding continued. Conditions at military detention facilities varied. Several prison riots and hunger strikes protesting conditions occurred. In March a prisoner in Gaza died while under Shin Bet interrogation. An Israeli investigation concluded that the cause of death was natural (an ulcer), and there is no presumption of mistreatment. The investigation also held that lax supervision may have contributed to the death, and a medical orderly has been disciplined. Another prisoner in Gaza died December 19 under interrogation in Shin Bet custody. An official autopsy concluded that death was caused by internal stomach bleeding brought on by a blow. Israel initiated an investigation into this incident.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No new deportation orders were issued in 1989, but 26 Palestinians (including 5 journalists and 5 labor leaders) were deported in 1989, many after a lengthy appeals process up to the Israeli High Court of Justice, under deportation orders issued in 1988. Two others avoided formal deportation by signing agreements to remain abroad and avoid political activities for 5 years. The deportation process is characterized by a lack of formal charges and the use of secret evidence not disclosed to the suspect or his attorney. The United States considers deportations to contravene Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. The Israeli High Court of Justice has not accepted this view.

Palestinians under deportation orders may appeal to the Israeli High Court. The Court has overturned no deportation orders.

Administrative detention for alleged security reasons without formal charges was widespread in 1989. Israel maintains that administrative detention is used only against persons engaged in activities threatening security; however, in a number of cases persons appear to have been detained for nonviolent political activities. While the number of administrative detainees at any one time varies, IDF figures indicate that the number was 1,271 as of January 1, 1990. Most were detained under a 6-month order, although many orders have been renewed for a second or third time. In August the maximum length of detention under orders was extended to 12 months.

District military commanders may order administrative detentions without formal charges. A detainee may appeal the order to a military judge. Only a small percentage of orders is overturned on appeal. Secret evidence, not made available to detainees or their attorneys, is often used to support administrative detention orders. Rulings by military judges can be appealed to the High Court, which may review secret evidence, but there have been no reversals. According to the IDF, approximately 30 percent of detention orders were shortened or canceled on appeal in 1989 after portions of the detention period were served.

The authorities continued to transfer detainees and prisoners convicted of security offenses from the occupied territories to facilities in Israel, particularly the Ketziot detention camp in the Negev Desert and Megiddo Prison near Afula in northern Israel. Such transfers, in the view of the United States, contravene Article 76 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. However, the Israeli High Court dismissed a 1988 petition brought by Ketziot detainees and held that the Convention's provisions could not be enforced by an Israeli court since they had not been enacted into Israeli law.

Any soldier can arrest without warrant a person who has committed, or is suspected of having committed, a criminal or security offense. Persons arrested for common crimes in the occupied territories are usually provided the opportunity for bail, access to an attorney, and a statement of charges, although these rights are sometimes delayed. Individuals may be held in custody without a warrant for 96 hours, and may be held without formal charges for up to 18 days. The normal pretrial detention period is 60 days. A high court judge may approve unlimited 3-month extensions. Security detainees are usually denied bail and are routinely held without access to counsel for 18 days. Access may be denied indefinitely if officials believe granting it would impede the investigation. Many security suspects are arrested without warrants and may be so held for up to 96 hours. Denial of notification of arrest to immediate family members, attorneys, and consular officials is common and under law can be extended for up to 14 days. Incommunicado detention for a period of 8 days is permitted with a court order. Detainees are often not told the reasons for their detention. In September Israel announced improved family notification procedures. However, the problem of delayed notification continued.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Palestinians accused of nonsecurity offenses are tried publicly in local courts by Palestinian judges, except where jurisdiction has been transferred by military order. Palestinians accused of security offenses, which are broadly defined and, as administered, cover Palestinian nationalist activity of a nonviolent character, are tried in Israeli military courts before panels composed of one or three judges. Charges are brought by military commanders. Suspects are entitled to counsel. In 1989 there were long delays before trial because military courts were overburdened by the large number of uprising-related security cases. An increased number of judges and prosecutors was inadequate to cover the workload.

Most military trials are public, though access is controlled and in some cases limited. Consular officers are allowed to attend military court proceedings involving foreign citizens, but there have been delays in gaining admission. Acquittals are very rare in security cases. Most convictions in military courts are based on confessions. The absence of bail, long pretrial delays, and physical and psychological pressures increase the likelihood of confessions. These are usually recorded in Hebrew, which many defendants are unable to read.

In April a military appeals court staffed by active duty and reserve military officers was established with branches in the West Bank and Gaza. Appeals from decisions by three-judge panels may be brought by the defendant or the prosecution. Cases heard by single-judge panels, which can impose prison sentences of up to 5 years, may be appealed only with the permission of the court. According to Israel's Judge Advocate General, the court heard 25 cases through mid-October in which it accepted 15 defense appeals and 7 prosecution appeals.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Nonjudicial administrative orders of the military government may be appealed to area military commanders and to the High Court. The court almost never reverses Civil Administration or military orders based on security considerations.

Israeli settlers in the occupied territories accused of security and ordinary offenses are tried in the nearest Israeli district court under Israeli law. These courts are presided over by professional judges, and standards of due process and admissibility of evidence are stricter than in military courts.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Military authorities may enter private homes and institutions without a warrant in pursuit of security objectives. Forced entries, which are a regular part of IDF operations, have resulted in beatings, destruction of property, and arrests. Military orders also authorize the authorities to occupy buildings, or parts of buildings, as military observation points. Security officials frequently questioned Palestinians about their political views, and temporarily detained people. Demolition and sealing are nonjudicial administrative punishments ordered by the area military commander. Demolition and sealing of houses in the occupied territories are carried out pursuant to Article 119 of the Defence (Emergency) Regulations of 1945. Under the regulations, military commanders may order the demolition or sealing of any house from which they suspect a firearm has been discharged or bomb thrown, or any house situated in an area, town, village, quarter, or street the inhabitants of which they are satisfied have committed offenses against the regulations. The Israeli High Court ruled in January that houses of stone-throwers could be demolished. In July the High Court ruled that houses rented by offenders could be demolished and that owners have 48 hours to appeal a demolition order to the area military commander, who can waive this right in cases of "operational military need." Final appeals can be made to the High Court. The High Court has delayed orders but has not overturned any of them. In 1989, 170 Arab houses were demolished or sealed for security reasons (88 demolished, 82 sealed).

Owners are not allowed to rebuild, making the punishment one of indefinite duration. House demolition as punishment is enforced only against Arab residents of the occupied territories. The United States believes demolition and sealing as punishment of families contravenes the Fourth Geneva Convention. Israel, however, holds that the Convention permits demolition under imperative military considerations. The Israeli High Court has ruled that demolition is lawful in certain circumstances.

Mail and telephone conversations are sometimes monitored. Telephone service to specific areas is sometimes interrupted by the authorities.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

While the rules of engagement set forth the limits within which force may be used, there were nonetheless a number of instances in which these limits were exceeded. IDF regulations permit use of live fire only when soldiers' lives are in real and immediate danger, to halt fleeing suspects, or to disperse a violent riot. Only a specific attacker may be fired on; fire is to be directed at legs only; and fire may be directed at a fleeing suspect only if a serious felony is suspected, and as a last resort. Rules of fire were expanded in 1989 to allow firing at any fleeing masked individual. Soldiers may fire high-velocity ammunition only after exhausting other methods, including tear gas, rubber bullets, and warning shots.

IDF guidelines often were not followed, resulting in avoidable deaths and injuries. Most Palestinians were killed by high-velocity rounds shot by the IDF or border police in the course of incidents involving stones, firebombs, and fleeing suspects. Many deaths and wounds were from bullets in the head or upper body. Misuse of plastic and rubber bullets continued to result in death and serious injury. In January noncommissioned officers were authorized to fire them. Tear gas was occasionally used in houses and enclosed spaces in violation of instructions for its use, which can be potentially lethal.

Estimates vary of the number of casualties from violence in the occupied territories. Figures compiled from press, Palestinian, hospital, international organization, and Israeli government sources indicate that in the occupied territories a total of 432 Palestinians were killed in 1989 (including the casualties already described in Section 1.a.: 11 Palestinians killed by settlers, and 128 Palestinians killed by other Palestinians). Estimates of the number of Palestinians wounded varies from over 5,000 to up to 20,000. As also reported in Section 1.a., 13 Israelis were killed by Palestinians and 196 injured in the occupied territories during 1989.

According to the IDF, 435 cases of IDF conduct were investigated in 1989, of which 47 resulted in court-martial; some were dropped for lack of evidence, and others were sent to unit commanders for disciplinary action below the level of court martial. However, regulations often were not vigorously enforced, many cases of unjust killing did not result in disciplinary action, and punishments often were lenient. In May four members of an elite IDF unit were cleared of manslaughter charges and convicted on reduced charges of "causing grievous bodily harm" in the 1988 beating death of a Gazan. The court found their officers had issued "manifestly illegal orders" in authorizing the beatings, but there was no prosecution of the officers. The 9-month sentences of the soldiers were later commuted to 6 months. The High Court of Justice on December 24 ordered the court-martial of an IDF colonel, who had resigned after the IDF had severely reprimanded him for ordering the breaking of bones of detainees. The IDF Judge Advocate General's office announced December 25 that another IDF colonel would be court-martialed for having shot to death a Palestinian resident of the Bureij refugee camp in Gaza. The official investigation of an incident in Nahalin in April 1989, which had resulted in five Palestinian deaths, acknowledged serious errors. Several Israeli security personnel involved in Nahalin were transferred and disciplined.

There were several controversial incidents in 1989 involving the entry by Israeli security forces into Palestinian hospitals and clinics. Israel denies that it interferes with medical services and supplies as a matter of policy but acknowledges that at times its security forces enter hospitals to pursue and arrest fleeing rioters or those suspected of security offenses. It denies allegations of mistreating patients or staff and asserts that Palestinians use hospitals as refuges for uninjured rioters. Palestinians deny this and charge that security forces in some cases used tear gas and beat patients and staff, in contravention of international law. Palestinians allege that security forces at IDF roadblocks deliberately held up ambulances transporting wounded. Israel charges that ambulances are used to transport uninjured security suspects.

Israel, in response to a tax boycott, imposed a siege on the West Bank town of Beit Sahour. All access to the town was blocked for over 40 days, during which Israeli authorities seized merchandise and vehicles to pay outstanding tax bills. Israel claims these actions were justified by the tax boycott. Palestinians claim that certain Israeli tax practices are inconsistent with international law, including the imposition of a value added tax (VAT) and other taxes which did not exist before 1967, the summary seizure of private property, and Israel's failure to address whether the tax revenues were being utilized for the benefit of the population of the occupied territories.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

East Jerusalem is an active center of Arabic publication, including newspapers. There is no press elsewhere in the occupied territories. The Israeli authorities imposed tight restrictions on the Arabic press, citing broadly defined security reasons. Publications in East Jerusalem must submit to the military for prior censorship all copy relating to the security, public order, and safety of Israel and the occupied territories. Some reports and editorials related to the uprising and Palestinian political goals were permitted, but articles and editorials were routinely expurgated. Arabic translations of uprising-related news stories which had previously appeared in the Hebrew language press were routinely censored from the Arabic press.

The display of Palestinian political symbols, such as flags, national colors, and graffiti, is punishable by fines, detention, or imprisonment. According to the IDF, very few persons were sentenced in 1989 solely for displaying nationalist symbols, although this charge may be levied along with other more serious charges for violent activity. Public expression of support for the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), its component factions, Muslim extremist groups (such as Hamas), and other banned organizations is prohibited.

No broadcast media originate from the occupied territories. The authorities have jammed inflammatory radio broadcasts from neighboring countries. In August the use of fax machines in the Gaza Strip was banned. A military order closing a prominent Palestinian press service was renewed, and two other Palestinian press services were closed.

For alleged security offenses, Israeli security authorities administratively detained at least 20 journalists, interrogated numerous others, and raided newspaper offices.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

A permit is required for publications imported into the occupied territories. Imported materials may be censored or banned for anti-Semitic or anti-Israeli content or support of Palestinian nationalism. In addition to temporary restrictions on individual publications, there were temporary bans on the distribution of all East Jerusalem Arab newspapers in the West Bank and Gaza on four occasions. Possession of banned materials, such as uprising leaflets, is punishable by fine and imprisonment. The IDF periodically declared all or parts of the West Bank and Gaza closed military areas, one primary effect of which was to exclude journalists except under military escort. Reports by foreign journalists are subject to censorship under a system of self-regulation.

Israel kept all Palestinian universities in the West Bank and Gaza closed throughout 1989, allegedly because they were contributing to violence. The vocational, secondary, and elementary schools in the West Bank, closed in January, reopened in July and August but were closed again in mid-November. Schools in Gaza and East Jerusalem were open for most of the school year. Alternate, off-campus classrooms organized by parents and teachers were banned on security grounds, although some continued to operate.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association.

Military orders ban public gatherings of 10 or more people without a permit. (No permits were requested in 1989.) Political parties and other groups, including some labor unions, viewed as political are banned. Private organizations must be registered, though some operate without licenses.

Palestinian charitable, community, professional, and self-help organizations were permitted to operate unless their activities were viewed as overtly political or supporting the uprising. Persons involved in such activities were arrested, interrogated, administratively detained, or denied permission to travel.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is respected in the occupied territories. No group or sect is banned on religious grounds. Muslim and Christian holy days are observed. Both faiths operate schools and institutions (although religious schools were subject to the same extended closure as other West Bank schools). Religious publications circulate subject to the laws for publications detailed in Section 2.a.

In the wake of a demonstration in the al-Aqsa mosque area in Jerusalem, which resulted in some worshipers at the Western Wall below being pelted with stones, the Israeli authorities restricted access to the Al-Aqsa mosque during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and the Id al-Adha holiday. Security forces raided mosques and confiscated mosque loudspeakers, claiming security reasons. There was no indication that such raids or arrests of Muslim clergy were directed at religious freedom but rather at political or security-related activities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Occupied Territories, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement was restricted periodically in the West Bank and Gaza by IDF curfews, which were often prolonged to discourage protest activities. Hundreds of curfews, some lasting several weeks, were imposed. During curfews, people were usually allowed to leave their houses to obtain food and medical care for short, defined periods. These curfews caused severe hardship.

All residents of the West Bank and/or Gaza were sometimes prevented from traveling to East Jerusalem or Israel. Peace advocacy groups from Israel were sometimes forbidden to visit Palestinian villages, for alleged security reasons.

Thousands of Palestinians in the occupied territories travel abroad each year. Israel imposed travel restraints on some political activists and on family members of some deportees. There were cases in which young men were denied permission to travel unless they agreed to remain abroad for an extended time. Exit travel permits were delayed for some Palestinians returning abroad for work or study after visiting relatives in the occupied territories. According to figures from the Islamic Waqf, which supervises mosques and Islamic properties in the occupied territories, over 90 percent of the Muslims who applied were permitted to make the hajj. Palestinians claim that those denied permission were denied because of nationalist activity.

There are no obstacles to emigration. Israel sometimes refuses to renew laissez-passers of Palestinians from the occupied territories who live or work abroad on the grounds that they have abandoned their residence, even though they may not have acquired foreign citizenship. Palestinians who obtain foreign citizenship are ordinarily not allowed to resume residence in the occupied territories. They are permitted to return as tourists only and sometimes are denied entry entirely. Enforcement of the 3-month limit for tourist visas for stays by Palestinians is uneven.

Entry or residency permission is frequently denied spouses, relatives, and children following the emigration of the head of the household. According to press reports, at least 100 spouses were deported for lack of residence permits in 1989. Persons who marry Palestinians in the occupied territories generally are not allowed to take up residence there. Israel has also denied the return of former West Bank residents who were not present in the territories, for whatever reason, at the time of the 1967 census.

Requests for family reunification far exceed the numbers of those granted. Palestinians say thousands of family reunification requests are pending. According to the Government of Israel, in 1988 and 1989 a total of 3,266 family reunification applications were filed for the West Bank, of which 695 were approved. For Gaza, 278 applications were filed in 1988 and, through July 1989, 219 were filed. Figures on the number approved for Gaza are not available. Israeli officials acknowledge that family reunification is limited for demographic and political reasons and assert that the laws of occupation do not require Israel to permit immigration into the territories. Restrictions on residence, tourist visas, reentry, and family reunification do not apply to Jews resident in the occupied territories, whether or not they are Israeli citizens.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIESSection 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

The West Bank and Gaza are ruled under occupation by Israel's Ministry of Defense through a military governor and civil administration. Palestinians have no means to participate in significant policy decisions concerning land and resource use and planning, taxation, trade, and industry. Municipal elections were last held in 1976 in the West Bank, and most mayors elected then were later dismissed on security grounds. Palestinians appointed by Israel have filled most vacancies. Some appointed mayors have resigned or stopped working because of the uprising and, in some cases, threats from other Palestinians. One Israeli-appointed municipal secretary was killed by other Palestinians.

East Jerusalem is governed as part of Israel. Arab residents of East Jerusalem are permitted to vote in municipal elections but have largely boycotted them. In the 1989 Jerusalem elections, less than 5 percent of Jerusalem's Arab population voted.

Israel normally permits international human rights groups to visit the occupied territories. Israel cooperates with a number of such organizations, and officials are generally available for meetings on human rights issues. However, some of these organizations often complain that Israel's responses are inadequate, not all inquiries receive answers, and some groups' requests for meetings with officials or access to detention facilities are denied.

Many local groups--Israeli, Palestinian, and mixed--are concerned with human rights. Their publications and statements are generally allowed to circulate in the occupied territories. They are allowed to hold press conferences. Individuals working for a prominent Palestinian legal rights organization were detained, beaten, prevented from traveling freely, and harassed at military checkpoints.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status.

Israeli settlers in the occupied territories are subject to Israeli law, while Palestinians live under military occupation law. Under the dual system of governance applied to Palestinians--both Muslim and Christian--and Israelis, Palestinians are treated less favorably than Israeli settlers on a broad range of issues, including the right to due process, right of residency, freedom of movement, sale of crops and goods, land and water use, and access to health and social services. Israeli settlers involved in security violations have been treated far more leniently than Palestinians guilty of similar offenses. Offenses against Israelis are investigated and prosecuted more vigorously than offenses against Palestinians. Israelis have residency rights in the occupied territories under Israel's Law of Return, regardless whether they have foreign nationality.

Israel continued to place land under its control for military purposes, roads, settlements, and other purposes which restrict use by Palestinians and discriminate in favor of

Israeli settlers against Palestinians. Palestinians do not participate in the Higher Planning Council, which plans land use in the occupied territories and exercises planning powers transferred from local, municipal, and village councils in 1971. Issuance of permits to Palestinians for house construction is tightly restricted.

The Israeli Civil Administration provides basic services. In 1989 such services were sharply reduced due to the economic disruption caused by the uprising and a Palestinian tax boycott. There was no public accounting of revenue and expenditure.

Palestinians and persons of Arab descent entering the West Bank via the Jordan River bridges, regardless of citizenship, are subject to extensive searches, and many complain of harsh or humiliating treatment. Israel limits the funds visitors or residents may bring into the occupied territories for Palestinian use to about $300 per person per month unless Israeli authorities grant permission in advance. There are no limits on funds for Israeli settlers.

There is no legal discrimination against women. Violence against women is not legally condoned. The participation rate of women in the labor force is low, and exists primarily in traditional professions and occupations, although there are exceptions. Women's societies flourish and play an important social role.

Section 6 Worker Rights

The applicable sections for West Bank and Gaza Palestinians working in Jerusalem and Israel are contained in the country report for Israel. Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem have the same rights and are governed by the same law as workers in Israel.

a. The Right of Association

The labor law in force in the West Bank is Jordanian Law No. 21 of 1960, as amended by military orders. It permits workers to join unions without prior government authorization. It also permits the formation of unions by any group of 20 or more workers from the same trade or workplace, with prior government authorization. The International Labor Organization (ILO) Director General's report has noted that the Israeli authorities have approved no applications since 1979. No petitions were submitted in 1989. Out of approximately 90 unions functioning in the West Bank, 31 are licensed.

Israeli authorities, citing security concerns, actively discourage union activities in the West Bank. The authorities state that the West Bank umbrella federations and many individual unions are fronts for illegal political organizations rather than trade unions. Israel claims that no legitimate union activities are disrupted and that its actions are intended to prevent illicit political activity.

More than 100,000 West Bank Palestinians, representing a full range of blue-collar and white-collar professions, were members of approximately 90 trade unions in 1989. Unions belong to one of three organizations, all calling themselves the General Federation of Trade Unions in the West Bank (GFTU). The largest GFTU claims membership in the

International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU), although the Tunis-based Palestinian Trade Union Federation (PTUF) is ICATU's affiliate of record. Two GFTU's have applied for membership in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). There is no connection between any of the West Bank unions and the Government of Israel or the Israeli Histadrut Labor Federation.

Military Order (M.O.) 825 of 1980 requires that Palestinian unions present lists of candidates for union office to the Civil Administration (CIVAD) for approval 30 days before elections. CIVAD has said that it will enforce M.O. 825 by disallowing the election of candidates not approved in advance. The order authorizes the CIVAD to remove from the lists any candidates who have been convicted of a felony or misdemeanor. Because Palestinian trade unionists fear that the CIVAD will use the order to exclude those candidates who have served in administrative detention, they refuse to adhere to the order.

Like all organizations and individuals in the occupied territories, Palestinian labor organizations are subject to disciplinary measures for engaging in political activities. The premises of the GFTU in Nablus remained closed on the grounds they had been used for political rather than union activities. Union-related meetings of 10 or more persons must have the prior approval of the CIVAD.

There has been no dissolution of unions by administrative or legislative action. Under prevailing labor law, unions have the right to strike only after submitting a complaint to the CIVAD for mandatory arbitration. No strikes have been authorized under this procedure. However, authorities have not interfered with unauthorized strikes called over strictly labor issues. More than 20 such strikes took place in the West Bank in 1989.

Union leaders have been among those detained for alleged security offenses. GFTU leaders have been denied permission to travel to ILO conferences, but they and their representatives have been permitted to travel abroad at the invitation of labor organizations in other countries. Delegations from the ICFTU and foreign trade unions, in addition to the annual ILO mission, visited the West Bank in 1989 and met with the GFTU leaders.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is protected. The CIVAD does not record collective agreements because some unions and/or their leaders are not legally recognized. However, most union-employer agreements are honored without interference from the authorities. The only legal forum for labor grievances in the West Bank is the CIVAD's military court system. Palestinians view the system as unsympathetic and prefer to use the traditional technique of mediation by community notables. There are no export processing zones in the occupied territories.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no forced or compulsory labor in the occupied territories. Under existing law applicable to the occupied territories, there is no statutory ban on forced labor.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Forced labor is, however, banned (except under certain exceptional circumstances) by the Fourth Geneva Convention.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

A 1978 military order raised the minimum working age in the West Bank and Gaza to 14, and there are no known instances of child labor in industry or construction.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

In the West Bank, Jordanian law allows a maximum workweek of 48 hours, except for certain hotel, food service, and cinema employees, whose workweek is 54 hours. In Gaza, Israeli authorities amended this law to provide for a 45-hour workweek for day laborers and a 40-hour week for salaried employees. There is no effective enforcement of maximum workweek laws. There is no minimum wage provision in the West Bank or Gaza. The Ministry of Labor's inspection service is charged with enforcing health and safety standards in the West Bank and Gaza, but no inspections take place.

JORDAN

Jordan is a hereditary monarchy with a constitution granting the King broad powers. The King forms and dissolves governments and is the ultimate arbiter of policy. The Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers (Cabinet) exercise considerable responsibility for many issues. The Constitution also provides for a bicameral parliament and an independent judiciary. New elections for the Parliament, which was dissolved in 1988, were held on November 8, 1989.

Martial law has been in effect since the 1967 war against Israel, which ended with Israel's occupation of the West Bank. Under martial law, the General Intelligence Directorate (GID) and Public Security Department (PSD) have broad powers to monitor segments of the population that they believe might pose a threat to the security of the regime. Certificates of good conduct from the GID are needed for all public sector jobs, and for many private sector jobs as well. The GID must also approve any public gatherings or activities sponsored by private clubs and organizations. Under martial law, some detained persons have been denied the opportunity to communicate with their families or attorneys for varying periods, sometimes for several months.

Jordan has a mixed economy, with government participation in certain sectors, largely in communications, transportation, and heavy industry. Jordan has limited natural resources but in the past has received up to $2.5 billion annually in workers' remittances and financial grants from its Gulf neighbors. It now faces severe budgetary constraints as these revenues have fallen off sharply along with the price of oil. Currency depreciation and steep increases in the cost of living combined to create a public furor which culminated in disturbances in April 1989. As one result of the unrest, Prime Minister Rifa'i resigned and a new Cabinet was named, headed by Sharif Zaid Ben Shaker.

The new Government is committed to economic restructuring and export-led growth and development, and moved quickly to implement an International Monetary Fund (IMF) economic adjustment program that aims at reducing government spending and stimulating the development of Jordan's private sector in order to offset the decline in foreign assistance and remittances.

After the November elections, the new Government took several significant steps toward political liberalization, including the release of 48 political detainees, the transfer of jurisdiction over several categories of crimes from military to civilian courts, easing of press restrictions, and elimination of travel and work restrictions imposed under security provisions for political beliefs. However, the absence of political parties, government intervention in the press, the continuance of martial law, and the wide scope of powers exercised by the police remain as important human rights concerns.

JORDAN

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Government does not sanction political killing. While there have been political killings by nongovernmental groups in the past, there were none in 1989. Summary executions do not occur in Jordan.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances were reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Jordanian law provides for the decent treatment of prisoners, and judicial authorities have been known to dismiss cases based on apparent mistreatment of prisoners. However, there are occasional reports of ill-treatment of detainees by the security authorities. The Director of Public Security maintains a special office to handle any public complaints of abuse by security officers.

Prison conditions are Spartan by Western standards, but not intentionally degrading. Jordanian authorities hosted a penal foundations conference in August 1989, in part to exhibit their new rehabilitation center at Al Swaga. The center is the focus of a 3-year effort to upgrade prison facilities, manifesting the reorientation of incarceration in Jordan from simple removal from society to actual rehabilitation. All prisoners are accessible to the International Committee of the Red Cross, which regularly inspects all detention facilities. Amnesty International (AI) published reports of ill-treatment of arrestees by security forces following the disturbances in April. AI said some prisoners were beaten and one woman was beaten, insulted, and held with those incarcerated for criminal offenses. In its 1989 report covering 1988, AI noted that it had received new reports of the torture of political prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although Jordan has been under martial law since 1967, most persons are placed in custody by Jordanian authorities in accordance with the criminal code, which requires imposition of charges within 48 hours. Persons may then be detained pending trial for 15 days, or longer if a court approves the prosecution's request for an extension. The criminal code is generally applied to persons arrested for designated martial law crimes, which include espionage, bribery of public officials, trafficking in narcotics or weapons, black-marketing, and security offenses. In the past, security forces have apparently detained incommunicado (or with limited outside access) some persons suspected of cross-border infiltration and security crimes.

The GID can detain a person without trial for varying periods. However, under martial law provisions, such arrests should be confirmed within a maximum of 15 days by the Prime Minister or by local administrators serving as military governors. Security detainees can be held without charge for indeterminate periods or can be formally charged and brought before the martial court for trial.

In 1989 up to 70 persons were in detention for 4 months after the disturbances in April. None was charged. In early September, all but four were released. In December the Government released 48 political detainees.

A petition for judicial review of the legality of the arrest of any detained person may be brought before the High Court of Justice but is unlikely to be granted in security cases.

Exile is forbidden by the Constitution and is not practiced in Jordan. For a discussion of forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

All criminal cases, except martial law crimes and crimes committed by military personnel, are tried in civilian courts. The legal code and the independent selection of judges help to assure a fair trial. Trials are held in open court, except in a few cases such as those involving sexual offenses. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty and have the right to be represented by counsel, to prepare a defense, to cross-examine witnesses, and to refrain from giving self-incriminating testimony. The court appoints a lawyer for those who cannot afford one if the potential sentence is execution or life imprisonment. An effective appeals process may be utilized by either the defendant or the prosecution, except in those cases tried before the Martial Law Court, which has no provision for appeal.

Civilian judges must demonstrate legal competence in written and oral examinations before selection by a board composed of three judges, the Chief Attorney General, and the Under Secretary of the Justice Ministry. A procedure exists for disciplining judges accused of serious transgressions of the law, i.e., "bad conduct." Penalties for those found guilty range from payment of fines to removal from office.

Martial law crimes are adjudicated in a military court before a panel of three military officers trained in the law. In practice, the military court observes the law of criminal procedure and defendants are given the same rights as in a civilian court. However, AI has expressed concern that trials by the Martial Law Court "fell below international standards for fair trial." No right of appeal exists from decisions of the military court; however, sentences of the court for martial law offenses must be ratified by the Prime Minister in his capacity as Military Governor. He has authority to increase, reduce, or annul the sentences. The cases are reviewed for fairness by a legal advisor or the Justice Minister before the Prime Minister makes a decision. The military court also adjudicates all crimes committed by military personnel. In these cases, the commander-in-chief of the armed forces must ratify the sentences.

In 1989 the Government established a special committee to review the convictions of persons convicted for political offenses. In December it transferred authority over several crimes from military to civil courts; military courts will no longer have jurisdiction over the following issues: violations of the Combating Communism Law; affiliation with, or membership in, an unlicensed or banned political party; attacks on government or military officials; violations of orders issued by the military governor; murder for revenge; weapons violations; forgery; and passport fraud.

Religious courts have jurisdiction over most family matters, such as marriage, divorce, child custody, or guardianship. The Shari'a (Muslim religious law) applies to Muslims in these areas, and a Shari'a court system handles disputes. Ecclesiastical courts handle similar matters for members of the main Christian sects. The civil courts administer the cases of other religious groups. Shari'a law, however, must be applied to questions of inheritance for all communities.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Jordanian authorities respect the inviolability of the home. Police searches of homes require warrants, except in rare cases involving security or the hot pursuit of fleeing suspects. There are allegations that security personnel sometimes monitor telephones and correspondence, but the practice is evidently not widespread.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for the freedoms of speech and press but permits censorship under martial law. Such censorship has become institutionalized over the years, and journalists do not feel free openly to criticize the Government. Jordanians freely express wide-ranging opinions, including criticism of the Government, in informal settings. Public debate is muted in the state-owned radio and television networks. Government ownership of newspapers was raised to over 50 percent during the tenure of Zaid Rifa'i's Government in early 1989. As a result of self-censorship, editorial opinion generally reflects the Government's views. However, reporting of the current economic and financial developments has been exceptionally frank. The media have also begun to address politically sensitive issues, such as the lifting of martial law and the ban on political parties.

The Government frequently provides editors with guidance on key foreign policy and security matters. On other issues, government interference is sporadic and critical commentary, though occasionally tolerated, is limited. Currently, all journalists must register with the Information Ministry and join the Journalists' Association. Foreign newspapers and magazines are widely available, although they are subject to censorship.

On December 11 the Government returned the management of the four major newspaper establishments to their original directors, who had been dismissed in 1988 and replaced by government-appointed management following disagreements between the Government and the press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public demonstrations require a permit, rarely granted, from the Interior Minister. All organizations require government approval and may not have political objectives. Government surveillance of public meetings, university activities, and organization gatherings is pervasive. Professional associations for doctors, engineers, lawyers, pharmacists, and similar professional groups exist. Professionals must join these associations in order to practice. The associations maintain influence with the Government in their respective fields and defend the interests of their members. However, until recently, they have tended to follow the government line. Officers are elected by the membership. Executive committees of clubs are vetted by the GID.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Well over 90 percent of Jordanians practice Islam, the state religion. The Government adheres to the constitutional guarantee of freedom of worship. The approximately 5 to 10 percent Christian minority is indigenous, and holds senior government positions in numbers far exceeding their proportion of the population. There appears to be little discrimination against most religious minorities, who are well represented at all levels in the government, military, and business community. Laws making harassment of religious minorities a crime are enforced. A variety of Christian groups--including Catholic, Orthodox, Armenian, and Protestant--maintain churches, schools, hospitals, and other institutions. A small Baha'i community also exists. A few foreign clergymen reside in Jordan. Although proselytizing among Muslims is forbidden, conversion by Muslims is not a criminal offense.

All religious groups must register with the authorities in order to obtain official permission to operate in Jordan. However, there are instances wherein denominations have failed to register but are nonetheless permitted to meet without harassment.

The only religious group restricted by the Government is the Jehovah's Witnesses. The Government states that it has no objection to the Witnesses' doctrine, but it is illegal for them to organize or assemble in Jordan. The Witnesses' religion prohibits them from taking oaths of allegiance, saluting flags, or serving in the armed forces. These religious restrictions are perceived as evidence that Witnesses are unreliable and disloyal.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement within Jordan is unrestricted, except in certain military zones. With a few exceptions (primarily military personnel and reservists who need permission for foreign travel), the Government does not restrict emigration or foreign travel. However, a woman must present the written consent of her husband, father, closest male relative, or male guardian to obtain a passport and may be required to present the same type of permission when she wishes to travel abroad without her husband.

Children may have to present proof of their father's consent to leave Jordan. Citizens who have left Jordan have the right to return. There are no reported cases of revocation of citizenship for political reasons. Some citizens returning to Jordan, particularly those who have traveled to Communist countries, are questioned by the GID. Jordanians may possess dual nationality.

JORDAN

In December the Government eliminated travel and work restrictions imposed by security provisions respecting political beliefs, and indicated that passports previously held by security authorities would be released.

Jordan has faced a long-term refugee problem from the influx of Palestinians made homeless by the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars. According to the most recent statistics, Palestinian refugees and their descendants registered with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) on the East Bank total 870,490. UNRWA estimates that another 200,000 refugees have failed to register for one reason or another. While these refugees are free to live anywhere, almost 216,000 of them still live in 10 refugee camps scattered across Jordan. The total includes refugees from the 1948 Arab-Israeli war and does not include a large but undetermined number of other persons from the West Bank, Gaza, and Israel who have settled on the East Bank since 1948. All Palestinian refugees residing in Jordan prior to August 1988 can obtain fully valid Jordanian passports. They have the unrestricted right to live, work, and own property in Jordan. Palestinians residing on the West Bank may obtain passports valid for 2 years. The Government also issues temporary Jordanian passports to between 26,000 and 27,000 Gazans resident on the East Bank who can prove they were displaced prior to 1971. Jordan is unique among Arab states in having granted full citizenship to all Palestinians on the East Bank, i.e., to a refugee population exceeding its own indigenous population at the time. The Interior Ministry routinely grants permits for travel between the East Bank and Israeli-occupied territories. Jordan has granted asylum even in cases which have strained relations with neighboring states.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Executive and legislative powers are constitutionally vested in the King, who rules with the assistance of an appointed Council of Ministers. The Constitution may not be amended without the approval of the King. Thus, Jordanian citizens, although constitutionally entitled to elect members of the lower house of Parliament, are not ultimately in a position to change their system of government.

The Parliament was dissolved in 1988 as part of a policy to sever Jordan's ties to the West Bank, but new elections were held in November 1989. Parliament is composed of an appointed Senate and an elected lower house. The Parliament is overshadowed by the executive branch but has the right to propose laws and approve (or reject) treaties and laws proposed by the Council of Ministers. The Parliament also has the right to pass a vote of no-confidence in the Council of Ministers, thus obliging the Prime Minister and his Cabinet to resign. The Constitution also gives the King broad scope to postpone the election of a new lower house or the recall of the previous house. The Government has allowed considerable political activity by "political groups" in preparation for the parliamentary elections. Most municipal and town councils are elected by popular vote. The person receiving the highest number of votes is traditionally confirmed as mayor by the Minister for Municipal Affairs and then by the Prime Minister.

Women were enfranchised in 1973 and may also run for public office. King Hussein appointed female cabinet ministers in 1979 and in 1984 and has encouraged the participation of women in the political process.

Article 16 of the Constitution allows Jordanians to establish political parties, but such parties are currently outlawed. However, several informal political groups operate openly. All persons seek elected office as independents. Article 18 of the election law amended in 1989 states that candidates may not belong to an unlawful organization, and that "an unlawful organization is one whose principles, goals, and objectives are incompatible with the provisions of the Constitution."

The Government is generally responsive to inquiries on individual human rights cases. Representatives of foreign embassies and international humanitarian organizations are allowed access to prisoners and detainees. The Government has often responded positively to recommendations from such representatives. In its Report covering 1988, AI reported several instances in which it had communicated its concern to the Government about alleged human rights violations and noted that the Government had "responded to Amnesty International's appeals and inquiries on a number of occasions."

The Jordanian Lawyers' Professional Association, which has a human rights committee, dramatically increased its advocacy on behalf of political prisoners in 1989. Other local organizations and ad hoc groups also occasionally issue statements and petitions on such human rights concerns as Palestinian rights and the ban on political parties. The Jordan Federation for Business and Professional Women hosted an Arab conference on human rights in Amman in April. Jordan has played an active role in the United Nations Human Rights Commission, and the Crown Prince is a cofounder of the Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues. The International Committee of the Red Cross maintains an office in Amman and has access to detainees.

In general, there is no official discrimination based on ethnicity or religion. Equality between men and women is the legal norm. In practice, however, certain traditions constrain women's freedoms, and entry of women into professional and academic realms, traditionally the preserve of men, can spark resentment and opposition.

Nevertheless, the role of women in society has been changing in recent years. Women now account for half the student body at the elite University of Jordan. Women today comprise roughly 12 to 20 percent of the labor force, compared to 4 percent in 1975. In 1989 the military, for the first time, set up a special basic training course for women, who serve in both the officer and enlisted ranks. An increasing number of women operate businesses and work in such professions as medicine, engineering, banking, and architecture. In 1990 the number of women lawyers in the Bar Association is expected to double, from 90 to 180. However, professional women and women's associations believe that more remains to be done to increase female participation in these areas. There are female police officers, and two Jordanian women fly for Royal

Jordanian Airlines, which qualified its first female airline captain before any scheduled U.S. airline.

Gauging the extent of physical abuse of women is difficult as it is almost never discussed publicly. The Koran allows a husband to discipline his wife, which could be interpreted, in extreme cases, as a license to discipline with force. Because of this Koranic principle, the issue is considered a personal one, and this view is reflected in the attitude of the police and the judiciary. Sources in the medical field say that while they know wife beating takes place, the victim is constrained by familial and sociocultural norms from seeking outside recourse to assistance, both medical and legal. No statistics are available.

Consular cases involving U.S. citizen wives of Jordanian men confirm that the problem exists and at most levels of society. Technically, wife beating is illegal and grounds for divorce. However, familial and tribal relationships serve to inhibit pressing charges; those same cultural constraints make gathering evidence of abuse next to impossible. Legal sources report that the filing of divorce cases or assault cases by a wife against her husband based on the grounds of wife beating is very rare.

In matters of inheritance and divorce, women are treated differently. Under Islamic law, sons inherit twice as much as daughters. However, the son is required to use his inheritance for the maintenance of his mother and sisters, while a female is free to retain her inheritance for herself. Likewise, a man may obtain a divorce more easily than a woman, but he may be required to pay considerable compensation based on the marriage contract. Women may also gain and retain custody of children until the children obtain their legal majority, but they may lose custody if they remarry or choose to live outside the country.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Jordanians are free to join labor unions. About 10 percent of the Jordanian work force is unionized. Nineteen unions comprise the Jordan Federation of Trade Unions (JFTU). Several other unions do not belong to the JFTU. Unions have almost no political role and confine themselves to representing their membership in such areas as wages, working conditions, and workers' layoffs. Their effectiveness varies widely. The JFTU actively participates in international organizations such as the International Labor Organization. Strikes are only permitted if the Ministry of Labor fails to act to arbitrate a labor dispute within 2 weeks after receiving a complaint from a union. In fact, strikes almost never occur. Strikes are not legal for government employees, who comprise about half of the labor force. United Nations Relief Works Agency employees staged a 1-day strike in August 1989 over pay scales.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Unions in Jordan have the right to organize and bargain collectively. The unions comprising the JFTU function freely and without government interference or antiunion discrimination, in accordance with Article 23 of the Constitution. In 1988 the JFTU rejoined the International Association of Arab Trade Unions (IAATU). The officers of each union, as well as the JFTU executive committee, are elected annually by secret ballot. JFTU member unions regularly engage in collective bargaining with employers. Negotiations cover a wide range of issues, including salaries, safety standards, working conditions, and health and life insurance for workers and their families. If a union is unable to reach agreement with an employer, the issue is referred to the Ministry of Labor for arbitration. Union-employer-government relations are generally tranquil, so arbitration is rarely necessary.

JORDAN

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is forbidden by the Constitution and not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Children under age 16 are not permitted to work except in the case of professional apprentices, who are allowed to leave the standard educational track and begin part-time (6 hours a day, no night shifts) training at age 13.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Jordan's workers are protected by a comprehensive labor code enforced by a staff of 30 full-time inspectors of the Ministry of Labor. Other Ministry of Labor employees augment the inspection staff on a part-time basis. Duty-free trade zones are in operation at Aqaba and Zarqa, and are governed by the same labor provisions that apply countrywide. The Government prepares and adjusts periodically a minimum wage schedule for various trades, based on recommendations of an advisory panel composed of representatives of workers, employers, and the Government. Maximum working hours are 48 hours per week, with the exception of hotel, bar, restaurant, and movie theater employees, who can work up to 54 hours. Workers are entitled to a weekly day of rest, rest intervals during the workday, 2 weeks' annual paid leave, 2 weeks' annual sick leave, and severance pay. The law specifies a number of health and safety requirements for workers, including bathrooms, drinking water, safety equipment, and first aid equipment. Jordan also has a workers' compensation law. The Government appears to administer and enforce its labor laws fairly.

As part of a campaign to improve occupational and public safety, the Government has created a committee to recommend standards and regulations. The committee conducts public awareness campaigns and is studying international safety practices. Jordan's social security laws cover all companies with more than five employees.

KUWAIT

Kuwait's Amirs, drawn from the al-Sabah family, have governed the country, in consultation with prominent commercial families and other community leaders, for over 200 years. The 1962 Constitution provides for an elected National Assembly and details the powers and relationships of the branches of the Government and the rights of the citizens. However, the Amir can suspend any or all provisions of the Constitution by decree. The National Assembly was dissolved from 1976 to 1981 and again in 1986 when the Amir cited a breakdown in executive and legislative branch cooperation at a time when the nation faced serious economic and security problems. Since then, the Amir has ruled by decree. In addition to suspending the National Assembly, the 1986 decrees imposed prior censorship on the press and added to existing restrictions on the political and civil rights of all Kuwaiti residents. The Government, however, rarely violates the integrity of the individual. There is an independent judicial system.

Kuwait's Ministry of the Interior supervises the country's security apparatus, including the Criminal Investigation Department (CID), which is responsible for ordinary criminal cases, and the Kuwait State Security (KSS), which investigates internal security-related offenses. Both are active in investigations of terrorism and both work in collaboration with the uniformed police. The security organizations can deport foreigners summarily.

The people of Kuwait enjoy a high standard of living, with an estimated per capita gross domestic product of $10,370 in 1988. Most of the country's income derives from oil production and commercial investment. Despite the emphasis Kuwait places on its open-market economy, expatriates are not allowed to own property or majority shares in significant local businesses and are subject to restrictive labor laws, which were further tightened in 1989.

Kuwait's human rights situation in 1989 continued to be affected by security concerns stemming from the large expatriate population and Iranian-inspired subversion. According to newly revised census figures, Kuwaiti citizens are now a 28-percent minority in their own country, accounting in 1988 for only 535,000 out of a population of 1.9 million. The Palestinian community numbers about 300,000. Although an Iran-Iraq cease-fire took effect in 1988, the Government remained preoccupied in 1989 with the internal security threat, and serious restrictions on the civil rights of both Kuwaitis and non-Kuwaitis, many of them imposed by the Government during the Iran-Iraq war, remained in place. The principal human rights concerns included mistreatment of prisoners (in both security and criminal cases); lack of due process in trials of security cases; restrictions on freedoms of speech, press, and assembly and the right of citizens to change their government; and discrimination and violence against women.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of government-instigated or condoned killings.

KUWAIT

b. Disappearance

There were no reported disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were credible reports of beatings and physical abuse of prisoners in Kuwait's prisons and deportation centers in 1989, including beatings on the soles of prisoners' feet. There were unconfirmed reports again in 1989 that torture was used by state security police to extract information from some of the 22 Shi'a convicted in June of plotting to overthrow the Government.

In routine criminal cases, police and security officials occasionally employ physical violence in apprehending and interrogating persons suspected of committing criminal acts. Non-Kuwaitis are more likely to receive rough treatment than Kuwaitis, as are persons suspected of serious crimes. There were credible reports that an expatriate received a severe beating from local police after he was caught in an illicit sexual relationship with a young Kuwaiti woman. The beating was used to extract a promise of marriage to the Kuwaiti woman in lieu of a jail sentence. Evidence of mistreatment during interrogation is a defense in Kuwait's courts, and confessions or other evidence obtained through torture are not admissible.

By and large, guards treat inmates humanely in Kuwait's prisons, but there have been credible reports of occasional beatings. Kuwait's legal process, based primarily on the Napoleonic code, is also inspired by Islamic law, but punishments such as mutilation or stoning are not permitted.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and imprisonment are prohibited by the Constitution. In 1989 there were no reports of persons being detained for political reasons, and no reports of arbitrary detention. The penal code affirms a person's right to due process and stipulates that a detainee may not be held for more than 4 days without charge. A prosecutor's approval is required for detention periods beyond 24 hours. Thereafter, the suspect must either be released or charged by a prosecutor, who may authorize detention for up to an additional 21 days. Further detention pending trial may be authorized by a judge. Warrants are required unless a person is apprehended in the act of committing an offense. These legal safeguards are generally observed. Bail is commonly set in all cases, with the amount depending on the nature of the crime. Arrests are generally made openly and for specific violations of the law. Reports of incommunicado detention are rare. Roadblocks and spot checks of outdoor gatherings of expatriates, especially of South Asians, are used sporadically by the police during searches for illegal immigrants and contraband liquor. Persons without proper identification may be detained by the police.

No Kuwaiti citizen may be exiled or denied return to Kuwait. However, a noncitizen, even if a long-term resident, may be summarily expelled without charge or judicial recourse if the authorities deem him to be a troublemaker or a security risk. With the passage of a new private sector labor law in March, expatriates are also subject to deportation for attempting to change employers before the end of a 3-year period of work for their initial sponsor. Expatriates must leave the country if they are unable to find work after being released from initial employment. Some expatriates have been held in deportation centers for extended periods of time, reportedly up to as long as 5 years, if they are unable to provide for their own transportation out of the country.

The Government reported 5,750 deportations for 1988, but this figure appears not to include the large number of routine deportations for immigration and residency violations which constitute a majority of cases. It is estimated that about 15,000 persons were deported in 1988 and estimates for 1989 range up to 25,000. These numbers correlate with official figures showing a decline in the number of expatriate workers employed in the public sector, tighter restrictions on expatriates employed in the private sector, and a concerted effort in 1989 to regularize the residency status of those whose claims to residency as "stateless" persons were, in the Government's view, unsubstantiated.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Kuwait's judicial system is independent and, except for the State Security Court, provides for public trials and the right of appeal. Judges are appointed by the Amir on the recommendation of the Justice Ministry. Kuwaiti nationals serving as judges usually receive lifetime appointments, while the many non-Kuwaiti judges serve under 1- to 3-year contracts, which are renewable. Judges may be removed by the Justice Ministry for cause, but such removal is rare.

By law, all defendants in felony cases must be represented by attorneys, court-appointed if necessary. In misdemeanor cases, which include crimes punishable by less than 3 years' imprisonment, legal counsel is optional, and the court is not required to appoint a defense attorney. The courts give consideration to defendants' allegations of police mistreatment in reaching verdicts and sentencing. Defendants tried in absentia have the right to an additional appeal. Legal representation is of adequate quality, including in cases where the defendant is assigned counsel. There are no reports of government interference in the issuance of verdicts or of discrimination against defense counsel. Translation of court proceedings, to ensure that they are understood by non-Arabic-speaking defendants, is sometimes inadequate.

However, trials before the State Security Court, which convenes on an ad hoc basis to handle cases deemed of an internal security nature, do not meet international standards for fair trial. Composed of judges normally serving in other courts, this tribunal, with few exceptions, conducts its proceedings in closed sessions. In 1989 opening and closing trial sessions were open to the public, but most of the substantive court proceedings took place during closed sessions. State Security Court decisions may not be appealed. Defendants are permitted to have an attorney, who is allowed to conduct an active defense on behalf of the accused. In July the State Security Court sentenced 22 of 33 Shi'a suspected of subversion against the State to prison terms ranging from 5 to 15 years. The defendants were charged with crimes ranging from the publication of literature advocating the overthrow of the Government to the planning of bombings and assassinations. No death penalties were handed down in 1989, and the Amir has yet to approve previous death sentences mandated by the court for terrorist attacks, including for an attack on the Amir himself in 1985.

According to the Constitution, military courts have jurisdiction only over offenses committed by members of the armed or security forces, except during periods of martial law (which has never been declared in Kuwait). The Amir has the power to pardon or commute sentences passed by either civilian or military courts and does so through the publication of an annual list of commutations following Kuwait's independence day, February 25. In 1989 the Amir's commutations covered the release of 292 prisoners held for common crimes and reduced sentences for 434 others. The commutations did not apply to terrorists or others convicted by the State Security Court. There are not known to be any political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to individual privacy and sanctity of the home is provided for in the Constitution and generally respected in practice. Search warrants are required, unless the police are in hot pursuit of a suspect fleeing the scene of a crime, or there is an indication of the presence of illegal alcohol or illegal narcotics. Search warrants to enter premises are issued by a public prosecutor. Expatriates, and particularly laborers and servants who live in accommodations provided by their employers, may have their premises searched by the police with authorization only of the employer. Items arriving by mail for personal or institutional use are not usually opened before delivery unless the contents are suspected of being pornographic.

In 1986 the Government restricted Kuwaiti males' right to marry foreigners, decreeing that official approval in advance would henceforth be required. The Government's action apparently was motivated by concern over how to meet its responsibilities toward the children of non-Kuwaiti spouses residing outside the country. The Government, and the public at large, were also concerned about the growing number of Kuwaiti males marrying foreigners rather than Kuwaiti women.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional provisions respecting these freedoms are often subject to such conditional phrases as "in accordance with conditions and manner specified by law." The Kuwaiti or foreign resident feels free to offer his opinion in private without fear of official retaliation, but no one may make a written or public attack upon the Amir and the ruling family, upon Islam, or upon leaders of other Arab states. Kuwait has an active censorship department, which reviews all books, films, videotapes, periodicals, and other material entering Kuwait in bulk or for commercial purposes. Radio and television are government owned and controlled.

The Amir's July 1986 decrees that amended the press law to impose prior censorship on the Kuwaiti press and otherwise tighten press curbs remain in effect. These decrees also authorized the Government to suspend for up to 2 years any publication found to be serving foreign states or organizations, receiving assistance from foreign sources without the approval of the Information Ministry, or publishing material conflicting with Kuwait's national interests. The revised censorship regulations also toughened existing penalties for violators, prescribing prison sentences of up to 3 years and fines up to $17,000 for offenses by publishers, editors, and journalists.

As before, the press was forbidden to publish material that contained direct criticism of the Amir and the ruling family, involved official confidential communications or treaties and agreements with other states, might disturb relations with Arab and friendly states, or, in a final category, "might incite people to commit crimes, create hatred, or spread dissension among the people." Prior to the Amir's decrees there was selective enforcement of the list of proscribed topics; violators were usually only issued warnings. Since July 1986, however, government censors have reviewed press items before their publication and ensured compliance by excising offending material or having it rewritten. There were no reports in 1989 of journalists arrested or journals confiscated. The daily Al-Rai Al-Aam was suspended for 1 week in April for publishing an unauthorized report that the Amir would visit Iraq and Egypt. In February Al-Rai Al-Aam went to press with a blank space on its editorial page in protest against the government's censorship of an editorial calling for restoration of press freedoms and the National Assembly. An estimated 15 foreign journalists residing in Kuwait and associated with local newspapers were summarily deported in 1986, following the July decrees. There have been no reports of deportations since that time.

Since the July 1986 decrees, senior government officials have held periodic meetings with Kuwait's chief editors, at which the editors have been encouraged to avoid sensationalism and publishing items which may be offensive or harmful to state security. By law, publishers lose their license, issued by the Information Ministry, if their publication does not appear for 6 months. On those topics not proscribed by censorship, the Kuwaiti press is vigorous and publishes a variety of opinions on numerous Middle East and international issues.

Academic freedom is subject to the same general restraints that apply to the press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political parties are banned. Political activity finds some outlet in informal family-based social gatherings known as "diwaniyyas." The Constitution affirms the right to private assembly, public meetings, processions, and gatherings which are peaceful and not contrary to public morals. However, any group of more than three people desiring to meet for public discussion (or to meet privately, but to issue a public statement) must receive prior permission from the Ministry of Interior. The authorities may prevent such an assembly merely by ignoring the request.

Professional groups, bar associations, and scientific bodies are permitted to establish international contacts without government interference. Kuwait university students are allowed to organize student groups and to vote for their own student representatives in vigorously contested annual elections. Campus student groups are active and relatively free to express their views on international political issues as long as there is no open discussion of domestic politics.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution declares that "freedom of belief is absolute" but must not "conflict with public policy or morals." Kuwait's state religion is Islam; the Shari'a (Islamic law) is, according to the Constitution, "a main source of legislation." The ruling family and most of the prominent Kuwaiti families are Sunni Muslims. There are no restraints on worship by Shi'a Muslims, who constitute about 30 percent of Kuwait's population. Kuwait has a tiny Arab Christian minority; there are a number of expatriate Christian congregations and churches. Expatriate practitioners of eastern religions (e.g., Hindus, Sikhs, and Buddhists) not recognized by Islam are not allowed to establish places of worship but may worship privately in their homes. Proselytizing of Muslims by non-Muslims is prohibited.

Before the dissolution of the National Assembly in 1986, Islamic pressure groups within that body were able to secure a bar on the granting of citizenship to non-Muslims, prohibition of alcoholic beverages, and partial classroom segregation at Kuwait University. The Government accommodated the National Assembly's demands for the application of some fundamentalist principles but blocked attempts to apply Islamic law across the board. Commercial law, for example, is based on Western practice.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens generally are free to travel inside and outside the country, to emigrate, and to return. Some restriction on foreign travel is applied to young men who have not completed, or been exempted from, their compulsory military service. Those serving in the military must receive permission from the Defense Ministry before traveling abroad. Although there are no different legal standards regarding the internal or foreign travel or emigration of Kuwaiti women, in practice husbands can prevent their wives and minor children from leaving the country.

There have been instances in which citizens' passports have been suspended temporarily. Generally, this has applied to criminal suspects. Representatives of societies, associations, and trade unions wishing to travel to and participate in international meetings must receive prior permission.

Although the Constitution states that "no Kuwaiti may be deported from Kuwait or prevented from returning thereto," the Government's policy of revoking the citizenship of some Kuwaitis is in contradiction to this rule. In some cases, such action has been based on the voluntary acquisition by the individual of foreign citizenship. An anomalous situation has developed, however, in the case of the so-called stateless persons residing in Kuwait who claim not to have any other nationality but who are unable to document their claim to Kuwaiti citizenship. Recently, the Government denied civil identification cards (entitling the bearer to various state services) to persons unable to document their claim to Kuwaiti citizenship. Along with this move, the Ministry of Planning altered its census figures, subtracting the stateless persons from the total number of Kuwaiti citizens. December 1988 census figures revealed a decrease from 42 to 28 percent for the number of actual Kuwaiti citizens as compared to expatriates, which would place the number of stateless persons at approximately 270,000 (14 percent of the total population). Of this number, the vast majority are presumed to be persons of Iraqi or Syrian origin who have asserted claims to Kuwaiti citizenship in order to take advantage of the generous social benefits which the State provides for full citizens. Faced with denial of civil identification cards, some of the so-called stateless persons have reasserted their original nationality, exited the country, and returned to Kuwait as expatriates. Many others have simply left the country permanently. However, a minority of the stateless are persons of Bedouin origin who can neither claim other nationality nor produce documentation of Kuwaiti citizenship. It is expected that many stateless persons in this latter category will eventually be allowed to retain their residency and/or receive Kuwaiti nationality. Accordingly, census figures for the number of Kuwaiti citizens may be revised upwards in the future. In the meantime, many stateless persons are in bureaucratic limbo due to the revocation of their civil identification cards, which are required for obtaining employment and official documents, such as automobile and marriage licenses.

All non-Kuwaitis over the age of 21 residing in Kuwait must be sponsored by a Kuwaiti citizen. Kuwait does not extend permanent residence to its expatriate population, and 1987 amendments to the alien residence law mandate stiffer penalties--fines and, in some cases, prison sentences--for expatriates who reside in Kuwait illegally or are not properly documented. Employers have the power to restrict both job mobility and the continued residence in Kuwait of their expatriate employees. Many expatriates (including some government employees) must surrender their travel documents to their employers, thus preventing them from leaving the country without the employer's consent. A new private sector labor law further restricted the residency rights of expatriate workers, providing that foreigners cannot change employers until after a 3-year period of employment with their initial sponsor. Those employed by government agencies are given residence visas, which require an exit permit or "no objection" letter in order for the expatriate to leave the country. In accordance with the law, non-Kuwaitis convicted of crimes are routinely deported after serving their sentences.

Illegal entrants to Kuwait are normally returned to their home countries. Exceptions have been made for those, mostly Iranians and Afghans, who are considered by the Government to be legitimate refugees. Some of these persons have been permitted to remain in Kuwait or have been sent to third countries. While most members of Kuwait's large Palestinian population have Jordanian passports, others are stateless and carry Lebanese or other Arab laissez-passers. Expatriate youths over 21 years of age who travel or study outside Kuwait often have difficulty rejoining their families in Kuwait.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Kuwait has no formal democratic institutions. Consequently, most of its citizens do not have a say in the choice of leaders or in changing the political system. The 1962 Constitution limited succession to the position of Amir to descendants of Mubarak the Great, the ruler at the turn of this century. In practice, the ruler and senior family members choose the crown prince from either the Al-Jaber or the Al-Salem branch of the Al-Sabah family. Under the Constitution this choice is confirmed by majority vote of the National Assembly. Executive power is vested in the ruler and, under him, in an appointed Council of Ministers, currently numbering 24, headed by the Crown Prince, who traditionally serves also as Prime Minister.

At independence Kuwait inaugurated a National Assembly composed of 50 deputies elected by secret ballot, plus Cabinet members sitting ex officio. The electoral law provides that candidates for the National Assembly be self-nominated, with multiple candidates permitted to compete for the 50 seats. A "grandfather clause" effectively limits suffrage to adult males who resided in Kuwait before 1920 and maintained a residence there until 1959, and their adult male descendants. In 1986 the National Assembly approved an amendment to the 1966 Nationality Law that delayed for 10 years, until 1996, the granting of voting rights to Kuwait's so-called second category citizens. The latter are certain long-time Arab and non-Arab residents who do not meet the "pre-1920" qualification. The Nationality Law was further amended in 1987 to extend from 20 to 30 years the period that naturalized Kuwaitis must wait before acquiring the right to vote. Efforts since 1982 to gain suffrage for women have been unsuccessful. Distinctions made on the basis of parentage, length of residence, and gender establish a limited class of citizenship with the privilege to participate in the political system.

The dissolution of the National Assembly, decreed by the Amir in July 1986, remains in effect. The 1986 decrees also suspended various constitutional provisions, including Article 107, which specified that, within 2 months of the Assembly's dissolution, either special elections be held for a new Assembly or the dissolved one be reinstated. The Assembly was previously dissolved in 1976 and reinstated in 1981. In the Assembly's absence, the Amir rules by decrees having the force of law.

The dissolution of the Assembly in 1986 represented a setback for citizens' political rights. Far from being a rubber stamp, the Assembly had served over the years as an important forum for the expression of diverse political views, some sharply at odds with those of the Government.

There have been reports of former parliamentarians petitioning the Amir in 1987, 1988, and 1989 for the Assembly's restoration. In February Kuwait university students initiated an active petition drive, supported by a number of university professors who were formerly parliamentarians, advocating the return of democratic government. Reports indicated that the petitions were still in circulation at the end of the year. The Government has recently instituted local government councils in each of the five governorates. These councils are intended to give Kuwaiti citizens more of a voice in issues of immediate concern in their daily lives (e.g., sanitation, security, and other government services). Many council members are former parliamentarians who have traditionally supported the Government.

KUWAIT

Informal contacts between rulers and ruled are an important feature of the Kuwaiti political system. Traditionally, adult male Kuwaitis have had relatively easy access to their leaders, including the heads of the prominent merchant clans and the ruling family itself, through the system of "diwaniyyas," informal family-based discussion groups to which anyone can come and freely speak his mind. That custom has endured, as has the tradition that the Amir should govern in consultation with other community leaders. Following the Assembly's dissolution in 1986, cabinet ministers instituted the practice of setting aside several hours a week to receive the public in their offices.

While most male Kuwaiti citizens can participate directly or indirectly in the political process, noncitizens, who greatly outnumber Kuwaitis, have no role. Kuwait has been reluctant to extend citizenship to those of non-Kuwaiti origin, and naturalization of even Kuwait-born persons is rare.

Citizenship has been extended only to a few Palestinian families who made significant contributions to Kuwait before the early 1970's. The Government established a committee to revise criteria for granting citizenship, but to date it has been without effect. Expatriates seldom engage in political activities for fear of exposing themselves to possible deportation.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has permitted visits by representatives of international human rights organizations. In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, Amnesty International (AI) cited instances in which it had sought and obtained information on several prisoner cases. It noted one case, however, in which it had not been able to examine the contents of leaflets produced as evidence of advocacy of violence against defendants tried by the State Security Court.

Some prominent Kuwaitis are members of international human rights organizations, such as the Arab Organization of Human Rights.

There are no nongovernmental human rights groups in Kuwait that deal with domestic human rights. The Government has an in-house council on human rights, composed of senior officials and working-level experts, but it is difficult to gauge its effectiveness since no information about its activities is published.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Kuwaiti women are allotted a subordinate role by statute and practice. Denied the vote, women are also limited by tradition from freely choosing their role in the society, though less so than in some other Islamic countries. Nevertheless, there are Kuwaiti women who are outspoken in their demand for a broader role in society. In contrast to the practice in some neighboring countries, a Kuwaiti woman is permitted to drive a car, may wear Western dress in public, and has legal access to higher education inside and outside the country. Women have the right to litigate against men (for example, in child custody suits). In recent years, more

KUWAIT

Kuwaiti women have joined the work force and compete for government and corporate employment. Some women have reached senior government positions, up to the level of assistant under secretary and director general. Women are well represented in the field of education through the university level. In 1986 the Government named the first woman prosecutor. Kuwaiti women have also represented Kuwait in international financial meetings.

The Government publicly encourages respectful treatment of women, and Article 160 of the Kuwaiti criminal law of 1960 states that a person who "beats or injures, or causes bodily harm or exposes another person's body to disrespect" may be sentenced to imprisonment for a period of 2 years and subject to fine. The Government produces no official statistics on domestic abuse. However, a 1986 study indicated that one out of three Kuwaiti women surveyed admitted to being subjected to insulting or degrading treatment by their husbands, while some 10 percent claimed to have been beaten by their husbands. Most wives do not report abuse because of the social stigma that is attached to legal proceedings in such cases. Kuwaiti police will intervene in domestic disputes but only in cases of visible abuse. Otherwise, there is a marked reticence on the part of police to intervene in domestic affairs. Husbands arrested in such cases are often verbally admonished and then released without charge. There are a large number of expatriate (South and Southeast Asian) female domestic servants in Kuwait. Although physical and sexual abuse of maids is punishable by law, and the press regularly reports some of the worst cases, mistreatment of female domestic servants is persistent. In at least two instances, highlighted by the press in 1989, domestic servants died as a result of mistreatment by employers. In both cases, the employers were tried and sentenced to prison terms with hard labor. Although domestic servants are able to take legal recourse against their employers if they so choose, many cases involving the abuse of domestic servants go unreported due to fear of repercussions from employers.

There is no evidence of discrimination among citizens in the administration of Kuwait's extensive social welfare programs, designed to provide housing, family allowances, retirement income, medical care, education, and employment. Members of Kuwait's Shi'a minority are less likely to be appointed to sensitive government positions. There are credible reports of Shi'a employees in the oil industry in 1987 losing their jobs, being transferred to other departments, or denied promotion following the series of oil field bombings, attributed to Shi'a. Nonetheless, many have achieved great wealth, and there is no evidence that they are discriminated against in matters of social welfare.

Foreign residents do not share in many of the rights and benefits Kuwaiti nationals enjoy. A new commercial law now allows for 100-percent foreign ownership of small commercial establishments, such as restaurants and shops, but 51-percent Kuwaiti ownership is still required for businesses of meaningful size. White-collar and skilled expatriate workers earn the same base pay as Kuwaitis but receive less in fringe benefits. Benefits restricted to Kuwaiti citizens include additional government stipends and social allowances and, in general, retirement pensions. Kuwaiti citizens also usually receive higher government salaries. Resident expatriates are entitled to medical benefits. Public schooling is offered, with some exceptions, only to children of expatriates who arrived in Kuwait prior to 1957, although the Government subsidizes tuition for students in a number of Arabic-language elementary and secondary schools. Kuwaitis are given preference for admission to the University of Kuwait. Because of limited space for new enrollees, non-Kuwaiti university entrants may equal no more than 10 percent of the number of Kuwaiti entrants. Unskilled expatriate workers usually are not permitted to bring their families to Kuwait.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Kuwaiti workers have the right to establish and join unions. Kuwait's labor movement has about 27,000 members, organized into 13 unions. All but one of the 13, that of the bank workers, are affiliated with the Kuwait Federation of Trade Unions (KFTU). Expatriate workers, who comprise about 80 percent of the roughly 700,000-strong labor force, are permitted to join unions after 5 years' residence but only as nonvoting members who cannot hold office. Kuwait labor law stipulates that any new union must include at least 100 workers, 15 of whom must be Kuwaitis. Unions are independent organizations, though the Government maintains a large supervisory role with regard to union financial records. Unions must also follow a standard format for internal rules and constitutions which includes a prohibition on any involvement in domestic political, sectarian, or religious issues. Kuwaiti law prevents the establishment of more than one union per functional area.

The vast majority of union members are Kuwaitis. The KFTU, grouping together nine civil service unions and three oil sector unions, is a member of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions as well as the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

The right to strike is recognized but is limited by Kuwait's labor law, which provides for compulsory negotiation followed by arbitration if a settlement cannot be reached between labor and management (see Section 6.b.). In recent years there have been few work stoppages, and in 1989 there were no reports of any. The tranquil labor/management relations situation stems in large part from a generous social welfare system and the Government's willingness to provide employment for Kuwaitis in the public sector, which features one of the most liberal government retirement systems in the world.

Kuwaiti labor law has a provision allowing for compulsory dissolution of any union that "commits an act considered to be violating the provisions of this law and of the laws connected with the preservation of public order and morals." Under the law, a union can only be dissolved by a court decision; such a court decision can be appealed. No union has been dissolved in this manner.

Union activity is concentrated in the government, banking, and oil sectors. Union members have the right to elect representatives of their own choosing provided the candidates can obtain a "good conduct certificate" (absence of criminal record). While non-Kuwaiti workers do not enjoy the same union rights as Kuwaitis, there is little display of discontent among expatriate workers. There are several reasons for this: most expatriates are drawn to Kuwait by comparatively high wages; the Government will summarily deport any non-Kuwaiti deemed a troublemaker; and a non-Kuwaiti cannot remain in Kuwait without employer sponsorship.

The International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts (COE) for a number of years has criticized various restrictions contained in the Kuwaiti labor code as being in contravention of Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. Many of these defects are reported to have been eliminated in a draft revised labor code under consideration by the Government, but the COE noted in early 1989 that the text of the new code was not available. It is not certain when the Government may adopt a revised labor code.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Kuwaiti workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively. Union rights are incorporated in the labor law and generally respected in practice. Article 78 of the Kuwait labor law states that any employer who "terminates or inflicts any penalty on a laborer for the purpose of forcing him to join, refrain from joining, or to withdraw from any trade union" must either rectify the contravention or be subject to fines. Discrimination against union or nonunion employees is rare.

Kuwaiti labor law provides for direct negotiations between employers and "laborers or their representatives." If an amicable agreement is not reached, the parties may petition the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs for settlement. If no agreed solution is reached by this means, the dispute is referred to a Labor Arbitration Board composed of officials representing the High Court of Appeals, the Attorney General's office, and the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs.

There are no export processing zones in Kuwait.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

The Kuwaiti Constitution prohibits forced labor "except in cases specified by law for national emergency and with just remuneration." This prohibition appears to be generally respected.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum age under Kuwait law is 18 years for full-time work and 14 years for part-time work. This law appears to be generally observed and enforced, particularly in urban areas, by both labor inspectors from the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs and truant officers of the Ministry of Education.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

General conditions of work are established by Kuwaiti labor law for both the public and private sector, with the oil industry treated separately. The law limits the workweek to 48 hours, provides for a minimum of 14 days' leave per year, and establishes a compensation schedule for industrial accidents. Reflecting the importance of the petroleum industry in Kuwait, the law governing employment in this sector is more generous than the general laws. It provides for a 40-hour workweek, overtime pay for shift work, 30 days' annual leave, and a generous sick leave policy. Women are permitted to work, except in "dangerous industries and trades harmful to the health," and are promised "equal remuneration to that of a man provided she does the same work." There is no legal minimum wage, but this has little impact since Kuwait is not a low-wage country.

By and large, employers appear to respect provisions of the labor law and provide suitable working conditions, although abuses occur in the treatment of unskilled foreign workers, particularly household maids and servants. There were credible reports that sizable groups of South Asian expatriate workers doing manual labor were not paid promised salaries in 1988, with similar reports of underpayment of salaries for servants and laborers in 1989. In May the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs issued a regulation requiring private companies to establish monetary guarantee funds for their employees. Private firms are required to set aside approximately $525-875, depending on the size of the company, as insurance against nonpayment of wages. The labor law does not apply to domestic servants and "sea workers."

A 1979 ministerial decree created a permanent commission to coordinate activities in the field of public health and occupational safety. It has had some success in raising safety awareness and improving government coordination. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs actively enforces the labor laws, and there are penalties for such violations as nonpayment or underpayment of wages.

LEBANON*

Lebanon's Constitution provides for a directly elected, unicameral Parliament which chooses the President. Political power is theoretically divided in accordance with the Constitution and with the unwritten, confessionally based National Pact of 1943. The latter provides for a Maronite Catholic president, a Sunni Muslim Prime Minister, and a Shi'a Muslim speaker of the National Assembly. The Pact also provides for the proportional allocation of government positions among various sectarian groups on the basis of the last national census, which was taken in 1932. However, 14 years of civil war have altered this arrangement greatly. Parliamentary elections, which should take place every 4 years, were last held in 1972. Since that time, one-fourth of the elected parliamentarians have died and have not been replaced. In 1988 Parliament was unable to elect a president before the constitutional deadline of September 23. As a result, for much of 1989 there were two rival cabinets in East and West Beirut, each claiming to be the legitimate government. As a result of an agreement reached at Taif, Saudi Arabia, members of the most recently elected Parliament met in November 1989 and approved the Taif Agreement which amends the Constitution and alters the 1943 National Pact. They also elected a new President, Rene Moawad. After Moawad was assassinated on November 22, the deputies met again, electing as President Elias Hrawi, like Moawad a Maronite Christian.

The prolonged civil war and the establishment of rival cabinets virtually eliminated the authority of any recognized central Lebanese government and its ability to safeguard human rights. Extralegal militias and local chieftains control much of the country where they, in effect, govern the civilian population and enforce their own version of justice with little regard for the Constitution or legal norms. The presence of foreign forces further contributes to the inability of any Lebanese central authority to exercise control over the entire country. Israel continued to maintain a "security zone" that encompasses 13 percent of Lebanese territory. Israeli attacks against Palestinian strongholds, terrorist headquarters, and staging zones led to civilian casualties when targets hit were located in or near civilian neighborhoods.

Syrian troops in Beirut, north Lebanon, and the Biqa' valley numbered over 40,000 at the end of 1989. In those areas, which comprise 70 percent of Lebanon's territory, the Syrian authorities carried out certain security and other functions normally reserved to a central government. Syrian military operations in these areas resulted in civilian casualties and material damage. Syrian forces were also direct participants in the heavy shelling of East Beirut and the enforcement of a naval blockade against the predominantly Christian area. Militia and terrorist groups, including Amal (supported by Syria), Hezbollah (supported by Iran), and several Palestinian splinter groups also operated in the region.

*The United States has had no official observers present in Lebanon since September 5, 1989, when the Embassy staff was withdrawn since it was no longer possible to assure its security or effectiveness. This report therefore draws in part on unofficial sources.

LEBANON

As a consequence of continued shelling and the imposition of naval and ground blockades, Lebanon's free-enterprise economy, already seriously disrupted by more than a decade of war, deteriorated sharply after March 1989. The value of the Lebanese pound deteriorated steadily during the spring and summer. However, in the fall the pound began to appreciate in response to a sustained cease-fire agreement.

The year witnessed a serious deterioration in the human rights situation. Nearly 6 months of virtually continuous artillery exchanges throughout densely populated areas of East and West Beirut brought injury and death to thousands of civilians. Most parties to the conflict, including Syrian forces, Lebanese army units, and militias, often deliberately located their headquarters and military emplacements in or near populated areas, including in areas close to schools, hospitals, and religious institutions. Noncombatants were also the victims of terrorist bombings, sniping, abductions, summary executions, and assassinations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

As in the past, rival Muslim and Christian factions routinely killed for political motives, with civilians killed and wounded by car bombs exploded in crowded areas and by indiscriminate sniping and other exchanges of fire between opposing factions. There were numerous assassinations of political and religious leaders, including newly elected President Rene Moawad and the Sunni Mufti, claims of hostage execution, and death threats aimed at forcing specific political actions. Militia forces outside of the nominal control of the Government were responsible for most of these actions, but each of the competing cabinets in early and mid-1989 charged that security forces and elements of the Lebanese Armed Forces loyal to the other carried out both indiscriminate and planned attacks, including assassinations (see also Section 1.g.).

Foreign diplomats and embassies also were targeted. In July a Hezbollah militant Islamic group, "The Organization of the Oppressed on Earth," claimed to have executed Col. William Higgins, an American serving with the U.N. observer mission in Lebanon. He had been held by them since his abduction in 1988. Numerous political and religious figures received death threats in the course of the year.

b. Disappearance

Thousands of Lebanon's inhabitants have been kidnaped or have disappeared since the beginning of the war in 1975. Illegal militias and foreign forces, rather than official Lebanese security services, appear to be responsible for most of these kidnappings. Some victims probably were summarily executed. Most of these persons remain unaccounted for, but occasionally hostage exchanges and releases occurred.

There were more politically motivated kidnappings in 1989. Abductions and disappearances took place throughout Lebanon, especially in the south, along the dividing line between East and West Beirut, and in West Beirut's southern suburbs. There were also numerous reports that military personnel and civilians were seized while crossing between the two sides of Beirut. Various Islamic groups continued to hold hostage journalists, educators, and relief workers--including 9 Americans. In addition, a number of foreign relief and other workers, including Red Cross workers, were kidnaped near Sidon and Tripoli; some were released after being held for a short time. In south Lebanon, Israeli forces seized several prominent Shi'a religious and militia leaders, most of whom were also released.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Overwhelmed by the presence of illegal militias and foreign forces and divided during much of 1989 between rival cabinets, the official Lebanese security services controlled little territory, and relatively few allegations of torture were made against them. There were many allegations of brutal treatment by Lebanese militias, Syrian and Israeli occupying forces, the Israeli-funded Army of South Lebanon, Palestinian factions, and Hezbollah, which includes several groups that receive support from Iran. The truth of these allegations, often brought by fiercely partisan elements, could rarely be verified.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Lebanese law requires that a suspect be arraigned before an accusation committee (a panel of three judges) and the prosecutor within 48 hours of arrest, but government prosecutors sometimes hold suspects indefinitely for interrogation without reference to a court or judge. Every defendant has the right to legal counsel, and bail is permitted in most cases. There is no public defender's office. However, if a defendant cannot afford a lawyer, and the judge deems he needs one, the judge requests the lawyers' association to appoint a lawyer to handle the case. No militia or foreign occupying force observes the above legal safeguards applicable to arrest cases. In general, persons arrested by these groups are denied access to the judicial system. Some of the major militia groups periodically turn individuals accused of civil crimes over to the legal authorities. Normally, however, the various militias detain individuals arbitrarily for indefinite periods, often to be exchanged for persons held by rival militias. Such detainees are frequently held incommunicado. In addition to politically motivated abductions, some militias presume to enforce law and order in regions under their control, arresting, imprisoning, and executing persons on purely criminal charges. The Army of South Lebanon maintains a detention center in al-Khiyam. The militia groups hold small numbers of prisoners in different locations and have not concentrated them in one place as far as is known.

Although neither of the two rival cabinets attempted, as a rule, to arrest or exile its political opponents (in a notable exception, former President Amine Gemayel was compelled to leave Lebanon in late 1988 by the new Maronite leadership), repeated instances of intimidation and threats of violence led increasing numbers of prominent Lebanese to seek temporary refuge abroad. Many ordinary Lebanese also fled, seeking to avoid the shelling and disruption in basic services which took place during much of the year.

LEBANON

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Despite the breakdown of central government authority, Lebanon continued its efforts to maintain a regular court system for criminal and civil cases, and each confessional group had its own court for family and personal status cases. The military also had its own courts-martial system. Lebanese law, practice, and custom provide the right to a fair public trial. Fourteen years of war, however, have disrupted the judicial process, and many cases remained unadjudicated. Trial delays result, for example, from the difficulty of conducting investigations when most of the country remains beyond effective government control, from a shortage of judges, and, most importantly, from the general breakdown in security.

Although the judiciary is considered independent and relatively impartial, and courts exist throughout the country, the disposition of criminal cases ultimately depends on the group in power locally. For example, militias frequently intervene to protect their supporters from detention and prosecution.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Lebanese authorities generally evince no interest in controlling personal life. The law requires that government prosecutors obtain the equivalent of a warrant before entering homes, except when the Lebanese army pursues an armed attacker. Rights of privacy, however, were violated frequently in the course of military operations mounted by the army, militias, and foreign forces in Lebanon and in the militias' administration of areas under their control. All of these groups have attempted to gather intelligence on their adversaries; these efforts include informer networks and telephone monitoring.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Significant violations of accepted international humanitarian standards with respect to treatment of prisoners taken during internal armed conflict occurred during 1989. Prisoners seized as the result of interfactional and intracommunal conflict were often subjected to prolonged incommunicado detention and physical and psychological abuse, including torture. As a rule, permission for humanitarian organizations to visit detention facilities was denied by the parties responsible.

The fighting between Lebanese Christian forces in February and the 6-month exchange of heavy shelling between East and West Beirut were marked by considerable disregard for the consequences of the fighting for the civilian population and resulted in indiscriminate killing. All participants in the fighting appear to have adopted a deliberate policy of applying pressure for political concessions through intimidation of the civilian population. The practice--especially by Syrian forces in West Beirut--of placing military facilities, particularly artillery, rocket launchers, and tanks, in the midst of densely populated residential neighborhoods also contributed to the disproportionate (10:1) ratio of civilian to military deaths.

As a result of the fighting, more than 900 people, most of them civilians, were reported to have been killed. Intracommunal fighting also took place during 1989; Shi'a militias of Amal and Hezbollah fought in Beirut's southern suburbs and in south Lebanon. This fighting became heavy in December, with over 70 people killed and 200 wounded. Exchanges between rival Palestinian factions, particularly in the Sidon area, also occurred. In East Beirut, a clash in February between the Lebanese Armed Forces and the Lebanese Forces' militia--fought in heavily populated residential areas--killed and wounded hundreds.

From March to September 1989, following a declaration by East Beirut authorities of a naval blockade of what they considered illegal ports located in other parts of the country, Syrian forces imposed a blockade on the predominantly Christian East Beirut enclave. This blockade, which was enforced through Syrian shelling of ships attempting to land in the enclave as well as bombardment of the coastal portion of the Christian area, was applied to all shipments, including attempted delivery of humanitarian supplies and fuel. As a consequence of the blockades, shortages of basic commodities such as flour, drinking water, and cooking gas occurred. This blockade was lifted in September as part of a cease-fire arrangement.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Lebanon has a strong heritage of freedom of opinion, speech, and press. Governmental authorities traditionally have respected the rights of those who opposed government policies through peaceful means. As a consequence of 14 years of civil war, and particularly the emergence of rival cabinets after failure to elect a president in 1988, efforts to control or influence the media for propaganda purposes became more widespread than had been the case previously.

Dozens of newspapers and magazines are published throughout Lebanon, traditionally representing a wide spectrum of opinion. By the end of 1989, however, the press had largely come to reflect the political views of those forces controlling places of publication. Also, while the press in Lebanon was nominally independent, virtually all newspapers and many magazines relied upon financing from specific Lebanese and foreign groups. As a result, these groups, which included Lebanese political and militia figures as well as foreign governments, were able to exercise considerable influence over the content of the press.

Distribution of the press was severely limited. Christian authorities and militias prevented the regular distribution in East Beirut of several leftist and Islamic publications, and during most of the year prevented entry of all but one newspaper published in West Beirut. Militias in West Beirut periodically refused to allow distribution of Christian militia and rival Muslim militia publications in their areas of control.

Lebanon's two "official" television channels (one each originating in East and West Beirut) were directly taken over by the rival cabinets in those areas, with coverage of

LEBANON

Lebanese developments tailored in accordance with, and to support, each side's position. Since the election of a President, the East Beirut station has fallen outside the control of the Government while continuing to support General Aoun. A wide variety of illegal radio and television stations were operated by many diverse political groups, particularly militias. These stations typically carried heavily slanted propaganda as part of their daily programming.

The widespread breakdown in security and intimidation of university faculty, administrators, and students continued to seriously threaten academic freedom. In at least one instance, university administrators received death threats as the result of disciplinary action taken against a staff member. Virtually all Lebanese educational institutions were forced to close from March to October, due to the heavy shelling.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Lebanese were theoretically free to assemble and associate in a peaceful manner. However, with the outbreak of fighting in early 1989 between the Lebanese Armed Forces and the Lebanese Forces' militia, followed by hostilities between factions in East and West Beirut, tolerance for demonstrations or assemblies other than those organized by or in support of the authorities in each area evaporated. In areas under the exclusive control of one militia, demonstrations or open shows of support for rival militias or political groups were not permitted.

Israel did not permit political groups which opposed the Israeli occupation to operate freely in areas under the control of the Israeli army or the South Lebanon Army. The Syrians did not, in general, allow groups openly hostile to them to remain in areas they occupied, much less to assemble freely.

The most significant constraint on freedom of assembly continued to be the restrictions imposed by authorities and militias in East and West Beirut on the ability of Parliament to gather for an electoral session. Parliamentarians were unable to cross the line dividing East and West Beirut during much of the year; no parliamentary session was held between August 1988 and November 1989 when Parliamentarians met to ratify the Taif Agreement and elect a new president (twice). (See also Section 3.)

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

In the past, Lebanese practiced their various religions with a great degree of liberty. There is no state religion, nor are there restrictions on particular religious groups, on foreign clergy, or regarding places of worship. Lebanon has long been a center for theological training, and there are numerous seminaries in the country. The various religious groups are free to publish religious material, participate in charitable activities, and provide religious education for their children. Many religious groups operate private schools. However, the intensification of religious hatred has led away from confessional mixing and towards confessional segregation. Today, Lebanese live more and more in neighborhoods and villages inhabited exclusively by one religious community. In militia-controlled areas, this exclusivity sometimes is maintained by force.

Lebanese are free to practice the religion into which they were born, and the confessional character of Lebanese society makes conversion to another religion difficult, except in the case of women, who normally adopt the religion of the man they marry. Conversion can mean ostracism from one's family and friends and having to live among strangers. In the smaller villages, local religious leaders often exert pressure on members of their congregation not to participate in the religious activities of other religious groups.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Lebanese traditionally have enjoyed freedom of internal travel, but the reality of civil war restricted the ability of Lebanese to cross freely between the Christian enclave and the rest of Lebanon during much of 1989. The Green Line dividing East and West Beirut was frequently closed during the year, as were other internal land crossings. Even when the crossings were open, passage was often rendered difficult by sniping, arbitrary controls imposed by militias and other authorities, and demands for bribes by officials. In addition to the problems affecting passage into the Christian enclave, militias throughout Lebanon often imposed controls on entry into areas under their domination. The Army of South Lebanon maintained tight restrictions on the movement of people and goods into and out of areas which it occupied. Today, Lebanese young people rarely travel into areas other than their own.

Foreign travel by Lebanese citizens was not officially restricted by Lebanese state authorities, although militias and foreign forces present at ports of entry and exit often prevented certain persons from entering or leaving the country. Because of the frequent closure of the Green Line, the shutting down of Beirut International Airport from March to September, and the naval blockade imposed on ports serving the Christian enclave, most Lebanese encountered considerable difficulties in traveling abroad. During the March to September period, Lebanese had the option of either traveling overland to Damascus or using a ferry/Hovercraft serving Jounieh in East Beirut and Larnaca, Cyprus. The ferry was frequently the target of shelling. Emigration and dual citizenship were permitted. There was no legal impediment to voluntary repatriation by Lebanese with valid identity papers.

Lebanon historically has been a land of asylum. During this century, it has given refuge to hundreds of thousands of Armenians and Palestinians as well as to smaller numbers from other Middle Eastern ethnic and religious groups. However, Lebanon's grave political and economic troubles in recent years have virtually ended its attractiveness to new refugees.

Lebanon's relationship with the Palestinian community has been difficult. Most Palestinians, like other foreigners, have not been able to obtain Lebanese citizenship. Their status as a "state within a state" under the 1969 Cairo Accords (abrogated in 1987) and their involvement in internal fighting from 1975 to 1982 and again from 1985 until 1988 brought upon them the bitter enmity of many other groups. In the wake of the 1982 conflict, many Palestinians encountered difficulty in renewing residence permits and travel documents, and delays still continue.

Estimates of the Palestinian population in Lebanon vary from a high of 500,000 to 600,000 (Lebanese officials) to a lower figure of 300,000 (United Nations Relief and Works Administration (UNRWA)). Palestinians have been hit hard by the collapse of Lebanon's once thriving economy and increasing numbers of them depend on UNRWA's relief, education, and medical facilities. These facilities operate in a difficult and sometimes dangerous environment. Various factions controlling the areas where UNRWA schools, clinics, and relief centers are located impose limits on UNRWA activities. There are at least 17 Palestinian factions operating in Lebanon, ranging from several characterized as "Islamic" to numerous pro- and anti-Arafat organizations, many built around prominent individual leaders. Lebanon does not grant citizenship to Palestinians or to other foreign residents. Most Palestinians live in refugee camps, better described as neighborhoods or ghettos under the control of one or more of the political factions. Leaders are not elected, nor are there any representative institutions which would permit popular participation in running the camps. There is no functioning judicial system in the Palestinian camps. Fundamental protections and freedoms expected of governments do not exist in Palestinian areas.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In practice, Lebanese citizens do not enjoy the right to change their government. Formally, Lebanon is a parliamentary democracy. According to the Constitution, direct elections must be held for the Parliament every 4 years. Parliament, in turn, elects a president every 6 years, and the president appoints a cabinet which must obtain the confidence of parliament. Political parties may be formed.

Since the emergence of the post-1943 Lebanese state, national policy has been determined largely by a relatively restricted elite of traditional regional and sectarian leaders. The 1943 National Pact essentially allocated political power on a confessional basis, according to the proportion of various religious groups in Lebanon as determined by the 1932 census. The unwritten National Pact stipulated that the president would be a Maronite Christian, the prime minister a Sunni Muslim, and the speaker of parliament a Shi'a Muslim. Seats in the Parliament were divided on a six-to-five ratio of Christians to Muslims. Positions in the government bureaucracy were allocated on a similar basis. Efforts to alter or abolish the confessional system of allocating political power have been at the center of Lebanese politics for more than 3 decades. Those religious groups most favored by the 1943 formula have sought to preserve it, while those disadvantaged by it have sought to revise it on the basis of new demographic realities or to abolish it entirely. This struggle has given a strongly religious coloration to Lebanese politics and to the continuing civil strife there.

In the past 15 years, political violence has robbed democratic institutions of much of their remaining substance. No parliamentary elections have been held since 1972, and Parliament was unable to decide upon a new president before the incumbent president's term expired on September 23, 1988. Through the mediation of Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries, Lebanese parliamentary deputies reached agreement in Taif, Saudi Arabia, for political reform and new presidential elections. The Taif Agreement, ratified by Parliament in November, gives Muslims and Christians an equal number of seats in an expanded 108-seat parliament, and transfers some powers from the President to the Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers. The Parliament on November 5 elected Rene Moawad as President and, after he was assassinated, they chose Elias Hrawi on November 24. A stalemate remains, however, since not all factions accept the Taif agreement. Rival forces continue to paralyze what little authority the central Government manages to exercise. Most of the country is under foreign or militia control.

Lebanese authorities have a mixed record in dealing with international human rights groups, and indigenous groups have not pressed the authorities strongly on human rights issues. The Lebanese Government (and both rival cabinets during 1989) affirms its support for international human rights and basic international documents and declarations on the subject. However, the chaotic situation within the country, especially the limited control exercised by the government over foreign forces and militias, has hindered its ability to be responsive to inquiries regarding human rights abuses.

The Army of South Lebanon has refused requests for access by international humanitarian groups to the prison facility it maintains at al-Khiyam in south Lebanon.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Discrimination based on religion is built into the system of government. As a result of the National Pact of 1943, government jobs are allocated on the ratio of six Christians for every five Muslims. Within each religion, distribution of positions is further subdivided among specific Christian and Muslim sects and denominations. Many of the larger corporations adhere to these standards as well. Since the National Pact was instituted, however, the Shi'a Muslim community has become the largest confessional group in Lebanon, and the proportion of Christians in the population has declined significantly. The six-to-five ratio thus works to the disadvantage of the Muslim community in general and the Shi'a in particular.

Palestinians also have suffered discrimination in the area of employment, because the Government has denied them permission to obtain work permits. The traditional position of the Lebanese authorities has been that there were not enough jobs for Lebanese who sought employment, and so it could not open up the Lebanese work force to outsiders. The result was that Palestinian refugees, who were often skilled workers, were compelled to take menial or marginal jobs.

There is little public or private debate on the issue of violence towards women, and no official statistics are produced on the subject. It is therefore difficult to estimate the extent to which it may be a problem in Lebanon.

Each confessional group has its own family and personal status laws. Generally, it is difficult for women to obtain divorces, and, in divorce, difficulties often arise with respect to child custody. There are no restrictions on women owning property.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Lebanese labor law gives workers the right to unionize; choose their own representatives, provided they are employed within the bargaining unit; and determine their own policies and programs as long as the unions do not involve themselves in politics. Workers enjoy the right to strike and exercise it. Lebanese authorities do not control or restrict unions, except that government employees may not unionize or strike. The operation of trade unions has been affected by the internal strife of recent years. There is no special protection for trade union members or their property. There are 160 local labor unions in Lebanon; the major umbrella labor organization, the General Confederation of Lebanese Workers (CGTL), comprises 18 federations of labor unions. There are no comprehensive statistics on union membership, although the CGTL claims 200,000 to 250,000 dues-paying members, about one-third of the 600,000 employed persons in Lebanon. The CGTL is affiliated with the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, based in Damascus. Thirteen of its affiliated federations belong to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Another affiliated federation is a member of the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. Lebanon has ratified ILO Convention 98 on collective bargaining, but not Convention 87 regarding freedom of association.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The right of workers to organize and to bargain collectively exists in law and practice in Lebanon. Most workers' groups engage in some form of collective bargaining with their employers. The stronger federations are able to obtain significant gains through their own collective bargaining efforts. The weaker unions rely heavily on the mediation of the CGTL which, prior to the civil war, used to negotiate annual across-the-board pay increases with the private employers' association. The CGTL often has assisted unions not affiliated with it in their bargaining efforts, and on occasion has assisted nonunionized workers. There is no government mechanism to promote voluntary worker-employee negotiations, and workers are not protected against antiunion discrimination. On several occasions in 1989, militia forces intervened to suppress strikes and impose binding resolutions on all parties to the dispute. Lebanon has no special economic incentive or export processing zones.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Lebanese law does not prohibit forced labor, and the Government does not practice forced labor. In the present anarchy, however, militias have forced workers, especially non-Lebanese manual laborers, to perform unpaid duties such as fortifying buildings, cleaning offices, and performing basic day labor.

LEBANON

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Lebanese labor law specifies the minimum age for employment of children as 8 years. In fact, few children under 16 years of age are employed.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

According to Lebanese labor law, the minimum wage was about $55 per month, calculated at the exchange rate in effect at the end of the year. From this sum, income and social security taxes are deducted. Persons living in militia-controlled areas are also compelled to pay certain "taxes" to the militias. Labor union leaders and government officials agree that the average family requires a monthly income of $150 to $200 to live decently.

The Lebanese work a 6-day week. According to Lebanese labor law, the maximum number of hours a person may work per week is 48. In practice, workers in the industrial sector work an average of 35 hours a week, and workers in the other sectors of the economy work an average of 30 hours a week. Lebanese labor law includes specific occupational health and safety regulations. However, given the civil strife and lack of central government authority, most of the regulations are not enforced.

LIBYA*

The Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya is a dictatorship ruled by Colonel Mu'ammr Al-Qadhafi. He is aided by extragovernmental Revolutionary Committees which operate at his behest. The governing principles of the society are expressed in Col. Qadhafi's "Green Book" rather than in a constitution. He has created a political system borrowing from pan-Islamic and pan-Arab sources and purporting to establish a "third way" superior to both capitalism and communism. In the past, he has used assassination as one way to control his enemies abroad; he controls enemies at home in a variety of summary and judicial proceedings which are employed wherever popular resistance exists. Ethnic minorities, such as Berbers, are tightly controlled.

Libya maintains an extensive security apparatus, consisting of several elite military units, including Col. Qadhafi's personal bodyguards. The Revolutionary Committees and People's Committees also have security functions, designed to protect as well as monitor the populace. The result is multilayered, pervasive surveillance and control of individual activities. Although Col. Qadhafi announced his intention in 1988 to strip the Revolutionary Committees of some of their prerogatives over internal security, there is little evidence that he has done so.

Despite recent government efforts at privatization, the Libyan economy remains essentially state controlled and is based primarily on the country's rich oil resources, which are its principal source of foreign exchange earnings. Libya has used its oil income to finance internal development (new schools, hospitals, roads), but much has been wasted, and the decline in oil revenues has forced retrenchment. The foreign exchange controls Libya relaxed in 1988 were again tightened in 1989. Libya's economic difficulties have been exacerbated to some extent by the regime's expenditures for weapons and on foreign military adventures.

Major human rights restrictions and abuses continued in Libya in 1989. Legal freedoms and rights are generally lacking. As a practical matter, there are no effective rights to peaceful association or assembly, to freedom of speech, to expression of opposing views to the Government in any form, to formation of trade unions, or to strike. The same is true of rights such as the right to be considered innocent until proven guilty, to a public or speedy trial, to be secure in one's home or person, or even to hold property. While some of these rights are guaranteed in principle by the Libyan Government, there is no evidence that they exist in fact. Although Col. Qadhafi announced his support in 1988 for policies and reforms aimed at remedying past widespread abuses of human rights in Libya, there was little evidence of any significant change and many of the reforms do not appear to have been implemented.

Amnesty International (AI) estimates that over 90 political prisoners remained imprisoned at the end of 1988.

*Since the U.S. has no official observers present in Libya and since Libya's media are totally controlled, this report draws heavily on unofficial sources.

LIBYA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were several reports of politically related and extrajudicial killings in 1989. Security forces were reported to have killed two or three persons and wounded others when they opened fire on a demonstration--in which anti-Qadhafi slogans were being shouted--in Tripoli in January 1989 (see Section 2.b.). A would-be assassin of Qadhafi was reported to have died of "shock" in police custody in May. There were unconfirmed reports that Islamist extremists opposed to the Government killed about a dozen nonbelievers in mosques in Tripoli in August. The mayor of Sirte is believed to have been killed for reasons of tribal politics in September. An Italian citizen was killed and his body burned by unknown assailants in October 1989 during a period of anti-Italian demonstrations fomented by the Libyan Government.

AI has expressed concern about the large number of offenses, including political offenses, which are punishable by death under Libyan law. For example, Law No. 71 of 1972 provides for the death penalty for anyone involved with any group activity based on any ideology opposed to the principles of the revolution (see also Section 1.e.). In 1988 Col. Qadhafi publicly stated his support for the abolition of the death penalty and promised to commute all existing death sentences. However, the Great Green Document on Human Rights adopted by the General People's Congress in 1988 merely identified the total abolition of the death penalty as an "aim of the society," and declared that the death penalty should be applied in those cases in which the accused poses a danger of corruption to the society.

In 1980 the Government instituted a policy of assassinations of Libyan exiles and announced the formation of "suicide squads" to hunt down and kill Libyan dissidents abroad. Between March 1980 and June 1987, AI recorded at least 37 attacks on Libyan opponents or presumed opponents living abroad, resulting in 25 deaths. In 1988 the regime invited exiles to return, promising they would not be in danger. Most refused to do so. There were no reliable reports of assassination attempts against Libyan exiles during 1989. According to AI's report for 1988, Col. Qadhafi indicated that the policy of "physical liquidation" of political opponents had ended.

There were no reports of disappearance in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

No current information is available on this subject.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Libyan law, detainees may be held incommunicado for unlimited periods. Many political prisoners are held in unofficial detention centers controlled by members of the Revolutionary Committees, where prolonged periods of incommunicado detention are common. Many allegedly are held without charge or trial, apparently as an example to other would-be opponents of the regime. AI stated in a report in August 1989 that 40 people are reportedly in incommunicado detention following antigovernment disturbances between January and May, mainly at the universities in Tripoli and Benghazi. While undergoing interrogation, sometimes for periods of several months, prisoners are given no access to legal representation. Although Qadhafi has claimed to be opposed to secret arrests, there is still no evidence he has followed up with explicit orders to that end or that the situation has improved in practice. Foreigners have also been subject to arbitrary arrest in the past, and there are credible reports that some foreign workers in Libya have been forced into military training and military service on behalf of Libya or coerced into subversive activities against their own countries.

Exile is not a form of punishment practiced in Libya; to the contrary, Col. Qadhafi seeks to pressure Libyans working or studying abroad to return to Libya. Libya does, however, expel noncitizens arbitrarily.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Civilians may be tried in regular courts, in less formal "people's courts," or by military or revolutionary courts, depending on the arbitrary decision of the security forces. Security forces have the power to judge persons guilty without trial, particularly "traitors to the people." Trials are also held in private or in the absence of the accused. The traditional courts have been bypassed to a significant extent by people's courts and revolutionary courts which sometimes conducted "show trials" on television, followed by public executions, which have at times been televised. These various trial systems provide few safeguards.

A 1981 law prohibits the private practice of law and makes all attorneys employees of the Secretariat of Justice. The Union of Arab Lawyers, located in France, has expressed concern about the ability and freedom of attorneys to provide legal defense for political prisoners while serving as government employees. Libya claims that it "guarantees prisoners all necessary means of defense and safeguards of justice adequate to the principles contained in the [Universal] Declaration of Human Rights" and provides for legal assistance "as soon as possible with respect to the exigencies of interrogation." Nevertheless, there continue to be numerous reports that these rights are frequently denied.

Alleged political offenses in the past often have been tried before ad hoc revolutionary courts rather than by civilian courts, with the opportunities to engage defense counsel severely restricted. A number of these trials have been held in secret. The regime's announcement in 1988 of the abolition of all "extraordinary" courts, including those operated by the Revolutionary Committees, does not appear to have been implemented.

Some of the political prisoners known to be held in Libya were released in March 1988, and Col. Qadhafi declared that there were "less than 100" political detainees. In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI estimated the number at 90.

LIBYA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not respect the right to privacy. The legal requirement that judicial warrants must be obtained before entering a private home reportedly often is disregarded. Local and international telephone calls are routinely monitored. The informer network is extensive, encouraged by both security agencies and Revolutionary Committees. Libyan exiles report that mere family ties to suspected regime opponents can result in harassment or even persecution and detention by the authorities. Property can be seized and burned if it belongs to "enemies of the people" or those who "cooperate" with foreign powers.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While some difference of opinion is tolerated in People's Committee meetings and at the General People's Congress, in general freedom of speech is severely limited. This is especially true with regard to any criticism of Col. Qadhafi or his regime. Fear of being informed upon by elements of the Revolutionary Committees and an underlying climate of mistrust at all levels of society further inhibit freedom of speech. Freedom of speech and other basic civil and political rights are further restricted during internal security crises.

Libyan media are owned and controlled by the State. There is a state-run daily newspaper, with a circulation of 40,000. Several smaller newspapers are run by the Revolutionary Committees and the Islamic Call Society. JANA, the official news agency, is the designated conduit for politically acceptable opinions. Publishing opinions contrary to government policy is not permitted. Foreign publications, once censored, now reportedly circulate sporadically in Tripoli.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public assembly is repressed unless it is government controlled and supportive of regime positions. The right of association is limited and granted only to institutions affiliated with the regime. Organizations such as independent trade unions and professional associations are viewed as unnecessary, since Col. Qadhafi has vowed not to "accept intermediaries between the revolution and its working forces."

Following the last-minute cancellation of an international soccer match in Tripoli in January 1989, disappointed crowds reportedly demonstrated spontaneously in the streets, chanting "down with Qadhafi" and other slogans. Security forces fired on the crowds, reportedly killing two or three and wounding others. In a speech shortly thereafter, Col. Qadhafi indirectly acknowledged growing public opposition by calling for an end to "the demonstrations, the sit-ins, and the protests." He also called for an end to organized sports.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

LIBYA

c. Freedom of Religion

Libya is overwhelmingly Muslim. Some minority religions (e.g. Christianity) still are allowed to conduct services, but Islamic groups at variance with the state-sanctioned version are banned. In an apparent effort to eliminate any alternative power bases, the regime has banned the once-powerful Sanusiyya Islamic religious sect.

Services in Christian churches are attended by the foreign community. There is a resident Catholic bishop and a small number of priests. Nuns reportedly are permitted to wear religious habits.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

With the exception of security areas, movement is not usually restricted for Libyan citizens. Traditionally, exit permits have been required for travel abroad, and currency controls have also served to restrict travel. Restrictions on travel abroad were eased significantly in 1988, but the restrictions on currency imposed in late 1989 had the practical effect of again curbing travel. Members of the Revolutionary Committees maintain surveillance of some Libyans while abroad. The right of return of Libyan nationals is theoretically fully protected even for opponents of Col. Qadhafi, so long as they are prepared to "repent." However, this "right" often appears to be more nearly an obligation; the regime often calls for students, many of whom are under government subsidy, and others working abroad to return on little or no notice and without regard to the impact on their studies or work. Libyans who study abroad are interrogated on their return home. Not surprisingly, a number of those called on to return resist.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The people of Libya have no right to change their government. Major government decisions are controlled by Col. Qadhafi himself, a few key figures around him, or by committees acting in his name. He appoints military officers and official functionaries down to junior levels. Power flows through a small circle of trusted associates. Corruption in the administration is a major problem, adversely affecting the efficiency of government.

Participation in elections is mandatory, and all candidates are cleared by the Revolutionary Committees from among persons who are not "merchants, contractors, tribal advocates, election brokers, officials of the former (pre-1969) government, or people who have been attacked by the power of the revolution." Political parties and tribal or local groupings are prohibited.

There are no independent human rights organizations in Libya to monitor the Government's performance. The Libyan Arab Human Rights Committee, a government organization, was created in May 1989, reportedly to implement the reforms announced in 1988. AI was allowed to visit Libya in 1988 and meet with political, judicial, and security officials.

LIBYA

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

There are frequent allegations of discrimination based on tribal status, with particular discrimination alleged against Berbers in the interior and Tuaregs in the south. Col. Qadhafi has often complained about the continued power of tribal and other groups, but he also utilizes them for political action when he sponsors proregime demonstrations. In past years, he sought unsuccessfully to assure that Berbers married only non-Berbers, presumably in an effort to erode their tribal identity.

The conservative cultural attitudes of Libya's Islamic society serve to restrict the rights of certain groups, most notably women. Within the confines of Islam, Col. Qadhafi has led efforts to change the status of women and expand their access to educational and employment opportunities. Women currently receive basic military training and are subject to the military draft, with some exceptions. The husband's permission is necessary for women or children to travel abroad. Female circumcision is still reportedly practiced among tribal groups in remote areas of the south. No information is available on the extent to which violence against women is a problem in Libya.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Workers do not have the right to form or join unions of their own choosing. The official trade union organization, the General Federation of Producers' Trade Unions, which was created in 1972, is under government control and administered through the People's Committee system. Independent trade unions and professional associations are viewed as unnecessary, since Col. Qadhafi has vowed not to accept intermediaries between the revolution and its working forces. Although unions are assured the right to "safeguard their interests," there is no right to strike, and no strikes by Libyan workers have been reported for years.

With government financing, the official trade union organization plays a leading role in the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and exploits international trade union contacts to engage in propaganda efforts on behalf of the Government. Libya is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO). It ratified ILO Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively in 1962 (under the previous regime), but it has not ratified Convention 87 on Freedom of Association.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Although the Libyan Labor Code provides for collective agreements, there is no collective bargaining in Libya. The ILO's Committee of Experts (COE), for a number of years including 1989, has noted that the conditions which are laid down in the Labor Code for the validity of collective agreements are contrary to provisions of ILO Convention 98 requiring free and voluntary negotiation of collective agreements.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Libya has ratified the two ILO Conventions dealing with forced labor. The ILO's COE, in its 1989 Report, noted that "persons expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system may be punished with penalties of imprisonment... involving...an obligation to perform labor." It also noted that public employees in Libya can be imprisoned and sentenced to compulsory labor "...as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for participation in strikes even in services whose interruption would not endanger the life, personal safety, or health of the whole or part of the population."

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

No information is available regarding employment of children in Libya. In general, there is no evidence that child labor is a widespread practice.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Libya maintains a work force of around 1 million workers in a population of 3.7 million. There is no minimum wage rate set by law. The legal maximum workweek is 48 hours. Libyan labor law defines the rights and duties of workers, and such aspects as compensation, pension rights, minimum rest periods, and length of the workday. Information on health and safety standards is not available.

Libyan labor law does not apply to the 300,000 foreign workers in Libya, who do much of the blue-collar and technical work. Their permission to stay in the country extends only for the duration of the contracts under which they are employed. Foreign workers are subject to arbitrary pressures, such as changes in work rules and contracts, with little option but to accept or to depart the country, often without full compensation for work already performed. The conditions of their employment are subject to negotiation between the worker and the employer. Foreign workers who are not under contract enjoy no protection and in past years have been expelled for such infractions as supporting or organizing strikes.

MALDIVES

The Republic of Maldives has a parliamentary form of government with a strong president. In practice, government control in this small, homogeneous society is exercised by an elite whose authority is based on long tradition. There are no political parties. Candidates for the unicameral legislature, the Majlis, run as individuals. The Majlis selects a single nominee for President who is subsequently approved or rejected by the voters. In 1988 President Maumoon Abdul Gayoom was reelected to a third term. This followed his unanimous nomination by the Majlis and subsequent approval in a public referendum by more than 95 percent of those voting.

Until recently, the Maldives had not been attacked or invaded for hundreds of years. It thus sees no need for a large defense and security establishment. In November 1988, however, a few Maldivians using foreign mercenaries attempted unsuccessfully to overthrow the Government. After the attempt, the Government moved to strengthen its security forces. The National Security Service (NSS), previously numbering fewer than 1,000, is now a force of about 1,500. The NSS is responsible for maintaining internal law and order and defending the country. The police division of the NSS investigates crimes, makes arrests, and enforces house arrest.

The Maldives comprises 1,200 islands in 19 atolls scattered across an area 500 miles long by 75 miles wide in the Indian Ocean. The isolation of individual islands from each other, and of the Republic as a whole from the rest of the world, is a dominant feature of social and economic life. Nearly half the population engages in traditional activities such as fishing, harvesting coconuts, and small-scale farming. Industry accounts for only 5 percent of the gross national product.

Human rights continue to be restricted in a number of areas, including speech and press, religion, the right of citizens to change their government, and women's and worker rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Maldivians follow Shari'a or Islamic law. Occasionally convicted criminals are flogged. Usually, however, punishment is confined to fines, compensatory payment, house arrest, imprisonment, or banishment to a remote and sparsely populated island.

MALDIVES

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution states that "no person shall be apprehended or arrested, except on a verdict specified by Shari'a or (civil) law." There is no provision under Maldivian law for preventive detention. Incommunicado detention is rare.

Acting on formal written complaints alleging commission of a crime, the Attorney General's office refers a case to the appropriate court. The court then instructs the police to undertake an investigation. A suspect may, depending upon the charges, be detained or placed under house arrest for 15 days while the case is investigated. In cases not brought to trial within 15 days, the suspect is freed. Detention or house arrest may be extended after the first 15 days by authority of the President, though usually for less than a month. There is no legal provision for bail. However, a defendant in detention who has valid reasons to travel may receive permission to do so from the Prisons Division.

Actions which "arouse the people against the Government" are illegal, and persons may be arrested for violation of this law, though none were in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There is a High Court and eight lesser courts in Male, the capital. Each deals with specialized cases, such as debt, theft, or property claims. On other islands, there are all-purpose courts. There are no jury trials. Trials are conducted by judges trained in Islamic law. They are appointed by the President and serve at his pleasure. Thus they cannot be considered fully independent. Cases in island courts that present knotty legal questions are referred to the appropriate specialized court at Male. The Male court can in turn refer the legal issue to four judges attached to the Justice Ministry. The High Court acts as a court of appeal. It also handles politically sensitive cases.

During trial, the accused may defend himself and call witnesses. He also may be assisted by a lawyer. However, there are few lawyers in the Maldives and courts do not provide them to defendants. The length and type of sentence are established by law and custom.

In 1989 the Maldivian judicial system faced an unprecedented challenge when it tried 7 Maldivians and 68 Sri Lankans accused of the November 1988 coup attempt. Court facilities were expanded and foreign translators located for the accused Tamil-speaking Sri Lankan mercenaries. However, a Sri Lankan lawyer engaged to represent these defendants was unable to secure government permission to participate in the court proceedings. The accused were therefore without legal counsel. All those tried were found guilty. Sixteen were sentenced to death, but the sentences were commuted to life in prison.

In its 1989 Report, Amnesty International (AI) stated that it had written to the Government, urging that the prisoners be granted access to lawyers and be tried in accordance with international standards, and that the Government had replied that the suspects would be tried according to Shari'a law.

MALDIVES

Other than those found guilty for attempting to overthrow the Government in 1988, there are no Maldivians serving sentences for political crimes.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits opening, intercepting, reading, or making public letters, telephone conversations, telegrams, and wireless messages exchanged between persons "except in accordance with the specific provisions of the law." There is no evidence that the Government monitors correspondence or telephone conversations or uses a regular system of informers. The Constitution requires that private premises and dwellings be respected. There have been no reports of practices to the contrary.

There are no prohibitions on the import of foreign publications, except those containing pornographic material. Foreign broadcasts are not jammed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and expression "so long as the specific provisions of Shari'a and the law are not contravened." In practice, freedom of speech and press are restricted. A citizen may criticize or complain to the Government without fear if he does so through recognized channels. These include letters or oral complaints to the President, a Majlis member, a civil servant, or other person in authority. Maldivians often discuss the Government, sometimes critically, in private. However, the law forbidding arousing opposition to the Government, together with a tradition of authoritarian rule, make Maldivians careful when expressing their opinions to foreigners or in the media.

There are three privately owned newspapers. Each must register with the Government. The only government-owned publication is the News Bulletin. It is published by the Maldivian Department of Information and Broadcasting. There is no prior censorship of newspapers. However, because writers and editors are subject to prosecution if their articles contravene the law, self-censorship is well ingrained. No writers or editors were prosecuted in 1989 for writing articles alleged to have created antigovernment feelings.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution assures freedom of assembly and association. However, Maldivians make little use of these freedoms in a political sense. Most rallies and meetings are sponsored or approved by the Government and are usually addressed by government officials or religious leaders. Clubs and other private associations are permitted if they do not contravene Shari'a and civil law. They must be registered with the Government.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

MALDIVES

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is significantly restricted. The Constitution affirms Islam as the official religion and defines all citizens as Muslims. There are no churches, shrines or synagogues for the practice of any other religion. Missionaries of non-Muslim faiths may enter the Maldives but are forbidden to proselytize. Conversion of a Muslim to another faith is a violation of Islamic (Shari'a) law and would result in the loss of citizenship for the Maldivian convert. Links with Muslims in other countries are strong. Each year a number of Maldivians perform the hajj.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government discourages Maldivians from changing islands of residence, primarily because most migrants move to Male, which is severely overcrowded. In 1982 the Government reimposed regulations that limit immigration to the capital island and its surrounding atoll, permitting migration to Male for short periods only for work, education, or medical treatment.

There are no restrictions on foreign travel or emigration. The Government does not require exit visas. It requires a Maldivian who has acquired another nationality to maintain Maldivian nationality concurrently. Such a dual national must enter and leave the Maldives on a Maldivian passport. As far as is known, the Government has never revoked the citizenship of a Maldivian. There are no refugees or displaced persons in the Maldives. As far as is known, no Maldivians have been exiled abroad or are refugees or displaced persons elsewhere.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Maldivians have only limited and indirect influence on the selection and organization of their government. President Maumoon Abdul Gayoom rules the Maldives together with a well-educated elite loyal to him. A single nominee for President is chosen by secret ballot in the Majlis from as many candidates as are proposed by members. His nomination is confirmed or rejected in a nationwide referendum, also by secret ballot. President Gayoom was elected for a third 5-year term by this process in 1988.

Members of the Majlis, a unicameral legislature, are chosen for 5-year terms by secret ballot. All Maldivians over 21 years of age may vote. Of 48 members, 40 are elected--2 from each atoll and 2 from Male--and the President appoints 8. Individuals or groups may freely approach members of the Majlis with grievances or opinions on proposed legislation. The most recent Majlis election was held in November 1989.

While they are not forbidden by law, there are no political parties. President Gayoom has publicly discouraged their formation, declaring political parties inappropriate to the homogeneous nature of Maldivian society. In place of political parties, factions in the Majlis tend to form around individuals or points of view. Any member may introduce legislation. If seconded, it must be considered by the Majlis. The Majlis may question ministers and call for their removal. In practice, however, the Majlis generally supports the Government in its positions after discussing and sometimes amending its proposals.

MALDIVES

There are no local human rights organizations. There were no public requests for outside investigation of human rights violations in 1989. The Government did respond to an inquiry from AI concerning the trials of those involved in the November 1988 coup attempt (see Section 1.e.).

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Women by tradition play a subordinate role in Maldivian society, although they now participate in public life in growing numbers. Islamic practice is the basis for Maldivian civil law. It is therefore easier for husbands to divorce wives than vice versa. Islamic law, or Shari'a, also governs inheritance. Most women, like most men, are not part of the cash economy. Women who do work for wages--for the Government, in businesses on Male, or in garment factories--generally receive wages similar to those of men.

In late 1988 the Government opened the NSS to female applicants. There are now about 70 women in the NSS and more are being sought.

Violence against women occurs in the Maldives, but little is known about its extent. Abuse within the family, such as wife beating, is seldom mentioned publicly owing to the value attached to personal privacy in this conservative society, and the Government does not acknowledge the existence of a problem. There are no official statistics on the subject.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

There are no trade unions in the Maldives. The Government recognizes neither the right to form them nor the right to strike, and strikes do not occur. The Maldives are not a member of the International Labor Organization.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers' rights to organize and bargain collectively are neither recognized nor protected by law. There are no export processing zones in the Maldives, though the Government has granted certain tax concessions to investors who opened garment factories. As far as is known, the customary procedures governing conditions of labor are the same for garment factories and the economy as a whole.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Although no information is available on Maldivian law on forced or compulsory labor, there have been no reported instances.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no compulsory education law or minimum age for the employment of young people. The Government has set no restrictions on conditions under which children or young people may be employed. However, most employers do not hire young people for work at night or in what are considered hazardous conditions.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Until the mid-1970's, most Maldivians were either self-employed or held government jobs. There was a relative lack of interest in workers' rights or organization. During the last 7 years, however, three garment factories have opened, employing large numbers of workers. Agreements between the Government and foreign investors setting up these factories included no provisions for workers' rights or treatment.

In 1982 the Government established a Department of Labor, and an intergovernmental Labor Advisory Board met in 1987 to draft the country's first labor laws. The Board's work is not yet complete, and the country still has no statutory provisions for hours of work and length of annual leave. An 8-hour day, 6-day workweek is customary, though not enforced by law.

There is no national minimum wage, although the Government has established wage floors for certain kinds of work. The wage floor for garment workers is $84 per month. Employees who work more than an 8-hour day are entitled to overtime pay. Government workers receive 3 weeks' leave per year under labor laws adopted in 1987.

MOROCCO

Morocco is a monarchy whose King dominates the country through the exercise of his wide-ranging governmental powers and his traditional role as spiritual leader of the country's predominantly Sunni Muslim population. The King makes all major political decisions, appoints and dismisses the Prime Minister and cabinet members, promulgates laws, presides over the Council of Ministers, may dissolve the nation's single legislative body (the House of Representatives), and may exercise powers by decree. The King often expresses his desire to strengthen democracy, and a few democratic practices and institutions in Morocco are in place. The Constitution provides for a pluralistic political system and a parliamentary form of government, and stipulates the freedoms of movement, expression, and association, among others. However, the Parliament exercises little real power, past elections have not been truly free, and constitutional freedoms are frequently ignored in practice.

The security apparatus is composed of several overlapping police and paramilitary organizations, operating within a framework of written legal provisions designed to maintain public order. All of the organizations are under the King's ultimate control, though many are administered on a day-to-day basis by the Interior Minister. In recent years, especially after the riots of 1981-82 and 1984, Interior Ministry and other security officials have been placed in administrative posts in other ministries, such as the Ministry of Religious Affairs, to ensure Interior Ministry oversight throughout the Government.

Private property and private investment drive the economy, which is based on the free-enterprise model. Morocco is rapidly undergoing urbanization; nearly 50 percent of the population now lives in cities and towns. Overall unemployment in urban Morocco stands at about 15 to 20 percent of the work force, and the creation of new jobs continues to lag behind population growth. New entrants to the labor force number more than 200,000 annually, and full-time employment is difficult to find outside the unskilled, manual trades, and lack of full-time employment is increasingly a problem for skilled workers and university graduates as well. Employment, or lack thereof, in rural Morocco is a function of the availability of arable land and annual rainfall. Rural incomes lag behind urban incomes by half.

In general the human rights situation did not improve significantly in 1989, and appears to have deteriorated in several areas. A positive step was the release in May by the King of 50 political prisoners, many of whom had been held for 14 years. For the first time, two of Morocco's human rights groups published lists of Morocco's political prisoners, estimated to number at least 225. Another favorable development was increased news coverage of human rights abuses, which reflected a growing awareness and concern by both Moroccan citizens and officials for human rights.

On the other hand, reports of police brutality, torture, and of cruel treatment and substandard prison conditions continued. When promised prison reforms were not forthcoming following mutinies and other protests, four political prisoners in Rabat resumed a hunger strike in June, which resulted in the death of one striker in August.

MOROCCO

There were a number of arrests of student activists, and in several instances police used force to put down student strikes and examination boycotts at universities and schools in protest against study conditions, other students' dismissals, and arrests. Freedom of speech and press remained significantly restricted, and in 1988-89 three monthly magazines went out of business as a result of government harassment and seizures. The Government in November convicted a newspaper director of spreading false information by publishing a communique by two human rights groups, but the King pardoned the director 3 days later. Other human rights concerns included arbitrary arrest and detention, lack of fair trial in political/security cases, and restrictions on freedom of association and on the right of citizens to change their government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known instances of political killings.

b. Disappearance

There have been few permanent disappearances in recent years, and none was reported in 1989. However, temporary "disappearances" continue to result from the practice of holding persons in pretrial detention, without notifying families or attorneys, for significantly longer than the legal limit of 10 days.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Human rights activists report that the number of incidents of torture, whether conducted in police stations or secret locations, remains high and most frequently involves detainees suspected of politically related crimes. Torture and other forms of cruel treatment most often take place during incommunicado detention following initial arrest, and confessions extracted during this period are often used to convict the suspect. Methods of torture reportedly include placing prisoners naked in small, dark punishment cells; beatings, often on the soles of the feet; and keeping prisoners in chains, restricting their movement and preventing them from standing upright.

While there is no indication that the incidence of torture increased during 1989, there was increased press coverage of torture and mistreatment. Based on a review of other papers and sources, the Socialist Party daily Al Ittihad al Ichtiraki reported 12 cases in 1988 of the death of persons while in official custody and 13 such cases in the first 8 months of 1989. These included deaths of persons in custody of police or local government officials. Although public officials are largely protected from investigation and prosecution for acts of torture, increased press coverage and demands by human rights groups have led to official investigations of some incidents of torture leading to death, but no prosecutions or administration hearings are known to have resulted.

MOROCCO

Moroccan prisons continue to be the focus of protests by prisoners, their families, and human rights activists. Prison legislation and standards have changed little since the colonial period. In September 1989, a new prison was opened in Sale to replace Rabat's prison, and a new prison in Casablanca is scheduled to open in 1990; both are intended to meet modern standards. In the old prisons, prisoners are held in degrading conditions which include unhygienic conditions in kitchens, cells and dispensaries, poor medical care, extremes of heat and cold, and lack of ventilation. Disease is prevalent, with a high incidence of permanent health defects, chronic illnesses, and ensuing mental disorders. Prisoners are often deprived of visitation rights and access to mail and reading materials, and their families are subject to harassment. Such mistreatment has led to deaths, suicides, hunger strikes, and revolt among political prisoners.

In late February, prisoners in Rabat's Lalou prison rioted and held the prison for 3 days before authorities were able to resume control by negotiating with the prisoners and promising to address prisoner complaints, including poor conditions, overcrowding (1,800 prisoners in a prison built for 400), mistreatment, and a particularly abusive prison director. When the prisoners' complaints were not rectified, four prisoners undertook hunger strikes which ultimately resulted in the death of one striker in August. The other three were sent to the Rabat hospital in serious condition.

Other hunger strikes took place in prisons throughout Morocco during the year. Three persons on a hunger strike since April 1985 in Casablanca are still being held incommunicado in Averroes hospital. Authorities claimed in August that one, Moulay Tahar Douraldi, had requested transfer back to prison and had ended his strike, but his family, denied visitation rights, has been unable to confirm this.

Prison conditions and the hunger strikes were the focus of numerous communiques and demarches on Justice Ministry officials by Morocco's three human rights organizations. In September the Government issued a "clarification" which claimed that none of the four persons on hunger strikes were political prisoners (although it admitted all were condemned for belonging to illegal organizations), that all had received fair trials and the right to counsel, and that further inquiries in these cases would be considered "interference in the internal affairs of the Kingdom."

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government often ignores guarantees of procedural due process. Moroccan law requires that a detainee be brought before a judge within 4 days of detention and informed of the charges against him. For political crimes, a detainee can be held 8 days, with a 4-day extension. These minimal legal requirements are widely disregarded. Detainees are often held up to several weeks or longer before appearing before a judge, frequently without notice or access to an attorney or to families. It is largely during these periods of initial incommunicado detention that torture and other inhumane treatment occurs.

Most persons are arrested in public view, but police sometimes refuse to identify themselves, and warrants are not always used. Arrests are frequently made only on the basis of suspicion. Moroccan law requires that a lawyer be in attendance after initial presentation of the detainee before the review court, but no such right exists for the prior period of police custody. Morocco does not have an extensive system of bail, although defendants are sometimes released on their own recognizance. Moroccan law does not provide for habeas corpus or its equivalent. Under a separate code of military justice, military personnel have been detained in past years without warrants or announcement of trial. No such incidents were confirmed in 1989.

Although reliable estimates of the number of arbitrary arrests and incommunicado detention are not available, an outbreak of student strikes in the spring of 1989, primarily in Kenitra, Fez, Oujda, Meknes, and Tetouan, resulted in the detention of several hundred students and many arrests. According to press and human rights sources, many were arrested arbitrarily, roughed up, and released without being charged. Others, charged with disturbing public order and illegal demonstrations, were tried, often without counsel or with inadequate notice to counsel, and received sentences of 5 months to 1 year plus fines. The Government ignored the protests of all three of Morocco's human rights groups concerning the arrests. Lawyers attempting to intervene on behalf of the students were often denied access to them.

There are no known instances of political activists sentenced to exile, although there are activists who prefer to remain abroad rather than risk arrest on their return to Morocco. In March Mohamed Ait Kadour, a Socialist Party member who was sentenced to death in absentia after the 1972 assassination attempt against King Hassan, was arrested upon his return to Morocco from voluntary exile in France although he holds a French travel document as a political refugee. In November, after serving 8 months in prison, Ait Kadour was pardoned by the King. According to some reports, the Government has refused to issue passports which might enable exiles to return. As of the fall of 1989, there was no sign that other political activists living in exile would be able to return to Morocco without fear of arrest.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although Morocco has a well-developed judicial system which includes courts of original jurisdiction, appellate courts, and a supreme court, those accused of political/security offenses often do not enjoy the procedural safeguards needed to ensure a fair trial. Most cases are handled by civilian/secular courts based in part on French legal tradition, but a parallel judicial system exists which uses Islamic legal principles to deal with marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance for Muslim Moroccans. In the Islamic courts, Western legal practices are not applicable, and Koranic principles govern the limited kinds of cases heard.

In general, cases are brought before an initial review court--the court of first instance in Morocco--which can call for a hearing quickly to bring cases to trial. The detainee is informed of charges and questioned by the judge to decide if they have merit. If not, or if the infraction is minor, the judge may release the detainee or impose a light sentence.

If a lengthy investigation is required, the judge may release detainees on their own recognizance. In cases of political crimes, detainees are often held for long periods before trial. There are reports of detainees convicted on the basis of forced confessions extracted under duress.

The Moroccan judicial system is generally considered susceptible to political intervention and control in cases viewed as challenges to royal authority or state policy. Human rights activists claim that only a minority of lawyers dare to take cases of defendants involved in political issues, and some defense lawyers are intimidated or persecuted. Activists claim that trials involving political issues are held in an atmosphere of harassment designed to confuse both defendants and their attorneys. Because of overcrowded court dockets and the lack of judicial resources, defendants often receive only cursory hearings, and judges depend on police reports to decide cases. Although the State provides an attorney at public expense for serious crimes (when the sentence is over 5 years), appointed attorneys often provide inadequate representation. For lesser crimes, needy defendants usually are not represented by counsel.

In May King Hassan released 50 prisoners, some of whom had served up to 14 years for activities considered subversive. Because they were not amnestied from their "crimes," however, they have been unable to find employment or to obtain passports or other government documents. The former prisoners have complained of continued police harassment and surveillance.

The Government denies that it has any political prisoners. King Hassan explained in September that political detainees are in prison because of their "treasonous" opposition to Morocco's claim to the Western Sahara.

For the first time in 1989, two of Morocco's human rights groups provided documentation on political prisoners in Morocco, listing names, charges, sentences, and prisons. They estimated that, following the release of 50 political prisoners in May, about 225 political prisoners remain. However, the groups believed their lists to be incomplete, since many students arrested in 1989 were not accounted for, and not all Islamic fundamentalists or persons imprisoned for involvement in the two coup attempts in the early 1970's were included. All three Moroccan human rights organizations asked the Government for a general amnesty of all political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Arbitrary government interference in the private lives of citizens is relatively infrequent. The Constitution states that the home is inviolable and that no search or investigation may take place without a search warrant. This stipulation is not always observed, however, and there are continuing allegations of illegal searches of the homes and offices of suspected political activists. It is widely accepted that the government security services selectively monitor certain individuals and organizations, including their telephones and mail. The university campuses are under close surveillance, and an informant system exists, especially on the campuses and in the inner cities.

The Government does not generally interfere with the private beliefs of the individual, and there is no forced membership in political organizations. The Government remains concerned about the spread of what it considers Islamic radicalism and carefully monitors activities in the nation's mosques.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of expression; however, political meetings are closely watched, criticism of the monarchy and Islam is not tolerated, and, in the opinion of most observers, neither foreign policy nor domestic politics is fully open to free discussion. The Government has made it clear that any challenge to Morocco's claim to the Western Sahara is not subject to public debate.

There is no truly independent daily Moroccan press. The dailies primarily present the opinions of the palace or the officially recognized political parties. The Ministry of Information, headed by the Minister of Interior, owns and controls the Arabic daily Al Anbaa as well as the Moroccan press agency, the Maghreb Arab Press, which disseminate official views. All newspapers receive government subsidies, with the three dailies in the propalace Le Matin group--Le Matin and Maroc Soir in French and Assahra in Arabic--receiving a disproportionate share. All other dailies are owned and controlled by Moroccan political parties and serve as party organs.

There was considerable press criticism of the Government and some discussion of political and socioeconomic issues during the year, though there was no serious discussion of the Government's 1988-92 planning objectives, priorities, or strategy. Investigative reporting is severely limited, and journalists are under government pressure to conform to government policy through self-censorship. For example, newspapers and journal publishers and editors are frequently called to the Ministry of Information to explain articles considered objectionable by the palace and warned to discontinue coverage of certain topics. The Socialist Party daily Al Ittihad al Ichtiraki and the Communist Al Bayane were threatened with closure numerous times in 1989. Mohammed Idrissi Kaitouni, editor of the Istiqlal Party daily L'opinion, was tried for publishing the joint communique of two Moroccan human rights groups concerning the deaths of four persons in August, allegedly while in police or official custody, because the Government considered the report a "falsification." The editor's trial lasted 1 month and was covered by the Moroccan and international press. On November 9, he was convicted and sentenced to 2 years in prison and fined the equivalent of $250. Three days later King Hassan II pardoned the editor, but the conviction created uncertainty among journalists and human rights activists about what they can safely publish on sensitive human rights issues.

There are a number of privately owned periodicals and journals. Without the protection of vested interests, such as political parties, publication of social criticism in these periodicals often has proved fatal to such independent journals. Three publications closed in 1988-89 because of government harassment and seizure. According to informed observers, Lamaalif, a well-respected French-language monthly, closed down in the summer of 1988 after 20 years of publication because of continued threats and complaints by the Ministry of Information about material it had published.

MOROCCO

Kalima, a popular French-language monthly, stopped publication in April following government seizure of an issue devoted to freedom of the press in Morocco. A letter to its readers explained that after three seizures and one suspension in a year, it could no longer afford to continue. Finally, Al Massar, an Arabic-language weekly with extensive human rights coverage, closed in December 1988 in the face of an $18,500 fine and suspended prison sentence for its publisher on the charge of defamation. Human rights activists claimed that the lawsuit, brought for publishing an article critical of a local official, was designed to intimidate the paper and put it out of business. It did.

Officials have regularly seized foreign publications entering the country from abroad. Distribution of some issues of international papers, including the International Herald Tribune, Le Monde, and the London Times, was prevented in 1989 when they included articles deemed highly sensitive by the Government. For the most part, foreign publications are available to the public.

The Government owns and controls the sole radio and television station received by viewers throughout Morocco. Parts of the country receive programs from southern Europe. In 1989 a second Moroccan television channel, owned by a private holding company controlled by the royal family, began operation. Radio Mediterranee International, coowned by the palace and the French company Sofirad, has a more independent voice and an audience in Algeria and Tunisia as well as in many parts of Morocco.

There is a limited measure of academic freedom. Although there are strictures against scholarly investigation of the monarchy and Islam, limited research and publishing on Islam and Islamic fundamentalism goes on.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are constitutional guarantees of assembly and association, but these rights are carefully controlled to the point of abrogation. Two decrees dating from 1935 and 1939 enable the Government to suppress popular manifestations of dissent, peaceful or not.

Groups seen as threatening the political stability of the regime, such as declared radical leftists and Islamic fundamentalist organizations, are outlawed. Private, nonpolitical associations are usually permitted after they register with the Government, and professional, religious, business, and cultural associations are active. Permits are required for public meetings, and if the requesting group is a legally registered association, permission is usually--but not always--granted. For example, in 1988 a new organization, the Moroccan Organization for Human Rights, was denied permission to hold its inaugural meeting on three occasions but finally met on December 15, 1988. It continued to meet without interference in 1989.

There were student disturbances, including strikes and examination boycotts on many university campuses again in 1989. While most demonstrations were peaceful, a few resulted in bloody clashes with security agents. A student organization, the Union Nationale des Etudiants Marocains (UNEM), banned in 1973, was legalized in late 1988 by the Interior Ministry. Many youth activists complained the new

UNEM was co-opted by government authorities and was no longer the independent, representative, broad-based student organization it had been. UNEM is becoming increasingly factionalized and paralyzed by an emerging radical anarchist group, who accuse the mainstream UNEM members of being co-opted. Most students choose not to belong to UNEM (which entails being listed on a roster) for fear of being arrested and jailed in the event of riots on campus. Some students also fear that UNEM has been infiltrated by security forces.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The population is over 99 percent Sunni Muslim, and Islam is the official religion. The King bears the title "Commander of the Faithful," and he is the religious as well as secular leader of the Moroccan people. The Constitution provides for freedom of worship, although proselytizing is prohibited by law. Islamic tenets and ingrained popular attitudes strongly discourage conversion from Islam to another faith, and Moroccan converts to Christianity are occasionally subject to rough treatment and arbitrary arrest by police. Some African Christian foreign students on government scholarships reported pressure by university officials to convert to Islam, but African diplomats do not confirm such reports.

There are organized communities of Christians and Jews in Morocco. There are from 7,000 to 10,000 Jews, most of whom live in Casablanca and several other major cities. The Jewish community operates private schools and social institutions as well as a number of synagogues. Publications in Hebrew are permitted, and rabbis serving the Jewish community are trained in Morocco. Jews are active and influential in the business community. They are also represented in the Government.

The Government adheres to a pledge by the King to guarantee the Roman Catholic Church's right to conduct both religious and charitable work. Catholic clergy, who come exclusively from abroad, minister to some 100,000 foreign residents with parishes in most cities. As a result of the Pope's visit in 1985, a resident apostolic nunciature was established in 1986. As in past years, there continued to be reports of administrative harassment and surveillance of members of the Baha'i community, including the continuation of the 1983 ban on the holding of any meetings or religious ceremonies and the sealing off of the Baha'i cemetery in Rabat.

The King and other religious leaders continue to oppose "radical" religious beliefs, and a number of Muslim fundamentalists (see Section 1.e.) have been imprisoned. Interior Ministry officials monitor what is taught in the mosques and report deviations from orthodox Sunni Islam.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is unrestricted throughout Morocco. As the administering authority in the Western Sahara, however, the Moroccan Government restricts movement in areas of the territory which are militarily sensitive. There were no reported cases of restrictions on foreign travel for political reasons in 1989, although persons imprisoned for political reasons in the past have had difficulty obtaining passports.

MOROCCO

While there are no formal restrictions on foreign travel and emigration, it often takes an ordinary citizen months, good connections, and even well-placed bribes to obtain a passport. In some cases, a passport may not be issued at all. The Minister of Interior undertook to expedite the process, but delays and difficulty in passport issuance remain the norm rather than the exception. In August the Ministry of Interior announced that the procedures for obtaining passports would be streamlined, and it appears that for most Moroccans passports are somewhat easier to obtain. However, there are human rights activists who are still unable to travel outside Morocco because they have not been able to get passports.

A woman is obliged to have the permission of her father or, if married, her husband to obtain a passport. A divorced woman must receive her father's permission for a passport and, if she has custody of children, she must have the children's father's permission for passports to be issued to children.

There are no known instances of the Government depriving any citizen of Moroccan nationality. Moroccan law considers any person who acquires Moroccan nationality to be a citizen for life. Many Moroccans hold dual nationality and travel on passports from two countries; while in Morocco, however, they are regarded as Moroccan citizens. As a result, the Government has often refused to recognize the right of foreign embassies to act on behalf of dual nationals, or even to receive information concerning their arrest and imprisonment. This has been a major problem for some Western European embassies. Moroccan law encourages voluntary repatriation for Jewish community members who have emigrated from Morocco. It also encourages the return of Saharans who have opposed Morocco in the Western Sahara conflict. Returning former Polisario members deemed to pose no security threat are reintegrated into Moroccan life.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Moroccan citizens cannot change their Government since the Parliament has little or no authority to effect change. All executive power is vested in a government appointed by the King which serves at his pleasure. Moreover, the Constitution may not be amended without the approval of the King, who would be unlikely to abolish or modify the monarchy or the current system of government. The King's messages to the House of Representatives and the nation are not open to debate. The King's Prime Minister shares with Parliament the responsibility for initiating legislation, although in practice he initiates all legislation, thus controlling the legislative process. The Parliament passes the annual budget and other items of legislation. However, many measures of importance are promulgated as government decrees or by royal proclamation. Opposition politicians frequently complain that the Government, which must approve the introduction of legislative bills into the Parliament, does not give the body sufficient work, both in terms of the volume of the legislation referred to it and of the importance of the legislation. Opposition party leaders also complain that the Government fails to keep the Parliament advised of developments relating to key issues. Parliamentary absenteeism continues to be high.

While government legislative proposals are rarely rejected outright, the Parliament is sometimes able to modify the bills it passes and, on occasion, persuade the Government to delay or withdraw legislation. For example, the Government introduced legislation authorizing a sweeping privatization program in the fall of 1988. The Parliament passed the Government's privatization bill in December following the introduction of some modifications in response to opposition complaints.

Nonetheless, the system allows some space for political parties which represent factions that developed during the independence movement. More than a dozen political parties, representing a spectrum of political philosophies from far left to conservative, competed in the municipal elections of 1983 and the 1984 parliamentary elections. Some of the results were challenged, with widespread accusations--which persist today--of government tampering, both in terms of the selection of the candidates and in the tallying of the results. In a number of cases, these challenges were upheld in court. The Moroccan Constitution requires a referendum in order to extend the term of Parliament, and in December the people approved by referendum the extension of the current Parliament's term for 2 years. The King may extend the term of municipal councils by decree, and in November he did so for two years. Consequently, the next parliamentary and municipal council elections will now occur by September 1992.

The Government is very sensitive to human rights inquiries and international publicity and does not welcome inquiries from or cooperate with nongovernmental organizations. In September 1989, representatives from the International Association of Democratic Jurists and from the International Commission of Health Professionals visited Morocco to inquire about the political prisoners on hunger strike in Rabat and Casablanca (see Section 1.c.). The Government refused to meet with the visitors or allow them to see the hunger strikers. The Government later published a warning that further inquiries about the hunger strikers would be considered "interference in the internal affairs of the Kingdom of Morocco." The Government is often slow to respond to inquiries from embassies into alleged human rights cases; many inquiries have gone unanswered for up to 2 years.

Morocco has three human rights groups; two are affiliated with opposition political parties, and the third is nonpartisan. The Moroccan League for Human Rights is affiliated with the Istiqlal Party, and the Moroccan Association for Human Rights is affiliated with one wing of the Socialist Party. Since June 1988, these two organizations have formed a coordinating committee and often issue joint communiques. The Moroccan Organization for Human Rights, formed in December 1989, is nonpartisan.

All three groups were active throughout 1989 in protesting government actions, especially in the area of prison conditions, official abuse of prisoners (including political prisoners and the hunger strikers), and government interference with the press. All three issued numerous communiques, met with government officials, and corresponded with the Government. Although the three groups were not effective in changing government policy, they claim some success in popularizing human rights and sensitizing public opinion.

MOROCCO

Morocco's human rights groups report that Morocco has neglected in recent years to submit reports to the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva, as part of the U.N. process.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

The Constitution affirms the legal equality of all Moroccans. In the professions, women have made progress in law, medicine, and teaching, but progress in professional fields has not been matched in the society at large. Many women also work in government. The Government does not have any special programs to eradicate discrimination or to promote women, especially in the area of private law.

Divorce is permitted, but a husband can simply repudiate his wife while a wife cannot repudiate her husband. A man is permitted four wives according to Islamic tradition, although multiple marriages are rare (perhaps 1 to 4 percent of the population). Serial marriages have become more common owing to the ease of divorce for men. Segregation of the sexes is common, especially in social settings. However, among the urban poor, as well as increasingly among middle and upper class families, women work outside the home and contribute to family income. Women have begun to dominate clerical jobs in the city. The woman's role in rural areas is traditional; it is the women who live in more urban areas who are seeing some degree of liberalization of their roles.

Moroccan laws and social practices governing violence against women reflect Morocco's Islamic culture and the importance Islam places on the honor of the family as reflected in the sexual conduct of its women. For example, the Moroccan penal code includes severe punishment for men who are convicted of raping or violating a woman or girl, and the burden of proof is on the defendant. However, because of the terrible stigma attached to not being a virgin, sexual assaults often go unreported. Furthermore, to protect the social status of young girls who have been violated, the law permits the perpetrator to contract a marriage with his young victim after the fact. These marriages often occur while the perpetrator is in preventive detention.

Moroccan law excuses the murder or injury of a wife who is found in the act of committing adultery if the husband surprises her and her lover. A woman would not be excused after committing violence under similar circumstances.

Domestic violence occurs in some Moroccan homes, particularly in rural areas and the poorer quarters of the cities, where wives are frequently beaten by their husbands and sisters are often hit by their brothers as a form of discipline. Beating and slapping are believed by some Moroccans to be sanctioned by Islamic tradition, and so are accepted. Although a woman has the right to complain to the police in the case of a severe beating, as a practical matter she would not generally do so unless she is prepared to file for divorce and leave her husband's home.

Some Berber spokesmen claim that Moroccan institutions do not reflect the Berber character of the population and that, as a result of the lack of Berber-language schools, the Berber identity is not adequately maintained. A popular intellectual monthly review, largely dedicated to questions of Berber identity, was suspended in 1983 and has not reappeared. Even so, Berbers continue to play a significant role in national and local affairs. Some state-owned radio stations broadcast several hours daily in the Berber language. Two political parties, both part of the governing coalition, represent largely Berber areas, and Berbers continue to be well represented in the officer corps of the military.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right to organize trade unions is provided for in the Constitution. Workers are free to form and join unions throughout the country. The right is exercised widely, but not universally. On occasion, the selection of union officers and their ability to carry out their duties is subject to government pressure. In November 1989, the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association, considering allegations that the transfer of newly elected officers by the state drinking water agency was an antiunion measure, recalled its earlier warnings to the Government and reminded it of the principles of noninterference in union elections.

Some 1 million of Morocco's 7.5 million workers are organized. Three of the 13 existing trade union federations dominate the labor scene; all are independent of the Government. They are the Union Marocain du Travail (UMT), the Confederation Democratique du Travail (CDT), and the Union Generale des Travailleurs Marocains (UGTM). Each has a leadership elected democratically. The UMT has no political affiliation, the CDT is linked to the Socialist Union of Popular Forces (USFP), and the UGTM to the Istiqlal Party. Both the USFP and Istiqlal are currently opposition parties.

Unions in Morocco have the right to strike and do so often. Most of the work stoppages are intended to advertise grievances and last 24 hours or less. The December 1988-January 1989 strike at the Jerada parastatal coal mines led by the CDT, however, lasted nearly 2 months and attracted international attention. The firm eventually settled with the CDT, agreeing to a 5-percent wage increase and other concessions, which were far below original demands. A second long strike began in August at an American firm in Casablanca. This dispute, complicated by rivalry between the UMT and the UGTM, was still unresolved at year's end, although the company had returned to full production.

Unions in Morocco belong to regional labor organizations and maintain ties with international trade secretariats.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Constitution provides for the right to organize and bargain collectively. The multiplicity of trade union federations creates competition to organize workers. Any group of eight workers can organize, and it is easy for a worker to change trade union affiliation. Thus a single factory may contain several independent locals or locals affiliated with more than one labor federation.

In both the process of organizing and during collective bargaining, labor laws are honored most often in the industrial sector of the economy, in which government mechanisms to promote worker-employer negotiations are more easily applied. In the informal and underground economies, especially the recently burgeoning textile sector, and in the artisanal field, labor laws and regulations are not only less carefully observed but are often ignored entirely. To some degree, the state of the economy, with widespread youth unemployment, hinders protection of the organizing and collective bargaining process. Because of constitutional guarantees of the right to organize and bargain collectively, the principle of collective bargaining is implicit rather than explicit in the labor codes themselves.

In Morocco, collective bargaining agreements are often invoked in legal disputes when a worker claims to have been reprimanded or dismissed for trade union activity. Employers usually cite work-related reasons for the dismissals. An employer intending to fire workers without replacing them must apply in advance to the provincial governor through the labor inspector's office. In the more usual cases where employers plan to replace fired workers, however, the labor inspector provides replacements and mediates the cases of workers who protest their dismissal. Any worker fired for a serious infraction, such as sabotage, is entitled by law to a court hearing. An employer found to have dismissed a worker unjustly is liable for fines or even imprisonment. Because inspectors are overburdened, workers have turned increasingly to the court procedure for the resolution of complaints. Moroccan labor law applies equally to the small Tangier Export Zone. The proportion of unionized workers there is about the same as in Morocco as a whole.

Despite constitutional protection, unions complain regularly that employers suspend or dismiss their members for trade union activity without penalty, although the law entails fines or imprisonment for some labor law violations. Under Moroccan law, labor inspectors serve as investigator, judge, and jury and carry heavy workloads and are not very effective. Workers thus have turned increasingly to the courts for the resolution of complaints.

Several allegations of antiunion discrimination in Morocco have been considered by the ILO in recent years. Again in 1989 the ILO's Committee of Experts (COE) remarked on the shortcomings of Morocco's laws protecting workers against antiunion discrimination. While noting that the new draft Labor Code would bring Morocco into conformity with ILO Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively, the COE regretted that the new Code has still not entered into force.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Morocco has ratified both the International Labor Organization's conventions against forced labor, although there appears to be no Moroccan legal or constitutional prohibition against such labor. As far as is known, there is no forced or compulsory labor in Morocco.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Under Moroccan law, children cannot be employed or apprenticed before age 12. Special regulations govern the employment of children between the ages of 12 and 16. In artisanal work, however, children are often apprenticed before age 12; the argument is made that they need to acquire skills, such as weaving or rug-making, at an earlier age. Five years of primary education is compulsory, starting at age 7, but enforcement in the countryside and poorer urban areas is lax.

Safety and health conditions as well as salaries in enterprises employing children are often substandard. Children are also employed informally as domestics and usually receive little or no wages. In 1989 Moroccan and international sources highlighted abuses of minors in the rug-making industry. Detection of abuses of the child labor laws is complicated by the fact that many abuses occur in the countryside or in private homes.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The minimum industrial wage was raised in May 1989 by 10 percent to about 56 cents an hour. Agricultural workers also received a 10-percent increase in May 1989 to about $2.90 per day. Despite subsidies, a family cannot maintain a decent standard of living on the minimum wage of a single worker. In many cases, several members, some of them working in the informal economy, combine their income to support the family.

The informal sector provides a safety net for those who would otherwise be unemployed or underemployed. Most industrial workers in the modern sector of the economy earn more than the minimum wage. Moreover, workers are customarily paid between 13 and 16 months' salary for every 12-month year.

Moroccan law provides a 48-hour maximum workweek (with not more than 10 hours for any single day), premium pay for overtime, paid public and annual holidays, and minimum conditions for health and safety, including the prohibition of night work for women and minors. As with other regulations and laws, these are observed unevenly and have little meaning in the informal sector. Labor inspectors endeavor to monitor working conditions, accidents, and labor disputes, but lack sufficient resources and authority to investigate many complaints and assure compliance with the law.

WESTERN SAHARA

Morocco assumed administration of the northern three provinces of the Western Sahara after the withdrawal of Spanish forces in 1975, and of the southernmost province in 1979 when Mauritania renounced its claim to the area. Since 1973 the Polisario, an organization which Algeria has supported and which seeks independence for the Western Sahara, has challenged first Spain's and later Morocco's claim to the territory. During 1989 sporadic fighting between Polisario and Moroccan forces continued until October, when the Polisario resumed heavy attacks.

Sovereignty over the territory remains a subject of international dispute. At the request of the General Assembly, the International Court of Justice issued an advisory opinion in 1975 which concluded that the people of the Western Sahara were entitled to self-determination and that Spain, Morocco, and Mauritania were not entitled to exercise sovereignty over the territory. The Organization of African Unity (OAU) has attempted to mediate a solution. In 1981 Morocco agreed to the holding of a referendum to determine the population's wishes regarding independence or integration with Morocco. These efforts collapsed in 1984 when the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic (SDAR), the civilian arm of the Polisario, was seated at the OAU summit, and Morocco withdrew from the OAU in protest. Morocco also rejected an OAU resolution calling for direct negotiations between Morocco and the Polisario.

Morocco called upon the United Nations to administer the referendum, and in 1986 U.N. Secretary General Perez de Cuellar lent his good offices to efforts to arrange it. In November and December 1987, a U.N. technical team visited the territory to explore the practical modalities of a referendum. On August 30, 1988, Morocco and the SDAR accepted in principle the Secretary General's proposal to conduct the referendum under U.N. and OAU auspices, and the Secretary General named a special representative to work out the practical details.

In 1989 some progress was made towards holding the referendum. In early January, King Hassan II received a high-ranking delegation of Polisario leaders for the first time, and in mid-January the U.N. Special Representative visited the region to discuss the modalities of the referendum. Secretary General Perez de Cuellar's June visit to the region, including to Morocco, Mauritania, Mali, and Algeria, resulted in the establishment of a technical commission to implement the "peace plan" in the Western Sahara. The first meeting of this commission took place at the U.N. in July between representatives of Morocco and the Polisario as well as representatives of the U.N. and the OAU. Despite this progress, disagreement continues over conditions for the referendum, and no date for it has yet been set. In November, however, King Hassan made clear his expectation that the Western Sahara referendum should be accomplished before the next parliamentary and municipal council elections take place in September 1992.

The civilian population in the approximately 85 percent of the Western Sahara under effective Moroccan control is subject to Moroccan political institutions and laws. In general, they experience the same human rights and worker rights practices as Moroccans in areas of undisputed Moroccan sovereignty. There are reports that some Saharans often have more difficulty obtaining passports, that their political views are more closely monitored than those of residents of Morocco proper, and that police and paramilitary authorities react especially harshly against those suspected of supporting the Polisario. The Moroccan Government denies such charges and counters with allegations of Polisario human rights abuses. Since there has been no opportunity to evaluate the human rights practices of the Polisario in areas of the Western Sahara outside of the Berm, the Moroccan earthwork defense line, these allegations cannot be confirmed or ruled out.

During 1989 Moroccan officials reported several defections to Morocco of former Polisario members from Polisario-controlled territory. These included two high-level Polisario leaders, as well as lower ranking officials. Moroccan officials and the defectors claim that the Polisario prohibits persons wishing to return to Morocco from leaving the Polisario camps at Tindouf. The Polisario has responded that these defections were the result of attempts by Morocco to create divisions within Polisario ranks. The defectors appeared to reintegrate into Moroccan society without difficulty or harassment from Moroccan officials. On numerous occasions in 1989, King Hassan publicly welcomed the "return to Morocco of all Saharans."

Within the Western Sahara, there is little organized labor activity (outside the area under Moroccan control, there is virtually no modern economic activity). Since all salaries in both the private and public sectors are at least twice those in Morocco, wage demands are not an issue. For example, the phosphate industry, the only indigenous industry and largest employer, employs about 2,000 persons who work in harsh desert conditions, but workers accept the jobs because of the attractive pay. Unemployment is not a problem owing to the investment in the region by the Moroccan Government. A program announced in July 1988 to employ 2,000 Saharan youth in jobs outside the territory has apparently eliminated most youth unemployment.

The same labor laws that apply in Morocco apply in the Moroccan-controlled areas of the Western Sahara, and enforcement is equivalent to that in Morocco proper.

The Polisario has established an embryonic labor wing called the Sario Federation of Labor (UGTSARIO), which reportedly enjoys close relations with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions and with a few Arab and African national labor centers; however, UGTSARIO does not engage in customary trade union activities in the Polisario-controlled areas.

NEPAL

The King is the sole source of authority for all government institutions in Nepal, the world's only Hindu Kingdom. Although traditional and constitutional restraints limit the King's powers, he rules as well as reigns. Political parties are formally banned but are permitted to function more or less openly. However, elections are officially contested on an individual basis. The National Panchayat (legislature) consists of 112 representatives elected directly on the basis of universal adult suffrage and 28 representatives appointed by the King. Legislation passed by the National Panchayat must have the King's approval to become law. The Supreme Court can invalidate laws which it finds to be inconsistent with the Constitution. Officially, the National Panchayat selects the Prime Minister from its ranks; in practice, he must also be acceptable to the King. The Prime Minister appoints the Council of Ministers (cabinet), which is answerable both to the National Panchayat and to the King. The Council manages day-to-day government operations and advises the King.

Internal security in Nepal is maintained by the national police and, as necessary, by the army. Because communication links in Nepal are limited, local officials have a great deal of autonomy and exercise wide discretion in handling law and order issues.

Nepal is one of the world's poorest countries. Over 90 percent of its 18 million people are engaged in subsistence agriculture. Economic development varies widely: the Kathmandu valley and the Terai (the lowland area adjacent to India) are being developed more rapidly, but population pressures and environmental degradation in the hills between the Terai in the south and the Himalaya mountain range in the north keep the hills the poorest region of the country.

Human rights in Nepal remain seriously restricted. Reports of beatings and other mistreatment of prisoners continue to be received. Citizens do not have the right to change their government. Their rights to the freedoms of speech and press, assembly and association, and religion are restricted in varying degrees, in most cases severely. Worker rights are limited by law, and women's rights are limited by tradition and illiteracy. Christians, including a prominent leader, continue to be imprisoned on charges of proselytizing, and a Christian church service in Kathmandu Valley was disrupted and the pastor and some members of the congregation beaten and jailed in November. There were concerns at year's end about the status of Christians in the Kingdom as a result. Arrests of Nepali Congress Party activists occurred periodically (1,000 were arrested in September), primarily for protesting Government measures regarding the dispute with India, but almost all were promptly released, a relaxation of previous detention policy. The Government introduced or revised several laws to reform arrest and detention and registered, reportedly for the first time, a human rights organization.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known instances of such killings in 1989.

NEPAL

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of government-instigated disappearances. However, the Government has not yet accounted for eight persons, arrested in the past 4 years, who disappeared, according to local press and human rights organizations.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were continuing reports of beatings and other brutal treatment of prisoners by police officials, particularly in the rural areas. The Human Rights Protection Forum, a private Nepalese organization, in a bulletin issued in April, alleged that police officials often use both psychological and physical torture during interrogation to obtain confessions in lieu of proper investigative techniques. The Government has rarely conducted active investigations into allegations of police brutality or acknowledged public concern about its prevalence.

In 1989 the King approved an amendment to the Jail Act which requires yearly inspection of local jails by the zonal commissioner and punishment of jail authorities who keep prisoners or detainees longer than the legally prescribed period. The amendment did not, however, address physical abuse of prisoners. The Civil Code does call for the punishment of jailors who withhold food, detain people without legal grounds, or keep detainees in handcuffs or fetters without legal grounds.

Care of and facilities for treating the mentally ill are inadequate; such persons are often placed in jails under conditions that are degrading and sometimes inhumane.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrests and brief detention are common. Although exact numbers are difficult to determine, it is reliably estimated that over 2,000 such arrests and detentions took place in 1989. On the national level, short-term arrests and detentions, sometimes without the issuance of any order, may be used to suppress political opposition. On the local level, officials have broad authority and little supervision from the central Government. Nepalese human rights organizations report that this often leads to abuse of power, with persons held incommunicado in police custody for extended periods, sometimes months.

A new Public Security Act (PSA), approved by the King on September 28, permits up to 18 months' detention before charges must be filed (the 1961 Act allowed 36 months). In a significant change from past practice, local authorities must now present a written detention order with "grounds and reasons" at the time of detention and must notify the district court within 24 hours. The listed grounds for detention have not changed from the 1961 Act and are open to broad interpretation. A person may be detained if it is suspected that his actions might affect: 1) the security of Nepal; 2) order and tranquility inside Nepal; 3) amicable relations between Nepal and other friendly states; and 4) amicable relations among people of different classes or religions within Nepal. Persons detained under the Act are not brought to trial.

NEPAL

Critics of the new Act assert that the Government is attempting to bring the judicial system into the executive branch's administration of the detention process. They point out that under the PSA the detainee still has no recourse to legal counsel at any point in the process. There are reports that some prisoners have been held in jail after completion of their sentences and, in some cases, in defiance of a Supreme Court order for their release. The new PSA provides that upon completion of the detention period, the detainee is to be released in the presence of the district court judge or his deputy. Rearrest is possible for a new 18-month period.

The Public Offenses Act, aimed at limiting public protest or demonstration, permits a district official to issue an order for up to 6 months' detention, or a sizable fine, and was used in April 1989 to detain several students who took part in demonstrations. (See also Section 2.b.)

Persons detained for the expression of views critical of, or different from, the Government's may also be charged under the Treason Act. In addition, the Government sometimes charges persons under the Organizations and Associations (Control) Act of 1963, which provides for the prosecution of persons who violate the constitutional ban on political parties.

Persons are often detained without warrants and are permitted access to a lawyer of their choosing only after they are no longer technically in police custody, which can be up to 25 days in criminal cases. Those detained under the PSA are presented with documentation stating they are being held under the Act when they are imprisoned. For common crimes, the law provides that a suspect must be brought before a court within 24 hours, and must be informed of the general grounds for the arrest or be released. A 7-day extension may be granted for the completion of the police investigation. The law generally provides a person in detention with the right to a judicial determination of the legality of the detention, but this right is often disregarded.

There is a functioning system of bail, but bail levels were substantially increased in 1987, making bail too expensive for most Nepalese. Legal sources also report a growing tendency for judges not to set bail, and many accused persons are held throughout their trial period.

Official exile is not practiced in Nepal. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The law provides for the right to a public trial except in some security and customs cases, and the right is usually honored. Except for those held in preventive detention, the Constitution provides for the right to counsel and protection from double jeopardy and retroactive application of the law. However, these rights are not always respected.

Military and civilian courts are separate. Military courts generally deal only with military personnel, but civilians may also be tried in military courts for crimes involving the military. Lower court judges are appointed by the Government on the recommendation of the Judicial Service Commission. Higher court judges are appointed by the King on the recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. In cases of terrorism or treason, the Destructive Crimes Act and the State Offenses and Punishment Act provide for closed trials before specially constituted tribunals.

The judiciary is legally independent but is generally not assertive in challenging the King. Law enforcement officials frequently ignore even writs and orders issued by the Supreme Court, or reply that the person in question is not in their custody. There is no mechanism for courts to follow up on their writs and orders. All lower court decisions, including acquittals, are subject to appeal. The Supreme Court is the court of last appeal, but the King may grant pardons and set aside judgments.

In its August 1989 Report, Asia Watch (AW) states that the courts have been unable to play a significant role in the enforcement of individual rights in Nepal. AW claims this is due in part to the power of the King, interference by government officials in decisions of the courts, and the absence of job security for judges.

Estimates in 1989 of the number of political prisoners on the basis of statistics supplied by the Forum for Protection of Human Rights ranged from 150 to 200, a marginal decrease over the estimates of 1988.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

While the Government generally respects the privacy of the home and family, principles which are bolstered by Nepalese law and tradition, there are exceptions. Search warrants issued by Chief District Officers are required before search and seizure but not in cases involving suspected narcotics or security violations. The correspondence of some individuals, both Nepalese and foreign, is opened with little attempt at concealment.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Under the Constitution, freedom of speech and of the press may not be exercised in support of a political party or "to the detriment of the common good, the monarch, or members of the royal family." In practice, this rule is widely interpreted to permit criticism of the Government but not of the monarch or of the royal family. In addition, provisions of The Press and Publications Act place limits on material which might undermine the interests or sovereignty of the nation; contravene principles which underlie the Constitution; or encourage, abet, or propagate party politics or party feelings. A well-known Nepalese political and human rights activist was arrested in May 1989 under the Treason Act after making speeches in India regarding the Nepal/India dispute over the conduct of their bilateral relations. He was released on the same day after paying a small fine.

The sole radio service and the only television station in Nepal are government controlled, and their programming reflects the views of the Government.

The two Nepalese dailies with the largest circulation are government organs. They carry some reports of opposition activities and criticism of the Government. A large number of Nepal's 400 publications (some of whose circulation is only in the hundreds of copies) are vigorous and candid in their criticism of the Government. However, comments deemed overly pro-Indian in the context of the India/Nepal dispute and allegations of serious corruption in the Government prompted restrictions on several publications in 1989. Fourteen journalists were reported arrested in 1989 for controversial reporting on the India/Nepal dispute. All but two have now been released. Legal bases cited for these arrests included the Press and Publications Act, the Treason Act, and the PSA. Most were released within 1 to several days of being arrested. In August two journalists were arrested in connection with the printing of a controversial interview with the leader of a political party in which the Nepalese "partyless" system was criticized.

Critics note that the Government uses its control of advertising and newsprint to inhibit press criticism. The Government did not close any newspapers in 1989, though officials are known to have raided and searched some newspaper offices. Foreign publications are seized or banned when deemed to carry articles unfavorable to the Government or to the monarchy. In 1989 the Government reportedly banned over 50 Indian publications. Nepalese officials withheld major Indian publications not included in the ban but containing objectionable articles on India/Nepal relations from expatriate subscribers. Circulation of banned or proscribed newspapers or articles can lead to arrest and imprisonment.

Academic freedom is limited. Professors at both of Nepal's universities are essentially civil servants and therefore have limited autonomy. The tenure system provides little protection from government intrusion. Self-censorship is practiced throughout the academic system. Academic freedom is further restricted by censorship of books and other domestic publications. In May the official press strongly criticized a prominent university professor for his authorship of articles in India which were regarded as challenging Nepalese policy toward India.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Regulations permit local authorities to prohibit meetings, speeches, and posters if they are found not to be "for the convenience or good of the general public." These regulations are frequently invoked. The law also forbids activities detrimental to the monarchy, relations among people, or national security. All political parties are considered illegal under the "partyless" panchayat (council) system, although in practice political party members are generally permitted to assemble privately and to express their views in the independent press.

Regulations governing political parties are interpreted differently by local authorities in different areas of the country, and the decision whether to permit a political meeting is usually made on an ad hoc basis. The Organizations and Associations (Control) Act requires that all organizations be registered with the Government and stipulates that members of applying organizations must receive a police report stating that they are not "antisystem." Approval of registration applications can take as long as several years and is often denied, but many groups meet without seeking approval, or even after approval is denied. Student groups, including those openly affiliated with the banned political parties, are allowed to contest campus elections.

NEPAL

After the dispute with India began last March, the Government usually did not impede student meetings and demonstrations held to protest university closings and Indian policies toward Nepal. By contrast, assembly by groups critical of the Government is often disrupted. A total of 555 persons (mostly students) were arrested during demonstrations sponsored by the Democratic National Unity Forum in April and May to protest the Government's handling of Nepal/India relations. Most of those arrested, except for some leftist political activists, were released promptly. While the official Nepal Labor Organization observed May Day with functions in Kathmandu and elsewhere without any hindrances, the police arrested about 50 members of the Nepal Independent Workers' Organization (a "blue-collar" workers' rights group), most for "unauthorized activities;" 28 persons were detained. In July over 1,000 people, including 300 in Kathmandu, were arrested when they attempted to plant trees or donate blood on the anniversary of the death of a prominent opposition leader. In September more than 1,000 Nepali Congress Party workers were arrested during demonstrations also protesting government handling of the dispute. On both occasions, almost all were soon released.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides that "every person, having regard to the traditions, may profess and practice his own religion as handed down from the ancient times," and that "no persons shall be entitled to convert another person from one religion to another." The legal code provides a maximum penalty of 1 year in prison for any Hindu who converts to another religion and 3 to 6 years for any person who seeks to proselytize a Hindu. The State views the conversion of Hindus as a more serious crime than the conversion of non-Hindus because conversion from Hinduism is regarded as undermining the religious and ideological underpinnings of the State.

The great majority of Nepalese are Hindus, and Nepal is officially described as a Hindu state. There is a sizable minority of Buddhists, a smaller number of Muslims, and a small but growing number of Christians. Non-Hindus are allowed to practice their religion and maintain places of worship. Many foreign Christian clergymen reside and work in Nepal in various fields. Religious education is offered by non-Hindus, including Muslims and Christians. Religious publications are imported mainly from India and are widely circulated.

The Government takes seriously the prohibition of proselytization and conversion. According to the most recent figures obtained from Nepalese Christian leaders, in mid-1989 there were 26 Nepalese Christians serving prison sentences of 3 months to 7 years; 80 court cases involving over 200 Christians; and 24 Christians in custody awaiting trial. Virtually all of these cases involved charges of proselytization. Nepalese authorities arrested Christian pastor Charles Mendies in November after he was tried and acquitted of proselytizing but subsequently found guilty by the Supreme Court. He remained in prison in late December and was awaiting the outcome of an appeal to the King. There were other reports that on November 12 a Christian church service in Kathmandu Valley was broken up, the pastor assaulted, and some members of the congregation arrested. Another well-publicized case involved an American citizen, David McBride, and a Canadian citizen, Mervyn Budd, who were arrested in October 1988 on the charge of proselytization. They were tried and found not guilty by a court and released in February 1989.

Nepalese citizens, who lack an international intercessor and the advantage of wide international press attention, as in the McBride-Budd case, often receive less favorable treatment. For Indians and Nepalese arrested on charges of proselytization, the time in police custody prior to trial may be worse, according to some observers, than an actual jail term, owing to the brutal treatment the detainee often receives. Customs officials reportedly continued to impound Bibles being brought into Nepal by travelers or returning citizens. There were fewer attacks in the press on the spread of Christianity.

By contrast, Muslims and Buddhists experience few difficulties, and there are almost no cases of proselytization pending against these two groups.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on travel within the country for Nepalese citizens. Foreigners (including Tibetans resident in Nepal) and journalists are restricted from traveling to several border areas. Nepalese abroad are free to return home. There are no known cases of revocation of citizenship for political reasons.

Travel outside of Nepal, generally not restricted for Nepalese citizens, is limited in the case of Tibetans who reside in Nepal to India only, with occasional exceptions. In June several Nepalese citizens were prevented from traveling to North Korea for the 13th World Youth and Student Festival. The Government objected to the North Korean Government arranging travel documents and sponsorship without the knowledge of the Government of Nepal. There are also reported instances of the Government sometimes delaying or otherwise making it more difficult for students to travel to Communist countries either at their own expense or through host government scholarships not administered by the Nepalese Government. Those going to countries on host government scholarships administered by the Government of Nepal have no difficulties.

Nepal has no stated refugee policy. In the past it has accepted and assimilated approximately 12,000 to 14,000 Tibetan refugees. However, border restrictions, tightened in 1988 by a joint Nepalese/Chinese agreement, continued to be stringent in 1989. Some Tibetans who attempted to cross the border into Nepal without appropriate documentation were turned back. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees opened an office in Kathmandu in October 1989. The Government is aiding its efforts by sharing lists of newly registered refugees and asylum-seekers.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Nepalese citizens do not have the right to change their government. Political legitimacy flows from the King, who is revered as an incarnation of the Hindu god Vishnu and who dominates the political system. The Constitution is bestowed by the King, not adopted by the citizens of Nepal, and there is no mechanism by which they can legally change the political system. Many Nepalese accept the monarchy as the symbol of Nepalese nationalism and a force which binds together the disparate ethnic and linguistic communities of Nepal. At the same time, there is substantial support, especially among educated Nepalese, for broader participation in the political system.

Elections at various levels based on universal suffrage are held every 5 years. There are multiple candidates, but political parties are not permitted to take part. Within the National Panchayat there is lively debate on many issues, but not on the monarchy itself, which cannot be criticized in the legislature or in print. In the absence of recognized political parties, the palace effectively dominates the legislature. The continued ban on political parties makes it difficult for public opinion to be mobilized and represented outside the strict confines of the Panchayat system. However, the banned Nepali Congress Party and a variety of Communist groups actively criticize the Government on many issues and periodically attempt to mobilize public opinion.

Despite the fact that political parties are legally banned, the Government continues a low-key dialog with some of the more moderate party representatives. The King meets with party leaders on an irregular basis. He reportedly met in 1989 with Ganesh Man Singh, the leader of the banned Nepali Congress Party. However, in November Singh was taken into police custody, then released on bail, allegedly on the charge of defaming and undermining the King and members of the royal family and the country.

There were no governmental or nongovernmental investigations of human rights conditions in Nepal in 1989 outside the area of worker rights (see Section 6). There are several unregistered human rights organizations which address domestic human rights issues. These include the Nepal Human Rights Organization and Human Rights Protection Forum. In September the Government finally accepted the registration of a human rights group known as the Nepal Human Rights Organization (distinct from the unregistered group of the same name). While some human rights activists consider the new group to be "government-sponsored," its board of directors includes members who actively oppose the present "partyless" political system as well as those who accept it. While the Government has not granted official status to other human rights groups, neither has it acted forcibly against them.

The Government of Nepal is generally not responsive to outside criticism of its human rights practices but did write to AI in 1988 to assert that officials were bound to inform detainees held under the PSA of the grounds of detention and that detainees or their representatives could approach the courts to set aside any unlawful detention order. AI replied, expressing concern that the detention orders were unspecific and so broad that effective recourse to the courts was difficult; it asked that a judicial authority promptly examine the legality of detention in the broadest sense. AI said that by the end of the year it had received no further response to this and other AI concerns.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Women in Nepal have the right to vote and to hold property in their own names. However, women do not enjoy their rights fully in many rural areas, where the weight of tradition, lack of education, and ignorance of the law remain severe impediments to the exercise of these rights. The female literacy rate in 1988 was 18 percent, far lower than the average literacy rate of 33 percent. Over the years, changes in marriage and inheritance laws have benefited women. Women are engaged chiefly in agriculture and, to a lesser extent, small trading.

Wife beating is said to be common though little is known about its extent. Abuse occurring within the family is seldom mentioned owing to the value attached to personal privacy in this traditional society. In general, there is virtually no public attention to or discussion of violence against women nor any government policies that focus on it as an issue.

The Nepal Women's Organization (one of the six "class" organizations set up by the Government) is charged with protecting women from exploitation and preventing violations of their rights. One of its major functions is to provide legal aid service to make women aware of their rights and the legal protection available to them. However, this organization is most active in Kathmandu--not in the villages where most women live. A growing number of women's lobbying groups are now taking up women's causes. The Government itself has adopted policies designed to encourage women's participation in family planning, adult education programs, and small-scale income-generating enterprises.

Still largely a traditional society, Nepal remains wedded to the caste system. However, public discrimination on the basis of caste, particularly the public shunning of "untouchables," has been outlawed and is officially discouraged. The spread of education and higher levels of prosperity, especially in the Kathmandu valley, are slowly reducing caste distinctions and increasing opportunities for lower socioeconomic groups. Politics and senior jobs in the government administration and army in Nepal continue to be dominated by higher and better educated castes (Brahmins, Chhetris, and certain elements of the Newar community), but the representation of other castes is slowly increasing.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. Right of Association

Workers do not enjoy the right to form associations independent of the Government. The Nepal Labor Organization (NLO) was established by the Government in 1963 to represent workers' interests after trade unions were banned in 1960, although the NLO is officially portrayed as being independent. All factory, mill, and other wage earners, including those in the transportation sector, are eligible for membership in the NLO, but membership is not mandatory. The NLO claims a membership of 20,000, about 3 percent of the total work force. Government workers are not allowed to join the NLO. The NLO generally represents "blue-collar" laborers. The professions have associations which function like trade unions but are not recognized as such.

Under the provisions of the Nepal Factories and Factory Workers' Act of 1977, as amended, factory managers are directed to form committees representing both management and labor "to encourage friendly and amicable relations." The committees are supposed to meet once a month. The number of members of each committee are not to exceed 20, with equal participation by management and labor.

Nepalese workers theoretically enjoy the right to strike, but only if the strike is authorized by the government-sponsored NLO. According to the most recent data gathered by the NLO, a total of 5 strikes were held in 1989, including a prolonged strike at the government-owned tea factory.

Several formal complaints, including one by the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, alleging the denial of trade union rights have been filed in recent years. The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the World Confederation of the Organizations of the Teaching Professions (WCOTP) brought a complaint before the International Labor Organization (ILO) regarding the Nepalese Government's refusal since 1980 to register the Nepal National Teachers Association (NNTA), as well as mass arrests, dismissals, transfers or other actions against demonstrating teachers. The Government responded formally in 1989, but the ILO stated that the reply lacked details and urged judicial inquiry into the alleged deaths of seven NNTA local officers, and reiterated its call for the right to a rapid trial and Nepalese government recognition of the NNTA.

Two teachers organizations--the Nepal National Secondary Teachers Association and the Nepal National Primary Teachers Association--were established and formally approved by the Government in 1988, which has averted efforts to form a teachers union. Though critics assailed the new organizations as government controlled, a majority of the members believe establishment of the new organizations has resulted in significant gains, including a pay raise of 29 to 30 percent in 1989, compared with a 25-percent increase for civil servants. According to the WCOTP, the NNTA continues to operate.

The NLO is not affiliated with any international trade union federation. The NLO, which was a member of the ICFTU in the mid-1970's and then withdrew, has held informal discussions with the ICFTU about rejoining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers do not, in practice, enjoy the right to organize and bargain collectively. Although there are limited provisions on collective bargaining and unfair labor practices in the Nepal Factories and Factory Workers' Act of 1977 (the Act), no collective bargaining agreements are known to have been made. Committees established by the Act have a mandate to settle differences, and a tribunal of arbitrators may be called to redress grievances. The Government states that the Nepalese system is based on "class coordination" rather than on a system of collective bargaining, reflecting the emphasis on class organizations such as the Nepal Labor Organization. There are no export processing zones in Nepal.

NEPAL

c. Prohibition of Forced and Compulsory Labor

The Constitution stipulates that no one may be subject to compulsory labor, and neither forced nor compulsory labor is practiced in Nepal.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The Act sets the minimum employment age for children at 14 but, according to many observers, child labor is common in privately owned factories and in the service sector, where enforcement of the Act is weak. The agricultural sector, which falls outside the purview of the Act, employs 90 percent of Nepal's labor force, where children of poor farmers help support their families.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Act calls for the Government to set conditions of work with respect to minimum wage, a 48-hour workweek, and standards for occupational safety and health, but implementation is uneven and the Act is not rigorously enforced. The few large factories in Nepal, i.e., those with 100 or more workers, are considered to be in better compliance with these regulations than the more numerous small enterprises. Minimum wage rates, increased by 25 percent in 1988, are set for four categories of employment as follows: unskilled--approximately $19 per month; semiskilled--$21 per month; skilled--$25 per month; highly skilled--$32 per month (all figures in this section are calculated at September 1989 exchange rates). The Government reports that average national family income is $43.26 per month, (rural - $41.82 and urban - $62.63). These wages all exceed the 1989 annual per capita income of $150, but are considered sufficient only for the most minimal standard of living.

OMAN

The Sultanate of Oman is an absolute monarchy without popularly elected representative institutions or political parties. The reigning Sultan, Qaboos bin Said al Said, is the 14th ruler of the current dynasty. The 55-member State Consultative Council, formed in 1981, functions as an advisory body on economic and social questions. Members are appointed by the Sultan who has continued the house of al Said's long tradition of firm control over all important matters affecting the Omani State. At the same time, the Sultan has built on an earlier trend to bring notables of the tribal system of the interior into the national administration.

National security continues to be an area of major concern. Although an insurrection in the southern province of Dhofar, supported by the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, was defeated in 1975, Oman has continued to devote considerable revenue to defense. Oman's strategic location on the south shore of the Strait of Hormuz exposed the country to the increased tension in the Persian Gulf area during the 1980's. The internal security services are large, efficient, and pervasive, but are not generally regarded as intrusive. Many key jobs in the Government, especially in the military and internal security services, are occupied by foreigners, including many British, although a policy of "Omanization" is causing the number of expatriates to decline.

Almost totally undeveloped when Sultan Qaboos came to power in 1970, Oman has used its modest oil revenues to foster impressive progress in the social, economic, and administrative spheres, achieving a significant improvement in living standards. Oman's economy remains heavily dependent on petroleum exports.

There were no important changes in the human rights situation in 1989. Human rights in Oman--particularly the freedoms of speech and association and the right to change the government--remained tightly restricted. Civil and political rights are not formally codified, but the integrity of the individual is usually respected, although there have been some reports of abuse of foreign workers (see Section 1.a.). The people have access to their Government at the local wali (governor) level; the walis and tribal leaders in turn have access to the Sultan, his advisers, and ministry officials to present the views of the people they represent.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known political or other extrajudicial killings in Oman.

b. Disappearance

No cases of disappearance were reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture or other forms of cruel punishment are not systematically practiced by Omani authorities. However, there were unconfirmed reports in 1989 that one youth was hospitalized for several weeks after being interrogated by the police (his mistreatment was said to have stopped when senior police officials learned of it) and that one foreign worker died from injuries suffered while in custody shortly after his arrest. Capital punishment, amputations, and related penalties under Islamic law are no longer carried out. Prison conditions are harsh, with temperatures sometimes exceeding 120 degrees in cells without airconditioning, fans, or proper ventilation. In 1989 the Government began publishing in the daily press the names, photos, and jail sentences of those convicted. This practice is apparently intended to humiliate the criminals' families and thereby serve as a deterrent to prospective wrongdoers. There are reports that juveniles are sometimes held with hardened criminals, and the result is the brutalizing of the juveniles.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although Omani law does not provide for habeas corpus or its equivalent, the period of detention before trial in criminal cases is usually short. Police notification to family is often slow. Incommunicado detention is not normally practiced, although some youths were reportedly held incommunicado for 3 months for interrogation during a state security trial. Under current Omani procedures, a person suspected of a crime may be held up to 15 days while a case is under investigation, although this may be extended to a maximum of 70 days if approved by the magistrate. Attorneys are not always permitted access to their clients. While in the past there have been abuses of the police power of arrest, the criminal code imposes penalties for unjustified arrest or detention. Citizens have several channels through which they can seek redress of any grievance against law enforcement authorities, and these channels appear to serve their purpose well, particularly in rural areas. There are several cases currently pending before the courts involving citizens suing police officers for unjustified arrest.

All Omanis who were in exile under the previous Sultan were given the opportunity to return, as many thousands did after 1970. The grace period for those in self-imposed exile who wished to return to Oman formally ended on December 31, 1986, although amnesty has subsequently been granted to at least one additional returnee.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Oman's first criminal code was enacted in 1974. This code does not explicitly state the rights of the accused during the criminal process, nor does it have rules for admission of evidence during trials or codified procedures for entering cases into the criminal system. A draft revised criminal code modeled on the French system has been circulating for comment within the Government since 1988.

Judicial practice in Oman conforms, for the most part, to the prescriptions under Islamic law for a fair trial before experienced and impartial judges. However, there is no right under law to a jury, counsel, or public trial, and attorneys are not provided for those who cannot afford them. If a case proceeds to trial, it is heard before a judge alone.

OMAN

Generally, all questioning is conducted by the judge, and there is no examination or cross-examination by the prosecution, defense, or the accused. Either side may request the judge to ask particular questions of a witness, however, and some judges do permit direct questioning of witnesses. At the discretion of the judge, the accused may call witnesses. Decisions in serious criminal cases heard by the magistrate court are generally pronounced promptly, and sentencing is immediate. Verdicts are final, although there may be informal appeals to the state advisor for penal affairs and ultimately to the Sultan in cases involving serious offenses. The Sultan must approve death penalty verdicts. The various judicial systems are subordinate to the Sultan, but they operate independently in the majority of cases. The judicial system suffers from a lack of trained personnel.

Although Islamic law is administered throughout the country by Islamic judges (qadis) in Shari'a courts, the jurisdiction of the Shari'a court is limited to civil cases, including commercial, as well as minor criminal cases. Similarly, recently reconstituted "barzah" or people's courts--presided over by walis, judges, and staff--handle personal and minor commercial disputes but not criminal cases. In these cases, there is a right of appeal to the Minister of Justice and ultimately to the Sultan. There is also a security court system that handles internal national security cases. This rarely used court consists of a three-judge panel whose verdict is final. The accused has a right to counsel, but there is no appeal of the verdict except to the Sultan. The last known trial before the security court was the case in late 1988 involving 16 Shi'a charged with plotting to overthrow the Government. Of these, two were released, two were sentenced to life imprisonment, and the remainder received sentences ranging from 5 to 15 years in prison.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is a widespread fear of government eavesdropping, and Omanis are guarded in their speech and written communication. Warrants are not required to search private residences, offices, or vehicles, and such searches, as well as the monitoring of telephones and private correspondence, are confined to cases where the Government perceives a security threat or criminal activity.

Although there is no government policy to discourage the use of other languages in speech or print or in religious instruction in the home, the Government has increasingly insisted that correspondence with it, and public and legal documents, be in Arabic. A 1986 law banned, with a few exceptions, marriage between Omanis and foreigners. The move was explained as an effort to stem the erosion of Omani culture. Those already married to foreigners had to register within a specified period or risk forfeiting their citizenship and that of their offspring.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are no provisions in law which protect freedom of speech or freedom of the press. Criticism of the Sultan in any form or medium is prohibited by law. Criticism of individual officials, agencies, and their programs is tolerated but is not given media coverage. The Government controls all radio and television broadcasting. Government control of all printed matter, including newspapers and magazines, is specified in the press and publication law, issued in May 1984. The law imposes strict controls on, and a mechanism for, prior censorship of all information in printed form in both domestic and imported publications. The Government owns two of the three daily newspapers, one in Arabic and one in English. Subsidies to the remaining daily and several privately owned weekly and biweekly publications provide an effective incentive to self-censorship, although there have been arrests and closure for offensive articles. Thus, editorials and news coverage invariably reflect the Government's views.

Publications and video and audio cassettes arriving in Oman from foreign countries are censored for politically or sexually offensive material and are occasionally banned. The censor's attention generally focuses on articles that directly attack or embarrass the Government. In the last 3 years, three expatriate reporters have been deported for articles written about Oman.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is not guaranteed by law. Associations of any kind must register with the Government, and those which oppose the political system of the Sultanate are prohibited.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Oman is an Islamic state. Non-Muslims in Oman are prohibited from proselytizing, and conversion to Islam is encouraged and publicized. Virtually all Omani citizens adhere to one or another sect of Islam, the exception being the small Hindu community made up of Omani citizens of Indian origin. Ibadhi Muslims form the dominant group of Muslims in Oman and include the ruling family. However, there may be as many or more Sunni Muslims in the country, and members of both the Sunni and small Shi'a communities are found in all walks of life in both the public and private sectors. Non-Muslim foreigners, both Christian and Hindu, are allowed to worship at designated locations on land donated by the Government. Although there is no indigenous Jewish community, Jews are not barred from living and working in Oman. Religion is not a factor in gaining entry into Oman.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

With the exception of a few military areas, there are no restrictions on travel by Omanis within their country. The Government's development of transportation has greatly increased the ability to move within the country to heretofore inaccessible areas. Omanis living abroad before 1970 have returned to Oman in large numbers with official encouragement and without legal obstacles. Several thousand ethnic Omani refugees from East Africa, particularly from Zanzibar, have been resettled successfully. Many Omanis who had sought refuge in the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen during the insurgency in Dhofar (1965-1975) have returned to Oman with official encouragement. Non-Omani refugees are not permitted to remain in Oman. Those few that reach Oman are generally returned to their homelands unless they can be quickly resettled in a third country. Omanis may travel abroad freely, although a woman must have authorization from her husband or father to obtain a passport. Many Omanis work abroad, particularly in the United Arab Emirates, where an estimated 35,000 Omanis are currently employed. Many of these people travel home to Oman on weekends.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Oman has no formal democratic institutions, and its citizens do not, therefore, have the ability to change peacefully their leaders or the political system. Oman is a monarchy in which the Sultan retains the final word on all government decisions. Succession to the monarchy is determined through a consensus of the ruling family and leading public figures. There are no political parties, legal opposition groups, elections, nor a constitution. Citizens have indirect access to senior officials through the traditional practice of submitting to local leaders petitions for the redress of grievances. Successful redress depends on the effectiveness of personal contact and the quality of the persons chosen as intermediaries. Outside of Muscat, the Government still reflects the tribal nature of Omani society. Traditional elites dominate the tribal and town councils, which settle intratribal disputes. Final authority, however, is with the walis, who are appointed by the Sultan. In an effort to broaden participation in the Government, the Sultan formed the State Consultative Council in 1981. It consists of 55 members drawn from the Government, the business community, and the outlying districts. It includes members of every significant ethnic, geographic, and religious group. The Council's role remains advisory, however, and is confined to the social and economic spheres.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Oman declined to receive a proposed Amnesty International mission in 1972 during the insurgency in Dhofar. Since then, there have been no known requests by international human rights organizations to visit Oman. There are no independent organizations to monitor human rights violations.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Although Oman's government and society are conservative, it has been relatively moderate in its attitude toward Islamic precepts on the status of women. Women have shared in the benefits of the social and economic growth of recent years. Schooling for girls is available to the same extent as for boys in urban areas, but less so in rural areas. For cultural reasons, the level of education that girls attain is still below that of boys. By and large, however, the occupational areas most available to women are limited to the fields of teaching, secretarial work, and nursing.

Violence against women is not believed to be widespread. Little is known about the extent to which abuse occurs within the family owing to the respect attached to personal privacy in this traditional society. There is no public discussion of the subject.

The gains achieved by a small minority of women are largely irrelevant to the great majority, both in the towns and in the rural areas, who live their lives within the confines of the house and the local marketplace. The previous lack of adult education facilities means that all but the youngest females in rural areas are illiterate. This general lack of education, combined with communal and tribal customs which dictate a subsidiary role for women, makes it difficult for most adult women to participate fully in the modern sector. The recent expansion of educational facilities for girls (including university training) will allow for some equalization of the position of women in the future, but communal and tribal customs will continue to work against full participation by women for the foreseeable future.

While there are no formal government restrictions against Omanis of east African origin, many of them believe they face de facto discrimination in employment opportunities.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Labor unions are illegal in Oman, and, as specified in Oman's labor law, "it is absolutely forbidden to provoke a strike for any reasons." Oman is not a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO).

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There are no provisions for collective bargaining for wages and working conditions in Oman. Wages are set by employers within the guidelines set down by the Government. The labor law provides procedures for pursuing a "collective grievance" and encourages conciliation of disputes through the formation of joint consultative bodies of labor and management under Department of Labor auspices. Employers are forbidden by law from making a distinction between workers who are parties to labor dispute hearings and those who are not. Labor reconciliation hearings are not open to the press or public.

Oman's labor law, promulgated in 1973, is a comprehensive document defining conditions of employment for both Omanis and foreign workers, who constitute 50 percent of the work force. Work rules must be approved by the Department of Labor and posted conspicuously. Under Oman's labor court system, any employee (Omani or expatriate) may file a grievance. The employer pays all costs incurred in the filing of the grievance, regardless of the verdict. The employee cannot be reprimanded or punished for filing a grievance. The labor law is reported to be fairly enforced, and the labor courts generally give workers the benefit of the doubt in grievance hearings. A 1989 draft of a revised labor code awaits action by the Sultan. There are no export processing zones in Oman.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law, and not practiced.

OMAN

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Employment of children under the age of 18 is prohibited, except with the permission of a guardian and the wali. Oman law regulates the employment of juveniles, defined as those between the ages of 13 and 18, prohibiting evening and nighttime work, work in a strenuous occupation, and overtime and holiday work. Education is not compulsory, but the Government encourages school attendance.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The labor law states that the Government can determine the minimum wage and make adjustments according to economic circumstances. Minimum wage guidelines do not cover domestic servants, farmers, government employees, or workers in small businesses. In November 1989, minimum monthly salary for Omani graduates of secondary and vocational schools employed in the private sector was fixed at $390 per month, with an additional $130 housing and transportation allowance. Nongraduate Omanis receive a minimum of $208 per month, with $52 housing/transport allowance. However, the minimum wage is not an issue for most Omanis and mid- to upper-level expatriates, since most are paid wages well above that level. The statutory minimum wage for foreign workers is $150 per month (plus benefits), but it is not enforced and employers frequently pay less. Expatriate manual laborers and clerks generally earn between $100 and $125 per month, plus lodging, which is enough both to maintain an adequate standard of living and to send a portion of their income back home. Omanis working in the private sector are issued labor cards bearing the name of the employee, his company, and his work. The workweek is 40 to 45 hours in the private sector (less for Muslims during Ramadan). Every worker has the right to 15 days of annual leave during the first 3 years of employment and 30 days per year thereafter. Expatriate maids and menial laborers are not protected by the labor law, and some are required to work long hours under substandard working conditions by some employers. Expatriate workers' passports are commonly held by the employer, who is legally responsible for their actions, until they leave Oman.

Oman's labor law and a subsequent 1976 proclamation "governing compensation for occupational injuries and illnesses" cover in detail issues of occupational safety and access to medical treatment. Employees covered by the labor law can recover compensation for industrial injury or illness through medical insurance provided by the employer. Oman has occupational health and safety standard codes which are scrupulously enforced by inspectors who make frequent on-site inspections. Such codes and inspections are required under Chapter Seven of the labor law. The laws on child labor and conditions of work are, for the most part, effectively and uniformly enforced by inspectors throughout the country.

PAKISTAN

The political landscape in Pakistan changed drastically in 1988 with the death of President Zia and the orderly transition to representative government under Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, whose Pakistan Peoples Party (PPP) won a plurality in the 1988 National Assembly elections, considered by many observers the fairest and most orderly in the nation's history. Pakistan's efforts to develop democratic institutions have been hampered by differing interpretations of constitutional authority and responsibility, both within the Federal Government and between the federal and provincial governments, as well as by intense competition between the government party and a strong opposition alliance. During 1989 the crucial constitutional question under debate on the federal level involved a disagreement over the powers of the President and Prime Minister, caused in part by the previous government's changes in the Constitution. The military has continued to speak out in support of Pakistan's emerging democracy.

The relationship between the Federal Government and the provincial governments of Punjab and Balochistan, whose provincial assemblies are controlled by opposition parties, adds a further complication. Political acrimony has brought to a virtual halt progress on implementing needed social welfare and economic reform programs in these provinces. It has also encouraged ethnic tensions and weakened both law and order and orderly administration, with a negative impact on the human rights situation.

Responsibility for internal security rests primarily with the police, although the army is called upon on occasion to restore order during civil disturbances. Paramilitary forces also operate in frontier areas and help maintain law and order. Police forces are under provincial control.

The public sector share in Pakistani industry has diminished in recent years, and by 1988 private sector investment accounted for 83 percent of total investment in the manufacturing sector. In December 1988, Pakistan adopted a 3-year structural adjustment program with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) which may help Pakistan reduce its deficit and commit more resources for social development programs, although it also imposes rigorous austerity measures, such as price rises for electricity and gas.

The Bhutto Government has made progress in some aspects of human rights, although problem areas remain. The review of martial law cases and the release of political prisoners has been largely completed. Most travel restrictions have been lifted, and Pakistanis no longer need government permission to travel abroad. The appointment of a substantial number of former human rights activists to high-level government positions has invigorated debate and focused attention on some human rights issues and human rights groups report they have greater access to officials and to the media than before.

In other areas, however, human rights abuses continued. Kidnapings and random violence continued in the southern province of Sindh and the tribal areas in the northwest. Government forces at times violated individual rights and used excessive force in efforts to combat banditry and reestablish law and order. There were repeated incidents of ethnic violence, especially in Karachi and Hyderabad. Widespread police abuse of prisoners and the failure of authorities to bring to trial and punish personnel who commit such abuses remained a significant problem. Arbitrary arrest and detention of prisoners were also issues of concern. Religious minorities such as Ahmadis, Christians, and Hindus still faced discrimination and were the objects of harassment, and both social and legal constraints continued to place women in a subordinate position in society. Significant restraints also remained on worker rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There was no evidence of government or government-instigated political killings, but extrajudicial killings, usually from physical abuse of prisoners and detainees by police, continued largely unchecked and unpunished (see Section 1.c.).

Ethnic clashes have continued to result in one form of political killing. Violence between rival ethnic political parties and organizations, especially in Sindh province, was a growing concern as frequent outbreaks of violence between Sindhi, Mohajir, Punjabi, and Pakhtun groups left scores dead. Armed clashes between the student wings of rival political and ethnic groups led to deaths on several occasions. Because of the random and often spontaneous nature of these incidents, and the political connections of many of the perpetrators, authorities have had little success in preventing this type of violence, and the perpetrators have largely gone unpunished.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of government-instigated disappearances. Kidnapings by highwaymen of prominent persons occur regularly in rural Sindh, usually for ransom. Incidents of kidnaping for ransom have also occurred in urban Sindh, and recently increased in the city of Karachi. Most of the victims were eventually released unharmed.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Police beatings and torture of arrestees are common; in its 1989 Report, covering 1988, Amnesty International (AI) noted that at least 19 prisoners were reported to have died in custody as a result of torture. Beating, whipping the soles of the feet with rubber whips, sexual assault, and prolonged isolation are said to be common occurrences in Pakistani jails. When deaths have occurred, allegations of suicide are used by police to cover up evidence of torture. There have been persistent and credible allegations in the press and from other observers that some ethnic and political parties have tortured political opponents, and, in some cases, used torture to enforce party discipline among their own members. The groups alleged to have used torture have publicly denied such allegations, and have claimed that the charges are politically motivated.

The Government (whether Federal or provincial) rarely holds police accountable for abuses. Police and jailers use "third degree" methods to obtain information and confessions and frequently employ the threat of abuse to extort money from prisoners and their families. In August a young man in Lahore died in detention, allegedly after being tortured by police. The press has also reported several instances of the deaths of prisoners under police detention in Karachi. A recent survey alleged that 43 percent of the women imprisoned in the Multan jail reported being sexually abused by prison authorities. The federal Ministry of Interior in 1989 established an office to monitor instances of arbitrary arrest, brutality, and extortion within the police forces; by year's end, the office had been established, and, according to the Ministry of Interior, had accepted and begun to investigate dozens of cases.

The Hadood Ordinances, promulgated in 1979, apply to Muslims and non-Muslims alike but appear to weigh most heavily on women and carry harsh punishment for actions deemed contrary to Islamic law. Extended imprisonment is the most common punishment. Two-thirds of the 99 women held in Karachi central jail in August 1989 were imprisoned under these ordinances. Some 60 poor women, many with minor children, were held in Lahore's Kot Lakhpat prison for alleged violation of the Ordinances. In June the Sindh high court stayed the executions by stoning of six people convicted under the Ordinances. The federal Shari'a (Islamic) Court accepted an appeal by two teachers convicted of adultery and sentenced to death by stoning. No punishments involving stoning, flogging, or amputation have been carried out under the Ordinances, but these laws remain in effect. Frequently, under the Ordinances, women who complain of rape find themselves arrested on charges of adultery.

Among the three classes of prison facilities that exist, Class "C" cells, which generally hold common criminals, suspected terrorists, and low-level political workers, are the worst. They usually have dirt floors, no furnishings, and poor quality food, and the use of handcuffs and fetters is common. Prisoners in these cells reportedly suffer the most abuse, such as beatings and being forced to kneel for long periods. Conditions in "B" and "A" cells are markedly better, with the latter reserved for "prominent" persons. Although increased attention is being focused on improving the worst jail conditions, there has been little real progress.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Pakistani law permits detention of persons suspected of threatening public order and safety for 30 days under court order. Such court orders are renewable for 30 days at a time, up to a total of 90 days, if the Government can demonstrate that the detainee does in fact threaten public safety. According to the law, detainees must be informed expeditiously of the reason for their detention. Most detainees are released fairly quickly, but only after the situation which prompted the preventive detention has passed. In September the Government promulgated an ordinance which denies bail to those arrested for terrorist activities if sufficient grounds exist to believe the accused is guilty of the crime.

Former detainees claim that prisoners under preventive detention frequently are held incommunicado. In July federal authorities detained former provincial chief minister and opposition figure Fazle Haq without charge. His continued detention has led to charges of official harassment of political opponents. At the same time, Punjab authorities arrested a pro-PPP activist for allegedly having delivered an inflammatory speech in January. He has been released on bail. The federal and particularly the Punjab authorities have harassed their political opponents by filing criminal charges of dubious credibility against them, obliging them to seek bail.

There have been repeated allegations of arbitrary arrests during attempts to quell communal violence. The majority of persons detained in such operations are released in a matter of hours or 1 or 2 days.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.C.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The civil judicial system, modeled after the British system, provides for an open trial, cross-examination, representation by an attorney, and appeal of sentences. The court will appoint an attorney for indigents in capital cases.

The pace of justice is slow due to the limited number of judges, the heavy backlog of cases, and outdated court procedures. The political impasse between the Federal and Punjab Governments has blocked appointment of judges in that province to succeed those who have retired or died. Over a quarter of the seats on the Lahore High Court are vacant, while scores of positions in the lower magistracy remain unfilled. These vacancies inevitably further delay the judicial process. Karachi human rights activists believe there are dozens of people awaiting prosecution in Sindh jails who have been held for periods longer than the sentence they would receive if convicted. Prison authorities allowed greater access to legal counsel to see prisoners and clients during 1989.

The special Shari'a (Islamic) courts operate in a manner similar to ordinary civilian courts. They try offenses relating to the enforcement of the Hadood Ordinances and also rule on whether laws are offensive to Islam. Cases referred to the Shari'a courts are heard jointly by Islamic scholars and judges from the civilian court system who usually employ ordinary criminal procedures. Both judges and attorneys must be Muslim and be familiar with Islamic law, although non-Muslims have been brought before the Shari'a courts. Defendants in the Shari'a courts are entitled to bail and lawyers of their choice.

Before martial law was lifted in 1985, the Parliament passed the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution which withdrew from the civilian judiciary the right to review the actions of martial law authorities and courts. Under the Eighth Amendment, only those sentenced to death by martial law courts may petition to have their cases reviewed by the President; all others must appeal to a provincial governor. In 1988 the Supreme Court allowed limited categories of people convicted under martial law courts to apply for review of their cases. Estimates of martial law prisoners still in detention vary from 15 to 200. Currently, martial law prisoners or their representatives have two avenues for review. The first avenue is to apply to have their cases considered by a special office in the President's Secretariat. The second avenue is to have their original cases reviewed by the ordinary civilian courts. The constitutionality of the procedures under which the Eighth Amendment was passed is currently being adjudicated before the Sindh and Balochistan High Courts.

In 1987 the Government established special courts to provide speedy trials in cases involving "offenses sensational in character or shocking to public morality, creating panic, or an atmosphere of fear and anxiety among the public." Cases involving bomb blasts, sabotage, highway robberies, banditry, or kidnaping can be expedited through these courts, and the Government may transfer cases from any other court to a special court.

Critics, including many lawyers, have expressed several concerns about the special courts. First, the accused is hampered from preparing an adequate defense and calling witnesses because of the short time allocated before the trial (usually a matter of a few days). Second, they believe that the judges in these courts are predisposed to find defendants guilty, given the high political profile of the proceedings. Third, the decision to refer a case to this system is an arbitrary one, made by the senior levels of the provincial government. The criteria for deciding which cases can be tried under these courts is broad enough to enable provincial authorities to abuse the system. Government officials argue that the courts are necessary to circumvent the judicial backlog; that all requirements of the rules of evidence still apply, including the right to counsel; and that the judges must meet the same standard as those appointed to a high court. They note that decisions may be appealed to the Supreme Court.

In September the Lahore High Court ruled that the speedy trial courts were illegal and closed them in Punjab province on the grounds that the original 1987 act had expired in early 1989 and that the provincial government had failed to extend it. Speedy trial courts continue to exist and operate in the Sindh.

Appeals of the 1986 death sentences against four Ahmadi defendants, whose convictions in 1985 by martial law courts in two separate murder cases raised serious human rights questions, are still pending. The death sentences themselves, however, have been commuted to life imprisonment as a result of the amnesty measures taken by the Bhutto Government in December 1988.

In December 1988 and January 1989, the new Government announced a major prisoner release program for martial law and political prisoners. Although thousands benefited from the program, some groups criticized the Government's review procedures which allegedly freed a number of hardened criminals but left members of opposition parties and members of minority religious groups behind bars. Estimates vary on the number of political prisoners who remain in custody.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Decisions about occupation, education, place of residence, and family size are made without official interference. Although police are required by law to obtain a warrant before entering a private home, authorities frequently ignore such legal requirements. During bandit sweeps and riots, police often chase suspects into homes without pausing to ensure the presence of a magistrate as required by law. There have been repeated allegations of incidents involving the use of excessive force in Sindh during attempts to quell ethnic violence. There are frequent charges that women throughout the country have been harassed and raped and their belongings stolen by individual officers. Although press and public attention to such incidents has increased, the Government has been slow to respond to or investigate such charges and to deal with problems of police indiscipline. Extortion and robbery by policemen are believed to be common.

Pakistan maintains several domestic intelligence services which monitor political activists, suspected terrorists, and suspected foreign intelligence agents. Informed sources maintain that wiretapping is used against opposition politicians and that their mail is occasionally intercepted and opened, and they are frequently under surveillance. Civil and military officials are instructed to report their contacts with foreign diplomats.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

Persistent ethnic divisions in the province of Sindh have led to incidents of communal violence in which persons belonging to one ethnic group have been killed in indiscriminate attacks by rival groups. There have been repeated allegations, which are difficult to verify, that law enforcement agencies have caused the deaths of innocent persons while attempting to bring communal violence under control or while standing by and refusing to intervene.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government owns and operates the radio and television stations and strictly controls the news they carry. A government-owned press trust controls four of the larger newspapers. The Government has yet to act on its campaign promise to disband the press trust, but has announced the establishment of separate management boards to run each of its publications. In addition, one of the two wire services is under the control of the Ministry of Information. Other newspapers are privately owned and their circulation far exceeds that of the government-owned papers.

The government newspapers and wire services are circumspect in their coverage of the news. Early in the year, there was an increase in coverage of the opposition in the official media, but that trend has fallen off in recent months, and the government-controlled media have again been restricting and distorting opposition news. Laws against bringing Islam or the armed forces into discredit or ridicule remain in force; reporters and editors exercise self-censorship in these areas. Continuing a trend begun in 1985, there is relatively free discussion of government policies and criticism of the Government, especially in the privately owned newspapers. Besides more or less unfettered reporting of statements made by legislators, the private press routinely reports remarks critical of the Government made by opposition politicians. The Government has suspended advertisements, an important source of revenue, in Markaz and in the Observer, newspapers often critical of the PPP. The Observer's editor was charged in July with violating the Official Secrets Act (a law left over from the British colonial era) in his book on Pakistan's nuclear program. Although the Government has denied that the arrest was related to the newspaper's policies, most papers carried editorials condemning the action as giving the appearance of restricting freedom of the press. Members of the Council of Pakistan Newspaper Editors believe the action was a result of the Observer's constant criticism of government policies. Although government officials are no longer calling editors to demand the inclusion or exclusion of particular stories, they are still giving editors "advice" on certain stories, which is generally followed.

The Government was also criticized in August for advising the press that any reporting on cabinet meetings other than the official report provided by the Government would be evaluated in the light of the Official Secrets Act. At the same time, the Prime Minister reminded the media of Article 6 of the 1973 Constitution which provides for the death penalty for those who damage the Constitution by any act, including publication of statements against the spirit of the Constitution. This apparently has stopped the publication of statements against the Constitution.

The actions of some political and religious pressure groups pose another danger to press freedom in Pakistan. In early 1989, the office of the daily Markaz was burned, allegedly by political party workers. Also, a political party in Sindh called a 1-day boycott of the largest circulation daily newspaper in Karachi. During the boycott, people were forcibly prevented from purchasing the paper, and its journalists and editors were threatened.

A restrictive Press and Publication ordinance, promulgated in 1963, was repealed in September 1988. Although the ordinance had not been used in the past few years, it was widely viewed by the press as being arbitrary and giving the Government sweeping powers over the press. It was replaced by a Printing Press and Publications ordinance which requires the registration of printing presses and newspapers and which also allows the Government to confiscate newspapers or magazines deemed objectionable. In a departure from past practice, the new law allows newspapers to appeal to the civil courts and allows individuals to start issuing new publications without approval if the Government fails to act on their application within 4 months.

The National Assembly enacted a new press act in 1989 which allows journalists access to all federal and provincial government files, except "highly sensitive defense files." Under this act publication permits are still required but can be obtained at the local level.

Academic freedom is generally recognized by government and university authorities, but almost all institutions of higher learning are state run, and authorities have extensive powers to restrict the actions of individuals and groups regarded as troublesome. Another threat to academic freedom is the atmosphere of violence and intolerance among student organizations, frequently with connections to the major political parties. At many universities, well-armed groups of students of varying political persuasions clash frequently and are successful in intimidating other students, instructors, and administrators on matters of language, syllabus, examination policies, doctrine, and dress.

Student unions were legalized again in early 1989 by Prime Minister Bhutto and held elections in the Punjab in the spring; student groups in other provinces are planning elections.

Literary and creative works remain generally free of censorship, but authors and publishers tend to avoid controversial and political themes. Obscene literature, a category which is broadly interpreted by the Government, is subject to seizure. Authorities have frequently banned or confiscated books and magazines dealing with sensitive political topics. The Government in 1988 banned "The Satanic Verses" by Salman Rushdie, a book which raised the ire of Muslims worldwide. In August the Government arrested, and later released, the author of a book on the development of Pakistan's nuclear program, and the book has been banned in two provinces. In speeches throughout the country, senior officials reiterated the Government's intention to prosecute anyone violating the Official Secrets Act. Dramas and documentaries on once taboo subjects, such as narcotics and female inequality, are now shown frequently on Pakistani television.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government continued to respect the right of peaceful assembly in most cases, although district magistrates exercised their power to ban meetings of more than four people whenever violent demonstrations seemed in the offing. Political leaders of all persuasions were usually able to travel freely and address large rallies, often emphasizing antigovernment themes. In February a demonstration in Islamabad against "The Satanic Verses," sponsored by a coalition of religious parties, turned violent. Seven people were killed and the American Center was attacked. The opposition coalition of parties, Islami Jamhuri Ittihad (IJI), held large rallies in Islamabad and Peshawar in August. Despite these examples, regulations preventing demonstrations are regularly invoked in Sindh Province during times of ethnic tension. The Sindh National Alliance was prohibited from holding a rally at the Provincial Assembly and the Mohajir Qaumi Movement (MQM) was prevented from demonstrating at the Chief Minister's house. To forestall potential violence between religious groups, the authorities prevented clergymen from traveling to certain areas during the religious month of Muharram. Afghan refugees were prevented from attending a large memorial service held in Islamabad on the anniversary of President Zia's death.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Pakistan is an Islamic republic with a population that is 97 percent Muslim. Its 1973 Constitution requires all law to be consistent with Islamic ideology. Under the Constitution, the President and Prime Minister must be Muslims. However, designated minority religious groups--for example, Ahmadis, Christians, and Parsis--have held high office and are represented in the economic, political, and social life of the country. The PPP Government has appointed several Ahmadis to high government posts. These minorities are not permitted to vote in Muslim constituencies, but rather must seek office and cast their ballots in at-large constituencies reserved for them in the national and provincial assemblies, an arrangement widely criticized by minority and human rights groups.

PAKISTAN

(Ahmadis, disputing their minority status and their designation as non-Muslims, have refused to exercise these electoral options.) Although by law Hadood Ordinances are applicable only to Muslims, minorities, especially Christians and Hindus, complain that the Hadood Ordinances are also applied to non-Muslims, making family matters, such as divorce, more difficult.

Generally, minorities can practice their own religion openly, maintain links with their coreligionists in other countries, and travel for religious purposes. Foreign clergy may enter the country to serve congregations. Conversions are permitted, but the Government prohibits proselytizing among Muslims and has refused to renew the residence permits of some foreign missionaries who have ignored this ban. In November nine Ahmadi doctors were arrested and charged with proselytizing while providing health care services.

The Ahmadi sect, which considers itself Muslim despite theological divergences from mainstream Islam, has historically been the object of popular prejudice and discrimination. Anti-Ahmadi riots in 1953 helped spark the imposition of Pakistan's first period of martial law. Following another outbreak of violence, in 1974 Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, with the support of all political parties, sponsored a constitutional amendment declaring the Ahmadis a non-Muslim minority. In 1984 the Government issued an ordinance which restricts the practice of the Ahmadi religion and bans the Ahmadis from using Muslim terminology or proselytizing. Violators are subject to prosecution. In 1986 Parliament passed legislation, apparently aimed at Ahmadis, making blaspheming the Prophet Muhammad a capital offense.

Many members of the Ahmadi sect were detained for displaying the Kalima, the Islamic profession of faith, and other Koranic verses. Most were released, but several were tried, convicted, and received prison sentences. Police removed the profession of faith from Ahmadi places of worship, which cannot be called mosques under Pakistani law. Several places of worship have been closed down. In March the Government forbade public celebration of the Ahmadis' 100th anniversary. Ahmadis charge that fundamentalist Muslim leaders have been effective in keeping Ahmadis in a position of second-class citizens. In April, during anti-Ahmadi riots in Nankana Sahib in Punjab, 15 Ahmadis were injured, and 50 houses and 3 places of worship were burned. In July Ahmadi-Orthodox tension turned violent in Chak Sikander in Punjab, leaving 4 dead, including 3 Ahmadis, and dozens of homes destroyed. Police occupied the village to maintain order, and some Ahmadis have been prevented from returning to their residences since the initial incident. A Pakistani human rights group investigated both incidents and concluded that local authorities failed to protect Ahmadi citizens and that the Punjab provincial government failed to investigate or take action against those authorities. To date, there still have been no official inquiries into the incidents. The Ahmadis were prohibited from holding their centenary celebration in April in Punjab Province, and there are credible reports of discrimination which limits the promotion possibilities for Ahmadis in the military and civil service. There have been reports of the forced conversion of female members of the Ahmadi sect. The major Ahmadi newspaper, banned for 3 years, resumed publication in March. In December the entire population of Rabwah, the Ahmadis' headquarters city, was charged in a complaint lodged with police with having violated Ordinance 20.

PAKISTAN

This law establishes as criminal certain acts of the Muslim faith when performed by Ahmadis, including the declaration of faith. By the end of the year, 16 prominent Ahmadis had been arrested and incarcerated on such charges.

Christians have had difficulty in getting permission to build new churches, although the Government reached a compromise in August with a congregation in Islamabad whose church construction had been halted for several years. Members of the Christian community complain that there are barriers to Christians rising to high positions in public service, public corporations, universities, and the military. Many Christians fill low-level jobs, such as in sanitation work and in similar municipal services. Some Christians work as bonded laborers in the brick kiln industry.

Hindus complain of continued kidnappings and forced conversions of young women, confiscation of Hindu shrines and temples, disruption of prayer services, and the burning of Hindu texts, as well as the torture of detained Hindus. In June a Hindu doctor was killed in Larkana, and four Hindus were murdered in rural Sindh while worshipping at a Hindu temple. No arrest has been made in the case of the killing of the doctor. One person was arrested and detained for 1 month before being released on bail in the case of the temple murders. At year's end the case had not yet come to trial.

Some observers believe the Government's reticence in looking into incidents involving discrimination against minorities is a reflection of its fear of offending fundamentalist Muslims who wield substantial influence over their coreligionists.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Pakistanis generally have freedom of movement within the country. Previous governments banned individual political leaders from traveling to certain provinces for a specified time through use of an "externment" notice. The only externment notice issued in 1989 by a provincial government prevented some Shi'a and Sunni clergy from entering certain areas during the Islamic holy month of Muharram; it was quickly rescinded.

Pakistanis are generally free to travel abroad. Travel to Israel, which is not recognized by the Pakistan Government, is legally prohibited, but Pakistanis nevertheless succeed in traveling to Jerusalem for religious reasons. There are various restrictions on travel to the Soviet Union, India, South Africa, Taiwan, and Eastern Europe.

All government employees are required to have "no-objection" certificates before traveling abroad. Students are also required to have "no-objection" certificates from their institutions. The Government announced that the exit control list, previously used to control foreign travel more broadly, now contains only the names of serious criminals, such as drug traffickers. However, the list remains a tool available to the Government to limit foreign travel.

Over 3 million Afghans have fled to Pakistan as a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the current civil war. The Government administers and supports some 340 Afghan refugee camps at significant cost. The movement and employment of Afghans in Pakistan has generally not been restricted, and many Afghans reside outside the refugee camps. With the signing of the Geneva accords in April 1988 and the Soviet troop withdrawal in February 1989, the Government and U.N. agencies have begun preparing for the refugees' return. The Government, however, has maintained its policy of not pressing refugees to go home before conditions in Afghanistan are secure.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The elections in November 1988 resulted in neither the PPP nor the Islamic Democratic Alliance attaining an absolute majority of seats in the National Assembly. President Ghulam Ishaq Khan on December 1, 1988 asked PPP leader Benazir Bhutto, as leader of the party most likely to receive a vote of confidence, to form a government. Under the Constitution of 1985, the President continues to hold the power, in consultation with the Prime Minister, to dismiss the Parliament and to act as Commander in Chief.

All Pakistanis aged 21 and over have the right to vote by secret ballot in elections. Local governments and the provincial and national assemblies are directly elected. The Senate, however, is elected by the four provincial assemblies. The President is also indirectly elected by an electoral college consisting of the national and provincial assemblies and the Senate.

According to the Constitution, the national and provincial assemblies serve terms of no more than 5 years, unless earlier dissolved. The President is to be elected every 5 years, while senators are elected for 6-year terms. Local by-elections were held for provincial and National Assembly seats in several constituencies throughout 1989. Although there were credible reports of vote-rigging in some areas, most observers report the elections proceeded without major interference.

Political parties have been allowed to operate since the lifting of martial law in 1985-1986. In 1988 the Supreme Court struck down a law banning unregistered political parties from participating in elections and upheld the use of symbols by political parties.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Domestic human rights organizations operate free of official harassment and their reports receive extensive coverage in the press. Pakistan has allowed visits by persons affiliated with various human rights organizations. In 1989 an AI delegation met with government officials, including the President and Prime Minister. In 1989 several new human rights and legal aid groups were formed and operated without government restriction.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

With a female Prime Minister as head of government, increased attention has been given to the rights and status of women. A strong lobby of Islamic leaders, however, refuses to accept a woman leader and continues to stress a conservative interpretation of Islamic injunctions to justify discrimination against women. It is accepted practice to assign women a subordinate role in terms of civil, political, and individual rights.

Many Pakistanis interpret the Koran's injunctions on modesty to mean that women should remain either at home or behind the veil. In rural areas, although women of small farmer families generally work alongside men in the fields, their status remains subordinate to men, and they suffer discrimination in education, employment, and legal rights. Women are often discouraged from voting in elections by family, religious, or social custom in the rural and more conservative parts of Pakistan. In some of these areas, women are discouraged from voting by authorities who do not provide separate voting facilities for women who observe purdah restrictions; these women are unwilling to unveil themselves to male poll officials who seek to confirm their identity. Despite clear injunctions in the Koran and the civil laws that guarantee the right of women to inherit, in practice, for a number of reasons, women generally do not receive their due share in family inheritance.

These attitudes have contributed to a very low adult female literacy rate, estimated, for example, to be only 4 percent among rural women. The primary school enrollment ratio in 1983 was only 33 percent for girls as compared to 64 percent for boys, although the figure for each is rising.

A small number of urban women study and teach in the universities, but postgraduate employment opportunities remain largely limited to teaching, medical services, and the law, with a small number of women entering the commercial and public sectors. Women may now participate in international athletic competition, a change which took place only in 1989.

In February the National Assembly allowed the 1988 Shari'a Ordinance, which set up committees to ensure Islamization in education and the economy, to lapse, but a new Shari'a bill was introduced in the Senate. In July the federal Shari'a Court upheld the distinction under the Haddood Ordinances between evidence presented in court by a man and that presented by a woman. The court ruled that only men can testify as witnesses in certain cases; in other cases only women's evidence is acceptable. In certain cases the testimony of two women is required to equal that of one man.

There has been an upsurge in press reporting and public concern about the unresponsiveness or involvement of police in continuing incidents of abuse of women and rape. There has also been a disturbing increase in the number of reports of newly wed wives being burned to death in kitchen accidents. Many of these deaths are believed to be murders perpetrated by husbands dissatisfied with the size of their wives' dowries. Many women are also mutilated or killed by male relatives who suspect them of adultery. Few such cases are seriously investigated, and, owing to the value attached to privacy in this conservative society, the great majority of cases involving abuse within the family are never reported. There are no official statistics on the subject.

The courts have begun to address some of the more extreme violations of women's rights. In July the Lahore High Court, acknowledging offenses committed against women by provincial police, ordered registration of cases against police responsible for abusing a 10-year-old girl in a local police station. The case has been registered but has not yet come to trial. The court also established procedures to protect the rights of female suspects who are in police custody.

While several members of minorities are prominent in public life, reports of discrimination against minority groups in employment and education appear well founded. In the early years of Pakistan's history, minorities were able to rise to the senior ranks of the military and civil service. Today, most complain they are unable to rise above midlevel ranks. The perception of discrimination on ethnic and linguistic grounds is fundamental to the repeated ethnic conflicts in several areas over recent years and most notably in the province of Sindh during 1989. These were but the latest in a long series of conflicts between Sindhis and Mohajirs (Urdu-speaking immigrants from India). Non-Punjabis also resent what they see as domination of the bureaucracy, the police, and armed forces by the majority Punjabis. Officially designated as "non-Muslims," Ahmadis are subject to discrimination and occasional harassment and have limited chances for advancement in the public sector. Young Ahmadis and their parents complain of increasing difficulty in gaining admittance to good colleges. This problem is not unique to Ahmadis, but their resentment is strengthened by their conviction that they too are Muslims.

An aggravating element in all cases of discrimination is the continuing social stratification; socially prominent Pakistanis suffer less at the hands of officials than those less well-off, partly because of their ability to reciprocate favors, and partly because of the general deference still accorded social "betters" in Pakistani society. Although the original caste distinctions common to South Asian societies have no legally binding force, clan affiliations and ethnic identities, which in some ways parallel the old caste system, still help or hinder those seeking education, employment, justice, public services, and public office. Among most minorities, there is a conviction that the authorities, even if they do not persecute them, afford them less protection under the law than Muslim citizens.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of industrial workers to form trade unions is protected by the Industrial Relations Ordinance but is subject to major restrictions in some employment areas. In practice, labor laws place significant constraints on the formation of unions and their ability to function effectively. In her first public statements after being named Prime Minister, Benazir Bhutto promised to remove all general bans on labor activity. However, little progress has been made in fulfilling this commitment.

The right of unions to strike in Pakistan is severely constrained by legally required conciliation proceedings and cooling-off periods, and especially by the Government's authority to ban any strike found to cause "serious hardship to the community" or prejudice to the national interest, or in any case after it has continued unresolved for 30 days. Strikes are rare; when they do occur, they are usually illegal and short. There are also periodic work slowdowns on the part of low-ranking government employees. There has been an upsurge in the number of small-scale strikes on the part of doctors, nurses, and police inspectors. Police crackdowns on worker demonstrations are fairly common.

Strikes are banned by law in export promotion zones (EPZ), although this has had little impact, since EPZ development has been largely on paper to date.

At present, union members make up only about 6 percent of the industrial labor force and 3 percent of the total estimated work force. Trade unions of all political orientations are permitted, and the political leanings of labor leaders cover the entire spectrum from far left to right.

While most unions remain aloof from party politics, several have associated themselves with political parties. Since the PPP came to power in 1988, it has made a concerted effort through its labor wing, the People's Labor Bureau, to organize trade unions under its banner.

There are no official constraints on Pakistani labor federations' affiliations with international labor organizations, notably the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its Communist-controlled rival, the World Federation of Trade Unions.

Pakistan has been criticized for years by International Labor Organization (ILO) committees for its failure to abide by Convention 87 regarding freedom of association and Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining, both of which it has ratified. The charges, repeatedly raised by Pakistani trade unions, have focused on the limitations on union formation, strikes, and collective bargaining. No Pakistani government has yet made any serious movement towards changing any of the laws criticized in the ILO reports.

These issues were again reviewed by the ILO's Committee of Experts (COE) in 1989, along with the question of excessive government supervision of trade union funds and the question of worker rights in the export promotion zones. See also Section 6.c.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Free formation of workers' associations and free election of representatives to act as collective bargaining agents are provided for by law. Current laws, however, place major limitations on the extent and effectiveness of such activities. Large sections of the labor force are excluded from the right to organize and bargain collectively under the Industrial Relations Ordinance. Union activity is prohibited for the 53 percent of Pakistan's labor force employed in agriculture. Under the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act of 1952 (ESA), normal union activities are severely restricted in sectors associated with "the administration of the State," covering a wide range of government services (e.g., education, medical) and state enterprises (e.g., oil and gas production, transport).

For each industry declared subject to the ESA (a finding which must be renewed every 6 months), a specific determination is made by the Government as to what constitutes the limits of union activity. In cases where collective bargaining has been barred, individual wage boards are established to decide wage levels. Disputes are adjudicated before the National Industrial Relations Commission. A worker's right to quit can also be curtailed under this Act, and a fired worker has no recourse to the labor courts. However, collective bargaining and even strikes are known in some job areas covered by the act (e.g., the nationalized banks). The abolition of the ESA is a major demand of most unions.

The ILO's COE has advised the Government that a 1980 ordinance permitting it to exempt the export processing zones from the provisions of any law is inconsistent with the requirements of ILO Conventions 87 and 98. Export processing zones are not yet functioning, and it is difficult to judge how labor laws will be applied there.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced labor is specifically prohibited by Pakistani law. There is no evidence that any form of slavery or bonded labor has received official sanction. However, critics argue that the ESA's limitation on some employees' right to leave their jobs constitutes a form of compulsory labor.

Cases of illegal bonded labor appear to be widespread, with a number of specific cases and the discovery of several forced labor camps reported in 1989. The worst cases tend to come to light only through sensational treatment in the press. Bonded labor is said to be particularly common in the brick, carpet, glass, and fishing industries and extends to agricultural and construction work in rural areas.

In the brick kiln industry, however, a workers' association in 1988 succeeded in bringing the plight of bonded brickmakers in the Punjab before the Supreme Court. In March 1989, the court issued a compromise ruling which reinforced prohibitions on forced labor and forcible collection of debts and limited pay advances to 1 week's wages, while upholding the legality of existing debts. The ruling was the first important gain for bonded workers and laid the groundwork for challenges to bonded labor in other industries. Resistance to the ruling is likely to be strong, however, and reports of violations continue to appear. Moreover, due to the lack of alternatives, many workers have returned to bonded labor.

In response to the publicity surrounding this case, the Government announced its intention to introduce a bill in the current session of the National Assembly to abolish bonded labor with a proposed penalty of 3 years in jail or a $750 fine for offenders. Critics charge that the proposed legislation will be ineffective due to the inadequate penalties and the inability of authorities to enforce the law in the rural areas, where such practices are prevalent.

While it is not clear that the provision of the ESA limiting the rights of some employees to leave their jobs has been invoked, this and other questionable Pakistani legislation have been under the scrutiny of the ILO's COE for a number of years. A government representative informed the ILO's Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (CACR) in June 1989 that various provisions of Pakistani legislation deemed inconsistent with the requirements of ILO Conventions 29 and 105 on forced labor (both of which have been ratified by Pakistan) have been, or will be, amended. The representative denied the existence of illegal bonded labor in Pakistan. The CACR welcomed the progress being made with respect to legislation, but requested more information and expressed "great concern" regarding the Security of Pakistan Act, which permits courts of law to impose sentences of prison labor for the expression of political views.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Child labor is limited by at least four separate statutes and Article 11 of the Constitution. These laws present a confusing picture, variously limiting employment in certain fields to those over 14 or 15, and, in one case, permitting factory work by children under 14 (in apparent contradiction of the Constitution) if a government doctor issues a certificate of fitness. None of these regulations is effectively enforced.

Despite legal limitations, child labor is common in Pakistan. While much of it is in the traditional framework of family farming or small business, the abusive employment of children in larger industries and government businesses is widespread. Although there are no reliable official statistics, unofficial surveys and occasional press features suggest that violations of existing laws are common. Unofficial estimates indicate that one-third of Pakistan's total labor force is made up of workers under age 18. The employment of children is occasionally linked with stories of bonded or forced labor and child prostitution.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Labor regulations in Pakistan are governed by federal statutes applicable throughout the country. These provide for, or require the provincial governments to provide for, a legal minimum wage as well as certain worker protection and welfare services. The minimum wage, which for an unskilled worker is roughly $25 per month, is not enough to support even a small family. The law provides for a maximum workweek of 54 hours and paid annual holiday and rest periods during the workday. These regulations apply, however, only to a small minority of the labor force; they specifically do not apply to agricultural workers (roughly one-half of Pakistan's work force), to workers in Pakistan's numerous small factories with fewer than 10 employees, and to the small contract groups of under 10 workers into which factory work forces are increasingly divided.

The enforcement of labor regulations is left to the provincial governments, all of which are largely ineffective in this area. The attention given to enforcement varies among the provinces in proportion to the significance of industrial labor. In all cases, limited resources, corruption, and inadequate regulatory structures hamper the effort.

In general, worker health and safety standards are poor and little is being done to improve them. Organized labor is occasionally able to press for improvements in this area, and some legal protections apply, although they are weakly enforced.

QATAR

A small Arab Gulf state ruled by an Amir from the Al-Thani family, Qatar is governed by a 1970 basic law which institutionalizes the customs and social mores of Qatar's conservative Wahhabi Muslim heritage. These include respect for the sanctity of private property, freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and protection against transgressions of Islamic law (the Shari'a). The Amir holds absolute power, but he is careful in exercising his authority. While he may, for example, suspend any secular law or countermand any civil court decision, he is unlikely to do so without first consulting his Council of Ministers, the advisory council of notables, and most importantly, obtaining a consensus from within the ruling Al-Thani family.

The Government continues to be concerned by the presence in Qatar of a large number of expatriate workers. In response to perceived threats to civil order, the Government has established an efficient security apparatus to control subversion. The civilian security apparatus is controlled by the Interior Ministry and operates on two levels, the police and the Criminal Investigation Department (CID). The CID is charged with investigation of all crimes, while the local police enforce laws and arrest violators. A second, more powerful branch of the Interior Ministry, the Mubahathat, deals with sedition and espionage. The Mubahathat is nearly independent of the regular civil security forces and has been alleged to use severe force during its investigations. It can incarcerate suspects without charge, but reportedly does this infrequently. The armed forces have no significant role in assuring internal security, although the army could be used against serious civil disturbances. However, the armed forces have under their jurisdiction another enforcement organization, known as Mukhabarat, whose function is to intercept and arrest incoming terrorists and to keep surveillance over political dissidents.

Qatar's economy is mixed, with the State owning and operating most basic industries and services while retail trade and the construction industry remain in private hands. The economy is beginning to recover slowly from the fall in the price of oil, and was able to expand slightly again in 1989. The rapid development of Qatar's infrastructure in the 1970's and early 1980's led to the creation of a ratio of expatriates (mostly Indian, Pakistani, and Sri Lankan) to nationals of 4 to 1. Limiting the influence and controlling the activities of the expatriate population are major Qatari national goals, and the economic downturn of the mid-to-late 80's has spurred a government program to reduce the expatriate-to-national ratio by offering employment in many government industries to Qatari citizens only. However, this refers only to skilled workers. Because the Qatari national population is so small, Qatar will be dependent on expatriate labor for the foreseeable future.

There were no reports of arbitrary arrest or similar abuses in 1989, but human rights remained significantly restricted, with little change from previous years. Principal human rights problems include abuse of detainees, arbitrary detentions in security cases, and restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, the right of citizens to change their government, and worker rights. Expatriate workers also continued to complain of systematic discrimination against them; Qatari resentment against expatriates makes them more likely than nationals to be the victims of arbitrary police action or harassment, and they are denied the right to bring suit against a Qatari national in the Shari'a court.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no known instances of political killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government of Qatar follows the conservative teachings of Wahhabi Islam, which forbids torture. Instances of torture in connection with security force actions involving political and security-related cases, however, have been reported in the past, although details are sketchy. The Government administers most of the corporal punishments prescribed by Shari'a law but does not allow physical mutilation. Many expatriates complain of mistreatment after their arrest by Qatari authorities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The authorities generally charge suspects before a competent court within 48 hours. In most cases involving expatriates, the police promptly notify the appropriate consular representative. However, suspects detained in security cases are generally not afforded their rights. There were no known security cases in 1989. Involuntary exile is very rare; the last known case occurred over 10 years ago. Expatriates convicted of crimes are usually deported after they have completed their sentences, which sometimes includes the administering of lashes. With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is nominally independent, but most judges are expatriates holding residence permits granted by the civil authorities and thus hold their positions at the Government's pleasure.

Qatar's legal system has an unusual balance, tilted in favor of Qataris and the Government of Qatar. There are two types of courts: the civil courts, which have jurisdiction in civil and commercial matters, and the Shari'a court, which has jurisdiction in family and criminal cases. There are no permanent security courts; security cases are tried by military courts established specifically for a given case. Technically, the Shari'a court may also assume jurisdiction in commercial or civil cases if requested to do so by one of the litigants. In practice, the Shari'a court only assumes discretionary jurisdiction if a Muslim litigant makes the request. It does not allow non-Muslims to bring a suit as plaintiffs. This anomaly prevents non-Muslim residents from obtaining full legal recourse when being sued by or trying to sue a Qatari national. There are no statutes preventing individuals from suing the Government of Qatar, but the threat or fear of losing a residence permit discourages such suits. There have been at least three cases in which a person was injured as a result of medical malpractice at the government-owned hospital, but no suits were filed.

Many expatriates find proceedings in the Shari'a court bewildering. Only the disputing parties, their relatives and associates, and witnesses are allowed in the courtroom. Lawyers may not play any formal role, except to prepare litigants for their cases. Although non-Arabic speakers are provided with translators, foreigners report being at a considerable disadvantage, especially in cases involving the nonperformance of contracts. Shari'a trials are normally brief. After both parties have stated their cases and examined witnesses, the judge is likely to deliver a verdict with only a short delay. Criminal cases are normally tried 2 to 3 months after suspects are detained.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Traditional attitudes of respect for the sanctity of the home provide a great deal of protection against arbitrary intrusions for most citizens. The police must normally obtain a warrant before searching a residence or business, except in cases involving national security or emergencies. There were no reports of illegal searches of homes in 1989. The police and security forces routinely monitor the communications of suspected criminals and security risks. Mail and periodicals thought to contain pornography, politically sensitive material, or criticism of Islam are also opened and routinely censored.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although both expatriates and Qataris may express political opinions in private, public criticism of the ruling family and its policies is not tolerated. The Government strongly discourages attacks on other Arab governments as well. This applies to the electronic media, which are government owned and operated, as well as to the press. Journalists, particularly the expatriates, generally avoid challenging these restrictions because of the risk of having residence permits cancelled.

The authorities routinely screen all video cassettes, audio tapes, books, and periodicals for objectionable political sentiments and pornography.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government allows private social, sports, trade, professional, and cultural societies to operate. The activities of these organizations, which must register with the Government, are closely watched. The Government does not allow political demonstrations, nor are political parties allowed. For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

QATAR

c. Freedom of Religion

Qatar's state religion is Islam, the Koran is its basic constitution, and Shari'a law is its legal code. Members of other religions are prohibited from public worship, and they may not proselytize. Apostasy from Islam is a capital offense, although no one is known to have been executed for it. The Government tolerates non-Muslim religions, and non-Muslim parents may raise their children in their own faiths. Private gatherings of non-Muslims for religious purposes are tacitly allowed but are closely monitored for potential political implications.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on internal travel, except around sensitive Qatari military and oil installations. In general, women, both Qataris and foreigners, do not require permission from a male guardian to travel either within the country or abroad. However, Qatari men can prevent their female relatives from leaving the country by placing their names with immigration officers at the ports of departure. Technically, Qatari women employed by the Government must obtain official permission to travel abroad when requesting leave; it is not known to what extent this regulation is enforced. Similarly, expatriate women sponsored directly by an employer (rather than their husbands) must obtain permission to leave the country. All Qatari citizens have the right to return. Foreigners are subject to immigration restrictions designed to control the size of the local labor pool. Foreigners who work in Qatar must have a sponsor to enter Qatar and the sponsor's permission to leave.

The Government has no formal policy on refugees. Those attempting to enter illegally, including defectors from nearby countries, are refused entry. Refugees who can obtain local sponsorship or employment will be allowed to enter. However, if they lose their jobs, they are expected to leave or face deportation. The Government continues to enforce its policy of discouraging Qatari males from marrying foreigners by refusing to issue residency permits to foreign wives. In such cases, the wife must reside in another country, where she is visited by her Qatari husband.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Qatar has no formal democratic institutions, and citizens do not, therefore, have the right or ability peacefully to change their government or the political system. Qatar's political institutions blend the characteristics of a traditional Bedouin tribal state and a modern bureaucracy. There are no political parties, elections, or organized opposition to the Government. The Amir exercises all executive and legislative powers. His rule, however, is tempered somewhat by local custom. Interlocking family networks and the recognized right of citizens to submit appeals or petitions personally to the Amir provide informal avenues for redress of many grievances and also serve to limit abuses. The custom of rule by consensus leads to extensive consultations among the Amir, leading merchant families, religious leaders, and other notables on important policies.

QATAR

Under Qatar's Basic Law of 1970, the Amir must be chosen from and by the adult males of the Al-Thani family. The current Amir, Khalifa bin Hamad, has designated his son, Hamad bin Khalifa, as the heir apparent. This designation was made with the consent of the notables and religious leaders in accordance with local custom. Effective power remains in the hands of the Amir, his family, and local notables.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international or nongovernmental organization monitoring human rights abuses has asked to investigate conditions in Qatar. No local organizations that concern themselves with human rights are permitted to exist.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The Government discriminates against expatriates and persons of non-Qatari origin even though they may be citizens of Qatar. In the past, Qatar naturalized a number of persons of Iranian origin. After the fall of the Shah and the rise of Shi'ite fundamentalism in Iran, the Government began to withdraw Qatari citizenship from many such persons. There have been reports of Qataris of Iranian descent being expatriated, fired from their government jobs, and deported without the benefit of due process.

Violence against women, primarily expatriate domestic workers, occurs in Qatar but is not believed to be a common problem. In keeping with Islamic law, all forms of physical abuse are illegal, and the maximum penalty for rape is the death sentence. The police actively investigate all reports of violence against women. Few cases come to the attention of the authorities, however, since most victims do not press charges for fear of being repatriated. The law is applied unevenly, with Qataris--particularly members of the ruling family--facing less severe punishments than do expatriates charged with rape or physical abuse.

The activities of Qatari women are governed by strict Wahhabi customs and quasi-legal restrictions, such as a prohibition against the issuance of driver's licenses to women unless they have permission from a male guardian and can demonstrate a need to drive based on employment or other acceptable reasons. However, these restrictions generally do not apply to non-Qatari women. Qatari women are largely relegated to the roles of mother and homemaker, but some women are now finding jobs in education, medicine, and the news media, and more Qatari women are receiving government scholarships to pursue degrees in these fields at universities overseas.

It is common practice to discriminate against the employment of non-Muslims, particularly in sensitive areas such as security and education. There also are reports that those who hold to fundamentalist tenets have an advantage in employment and hiring practices.

QATAR

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of association is strictly limited, and workers are prohibited from forming labor unions. Persons are allowed to establish organizations based on their professional or private interests. Membership in international professional organizations critical of the Government of Qatar or any other Arab government is not permitted. The Government would severely restrict operations of any organized group which it deemed detrimental to the national interest.

Workers have the right to strike after their case has been presented to the Labor Conciliation Board and a decision has been made. Strikes are rare. There were at least two organized work stoppages over unpaid wages in 1988, but none were reported in 1989.

Qatar has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1972, but has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining. The government-designated worker delegate to the 1989 ILO Conference was listed as being the head of the workers' committee of the Qatar General Petroleum Corporation.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers in Qatar are prohibited from engaging in collective bargaining. All disputes between workers and employers are handled in the local labor courts. There are no export processing zones in Qatar.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There have been no reported instances of forced or compulsory labor, which are prohibited by law.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum working age is 18 years, but expatriate children sometimes work at younger ages in small family-owned businesses and shops. Although the laws governing the minimum age for employment of children are not strictly enforced, child labor, either Qatari or expatriate, is rare in Qatar.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Qatar has enacted regulations concerning worker safety and health, but enforcement is lax, at best. There is no minimum wage in Qatar. The 48-hour workweek is prescribed by law. Employess who work more than 48 hours a week (or 36 hours a week during the Muslim month of Ramadan) are entitled to overtime. The law is enforced in government offices and major private sector companies, but not in regard to domestic or personal employees. However, the workweek is usually less than 48 hours. Domestic servants frequently work 7 days a week, 12 hours a day, with few or no holidays, and have no way to redress grievances against their employer.

Expatriate workers in Qatar must be sponsored by a recognized organization or person legally responsible for them during their residence in Qatar. Technically, any worker can seek legal relief. Unskilled workers, including domestic servants, who constitute the group most likely to experience onerous working conditions, generally accept their situation rather than risk repatriation.

SAUDI ARABIA

Saudi Arabia is a monarchy ruled by the descendants of its founder, King Abd Al-Aziz (known in the West as "Ibn Saud"), who unified the country in the early part of the 20th century. The concept of separation of religion and state is foreign to Saudi society, and the legitimacy of the regime rests to a large degree on its perceived adherence to the defense of a conservative form of Islam. The legal system is based on the Shari'a, the codified Islamic religious law. There is no written national constitution. Most Saudis share a respect for this legal system, which they believe to be divinely inspired, as well as for ancient customs which call for consensus in government, internal social cohesion, and private economic enterprise. Since the death of King Abd Al-Aziz, the King and Crown Prince have been chosen from among his sons, who themselves have preponderant influence in the choice. Senior religious scholars and other princes also have a voice. There are no elected assemblies or political parties. All forms of political expression (except those favorable to the regime) are forbidden.

Saudi Arabia's security rests with three entities: the Ministry of Defense and Aviation, which controls the Army, Air Force, and Navy; the National Guard, which is responsible for guarding vital internal installations and providing additional land forces in case of war; and the Ministry of Interior, which is responsible for internal security (including police) and border forces.

During the past 40 years, massive oil revenues have transformed Saudi Arabia's centuries-old pastoral, agricultural, and commercial economy. This transformation has been marked by rapid urbanization, large-scale infrastructural development, the emergence of a technocratic middle class, and the importation of millions of foreign workers to do menial and high-skill jobs. It has also been marked by widespread expenditure of public funds in ways which have enriched the royal family and their associates. With some important exceptions, the economy remains largely in private hands.

No major new developments affected human rights in 1989.³ As in previous years, there were continuing reports of mistreatment of prisoners and incommunicado detention. Civil liberties--particularly the freedoms of speech and press, peaceful assembly and association, religion, and the right of citizens to change their government--were still significantly restricted.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of political killings, but there was one reported death by torture of a person in official custody (see Section 1.c.).

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances.

SAUDI ARABIA

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Under the Saudi interpretation of Islamic law, punishment for some crimes may include amputation, administered under anesthetic, or execution by beheading, firing squad, or stoning (with the convicted person in a drugged state). In the absence of two witnesses (four witnesses in the case of adultery), confessions before a judge are usually required for conviction. There were unconfirmed reports in 1989 that the police beat some detainees to elicit confessions. One prisoner is known to have been forced to stand for long periods of time with his hands above his head as a means of inducing him to confess. In an August 10 press release, Amnesty International (AI) alleged that Zahara' Habib Mansur al Nasser died in July while in police custody, reportedly as a result of torture.

In accordance with its interpretation of Islamic law, Saudi Arabia imposes capital punishment for a wide variety of crimes. Beheading is the usual method of execution, and all executions in 1989 were by this method. In some cases in 1989, beheading was followed by public crucifixion. Death by firing squad or stoning may be imposed for adultery. There were reliable reports of public nonjudicial stonings for adultery during 1989. In the first 10 months of 1989, at least 13 recidivist thieves had their hands severed, including 11 non-Saudis.

For less severe crimes, such as drunkenness or publicly flouting Islamic precepts, flogging with a cane is often imposed. Flogging is intended to degrade rather than cripple the criminal and to serve as a deterrent to others. The skin is not broken, and the flogging, though it is painful and leaves welts, is administered with a bent elbow. One of the Kuwaitis sentenced to prison for the bombings in Mecca in 1989 will receive a total of 1,500 lashes in 30 installments over his 20-year sentence. Two Americans were flogged for alcohol-related offenses in 1989.

In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI noted that it had received new information about the torture and ill-treatment of detainees in previous years. Among the practices described were "falaqa" (beating on the soles of the feet) with the ankles secured by rope to a raised pole; partial submersion in water; sleep deprivation; and extended solitary confinement. It said reports from detainees indicated torture is commonly practiced at the General Directorate of Investigations (GDI) prison in Damman.

Members of the Committee for the Propagation of Virtue and Prevention of Vice (the "religious police," commonly called Mutawwi'in), enforce laws concerning prayer time closings and appropriate dress in public. They have the legal right to detain suspects for up to 24 hours before turning them over to the regular authorities. Mutawwi'in have flogged detainees while seeking to elicit a confession and often use switch-like sticks in harassing those who violate the law. Some incidents of harassment were attributable to self-appointed vigilantes who function outside the Mutawwi'in hierarchy. Expatriates were often the targets of harassment. In several instances involving Americans, the U.S. Government protested to the Saudi Government. The Government has occasionally disciplined overzealous Mutawwi'in, and in a year-end speech the King cautioned the religious police to carry out their duties in a civil fashion.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Saudi security forces are divided into several branches, including the regular police and the special investigative police. Since criminal procedure is generally determined at the discretion of the arresting officer, arbitrary arrest occurs. There is no automatic, prompt procedure for contacting a detainee's family or employer; however, in cases involving foreigners, Saudi authorities acknowledge that they have the obligation to do so. When asked, the police will almost always confirm an arrest. Embassies usually hear about arrests of their nationals informally within a few days. Although in the past consular officials were usually given prompt access to prisoners, a new policy requiring Foreign Ministry approval has caused delays in consular visits. Official notification almost always takes several months, if it is given at all.

Problems may arise when persons are arrested by the GDI, the security service commonly called the "Mubahith" or investigative police. GDI prisoners are regularly held incommunicado during the initial phase of an investigation, which may last weeks or months. Following the bombings in Mecca in July 1989, a number of suspects were arrested and held for weeks without official charges while their cases were being investigated.

Saudi law makes no provision for bail or habeas corpus; prisoners are sometimes released on the recognizance of a patron or employer. Prisoners may be held for long periods while investigations proceed before being charged or released. Regulations issued by the Interior Ministry in 1983 to eliminate lengthy pretrial detentions or detentions without charges are frequently not enforced. However, under normal circumstances most arrestees are held no longer than approximately 3 days before being formally charged.

In a July 1989 newsletter, AI expressed concern over the detention since April 1988 of over 40 Shi'a activists in prison in Riyadh.

The Government does not formally use exile as a form of punishment. However, in the past, dissident members of the royal family have been barred from reentering the country. Denial of exit visas is a more common punishment.

AI charged in a report issued in January 1990 that there is evidence of a "clear pattern of suspected political opponents being arrested without warrant and held for long periods without trial." The detainees cited in the report are members or suspected members of several Shi'ite fundamentalist groups banned in Saudi Arabia. The report alleges that detainees are routinely tortured or otherwise abused in the first days or weeks of detention and are denied access to counsel and family. AI states that the Saudi Government has not responded to its contention that at least 66 individuals are being held without charge or trial. AI has specifically cited the case of Shi'ite scholar Sayyid Tahir Al Shimimy, saying there are fears that he has been tortured during his detention since June 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

SAUDI ARABIA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is founded upon the Shari'a. Regular Shari'a Courts exercise jurisdiction over common criminal cases and civil suits regarding marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance of real or personal property. Trials are generally closed and are normally held without counsel, though the advice of lawyers is available before trial. In a Saudi court the defendant appears before a judge who determines guilt or innocence and, if warranted, imposes the appropriate punishment. Counsel is not permitted in the court itself, but lawyers may act as interpreters for those unfamiliar with Arabic. With rare exceptions, there is no consular access to the trials of foreign nationals. Sentencing is not uniform and may be changed at any of the stages of review. Appeals against judges' decisions are automatically reviewed by the Justice Ministry or, in more serious cases, by the Court of Cassation and the Supreme Judicial Council, to ensure that court procedure was correct and that the judge applied appropriate legal principles and punishments. Cases involving capital punishment must also be reviewed by the King.

Shi'a are free to adjudicate exclusively noncriminal intra-Shi'a disputes within their own legal tradition.

The independence of the judiciary is prescribed by law and usually respected in practice, although jurists are nevertheless aware of (and reportedly have often acceded to) the power and influence of the royal family and their associates. The Justice Ministry is responsible for the appointment, transfer, and promotion of judges. Judges may be disciplined or removed only by the Supreme Judicial Council, an independent body of senior jurists. The Supreme Judicial Council in the past has investigated and removed corrupt judges to allow prosecution and imprisonment.

Specialized labor and commercial courts decide cases on the basis of decrees issued by the Council of Ministers and regulations issued pursuant to those decrees. The labor and commercial courts' effectiveness is frequently vitiated by long delays in reaching decisions and practical difficulties in enforcing judgments reached. In addition, it is often impossible to obtain texts of laws or decrees, and the decisions of the commercial and labor courts are reportedly often influenced by the relative rank or influence of the parties involved. The military justice system has jurisdiction over uniformed personnel and civilian government employees charged with violations of military regulations. Court-martial decisions are reviewed by the Minister of Defense and Aviation and the King.

The Board of Grievances arbitrates claims against the State. Although the Board has a staff of experienced jurists and is guaranteed considerable independence, it lacks the power to enforce judgments, and the collection of debts owed by the Government to contractors remains difficult.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Among the most fundamental of Islamic precepts are the sanctity of family life and the inviolability of the home. Saudi police must generally demonstrate reasonable cause and obtain special permission from the provincial governor before searching a private home, but warrants are not required. The Mutawwi'in may enter homes to search for evidence of un-Islamic behavior when they have grounds for suspicion, but instances of this appear to be rare. Wiretaps and mail surveillance can be carried out on the authority of officials of the Interior Ministry or the Directorate of Intelligence. Informants are reliably reported to be widely employed in internal security matters. An American citizen was detained and deported in 1989 for political statements made in private correspondence which was opened by Saudi authorities.

Most social and Islamic religious norms and strictures affecting personal life are matters of law and are enforced by the Government. Saudi women may not marry non-Saudis without government permission, which is rarely given. Saudi men must obtain approval to marry women from countries other than the six members of the Gulf Cooperation Council. During the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, the prohibition against public eating, drinking, or smoking during daylight hours is enforced on Muslims and non-Muslims alike. Prohibitions against alcohol and material deemed pornographic are strictly enforced and apply as well to foreign residents. Decorum in dress and demeanor, as well as the closing of shops for a half-hour period during the five daily prayers, are enforced by the Mutawwi'in.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The freedom of speech and press is significantly limited. Criticism of Islam or of the ruling family is not allowed. The potential presence of informers renders public criticism of the regime rare. In private, complaints are expressed relatively freely. Saudis are able to voice complaints and to seek redress of grievances through the open door audiences which are held regularly by even the highest officials, but such grievances are generally personal rather than political or social.

Saudi television and radio are state owned and operated. Foreign programs and songs are heavily censored, with references to politics, religions other than Islam, pork or pigs, and alcohol removed. Although foreign news is generally presented in an objective manner, news about subjects affecting Saudi Arabia is tightly controlled and conflicting viewpoints are not offered.

The press is privately owned. It is effectively controlled by a 1982 media policy statement and the firm understanding that nothing embarrassing to the Government, ruling family, or religious leadership may be published. The media policy statement enjoins the press to uphold Islam, oppose atheism, promote Arab interests, and preserve the cultural heritage of Saudi Arabia. Newspapers receive guidelines issued by the Information Ministry on government positions on controversial issues, and the government-owned Saudi Press Agency (SPA) expresses the official viewpoint on such issues. Most foreign news that does not directly concern Saudi Arabia is presented objectively. Domestic news concerning sensitive subjects, such as crime or terrorism, is not published.

Editors-in-chief are appointed with the tacit approval of the Information Minister, and the Government has the power to have them removed. Foreign publications circulate but can be censored for materials deemed immoral or explicitly or implicitly critical of Saudi policies and actions. For example, international publications such as Time or the International Herald Tribune are received by subscribers or appear on newsstands with advertisements for alcoholic beverages, pictures of female celebrities, and beach scenes torn out or obscured with black ink, and entire publications have sometimes been withheld from distribution. Crossword puzzles and comic strips in English-language newspapers are sometimes censored.

Academic freedom is constrained by similar guidelines; for example, the study of Freud, Marx, and Western philosophy is forbidden. Professors commonly believe that classroom comments which would be taken as antiregime will be reported to the authorities. There is also an injunction against the study of music in educational institutions, including universities. Nevertheless, there has been an increase in artistic activities in schools and universities, and in society in general, as evidenced by classes sponsored by the Saudi Arabian Society for Culture and Arts, an association whose head holds ministerial rank. There are also private art galleries, and some members of the royal family patronize the arts. Abstract and representational artists as well as photographers are allowed to work. Cinemas and most public musical or theatrical performances are, however, still prohibited.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public demonstrations as a means of political expression or to present grievances are prohibited. Tribal, familial, and economic interest groups informally aggregate public opinion, which their leaders express to high officials. Nonpolitical clubs and professional groups may be organized with the permission of the authorities. The few existing professional bodies are permitted but not encouraged to maintain contacts with their recognized international counterparts. Public meetings are generally segregated by sex. Unless they are sponsored by diplomatic missions, members of groups seeking to hold unsegregated meetings face arrest, imprisonment, and deportation.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is strictly circumscribed. Islam is the official religion, and all Saudi citizens must be Muslims. Conversion to another religion is a crime punishable by death. The Saudis allow all Muslims who wish to visit Mecca and Medina to do so. However, in conjunction with the Organization of the Islamic Conference, they have established a system of national quotas for the yearly pilgrimage, or hajj, which is seen as discriminatory by some nationalities, particularly the Iranians. Travel to the holy places by non-Muslims is illegal. Political activities by pilgrims are banned. Islamic practice in Saudi Arabia is limited to that sanctioned by the "Wahhabi" interpretation of the Hanbali jurisprudential school. Practices contrary to this interpretation, such as the visiting of graves by pilgrims to Mecca or Medina, or the use of the Shi'ite call to prayer, are prohibited.

SAUDI ARABIA

The Shi'a Muslims of the eastern province, usually estimated at up to 400,000 persons, constitute a religious minority subject to officially sanctioned forms of social and economic discrimination. Any form of public Shi'ite practice that deviates from Sunni Islam is generally prohibited. Historically, the Government has prohibited Shi'ite public processions during the holy month of Muharram and restricted public celebrations to specially designated areas within the major Shia cities, but there were reports that authorities permitted marches in 1989 without banners or public self-flagellation. In addition, Shi'ite banners were allowed to be hung from a public building in at least one Eastern province town.

The Government offers to provide financial support for the Shi'a religious establishment, which is generally refused. The Government seldom permits private construction of Shi'ite mosques, and the Shi'a have refused government offers to build state-supported mosques, in which Shi'ite motifs would be prohibited.

Public or private non-Muslim religious activities are not permitted, and importation of non-Islamic religious materials, including Christmas cards or trees, is illegal. Persons wearing non-Islamic religious symbols in public may be arrested or publicly harassed by the Mutawwi'in. There are no non-Muslim places of worship, and foreign nationals may practice their religions only in secret. Proselytizing, large gatherings, or elaborate organizational structures are likely to attract official attention and lead to the imprisonment or expulsion of those responsible.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Male Saudis may travel freely anywhere within the country. Most male Saudis may also travel abroad freely. In the case of government officials, the permission of the royal court is required, but apparently is normally perfunctory. Saudi and non-Saudi women must obtain written permission from their closest male relative before being allowed to leave the country, or to travel on public transportation between different parts of the country. The passports of suspected subversives have occasionally been seized. Shi'a known to have pro-Khomeini sympathies may not be allowed to travel abroad. Saudis are permitted to emigrate and assume foreign nationality, which results in the loss of Saudi nationality. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

There is no explicit formal policy regarding refugees or granting asylum. Refugees and displaced persons are in most cases dealt with like other foreign workers. With some exceptions, persons seeking residence in the country must meet strictly enforced requirements of sponsorship and employment. There are over 250,000 resident foreigners who fled their native countries, primarily Palestinians, Lebanese, Eritreans, Somalis, Afghans, and South Yemenis. These persons generally receive no special treatment, privileges, or services. Individual Saudis (frequently members of the ruling family) permanently sponsor such individuals to enable them to remain in Saudi Arabia, permitting them to find work where they may. In a small number of cases, sponsors reportedly have charged fees to such persons for providing documentation required by the Government. There are few Saudi refugees outside the country. Saudi Arabia is not a signatory of the International Convention on Refugees, but Saudi authorities have reportedly been responsive in cases where deportation of refugees to their home country would jeopardize their safety.

Foreigners living in Saudi Arabia, except for North Yemenis, are required to carry identification cards. They are not permitted to travel outside the city of their employment or to change their workplace without their sponsor's permission. Foreign diplomats may not travel outside of the major cities without notifying the Government. Foreign national employees are not permitted to travel abroad without their sponsor's permission, since sponsors hold their passports and are responsible for obtaining exit visas for them. Foreigners involved in commercial disputes are often not allowed to leave the country until the dispute has been resolved. Sponsors have taken advantage of this arrangement at times to exert unfair pressure to resolve commercial disputes in their favor. Occasionally Saudi sponsors or business partners have been able to prevent foreign nationals from departing Saudi Arabia for years or to have them arrested or deported. In criminal cases, Saudi regulations require that the passports of all potential suspects and witnesses be seized. This has sometimes forced innocent foreign nationals to remain in Saudi Arabia for lengthy periods against their will.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the ability peacefully to change their government. There are no formal democratic institutions, and most Saudi citizens have no voice in the choice of leaders or in changing the political system. The King rules the country in matters secular and religious, within limits established by religious law, tradition, and the need to maintain consensus among the ruling family and religious leaders. The King's legitimacy is based upon his descent, his selection by consensus of the royal family, his adherence to the tenets of Islam, his ability to govern, and his perceived concern for the welfare and security of the nation. The King is also the Prime Minister, and the Crown Prince serves as First Deputy Prime Minister. The King appoints all other Ministers, who in turn appoint subordinate officials with cabinet concurrence. There are no popularly elected officials in Saudi Arabia. Political parties are not permitted, and there are no public organized opposition groups.

Traditionally, public opinion has been expressed through client-patron relationships and interest groups such as tribes, families, and professional hierarchies. The open-door audience (majlis) remains the primary forum for expression of opinion or grievance. Any male citizen or expatriate may attend these sessions, which the King, Princes, and all important officials, national and local, hold regularly and openly. Since the assassination of King Faisal during a majlis in 1975, however, kings have reduced the frequency of their personal contacts with the public. Access to King Fahd, to whom decisions on some even relatively minor matters are referred, is considered to be quite difficult. Typical topics raised in a majlis are complaints about bureaucratic delay or insensitivity, requests for redress or assistance, and criticism of particular acts of government affecting personal or family welfare. Broader "political" concerns--Saudi social, economic, or foreign policy--are raised only occasionally. Either the King or the Crown Prince meets with Sunni religious leaders at least once a week.

SAUDI ARABIA

This institutionalized but relaxed means of ascertaining public opinion through consultation has limitations. Participation by women in the process is severely restricted, although there are reports that women may seek redress through female members of the royal family. As governmental functions have become increasingly complex, time consuming, and centralized in Riyadh, direct access to senior officials has become more difficult.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no human rights groups in Saudi Arabia, and none critical of Saudi policies would be permitted. AI, in its 1989 Report, states that the Foreign Minister wrote to the organization in January 1988 indicating Saudi willingness to discuss with AI officials "the origins of human rights in Islam and the principles of the Shari'a and its implementation in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia."

Although racial discrimination is illegal in Saudi Arabia, substantial societal prejudice based on race still exists. Foreign workers from Africa and Asia are subject to various forms of discrimination, as are Saudis from the Yemeni-influenced areas of southwest Saudi Arabia.

Women in Saudi Arabia have few substantive political and social rights, and they are not equal members of society. Women (including foreigners) may not drive motor vehicles (or bicycles), and there are restrictions on their use of public facilities when men are present. By law and custom, women cannot travel alone; they may travel abroad, or within the country, only with the written permission of their nearest male relative. They are restricted to specially designated sections in the rear of urban buses with separate entrances. In public, women are expected to wear black garments covering their entire bodies, including, in many cases, their faces. Female circumcision or other mutilation is not practiced in most parts of Saudi Arabia, although there are indications that it may persist in the southwestern Tihama region. Although no figures are available, it is likely that physical abuse of women by their husbands or male relatives is not uncommon. "Islamic advice" columns in the Saudi press frequently recommend beating of women as a form of discipline.

In addition to these customary and legal restrictions, Saudi women are subject to discrimination inherent in the Islamic legal system. Under Islamic law a daughter's share of an inheritance is less than that of her brother, although the brother has financial obligations to his mother and sisters. Women must demonstrate legally specified grounds for divorce, but men may divorce without grounds. If divorced or widowed, a woman normally may keep her children until they attain the age of 7 years, but then they revert to the husband's family, to whom they belong under Islamic law. American women married to Saudis have frequently been barred from visiting their children after divorce. In a Shari'a court, the testimony of one man equals that of two women. Although Islamic law permits polygamy, it is becoming less common, especially in cities and among younger Saudis. Islamic law limits the number of wives to four, and requires a husband who has more than one wife to treat each of his wives equally.

Employment opportunities for Saudi women are extremely limited, although there has been some slight improvement in recent years. In practice their employment is largely restricted to the media and to the teaching and health care professions. Free but segregated education through the university level is available to Saudi women, and the number of women enrolled in the educational system now totals more than a million, up about 50 percent in the past 5 years. Saudi men are able to study overseas; Saudi women cannot.

The large expatriate work force does not, for the most part, receive the same economic and social benefits available to native Saudis and must conform to restrictive Saudi social standards. Only a few highly skilled or high-ranking foreign workers are allowed to bring their families to live with them. Visits by relatives of foreigners working in Saudi Arabia, including foreign diplomats, are difficult to arrange. Employment opportunities for non-Muslims are circumscribed. Foreign embassies have received numerous reports of sexual abuse of female domestics by Saudi employers. It is almost impossible for these women to obtain redress in the courts, although a few employers have reportedly been punished for such abuses.

Saudi Shi'a face discrimination in government and industrial employment, especially in jobs with national security implications, which is broadly defined. The government petroleum company, Saudi Aramco, which traditionally provided large numbers of jobs to Shi'a, reportedly has been instructed to cease all further hiring of Shi'a and to phase out gradually all Shi'a working in responsible positions. Shi'a also face some limitations on their access to social services, despite efforts by the Government to improve the social service infrastructure in predominantly Shi'a areas of the country. Since the Iranian revolution, some Shi'a have been subjected periodically to surveillance and limitations on travel abroad.

Members of the royal family, and of other powerful families, are not subject to the same legal constraints as other Saudis. Princes and other influential persons may not be subject to customs inspection on entering the country and cannot be arrested. Government contracts are allegedly often awarded on the basis of influence, and foreign companies doing business in Saudi Arabia are said to need an influential "sponsor," often a member of the royal family, to be successful.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Government decrees prohibit the formation of labor unions and strike activity. Saudi Arabia has been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since 1976 but has ratified neither ILO Convention 87 regarding freedom of association, nor Convention 98 on collective bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Collective bargaining is not recognized. There are no export processing zones in the country.

SAUDI ARABIA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor, in the usual sense, is not known to exist in Saudi Arabia. However, since employers generally exercise control over the movements of foreign employees, situations that could be described as forced labor can occur, especially in remote areas where workers are unable to leave their place of work. There are also reports that female workers are sometimes prevented from leaving the homes of their employers and forced to work 12 to 16 hours per day, 7 days a week. In addition, there are reports of workers whose employers have refused to pay several months' or even years' of accumulated salary, or other promised benefits, although in such cases workers have recourse to the labor courts. Workmen's wages are considered "first-class privileged debts," secured by a lien on all of the employer's property, and enforceable for collection before all other debts.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no minimum age for workers employed in family-operated businesses or in other situations that are construed as extensions of the household (e.g., farmers, herdsmen, and domestic servants) since they are not covered by Saudi Arabia's labor regulations. In other cases, the labor regulations provide for a minimum age of 13, which may be waived by the Ministry of Labor with the consent of the juvenile's guardian. Women and children under age 18 may not be employed in hazardous or harmful industries, such as mines or industries employing power-operated machinery.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no legal minimum wage. The effective minimum wage is the amount required to induce laborers to come to work in Saudi Arabia. In some companies and institutions, wages are effectively set in accordance with nationality. As a result, workers from some countries may find themselves paid far less than workers from other countries who have equal seniority and are doing the same job. Saudi labor regulations establish a maximum 48-hour workweek at regular pay, and allow employers to require up to 12 additional hours of overtime at time-and-a-half pay.

Saudi labor regulations require employers to protect most workers from job-related hazards and disease, but workers employed in family-operated businesses, farmers, herdsmen, and domestic servants are not covered by these regulations. The law specifically prohibits employers from requiring workers to work outside when the temperature exceeds 122 degrees Fahrenheit. Labor Ministry inspectors and the labor courts are seeking, with some success, to enforce the labor code, but foreign nationals report frequent failures to enforce health and safety standards.

Saudi Arabia has a generous social security program. Most foreign workers were formerly eligible to participate in this program on the same basis as Saudis, but were excluded from participation in 1987. Saudi Arabia is now refunding all previous contributions by foreign laborers to these programs, with interest.

Foreign workers reside in Saudi Arabia in an explicitly temporary status comparable to workers who enter the United States under temporary labor contracts. As a consequence, they are officially barred from seeking employment with anyone but their sponsor, although in practice many do change jobs during the course of their stay in Saudi Arabia. If dismissed, foreign workers are officially obliged to leave the country by a date set by their employers, although many do stay on in alternate employment. In some cases, foreigners, who have worked in Saudi Arabia for many decades and who may have no country to which they can return, find themselves required to leave the country immediately if demanded by their employers or upon retirement.

There are numerous reports of domestic servants being victims of overwork and sexual and physical abuse. Saudi relations with a country supplying large numbers of foreign domestics were, in fact, strained in 1988 due to that country's concern with the treatment of its citizens in such positions. This problem was later settled--at least to the satisfaction of both governments--through bilateral negotiations. As noted above, domestic positions, such as maid, nanny, and cook, are not covered by Saudi labor regulations. This fact, plus ignorance of the labor regulations, inability to understand Arabic, and fear of retribution from their employers, have generally militated against maids pressing charges in court. The Government, in general, considers cases involving domestic servants to be private family matters and will not get involved unless clear-cut charges of severe abuse are brought to its attention.

SRI LANKA

Sri Lanka's constitutional, multiparty form of government features a strong executive presidency and a unicameral legislature elected by universal adult suffrage. The 1980's saw rising tension between Sri Lanka's majority Sinhalese and minority Tamil populations. By 1986 government security forces were battling armed Tamil separatists. In July 1987, The Governments of Sri Lanka and India concluded a Peace Accord to end the conflict.

Radicals of both major ethnic groups refused to accept the Accord. In the Sinhalese-majority south, government security forces were pitted against the revolutionary Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP) attempting to overthrow the Government by terrorist methods. In the Tamil-majority northeast, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) waged guerrilla war against the Indian Peace-Keeping Force (IPKF), introduced under the Accord, and India's Tamil militant allies.

In 1989 the JVP stepped up its campaign against the Government and population at large. Likened by some observers to Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge and the Maoist Shining Path in Peru, the JVP sought to topple Sri Lanka's elected Government through a campaign of murder, intimidation, and strikes designed to paralyze civil administration, cripple the economy, and disrupt society. It did so despite repeated efforts by the Sri Lankan Government to bring the JVP into the political mainstream. In 1988 the Government had legalized the JVP and invited it to participate in the elections. The JVP responded by killing voters and candidates in an attempt to disrupt elections held in late 1988 and early 1989. In January 1989, in an effort to open a dialog with the JVP, newly elected President Ranasinghe Premadasa released 1,800 JVP suspects and lifted the state of emergency. The JVP nonetheless continued its terror campaign of targeting hospitals, transportation, and other essential services, murdering union leaders who refused to participate in JVP-called strikes and killing the families of security force personnel. At mid-year, the Government began a massive crackdown on the JVP. It detained several thousand JVP suspects. By the end of the year, security forces had captured or killed much of the JVP's top leadership.

During 1989 the IPKF remained active in the northeast. Here Indian forces and their Tamil militant allies--particularly the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front (EPRLF)--battled the LTTE until a cease-fire went into effect in September. In the same month, India concluded an agreement with Sri Lanka for the withdrawal of the IPKF. India began evacuating troops late in the year. While significant numbers of Indian troops remained in the northeast at the end of the year, Indian authorities said they hoped to complete the Indian withdrawal by March 31, 1990. As the IPKF withdrew, the LTTE clashed with India's Tamil allies, as did Sri Lankan security forces. One week-long battle in December reportedly left 100 combatants and 50 civilians dead.

Sri Lankans elected a new President in December 1988 and a new Parliament in February 1989. The JVP and LTTE tried to prevent these elections through death threats and assassinations, killing hundreds of voters and 14 parliamentary candidates. As a result, turnout was low by Sri Lankan standards. International observers declared both elections largely free and fair, given the prevailing conditions. The leading opposition presidential candidate, however, challenged the results of the presidential election in court.

Until the 1980's, Sri Lanka had a largely ceremonial army. However, in response to terrorist threats and guerrilla insurgency, the Government has enlisted upwards of 50,000 men in its army, navy, and air force. About 25,000 men serve in its police force, including 2,000 police commandos in the Special Task Force (STF). The Government also maintains a force of some 15,000 paramilitary home guards and is raising a Citizens Volunteer Force (CVF) in the northeast. The overwhelming majority of security force personnel are Sinhalese.

About 60 percent of Sri Lanka's productive capacity is owned or controlled by the Government. The rise of Tamil separatist and then JVP insurgencies during the 1980's damaged Sri Lanka's economy and crippled what many considered its high developmental potential. In 1989 the JVP's violent antigovernment campaign seriously hampered economic growth. Per capita gross domestic product is less than $400. Tea, foreign aid, garment exports, and remittances from expatriate Sri Lankans are leading sources of foreign exchange.

The human rights situation deteriorated further during 1989. Over 8,500 persons, many of them civilians, died violently, the highest death toll since Sri Lanka achieved independence in 1948. There were reports of human rights abuses, not only by radical groups such as the JVP and LTTE, but by government security forces, the IPKF, and the IPKF's Tamil militant allies. Credible allegations linked the IPKF and government security forces to extrajudicial killings, disappearances, and torture.

The rise of anti-JVP vigilante groups in the south was a disturbing development in 1989. The Government denied knowing the identity of these vigilantes and announced an independent investigation into their activities. Nevertheless, knowledgeable observers claimed that the groups were manned at least in part by security force personnel operating with the knowledge of the Government.

In 1989 thousands of Sri Lankans were detained by the Government and--to a lesser extent--the IPKF. The Government acknowledged that it held 7,200 persons without charge. Emergency Regulations granting sweeping powers to security forces enacted in late 1988 were lifted in January only to be reimposed at midyear in a response to increased terrorist activity. The Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA), which also grants security forces wide-ranging powers, was in effect throughout 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Political killing remained Sri Lanka's leading human rights problem. Widespread terrorist activity, ongoing military operations, disruption of civil administration, and government secrecy made collection of accurate statistics difficult. Moreover, as law and order deteriorated, distinguishing between political killings and common criminality became problematic. Rough independent estimates put the number of political killings at over 8,500--of which perhaps 5,600 were civilians. The remaining 2,900 were combatants: members of the security forces, the IPKF, Tamil militant groups, and the JVP.

More than 550 civilians died in the northeast. About 350 were killed during Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) clashes with the IPKF and the IPKF's Tamil militant allies, in reprisal killings by the IPKF and its allies, and in other forms of political killing. The remaining 200 civilians represent Sinhalese and Muslim men, women, and children killed by Tamil militant groups. In addition, there were about 1,600 members of all combatant groups killed.

In the south, over 6,300 died as a result of political violence. Perhaps 5,100 were civilians. By a very rough estimate, more than 2,500 civilians were killed by the JVP, a minimum of 2,000 by vigilante groups, and over 200 by the security forces. The JVP killed about 500 members of the ruling United National Party and 400 members of the security forces.

During 1989 the rise of anti-JVP vigilante groups was disturbing. In July the JVP threatened to kill the families of security force personnel, and over the next several months it murdered more than 50 men, women, and children related to members of the forces. Shortly thereafter vigilante activity increased markedly throughout the south. The killing fit a pattern: first, members of security force families were killed, presumably by the JVP; then, within days or sometimes even hours, vigilante groups would abduct JVP suspects, summarily execute them, and burn their bodies. Human rights groups alleged that some victims of vigilante killings had been identified as persons previously arrested by security forces.

The Government denied knowledge of the identity of these vigilantes and declared that vigilantes would be treated like terrorists if they were captured. This claim of ignorance runs counter to strong circumstantial evidence linking the security forces to vigilante groups. A wide range of observers--human rights groups, opposition politicians, individual government officials, and members of the security forces themselves--assert that many vigilantes were security force personnel operating with the knowledge and acquiescence of the Government.

Both the JVP and anti-JVP vigilantes were reportedly responsible for threatening lawyers. At least five lawyers were assassinated. The JVP targeted lawyers who ventured to defend members of the security forces accused of wrongdoing. At least one prominent human rights attorney left the country following death threats. Vigilantes targeted lawyers who represented persons seeking redress for human rights abuses at the hands of the security forces and who had filed habeas corpus petitions on these persons' behalf or that of their families. The JVP also threatened members of the news media. It reportedly killed the Chairman of the Sri Lanka Broadcasting Corporation, a well-known radio and television announcer, and the chief news editor of the state-run television corporation.

The Government condemned threats and attacks against lawyers, and ordered the establishment of an independent commission to investigate vigilante groups. The Attorney General's office charged 10 policemen with murder in two different security-related cases. By the end of 1989, three had gone to trial. The rest awaited trial. In 1989 the military court-martialed a number of servicemen for abuse of authority. Following a pattern set in 1983, the Government published no results of its inquiries into alleged security force human rights abuses.

Frequent disappearance of both Tamils and Sinhalese, usually young men, remained another major concern. Amnesty International (AI), in a May report on disappearance in Sri Lanka, said that it had received reports of 780 cases since 1983--83 of them since the signing of the Indo-Sri Lankan Peace Accord in 1987. Of the newer cases, 49 were reported to have occurred in the south at the hands of government security forces and 34 in the northeast by members of the IPKF and its Tamil allies. The Government acknowledged that reports of some 800 cases of disappearance had been made. It said that of the 685 cases recorded before the Accord--mostly those of suspected Tamil militants--only a small number had been resolved.

Other observers, including local human rights groups and the Committee of Parliamentarians for Fundamental and Human Rights, believe that many more disappearances in fact have occurred since the Accord. In May, within a month of its formation, the Committee, made up of opposition members of Parliament, reported that it had received reports of 250 disappearances since the Accord. Most were in the south. By year's end, some 3,000 cases of disappearance in the south had been reported. Human rights groups said they had received reports of more than 100 disappearances in the northeast, most allegedly at the hands of the IPKF. They also noted a small number of abductions of civilians by Tamil militant groups. In some of these cases, those abducted were later released; in others, they "disappeared." The JVP in the south also abducted civilians, though victims were most often found dead shortly after their abduction.

In the majority of cases, according to AI, local human rights groups, and the Parliamentary Committee, reports of disappearances were documented by family members or other witnesses in sworn affidavits attesting to the arrests of persons who later disappeared. Often these affidavits described their efforts to visit arrested persons at police stations, military camps, or detention centers, only to be told by security officials that the persons seen arrested were not in custody.

In some cases, fellow detainees swore that they had seen in custody persons said by security forces not to have been arrested. In a few cases, detainees swore that they had seen "disappeared" persons taken away by security forces and not returned or that they saw these persons' corpses. Reports like these, along with the fact that the Emergency Regulations (ER) permit security forces to dispose of dead bodies without inquest, strongly suggest that some "disappeared" persons have been killed by the security forces, perhaps in reprisal for attacks on security forces and their families.

Sri Lankan attorneys have brought some 1,300 lawsuits during the past 6 years--more than 400 in 1989 alone--asking the

SRI LANKA

Government to produce "disappeared" persons. Many of the earlier cases have been dropped with the Government's release over the last 3 years of some 5,500 Tamil and Sinhalese militants. Under normal circumstances, government authorities respond within days to such summonses. However, under the Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA), the delay allowed while the Government prepares its response is 12 months.

The Government claimed that several factors complicated accounting for disappeared persons. These include false names given by arrested persons to conceal their identity and affiliation and the fact that many detainees may have left the country after a short detention period.

The IPKF did not respond to lawsuits filed in Sri Lankan courts. In one case, a court lodged contempt proceedings against an IPKF officer who failed to appear in response to a summons in the case of a suspected Tamil militant allegedly arrested by Indian soldiers in April 1988 and subsequently reported to have disappeared.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution provides that "no person shall be subjected to torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment." However, there were continuing reports by eyewitnesses, human rights organizations, members of Parliament, individual government officials, and members of the security forces that Sri Lankan security force personnel and the IPKF tortured and mistreated persons in detention. Victims and family members have also alleged torture at the hands of Tamil militant groups.

In January 1989, three police officers were charged with murder in the death while in police custody in September 1988 of a lawyer and accused JVP activist. Medical evidence showed that the lawyer had sustained more than 100 internal injuries and had died as a result of beating. By the end of the year the trial had not yet concluded. In March a doctor, who had been released after a government decision not to pursue charges against him, told the press he had been tortured by police during the first weeks of his detention. Findings of inquiry--if any--into these charges have not been made public.

In its report on Sri Lanka issued in May 1989, AI stated it had received reports "that torture is used extensively by the Sri Lanka security forces, and that several people have died as a result of injuries incurred through torture." Local human rights groups and some government security officials acknowledge that Sri Lankan security forces commonly used torture to elicit information and cooperation from suspected members of the JVP. The ER allow confessions made to police officers to be used in court. Moreover, the ER place the burden of proof on defendants to show that a confession was exacted under duress.

AI and local human rights groups also reported numerous cases of the IPKF torturing suspected Tamil militants. There were also reports that IPKF-allied Tamil groups tortured Tamil militants opposed to them. Local human rights groups received a large number of affidavits from victims stating that Indian soldiers beat them with rods, whipped them with electric cords, and subjected them to electric shock and dunkings. The Indian Government denies these allegations. It is unknown whether the Indian Government conducted any investigations into these charges or took any disciplinary actions.

A number of persons alleged in petitions to the Supreme Court in 1988 and 1989 that they had been tortured. In one such case, heard in December 1988, the Supreme Court ordered the State to pay $500 compensation to a person the Court found had been subjected to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment. The Government stated that a number of servicemen had been court-martialed for mistreating detainees. However, it provided no details of the charges, the number charged, or the verdict and sentences issued.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that no person "shall be arrested except according to procedure established by law." It further provides that an arrested person must be informed of the reason for his arrest. By law, an arrested person must be brought within 24 hours before a magistrate who may authorize bail or, for serious crimes, order continued detention. However, criminals are frequently not informed of the reasons for their arrest, though they are generally produced before a magistrate within a few days of arrest. A suspect may be detained up to 3 months without bail or longer if a court so rules.

The PTA, adopted in 1979, and the ER, renewed monthly with the extension of the state of emergency in effect since 1983, give the security forces extraordinary powers in dealing with suspects. President Premadasa suspended the ER shortly after taking office in January but reimposed them in June in response to growing JVP terrorist activity. The PTA and ER permit preventive and incommunicado detention. Under the ER, security forces may detain a suspect for up to 3 months before he must be presented to a magistrate. The PTA and the ER also include vaguely defined acts which can encompass nonviolent expression of opposition to the Government.

Magistrates are not empowered to investigate the circumstances leading to a person's arrest and continued detention but under the ER "shall" remand the detainee to a prison where he may be held indefinitely. A person held under the PTA may be detained without charge for up to 18 months. There have been numerous cases in which persons have been held longer. Bail may be granted for persons held under the ER but, once charged, persons held under the PTA are ineligible for bail. Visits by family, access to lawyers, food, and other conditions of incarceration are normally restricted under these extraordinary laws.

Relatives may write to the Ministry of Defense and ask that the case of a family member detained under the PTA be reviewed. The review is conducted by a three-man advisory board which considers the evidence, interviews the police and the detainee, and makes a nonbinding recommendation. Board reviews frequently take several months, and the authorities have refused or delayed carrying out the recommendation of the board in some cases. By the end of the year, the board had reviewed the cases of approximately 1,000 suspected JVP members who had surrendered to the Government, freeing about 250 and recommending the balance for rehabilitation. At the beginning of 1990, the board had a backlog of 5,000 cases, representing persons arrested by security forces.

SRI LANKA

In May the Government appointed a retired Supreme Court judge to head a committee monitoring the arrests, detention, and release of students. In September the Government stated it would file lists of detainees with local government officials and permit access to them by family members and other interested persons. The Government also said it would permit Members of Parliament to visit certain places of detention after prior notice to the Ministry of Defense. By year's end, the Government had not provided the promised full lists to local officials. It did, however, provide the names of several thousand detainees to Members of Parliament.

Persons may challenge the legality of their detention either by filing a habeas corpus suit in the Courts of Appeal or by charging the Government before the Supreme Court with illegally violating fundamental rights under the Constitution. In early May, the Court ruled that police had violated the fundamental rights of two women who were twice arrested on suspicion of involvement with the JVP, and it awarded them damages. However, in many cases these provisions did not provide effective means of redress to persons who allege arbitrary detention. The Courts of Appeal are located only in Colombo, which necessitates costly travel to the capital for those seeking redress. Fundamental rights suits must be filed--complete with documentation--within 30 days of the alleged infringement. This 30-day limit makes it virtually impossible in practice for persons detained incommunicado for prolonged periods, or relatives of those alleged to have disappeared, to bring such suits.

In a peace gesture toward the JVP, President Premadasa within weeks of taking office in January released some 1,800 persons detained under the ER. However, JVP terrorist activity continued unabated. During the year the Government used the PTA and the ER to detain large numbers of JVP suspects. In October the Government said that it was detaining 7,200 persons. Human rights groups believe the number may be higher. They also assert that in some cases family members of suspects are arrested and held until the suspects produce themselves. Human rights groups claimed that detainees were held not only in prisons and detention centers but also in military camps. The Government has said it will grant access to these camps only to members of an International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) team attempting to trace missing persons.

The release of Tamil militants held by the Government, begun after the signing of the Accord, continued. Since mid-1987, more than 3,800 Tamil suspects have been released. In August the Government announced that only 51 suspected Tamil militants remained in custody.

AI and local human rights groups reported that the IPKF continued in 1989 to arrest and detain without charge suspected Tamil militants in its camps in the northeast. In late September, the Commander of the IPKF said Indian troops had captured 1,185 LTTE members since October 1987. Perhaps as many as 1,000 of these persons, as well as others identified as LTTE sympathizers, remain in IPKF custody. The IPKF has not responded to lawsuits in Sri Lankan courts filed to compel it to produce arrested persons. It has not stated on what legal basis persons are being held or specified the course of due legal process to be followed in their cases.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

SRI LANKA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Substantial due process rights are accorded in nonpolitical cases, but trials under the PTA and ER are lacking several significant procedural safeguards. Persons accused of criminal acts are generally entitled to a fair public trial, are informed of the charges and the evidence against them, and are represented by counsel of their choice. Persons tried in the High Court and the Court of Appeals on criminal charges are provided an attorney at government expense if necessary. The Government does not provide attorneys in other cases, though private legal aid organizations provide assistance to some defendants. Although public trial by jury is the custom, juries are not provided in trials under the PTA on the grounds that jury members could be intimidated.

Confessions are admissible in PTA and ER cases but not in nonpolitical criminal and civil cases. Those convicted under the PTA or the ER have the same right of appeal to the Appeals and Supreme Courts as those sentenced in other cases. However, most people held under these Acts are never formally charged and therefore do not enter the appeals process.

The Sri Lankan judiciary is independent. The President appoints all judges of the Sri Lankan Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal, and High Courts. The Chief Justice and two Supreme Court judges comprise a Judicial Service Commission which appoints, transfers, and dismisses lower court judges. Judges serve from time of appointment to mandatory retirement age: 65 for Supreme Court judges, 62 for others.

In late 1988, the Government enacted legislation to create a special tribunal for the expeditious trial of suspected terrorists and subversives. The tribunal was to sit without jury and admit in evidence confessions and other statements made to any person in whatever circumstances. It would act on the basis of written complaints from the Inspector General of Police or any Deputy Inspector General. At the end of 1989, it was unknown whether this body had tried any cases.

In the Northeastern Province, intimidation by Tamil militants, especially the LTTE, prevented the judiciary from functioning. In the south, the JVP also abridged the right to fair public trial by threatening judges. In at least one instance the JVP allegedly attacked a lawyer defending three police officers charged with the murder of a suspected member of the JVP.

The Government brought indictments against more than 375 persons detained under the PTA and ER in 1989. It is impossible to know how many of the 7,200 persons the Government admits are under detention, and the estimated 1,000 persons in IPKF custody might be accurately termed political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government generally respects individual privacy and the sanctity of the family and the home. The judiciary has a good record of upholding rights to privacy in cases which reach the High Court. Ordinarily, search and arrest warrants are required to enter private premises. Under the PTA, however, police officers above a certain rank and less senior officers authorized by them in writing may enter and search any premises without a warrant and seize "any document or thing" when there is a presumption or evidence of support for, or involvement with, unlawful activity. These powers were used extensively in 1989.

As in the past, IPKF soldiers operating in the northeast manned checkpoints, stopped vehicles, and searched homes and persons at the direction of officers without warrant or other legal sanction. In June India's Tamil allies began forcibly conscripting young Tamil men in the northeast to provide manpower for the defense of Tamil-majority areas. This force, "The Tamil National Army," was distinct from the Citizens Volunteer Force raised under the Government's Manpower Mobilization Act and not sanctioned by Sri Lankan law. An estimated 4,000 young men were forcibly conscripted. Perhaps another 1,000 youths fled the northeast to avoid impressment. An unknown number of the draftees were subsequently released by their abductors. Perhaps 500 were captured while fighting the LTTE and Sri Lankan security forces and subsequently released.

In the south, the JVP used intimidation to recruit unwilling members and to force participation in demonstrations and other activities liable to subject individuals to criminal prosecution. University and secondary school students were particularly affected by JVP coercion--a development that contributed to campus unrest and the closure of most schools for much of the year. Students reportedly intimidated university administrators and teachers, rendering ineffective any schools which remained open.

Monitoring telephones or correspondence is not known to be a common practice. Local politicians, journalists, and human rights activists have, however, alleged government wiretapping.

g. Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts

In the south, the JVP stepped up its terrorist campaign against the Government, killing over 2,500 civilians and causing great human suffering. Throughout the year, the JVP used death threats to compel participation in strikes which closed businesses and government offices. In addition, the strikes disrupted the distribution of food supplies and other key commodities. Threats against importers and consumers of Indian goods caused a shortage of pharmaceuticals.

In July the JVP threatened to kill the families of security force personnel (see Section 1.a.). In August the JVP targeted hospital workers in the Western Province. Threats against doctors, nurses, and other hospital employees--and the murders of at least two health practitioners--effectively shut down health service in the country's most populous region for several weeks. As a result, an estimated 100-plus persons died for lack of medical care.

The Government countered the JVP's campaign with the enactment of a number of extraordinary laws designed to quell civil unrest. As part of the ER, the Government in late 1988 broadened security force powers to dispose of dead bodies without inquest. It issued "shoot-on-sight" orders against illegal demonstrators and curfew violators. It declared making or posting a death threat a capital offense. These laws were suspended with the ER in January but reimposed with the ER in June.

SRI LANKA

Throughout the summer and into the fall, the Government waged an all-out campaign against the JVP, making a concerted effort to wipe out its leadership. By late November, most key leaders had been captured or killed. Two of the three most senior JVP leaders were killed after their capture. According to the Government, they were shot while trying to escape.

In December 1988, Parliament amended the "Indemnity Act" to extend immunity from prosecution for acts, "legal or otherwise," committed by security force members, members of the Government, and government servants acting "in good faith" to preserve public order between August 1, 1977 and December 16, 1988. Human rights groups have criticized the Act for its broad scope and its obvious potential to abridge constitutionally guaranteed rights. The Government invoked the Indemnity Act once in January, arguing that family members of those killed in a 1983 communal riot at Colombo's Welikada Prison should not be granted compensation from the Government because security forces had acted "in good faith" to quell the disturbance.

There were eyewitness reports that security forces shot on sight persons putting up posters in July. Security force personnel posted their own placards threatening reprisals should the JVP kill their relatives.

In July security forces confronted large-scale demonstrations in many parts of the south. Security force personnel, allegedly after being fired on from the crowds, fired back. Perhaps as many as 150 persons were killed in 2 days throughout the south.

In the northeast, Tamil militants reportedly murdered some 200 unarmed Sinhalese and Muslims because they had settled on territory claimed as a Tamil homeland by Tamil militants. In addition, the LTTE apparently exacted civilian assistance in the form of shelter, food, money, and assistance. Providing assistance to the LTTE exposed civilians to punishment by the IPKF.

There were numerous credible reports by victims and witnesses of indiscriminate IPKF reprisals against civilians in the northeast. According to the worst of these reports, Indian troops in early August attacked civilians in the northern town of Valvedditturai, summarily executing many. The incident followed an LTTE attack which left seven Indian soldiers dead. By the best count available, 53 men, women, and children were killed by Indian soldiers in the retaliation. The Indian Government ordered an investigation into the incident, but no results have been made public.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for "freedom of speech and expression including publication." However, it also permits these rights to be restricted "as may be prescribed by law in the interests of national security."

Many newspapers criticize the ruling party and the Government. However, opposition groups alleged that the ER have been used directly and indirectly to restrict free speech. For example, persons wishing to post bills advertising meetings of any type are required under the ER to secure police approval of the text. In May 1987, the Supreme Court ruled that this clause gave the police too broad an authority. It declared that police must specify a reason for denying a person permission to post bills. Posting of bills threatening death was made a capital offense in late 1988 (see Section 1.g.).

In 1989 the Government continued to prosecute individuals who distributed "antigovernment" literature. It also considered possession of JVP literature prima facie evidence of involvement in the organization and reason for detention under the ER. In September 1987, Parliament amended the Parliamentary Powers and Privileges Act of 1978, which permits Parliament to impose a fine on anyone who criticizes a member of Parliament. Under the 1978 Act, fines imposed were limited to $160. Under the 1987 amendment, Parliament was empowered to levy unlimited fines and imprison violators for up to 2 years. While the amendment was not applied in 1989, human rights observers believe it serves as a deterrent to free speech.

The Government controls the country's largest newspaper chain and owns the radio and television services. A variety of independent newspapers and journals, however, provide a full range of viewpoints on foreign policy and most domestic matters, including human rights issues. Many small-circulation periodicals published by opposition political parties operate freely.

The Government imposed formal press censorship on press and other media between June 30 and July 24. Earlier, in order to counter JVP threats against state-owned media employees, the Government compelled these employees to go to work, in some instances forcibly conveying workers to their jobs. In July the Government expelled a British Broadcasting Corporation film crew for violating press censorship regulations.

Some Sri Lankans assert that the Government can intimidate the press even without formal censorship. By threatening to take over private media which it claims do not operate in the public interest, for instance, the Government has allegedly prevented the media from accepting advertisements from certain organizations. Members of the media allege that the Government also exerts pressure on the press by controlling permits for the import of newsprint and through placement of considerable amounts of government announcements and advertising.

The IPKF and its Tamil militant allies reportedly attempted to influence Jaffna-based Tamil newspapers in an effort to increase favorable reporting on the IPFK. According to human rights groups, the IPKF-allied Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front (EPRLF) forced the closure of the three independent Tamil dailies in Jaffna and abducted a number of their staff members. The EPRLF reportedly hoped to clear the field for the establishment of a new Tamil daily closely linked to it.

Radicals in the northeast and south also practiced a particularly brutal form of censorship through intimidation and murder in 1989. In early May, Tamil militants killed the son of the editor of one of Jaffna's Tamil dailies, as well as the Jaffna correspondent of one of the country's three major English language dailies. In the south, the JVP threatened and murdered several journalists and executives of the state-run media (see Section 1.a.). It also targeted vendors and distributors of government-owned newspapers, killing several of them in an effort to prevent the newspapers' circulation in parts of the south.

Academic freedom is generally respected by the Government. The JVP coerced students into boycotting classes. In some cases, students occupied university and secondary school campuses at JVP instigation. In response, the Government closed public universities and secondary schools in the south. They remained closed most of the year. Private schools which stayed opened received threats from the JVP and closed. In the north, forced conscription of teenagers led many parents to keep their sons at home or send them away for safety (see Section 1.f.).

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association. These, however, can be restricted under provisions of the ER and PTA. Sri Lanka has numerous private associations, which are free to maintain ties with international bodies.

Under the ER, the President (or his designee) may prohibit public meetings "likely to cause a disturbance to public order and promote disaffection." In practice, the police issue or deny permits at the discretion of the Superintendent of Police in each area for outdoor public meetings or processions. There was no evidence in 1989 that permits to hold public meetings were denied to the legal opposition. In November 1988, the Government ordered its security forces to shoot on sight illegal antigovernment demonstrators (see Section 1.g.).

Antigovernment militants were the greatest threat to Sri Lankans' freedom of assembly. JVP members attacked UNP and other political party meetings in the period before the February 15 parliamentary elections, killing hundreds of voters and keeping many thousands from the polls.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution establishes Buddhism as the official religion and requires the Government "to protect and foster" Buddhism. It also guarantees the rights of all others, including Hindus, Muslims, and Christians, to practice their religions freely. Complaints in the past that Buddhists had an advantage over members of other religions in winning senior government positions are now heard less frequently. Members of all religious groups hold influential positions in the Government and in major political parties.

Religious groups are free to maintain active ties with coreligionists in other countries, and many Sri Lankans perform religious travel each year. Religious publishing and proselytizing are freely allowed, and foreign clergy may work in Sri Lanka.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution grants every citizen "freedom of movement and of choosing his residence within Sri Lanka" and "freedom to return to Sri Lanka." These constitutional provisions are generally honored.

However, believing that Tamil militants were frequently crossing from southern India to northern Sri Lanka via the Palk Strait, the Government adopted a series of measures, beginning in 1984, which progressively restricted free movement in the north. Maritime surveillance and prohibited zones significantly restricted free movement and made it almost impossible for resident fishermen to ply their trade. These restrictions were strengthened significantly by the IPKF in the northeast but were not enforced consistently during 1989.

Movement in the northeast and the south was also restricted by curfews imposed by the Government, as well as by "strikes" ordered by the JVP and enforced through threats and assassination. Southern districts were under night curfew from late July through October as the Government attempted to end terrorist incidents and capture or kill the JVP's leadership.

Sri Lanka generally denies entry to refugees or displaced persons from other countries. The Government does not help refugees who attempt to stay in the country while seeking permanent residence elsewhere.

There was an unknown number of internally displaced persons in Sri Lanka at the end of the year. Most lived with relatives or friends. The Government estimated that some 134,000 Sri Lankan Tamil refugees left the island for southern India during the 4 years of fighting prior to the Accord. In late April, it said that about 40,000 of these persons had returned to Sri Lanka, many with the help of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Governments of India and Sri Lanka. Another 12,000 refugees are known to have returned without assistance. Refugee officials estimated that fewer than 5,000 Sri Lankan Tamil refugees remained in camps in southern India. The remaining 90,000 persons are believed still in southern India, living and working in the local economy. In addition, as many as 60,000 Sri Lankan Tamils have sought refuge in Western Europe and North America.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens have the constitutional right to change their government through periodic, multiparty elections. There is universal adult suffrage, and voter turnout is high (usually around 80 percent).

In December 1988, Sri Lankan voters elected then-Prime Minister Ranasinghe Premadasa of the United National Party (UNP) as President with 50.4 percent of the popular vote. He succeeded his UNP colleague, J. R. Jayewardene. In February 1989, the UNP won 50.7 percent of the popular vote and 125 of 225 seats in the nation's first parliamentary elections in 12 years.

Both elections were marked by high levels of violence instigated by the LTTE in the northeast and the JVP in the south. Both organizations attempted through intimidation and murder to halt the elections and prevent citizens from voting. In the first 6 weeks of the year, the JVP killed 14 parliamentary candidates. During the week of the parliamentary elections, the LTTE and the JVP murdered perhaps 225 persons, many of them at polling stations or on their way to and from voting. Despite these difficulties, 55 percent of the electorate turned out for the presidential election and 64 percent for parliamentary polls.

The Government invited international observer teams for both elections. The teams found both elections generally free and fair, given the prevailing conditions. However, the leading opposition presidential candidate challenged the results of the presidential election in a petition to the Supreme Court. She alleged that the prevailing violence, as well as government-sponsored coercion and vote fraud, unfairly influenced the outcome. Her case was still pending at the end of 1989.

Although members of each ethnic community can be found in many of the political parties, the most influential political parties generally draw their support from one ethnic community. The UNP and the Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP), dominant in the Sinhalese electorate, historically have alternated rule. That pattern changed in 1982, when, following the victory of UNP incumbent President Jayewardene, the Government held a referendum to extend the life of the 1977 Parliament by 6 years. Restrictions were imposed on the activities of opposition political parties during the referendum campaign. Numerous voting irregularities were reported by the elections commissioner. The extension was approved by 54.5 percent of the voters.

In 1988 and 1989, several formerly militant Tamil groups that had accepted the Accord emerged as representative political parties in the northeast. They effectively replaced the Tamil United Liberation Front, which until 1988 had claimed to speak for the Ceylon Tamils, for centuries the majority population in the northeast. The political wing of the Eelam Revolutionary Organization of Students (EROS), the Eelavar Democratic Front (EDF), won 13 seats in Parliament to become the third largest party in Parliament and the largest parliamentary party in the northeast.

Indian Tamils, who make up about one-third of the country's Tamil population, live primarily in the central hill country and have been only minimally involved in the ethnic conflict. They are represented by the Ceylon Workers Congress (CWC), which is also a trade union. The CWC is allied to the ruling UNP.

Opposition parties function freely. Several operate their own newspapers. The JVP was granted legal status as a political party in May 1988. This ended an official proscription of the party imposed in 1983. The Government repeatedly invited the JVP to discuss its differences at the conference table and often appealed to the group to forswear violence and join the democratic process. The JVP responded to none of these appeals and continued its violent terrorist activity. In September the Government called for an all-party congress to deal with the country's political difficulties. The JVP refused to take part.

SRI LANKA

The Government is sensitive to criticism of human rights in Sri Lanka. Senior government officials have made themselves available to visitors looking into human rights issues. In October, 6 years after the ICRC had first offered its services to the Sri Lankan Government, the Government invited an ICRC team to visit Sri Lanka to extend humanitarian services. In November the team began visiting places of detention to interview JVP suspects. In the north, however, the IPKF reportedly denied the ICRC access to prisoners held by Indian troops. The Government continues to respond to questions on human rights practices put by the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

In its May 1989 report, covering 1988 and early 1989, AI noted that it had last visited Sri Lanka in 1982 and that numerous requests, the latest in January 1989, to the Government to permit another visit had gone unanswered. The Government says that it draws a distinction between "impartial" international organizations such as the ICRC and private groups such as AI. The Government has further said that it does not plan to invite AI to the country.

Several local nongovernmental organizations monitor human rights, including the Civil Rights Movement and the Movement for Interracial Justice and Equality. They collect information from families of victims or members of citizens' committees near the site of alleged incidents. The Government generally does not address their periodic reports and appeals. A new human rights organization, the Parliamentarians for Fundamental and Human Rights, with membership drawn from the ranks of the country's 100 opposition members of Parliament, was formed in 1989. It has invited ruling party parliamentarians to join it and participate in its activities.

Under British colonial administration prior to 1948, Ceylon Tamils held a larger percentage of influential positions in government service, the police, the professions, and commerce than the percentage of Tamils overall in the population. With independence, Sinhalese political leaders sought to redress what they regarded as an imbalance in favor of Ceylon Tamils. Typical of their efforts was the "Sinhala-Only" Act of 1956 which made Sinhala the sole official language of the country. Many Tamils considered the Act discriminatory, claiming that it granted native Sinhala speakers unfair advantage in education and in the workplace.

In the 1978 Constitution, Tamil was designated a "national" language and its use in government, education, and the courts was specifically protected. Nevertheless, Tamils have charged that this legal protection is not enforced. Tamils complain that they suffer from systematic discrimination in competition for university entrance, employment opportunities, and other matters under government control. Government officials have denied these charges. They point out that prominent Tamils occupy senior-level civil service positions. Many of these Tamils are approaching retirement age, however, and there are few Tamils in the lower ranks of the civil service and military to take their places. Under the Constitution's 13th Amendment, enacted in November 1988 to implement the terms of the Indo-Sri Lanka Accord, Tamil and Sinhalese were made co-official languages and English the "link" language. However, one observer estimates that 98 percent of the schools are segregated by language.

Indian Tamils, descendants of Tamils brought from India in the 19th century to work on plantations, have suffered particular discrimination. No longer qualifying for citizenship under Indian law, they were also denied Sri Lankan citizenship by laws adopted after independence. Since then, the Sri Lankan and Indian Governments have reached several agreements aimed at resolving the problem of these stateless Tamils. Under a 1986 agreement, the Sri Lankan Government agreed to grant citizenship to all remaining stateless Tamils. In November 1988, the Government eliminated processing delays by passing a law making extension of citizenship to these stateless persons automatic upon simple request. The new legislation did not cover some 94,000 Tamils who themselves or whose parents once applied for Indian citizenship but who now wish to stay in Sri Lanka. These will be compelled to leave Sri Lanka, presumably for India. None, however, were forced to leave in 1989.

The Government established a commission for the elimination of discrimination and the monitoring of fundamental rights late in 1986. Charged with investigating individual complaints on the basis of race, religion, language, caste, sex, political opinion, or place of birth, the commission resolved 1,379 complaints, some with many grievants, in the first 9 months of 1989. Many of these complaints were related to the workplace.

Sri Lankan women have equal rights under the law, including equal property and inheritance rights. However, various ethnic and religious groups have their own strictures which place limitations on women. Some Tamil families believe their women members should not be seen working in public. Some Muslim women are discouraged by members of their community from seeking higher education or employment. Women do fill important posts in the civil service, the professions, and business, but most are found either in manual and semiskilled jobs or in the home. In 1985, the last year for which figures are available, women employed in agricultural work were paid on average 71 percent of the hourly wage received by men.

Violence against women is known to occur in Sri Lanka, but little is known about its extent. There are no official statistics on the subject. Abuse within the family is seldom reported or discussed publicly owing to the respect accorded personal privacy. Perpetrators of violence against women may be prosecuted under the criminal code, but many women are reluctant to pursue charges against family members. There are infrequent reports of rape, wife beating and murder of wives by husbands.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association and the right to form and join trade unions. Any seven workers may form a union, draw up their own procedures, elect their own representatives, and formulate programs. Worker rights, including the right to choose representatives, publicize views, and determine programs, are protected by law. Unions are free to affiliate internationally, and different Sri Lankan trade union federations are affiliates of all three major international trade union organizations.

Public servants have no right to strike and are not provided arbitration machinery. Aggrieved public servants may appeal to a Public Service Commission for relief. However, union activists and labor lawyers claim that the Commission is biased against employees. Other workers are free to strike and have done so frequently. Under the Essential Services Act, the President may declare any business to be an essential service, making a strike illegal. President Premadasa used this power extensively during the year to counter the violent efforts of the JVP to cripple essential services and overthrow the Government. The JVP targeted union leaders, especially those of government-affiliated unions, murdering more than 200 of them since 1987 in its effort to enforce involuntary strikes.

About 1,000 labor unions and federations together represent about one-third of the 5.5 million-strong labor force. Although there are a few independent unions, most large worker organizations are affiliated with political parties and play a significant role in the political process.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Workers are expressly granted the right to bargain collectively by formation of workers' councils to promote a voluntary worker-employer dialog. Workers who believe that this right has been abridged may lodge complaints with the Commissioner of Labor, the Labor Tribunal, or the Supreme Court. Department of Labor officers may arbitrate when workers and employers are not able to resolve a dispute. These officers are stationed throughout the country to assure that employers fulfill their legal and contractual obligations to workers and to be available for mediation in minor local disputes. A 1989 report by an International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts (COE) called on the Government to provide information on measures taken to guarantee adequate protection against antiunion discrimination.

Workers in the nonplantation agricultural sector and most of those employed in small businesses, as well as workers in the free trade zones, are not represented by unions. Unionization in the zones is not prohibited by law but is, according to employers and union leaders, discouraged in practice by employers and the Government, the latter by restricting access to the zones by union organizers. Zone employees participate in labor-management company associations. Workers in the unorganized agricultural sector are not covered by labor laws, although the Government may investigate individual complaints.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

While not prohibited by law, there is no forced labor in Sri Lanka. As noted in Section 1.f., India's Tamil militant allies have forcibly conscripted young Tamil men in the northeast to provide manpower for the defense of Tamil-majority areas.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Employment of children under age 12 is prohibited. Those between ages 12 and 14 are called child workers and may not be employed in industry or dangerous occupations. Employment of young persons between 15 and 18 is subject to certain restrictions. Employees under age 18 cannot be required to work outside specified hours. In addition, employers are required to provide young workers with annual leave, rest periods, and meal breaks similar to those provided to adult workers. There is no compulsory education law.

In practice, however, there is a work force of children, probably numbering at least several thousand, who work illegally, mostly at jobs in rice cultivation, as domestics, or as street peddlers. Efforts to address this problem have been hampered by the fact that in some cases child workers are a major source of family income.

There is no national minimum wage, but wage boards for 37 different trades set minimum wages and working conditions. For example, the minimum wage for nurses, bus drivers, and garment workers is about $25 per month. Actual wages and working conditions generally exceed these minimums, which many union leaders consider insufficient for maintaining a decent standard of living. A 1989 report by the ILO's COE called on the Government to maintain its minimum wage machinery in operation. Several Sri Lankan unions had filed a complaint under ILO Convention 131 that a motion of the Wage Board for an increase in the cost of living for plantation workers was denied by the Government until export conditions and internal conditions stabilized. Most permanent full-time workers are covered by laws which provide that they shall work no more than 45 hours per week and that they will receive a 14-day paid annual holiday.

Minimum conditions for the protection of the safety and health of workers are set forth in legislation passed by Parliament and implemented by the Department of Labor, which employs a small staff of engineers and inspectors for this purpose. Fines up to $150 may be levied on employers who fail to meet minimum standards. The Department of Labor educates workers about minimum standards for different workplaces and encourages the use of safety equipment such as earplugs and safety guards. Union leaders allege that government enforcement of health and safety standards is poor.

SYRIA

Syria is ruled by an authoritarian regime which does not hesitate to use force when it is threatened. The President wields almost absolute authority. Key decisions regarding foreign policy, national security, and the economy are made by the President and his key advisers, and are often ratified by the Parliament. There are regular elections to the Parliament, but it wields no independent authority. All three branches of government are highly influenced by the views of the Ba'ath Party, whose primacy in the State is assured by the Constitution. Independent, nonsanctioned political opposition is forcibly repressed. However, a certain amount of regional autonomy is exercised by local administrative councils.

The ruling Ba'ath Party, which emphasizes socialism and secular Arabism, gained ascendancy in 1963. It has become dominated by the military, which consumes a large share of Syria's scarce economic resources. In recent years, the party has served principally to legitimize President Asad's rule. Although Ba'ath Party doctrine seeks to overcome sectarian and class consciousness by building a sense of national rather than ethnic identity, ethnic, religious, and regional allegiances remain important. Members of President Asad's own sect, the Alawis, hold most of the important military and security positions.

Except for a hiatus in 1973-74, Syria has been under emergency powers since 1963. The Government has justified martial law by the state of war with Israel and continuing threats posed by terrorist groups (Islamic fundamentalist, Iraqi, and Lebanese). The Muslim Brotherhood was until 1982 the greatest internal threat to the regime. This group of Sunni Muslim fundamentalists openly challenged the secular Ba'athist Alawi-dominated regime from the late 1970's until its brutal suppression in 1982. The League for Communist Action is another clandestine opposition group. Public manifestation of antiregime activity, however, remains very limited, and there were no reports of large-scale arrests in 1989.

The central Government maintains an extensive security apparatus. The several main branches of the security services operate independently of each other and outside the normal legal system; each is suspected of human rights violations. The regime justifies the activities of the security services because of the continuing state of emergency declared on the basis of the state of war with Israel.

Syria has a state socialist economy and has nationalized most major enterprises. The regime has followed economic policies designed to correct previous regional and class disparities. There is a small but vigorous private sector which is expanding, and most agricultural land is privately owned. The economy is plagued by stagnation, and real growth essentially has been flat, with 1988 gross domestic product roughly equivalent to that in 1982.

There was little change in the overall human rights situation in 1989. However, Syria did respond for the first time to a United Nations inquiry about its human rights practices, and the Syrian press reported that a visiting Amnesty International (AI) delegation met with Vice President Khaddam in June. The Government also responded positively to specific requests from the U.S. Government about the status of Syrian Jews. However, Syria remains effectively under the rule of an authoritarian regime, and there were no signs of progress towards a freer political system or a greater respect for individual human rights. Human rights abuses, including torture, denial of the freedoms of speech, press, association, and the right of citizens to change their government continued to characterize the regime's record in 1989.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

Executions for political beliefs in Syria are typically a reaction to perceived subversion or direct and violent threats to the regime. There were no reports of executions for political beliefs in 1989, but at least two deaths due to mistreatment while in custody were reported by AI in 1988.

b. Disappearance

There have been credible reports in the past that some Syrians arrested for security reasons have disappeared. There were, however, no such reports in 1989.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the penal code prohibits torture and establishes severe penalties for it, there continue to be numerous reports of torture, primarily during arrest and interrogation in political or security-related cases.

In its 1989 Report, covering the year 1988, Amnesty International (AI) noted that the torture and ill-treatment of prisoners, including minors, continued to be widely reported and appeared to be routine. It cited cases in which prisoners were reportedly beaten--resulting in some cases in serious injury--and, in one case, subjected to electric shock. The report noted that 3 of the 10 members of the Jewish community arrested since 1987 on charges of illegal travel reportedly were tortured while in detention. Security forces often will arrest family members of a fugitive and detain or torture them until the fugitive surrenders to authorities. There was at least one report in 1989 of the arraignment of officials who engaged in such practices in 1989, but no evidence of a concerted government attempt to end such practices.

No international groups are allowed access to security detention facilities. Families are usually not allowed to visit security prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

While the civil law code, modeled after French law, generally provides for due process, it is almost totally lacking in provisions covering security or political offenses. Under the state of emergency law, normal safeguards can be suspended, especially in security and political cases, and a person may be held indefinitely without charge or trial; arrested secretly, with no legal restraints; and denied the right to a judicial determination of the basis for pretrial detention. The accused has no redress for false arrest and cannot be contacted by family or friends, who most often do not know where the accused is being held. Many "disappeared" persons are believed to be alive and held by the security forces. Frequently, the detained individual is released without ever being charged. There are no reliable estimates of the number of persons detained without trial. Exile, sometimes voluntary, is occasionally used to rid the regime of troubling elements.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Syrian court system, based upon French law, is comprised of separate civil courts (rents, contracts, etc); penal or criminal courts, whose jurisdiction includes economic crimes; religious courts; military courts; security courts; and constitutional courts.

Civil and penal cases are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice. The defendant in a criminal case is detained provisionally upon the accusation of the public prosecutor, then remanded to a judge for arraignment. The judge may either free the defendant on the basis of insufficient evidence or refer the case to a criminal court. Defendants are entitled to legal representation of their choice; if they cannot afford a lawyer, one will be appointed by the court. Civil and penal courts impose no restrictions on lawyers in representing their clients, and allow the right of appeal. They also provide for a bond guarantee of a usually moderate sum. In noncontroversial criminal cases, civil courts are usually free of governmental coercion, although the Government can bring pressure to bear if it wishes to do so. The slow and cumbersome legal system can leave suspects languishing in prison for months.

Defendants in criminal cases are presumed innocent until proven guilty. Defendants are allowed to present evidence and confront their accusers. Trials are public except for cases involving juveniles and crimes which may impact negatively on moral sensitivity, such as rape. Cases are tried before a judge; there is no jury system.

There were fewer reports of arrests for "economic" crimes in 1989. Rather, a number of those arrested earlier for currency violations were released from jail, and economic liberalization measures have made it easier for private businessmen to operate without resort to illegal currency markets, although it is still technically illegal for a private Syrian to hold foreign exchange, unless generated by private exports.

Persons charged with security or political offenses fall under the jurisdiction of the State Security Court. Such persons have no say in the selection of a lawyer, who is chosen by the court. All court sessions are closed, and there are no official channels for obtaining information on the trial or sentencing, although relatives with influence in the Government ultimately may succeed in obtaining information and even effecting the release of the accused.

There is also a Higher Court, under the authority of the Prime Minister, which reviews issues related to the legality of government contracts and other government-private sector issues.

SYRIA

The Government does not release information on the number of persons detained for political or security offenses, but with detentions dating back to 1970, the number is probably significant. Between February and May 1988, unconfirmed reports indicate that up to 1,200 citizens associated with the Muslim Brotherhood or the League of Communist Action may have been arrested. There were no reports of politically motivated arrests in 1989.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Domestic intelligence organizations maintain a network of guards to protect officials and important buildings, as well as to monitor the activity of people living in those neighborhoods. Some telephone conversations are almost certainly recorded. The presence of police and security officials is pervasive, especially in Damascus.

The postal system censors the mail, including foreign publications, selectively. Although the legal system provides safeguards, including the requirement of an arrest or search warrant before police are allowed to enter private homes, regulations under the state of emergency suspend these protections in security-related cases.

Security checkpoints can be set up anywhere, and no warrant for search or arrest is required. Security forces are mostly concerned with suspected subversives, but also search for smuggled goods. There were few reports of checkpoints having been set up during 1989, except at the border with Lebanon.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Public criticism of the President is not permitted, and criticism of the Government and the Ba'ath Party is effectively discouraged. The Government or the Ba'ath Party wholly own and operate all broadcast media and publishing houses and strictly control the dissemination of all information.

Censorship of foreign and domestic news is exercised through offices in the Ministries of Information and of Culture and National Guidance. Any subject deemed sensitive to Syrian government interests will not appear in the press or in daily broadcasts. In 1989 this censorship included certain decisions of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and civil unrest in the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, and China prior to the release of such reports by the Soviet press agency TASS. However, radio and television broadcasts from neighboring countries, including Israel, are not jammed, and reports not carried in Syrian media are generally well known.

Newspapers provide no medium for political opposition. Criticism of government policies or their operations is limited to economic issues, minor administrative failings, and domestic corruption, and even this criticism is usually orchestrated from above. However, there is almost daily criticism of problems in the economy. Officials above the middle rank are rarely criticized.

Imported printed material and films are subject to censorship. Articles critical of Syria or Syria's role in Lebanon are occasionally completely deleted from foreign magazines and newspapers before distribution. Fictional and nonfictional literature is censored by the Union of Arab Writers if it is considered overly critical of Syria, offensive to one of Syria's religious groups, or too graphically discusses sex. Films are often censored for a variety of reasons, such as unfavorable interpretation of the Middle East conflict, sectarianism, or the use of actors or production companies targeted by the Arab boycott. Control is much stricter on materials in Arabic.

SYRIA

Schools at all levels are government operated. Private primary and secondary schools run by minority religious groups are required to follow the Ministry of Education curriculum and are subject to regular inspection. One hour of the school day is devoted to instruction on Syrian patriotism. Teachers are not permitted to express ideas contrary to government policy, although more freedom of expression is tolerated at the university level.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings, assemblies, or demonstrations may be held only with official permission, and usually at the instigation of the Government or the Ba'ath Party. Private societies, including religious groups, are allowed to meet if they have received governmental permission to organize. While usually granted, such permission authorizes only nonpolitical activities.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although nearly two-thirds of the Syrians are Sunni Muslim, the Constitution does not establish a state religion. As a concession to Islamic fundamentalists, who object to Ba'athi secularism, the 1973 Constitution requires that the President be Muslim. Otherwise, there is no official preference given to one religion over another, and all major Christian and Muslim holidays are officially observed by the Government. Many key positions in the Government are controlled by members of the minority Alawi sect (at least 10-12 percent of the population), which is considered heretical by many Sunni Muslims.

Ba'athi secular ideology and modernizing influences have had some impact in diminishing the primacy of religion and ethnicity, but individual Syrians continue to identify themselves by their communal associations.

With few exceptions (noted below), all religious groups, Muslim and non-Muslim, including Syria's 3,800 Jews, have the freedom to practice their different religions. However, fund-raising, construction, and the holding of all meetings except for worship are tightly restricted and sometimes banned. Religious training is permitted within the curriculum for Jews and Christians in Jewish and Armenian schools, among others. Non-Muslim groups may maintain links with Muslim and coreligionists outside Syria.

SYRIA

One exception to the official policy of religious tolerance is the treatment of Jehovah's Witnesses and Seventh-Day Adventists, who are forbidden to practice their religion or own church property.

Foreign missionaries are permitted to preach and practice. The publication of religious materials is subject to the same strict controls as secular material.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal travel is restricted only in the security zone of the Golan Heights and near the borders with Lebanon, Jordan, and Iraq. All citizens wishing to travel abroad must acquire passports and exit visas. In theory, Syrians can travel to other Arab countries, except Iraq, on their identification cards alone, although in practice this applies only to Lebanon. Syrian women over the age of 18 are free to travel without the permission of a male relative. However, a husband may file a request with the Ministry of Interior to prevent his wife's departure from Syria.

In general, the Government prohibits foreign travel for persons liable for military service and for certain categories of professionals, such as pharmacists, architects, and engineers, trained at public expense, who have not fulfilled 5 years of government service. Under exceptional circumstances, however, persons in these groups may obtain passports valid for 3 months and limited for travel to specific countries. Students traveling abroad for higher education must obtain permission from the Foreign Ministry and, like all Syrians, are subject to recall by the Government. Persons caught trying to travel illegally are subject to fines and detention.

Palestinians living in Syria must also obtain an exit visa from Syrian authorities. Young Palestinians sometimes experience difficulties obtaining the requisite travel document.

Jews, particularly those with significant holdings and financial ties in Syria, have found it somewhat easier to travel abroad since the mid-1970's. With some exceptions, the Government continues its policy of not issuing passports and exit visas to all members of a Jewish family at the same time. In theory, any Syrian can be required to post a bond of between $300 and $1,000 which would be forfeited in the event of nonreturn. In reality, only Jews are routinely required to post such bonds. While Jewish emigration in general is frowned upon, the Syrian Government has stated that it looks positively at cases of family reunification and of unmarried Jewish women unable to find suitable husbands in the small Syrian Jewish community. The number of unmarried Jewish women allowed to emigrate jumped dramatically in the middle of 1989 following U.S.-Syrian discussions on this issue. Any Syrian citizen caught trying to emigrate or travel abroad without permission, or suspected of having visited Israel illegally, may be arrested and be subject to criminal prosecution. In late 1987 and 1988, 10 Jews were arrested on travel violations and sentenced to incarceration of up to 2 years. Three of these persons reportedly were tortured. Three remain in jail. There were no new arrests in 1989.

SYRIA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Syrians do not have the ability to change their government legally and peacefully. President Asad and his senior advisers maintain effective control over foreign policy, national security decisions, and key economic and social decisions. Although popular participation in presidential elections, held every 7 years, is provided for in the Constitution, Syrians have little say in the determination of their political leadership. Presidential decrees, issued when the Parliament is not in session, have the force of law and usually involve key domestic issues such as the raising of public sector wages and the prices of critical commodities. President Asad won the presidency for the third time in 1985 when, according to official sources, 99 percent of the population voted and 99 percent of those who cast ballots voted for Asad, who ran unopposed. A certain degree of regional autonomy is permitted as long as it does not challenge the central Government's authority. Major city centers, for example, exercise local administrative control. Certain ethnic and social groups, such as the Bedouin and people living in small villages, have little contact with the central Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government denies charges of human rights violations, often ignoring them or calling them an intrusion into its internal affairs. However, the Government responded to a 1988 U.N. Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) investigation of Syrian practices, based on a complaint by AI. The UNHRC eventually dismissed the case. AI officials visited Syria in June 1989 to attend an Arab lawyers' convention during which they met privately with Vice President Khaddam. The International Committee of the Red Cross has had only limited access to prisoners. No Syrian is willing publicly to criticize the Government for human rights actions.

In its Report covering 1988, AI noted that it had continued throughout the year to express concern to the Government about reports of arbitrary arrests, detention without trial of political suspects, torture and ill-treatment of detainees, and the imposition of the death penalty, but that the Government did not respond. It noted that the Government did react to an oral statement that AI made in February 1988, drawing the attention of the UNHRC to reports of the widespread and routine use of torture by the security forces and of deaths in custody of political detainees; the Government responded by expressing "regret" at the "exaggerated statement" and the "biased position" taken by AI. AI also noted that in April 1988 it had submitted information about its concerns to the U.N. and had sent a copy of its communications to the Syrian Government with an invitation to comment, but that no response had been received.

The Government frequently criticizes other countries, including Israel, Iraq, and South Africa, on human rights grounds in the U.N. and in other international bodies.

SYRIASection 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion,
Language, or Social Status

Membership in the Ba'ath Party, or being a close relative of a prominent Ba'ath Party member, is important to prospering in Syria. Party connections can pave the way for entrance into better elementary and secondary schools, access to more lucrative employment, and greater power in the Government. Religion is also a factor. Members of the Alawi sect often enjoy job preference. Jews are prohibited from joining the military.

The official state of war with Israel continues to influence the status of Syrian Jews, although the community's situation has improved in recent years. Today, the Jewish community enjoys a relatively high standard of living, access to higher education, and entrance into the professions. Jews are subject to some foreign travel restrictions (See Section 4.d.), however, and are the only minority whose passports and identity cards note their religion. Jews, like other citizens of Syria, are subject to the close purview of the intelligence services. As with all other Syrians, contact between Syrian Jews and Israelis is prohibited. Jews do not hold government jobs except for a few low-level positions as clerks and teachers.

Syria's Palestinian community numbers approximately 250,000 registered with the United Nations Relief Works Agency and consists predominantly of refugees from the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars. Several thousand Lebanese and Palestinians also fled to Syria in 1982 following the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. Palestinians are officially considered to be temporary residents pending the resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Under Syrian law, resident Palestinians enjoy equal access to employment, social services, and education. In addition, Palestinian organizations sanctioned by the Government operate social institutions within their community. Palestinians may choose their place of residence and occupation, and the majority participate fully in the local economy. With government permission, they may own more than one building or plot of land.

The Government allows the operation of those Palestinian political groups that espouse the officially sanctioned position against Yasir Arafat's policies, although their activities are carefully circumscribed. Palestinians may not vote in Syrian elections or acquire Syrian citizenship except through marriage to a Syrian male citizen. Although they currently occupy several senior positions in the bureaucracy, Palestinians are unofficially barred from the highest echelons of the Government.

The Constitution guarantees the equal rights of women and calls for the elimination of all obstacles to women's development. Historically, Syrian women have benefited from government policies, including equal pay for work of equal value.

Syrian women are active in both the public and private sector. According to official statistics, 43 percent of all women are literate, compared to a national average of 49 percent. The Government encourages women's enrollment at all levels of education, and large numbers of women attend universities. Government laws provide up to 3 1/2 months' paid maternity leave and ensure that a woman may return to her previous job. Moreover, all establishments of over 100 employees must provide child-care facilities. The National Women's Union, founded in 1967, pursues many of the issues facing women and seeks to protect rights already won as well as to strengthen the position of women. It is currently considering a legislative proposal which would extend a mother's custody of children to the age of 15 or 16 in divorce cases (instead of the current age of 9 for boys and 11 for girls) and is actively seeking to eradicate illiteracy among adult women.

Privately, traditional concepts of male guardianship of women continue to run against official policies. Particularly among Muslims, these concepts often limit a woman's rights in matters of marriage, divorce, child custody, inheritance, and personal decisions.

Wife beating and other physical abuse of women is known to occur, but conservative social mores in Syrian society discourage public discussion of the issue, and it is therefore difficult to estimate the extent of the problem. The Government is not known to produce official statistics on domestic abuse. Under the Syrian legal system women have access through the courts to redress any grievance caused by violent acts against them, but many cases of domestic abuse are not pursued because of the social stigma that is attached to legal proceedings in such cases.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The Government uses the Syrian General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) as its framework for controlling nearly all aspects of union activity. Workers are not free to form labor unions independent of the government-prescribed structure. While unions are used to transmit instructions and information to the labor force from the Syrian leadership, there are indications that elected union leaders, as members of the Ba'ath Party, also act as a conduit through which workers' dissatisfaction is transmitted to the leadership. By law at least 51 percent of the elected members of Parliament must be workers or peasants. While strikes are not prohibited under Syrian law (except in the agricultural sector), in practice they are effectively discouraged. There were no reports of strikes in 1989.

The GFTU is affiliated with the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

The 1973 Constitution affirmed the right to form trade unions. Syrian labor unions are organized sectorally and at local, provincial, and national levels. Under Syrian labor law, any group of 50 or more workers in a particular profession or sector may form a guild committee. These local committees may join to form a provincial union. The provincial unions may join with others in the same profession to form a national syndicate or union. Officials at all levels are elected through secret ballot, and the provincial unions reportedly are financially independent of the national syndicate.

SYRIA

However, the Committee of Experts (COE) of the International Labor Organization (ILO) has observed that only one trade union can be set up for the same occupation within the same province, and that the unions in a province can only group themselves into one provincial federation of workers, and all can group themselves into the GFTU. The COE has also noted that the GFTU has the exclusive power to determine which unions may be constituted and the right to dissolve the management committee of any trade union. Also, trade unions have a legal obligation to allocate a certain percentage of their income to the higher trade union bodies, and the Government enjoys wide powers of intervention in trade union finances.

According to the Government, there are 198 national unions in Syria which are part of the GFTU structure, and 9 professional unions. The Government maintains that while it is not illegal to set up competitive unions, the unions which belong to the GFTU chose voluntarily to do so because it most effectively advances workers' interests. GFTU officials also note that Syrian unions first developed during the 1920's and the GFTU was formed in the 1930's, long before the advent of the Arab Socialist Ba'ath Party or the Asad Government, so that Syrian legislation recognizing a single trade union system merely codifies existing practice which reflects the will of Syrian workers. The GFTU is charged with providing opinions on legislation, devising rules for workers and labor, and organizing labor. The elected President of the GFTU is a senior member of the ruling Ba'ath Party and a member of the Regional Command and, along with his deputy, participates in all Cabinet sessions. The secretaries general of the nine nonaffiliated associations, some of whom are not Ba'ath Party members, are also elected officials.

The COE in its 1987 and 1988 reports concluded that the GFTU structure amounted to a legally mandated system of trade union unity. Other observations of the COE had to do with restrictions on the right of foreign workers to join or form trade unions of their own choosing; the interference of public authorities in trade union administration; and the prohibition of strikes in the agricultural sector. In its 1989 report, the COE once again raised these issues, noting that the Syrian Government had established a working group including worker and employer representatives to examine the COE's comments.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

In the public sector unions do not normally bargain collectively on wage issues, but there is some evidence that union representatives participate with the representatives of the respective employer and ministry in establishing sectoral minimum wages. The Government has cited 10 specific examples of such sectoral collective bargaining agreements. In a country whose major industries are publicly held, workers make up the majority of each board of directors and always include union representation on those boards. They also monitor and enforce compliance with the labor law. In the private sector, unions are active in monitoring compliance with the laws and ensuring workers' health and safety. The unions, under the law, can undertake negotiations for collective contracts with employers, but there is no information available on whether such contracts envision that unions can also sue and be represented in court.

SYRIA

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There is no law in Syria banning forced or compulsory labor. There are a few instances in which such punishment can be imposed as punishment, usually in connection with prison sentences for criminal offenses. Article 35 of the Constitution states that it is the right and duty of every citizen to work and it is a criminal offense for a government employee to resign his position without the permission of the relevant Minister..

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The minimum employment age in the predominant public sector is 14, though it is higher in certain industries. The minimum age varies more widely in the private sector; the absolute minimum age is 12, while parental permission is required for children under age 16 to work. Children are forbidden to work at night. The Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor is responsible for enforcing minimum age requirements, but the number of labor investigators is small, and violation of the law may be extensive.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

The Government provides minimum and maximum wage limits in the public sector. Salaries are set on a monthly scale. In 1989 the President issued a decree raising public sector salaries by 25 percent while at the same time allowing the price of gasoline and some other commodities to increase by 50 percent. Two months later, following discussions among labor unions and employers, the Minister of Social Affairs and Labor announced that salaries in the private sector would also be raised by 25 percent. The lowest salary scale for an entry position, with no experience or credentials and involving no physical labor, is approximately $118 per month at the official rate of exchange. The highest public sector starting salary is approximately $235 per month for someone with a Ph.D. degree. Neither of these rates alone is sufficient to provide a decent standard of living. As a result, many workers take additional jobs or rely on extended families for support.

There is no fixed minimum wage in the private sector for permanent employees. However, the monthly minimum would not be less, in practice, than that in the public sector. According to the 1959 labor law, minimum wage levels in the private sector are set by sector and are fixed by the Minister of Social Affairs and Labor. Recommendations are put to him by a committee, formed by a representative of the Ministry of Industry or Economy and Commerce plus a representative of the employers' and of the employees' union.

Syrian labor law extensively regulates conditions of work. This includes rules and regulations which severely limit the ability of an employer to fire an employee without due cause, an issue which the employee may take to a labor committee, composed of a representative of the municipality, a judge, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor, the union, and the employer. In the majority of cases, such labor committees have decided in favor of the employee. Workers, once hired, cannot easily be fired. One exception in the heavily regulated labor field relates to day laborers. They are not subject to minimum wage regulations and receive compensation only for job-related injuries. They are commonly employed in small private firms and businesses in order to avoid the costs of permanent employees who are well protected, even against firing.

The workweek consists of six 6-hour days, although in certain fields in which workers are not continuously busy, a 9-hour day is permitted. Labor laws also mandate a full 24-hour rest day per week. Employees are guaranteed 15 days of paid leave per year during the first 5 years, rising to 30 days per year for persons over age 50 or with 20 years employment. Employers are required to provide limited medical care, and establishments with more than 100 employees must hire a nurse and offer access to a physician when necessary.

Public laws mandate safety standards in all sectors, although actual enforcement depends on managers and may therefore vary. The Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor has a small Office of Health and Safety which seeks to inspect and correct unhealthy and unsafe conditions in the workplace. In addition, a worker may also file suit against his employer, charging that the unhealthy conditions are threatening his job. The Government provides disability insurance for job-related injuries. Guest workers theoretically receive the same benefits, but are often reluctant to press claims because workers' permits may be withdrawn at any time. Moreover, many work illegally and are not covered by the government system.

There is no information currently available regarding Syrian labor practices inside Syrian free-trade zones.

TUNISIA

Tunisia is a republic in which the President and his party dominate decisionmaking at all levels. The President appoints the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and all 23 governors. The elected Chamber of Deputies has limited power. President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali was unopposed in April 1989 elections which, at the request of the opposition, he had advanced from 1991. His ruling Constitutional Democratic Party (RCD) won all seats in the Chamber of Deputies after a leading opposition party rejected a government-proposed common voting list which would have given the opposition some seats. The results were influenced by a winner-take-all voting system, the inability of many voters to register, and heavy-handed RCD tactics. Moreover, although Islamist candidates running as independents averaged 18 percent of the vote wherever they ran, the Islamist party An Nahda continued to be denied legal status. Following the elections, President Ben Ali appointed some leading opposition figures to his Cabinet.

Tunisia's internal security is maintained by civilian services, backed by armed forces in times of crisis. Since President Ben Ali assumed power in 1987, these services have generally avoided repressive measures, but reports of police harassment and arrests of some opposition activists following the April elections suggested a trend toward tighter control, especially of the activities of unrecognized parties.

The Government continued to implement structural adjustment of the economy. In addition to easing requirements for investment and liberalizing trade, the Government reduced the subsidy on staple foods, including bread, by raising prices an average of 17 percent. Exports increased despite a decline in petroleum production, and imports of capital goods and raw materials also rose. However, the agricultural sector continued to suffer the effects of drought: the Government estimated that 50,000 agricultural jobs had been lost because of the drought, exacerbating already serious unemployment.

There were both human rights advances and setbacks in 1989. The Government legalized several new associations, including the independent Democratic Womens' Association, and lifted restrictions which had prevented the free functioning of trade unions. By pardoning all prisoners who had participated in the plot by Islamist radicals to overthrow ex-president Bourguiba, President Ben Ali emptied the prisons of virtually all political prisoners. The President also initiated a general amnesty which theoretically should restore civil and political rights to about 5,500 ex-prisoners. Among areas of continuing concern were freedom of speech and press, freedom of assembly and association, and the right of citizens to change their government. Some Islamists claimed to have lost their jobs or to have suffered other forms of harassment.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no reports of such killings in 1989.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance in 1989.

TUNISIA

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Despite Tunisia's ratification of the U.N. Convention on Torture in 1988, there were isolated reports of torture in 1989. On June 6, five Islamists were arrested in Tunis, and three were tortured. Interior Ministry officials told the Tunisian Human Rights League that the torture had been committed by irresponsible subordinates. No disciplinary action is known to have been taken against those responsible. According to Amnesty International (AI), one detainee from the 1987 coup plot, who was released in May, is unable to walk as the result of injuries suffered during his detention of 16 months. Through the summer and fall of 1989, the Human Rights League continued to receive reports of other maltreatment from around the country, apparently aimed for the most part at those who demonstrated support for opposition parties in the April elections. The League reported that 2 of the 6 members of the illegal Communist Workers Party (POCT) arrested for dissemination of political tracts were severely beaten and suffered sleep deprivation during their detention. There were also reports of the abuse of nonpolitical prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were no reported cases of arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile, and President Ben Ali released 72 prisoners detained without trial as conspirators in the 1987 coup plot.

Under Tunisian law, arrests can be made without a warrant. Under a law adopted in 1987, prearrestment detention is limited to between 4 and 10 days. The accused is told the grounds for the arrest and is then questioned. A detainee may request an examination by a medical doctor but may otherwise be held incommunicado. During prearrestment detention, detainees do not have the right to a lawyer, but they have the right to a lawyer at their arraignment, and the Government provides legal assistance to indigent detainees. Pretrial detention is limited to 6 months, renewable by an arraignment judge for up to two additional 6-month periods in the case of felony indictments.

Exile was not used as a means of political control in 1989.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Tunisia's court system is highly centralized under the Justice Ministry. Trials are open to the public, and both domestic and foreign observers are able to attend. No secret trials were known to have been held in 1989. Having abolished both the position of General Prosecutor of the Republic and the State Security Court in 1987, President Ben Ali has also advocated a more independent judiciary. However, the executive branch's discretion in naming, assigning, and granting tenure to judges makes them susceptible to pressure. Human rights activists advocate a reduction in executive branch control in order to establish more judicial independence.

In September the passport of Bechir Essid, Secretary General of the unrecognized pro-Libyan Arab Nationalist Party, was confiscated, and he was subsequently arrested for defamation of the President. Essid's trial was postponed in late September when Essid began a hunger strike.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of the person as well as the inviolability of the home and privacy in correspondence, "except in exceptional cases defined by law." Police must have a search warrant, but this requirement is often ignored in cases concerning state security.

In 1989 the Government again stepped up surveillance of opposition groups. This policy seemed directed especially at those identified as Islamist (those who believe that Islam should be the point of reference for the political, economic, and social structures of their country). The Human Rights League reported that the home of a member of the Islamist movement's An Nahda Party, who also serves in the League, was broken into and his papers confiscated. An Nahda members claimed that Interior Ministry personnel kept their homes under surveillance. Prisoners who were detained but never tried for participation in the 1987 coup plot asserted that their houses remained under surveillance and that their families and friends continued to be harassed. Some opposition party members claimed that their telephones were tapped. There were also numerous reports of mail being opened, including the mail of human rights activists. Islamist attorneys claimed that their clients were being stopped and interviewed by plainclothesmen at the entrances to their offices, and that local ruling party officials interfered with their businesses, causing them financial hardship. Visitors to the homes of Islamists reported that police recorded their license plate numbers.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Tunisians discuss politics in private with relative freedom, both among themselves and with foreigners. However, in August Jalloul Azzouna, a professor who attempted to establish a rival leadership to the legal Popular Unity Party (PUP), was sentenced to a year in prison for defaming the Head of State and publishing communiques without authorization. He was released under a presidential pardon in November. His lawyer, Radhia Nasraoui of the illegal Communist Workers Party (POCT), was herself charged with defamation based on her defense statements during Azzouna's trial. She was released on bail, pending trial.

The press continues to operate under the relatively severe press code adopted in 1988, which requires the printer to deposit copies with the Information, Interior, and Justice Ministries of all newspapers and other publications prepared in Tunisia. Political tracts must also be submitted for approval, and the Tunisian press reported in October that an Interior Ministry circular orders the arrest of those who possess or circulate illegal tracts. Since 1988 suspensions of publications have normally required the approval of a judge, and they may apply only to a single issue of a newspaper or magazine. The Interior Ministry can order the seizure of all copies of a single issue of a journal from the newsstands if the Ministry considers that the issue will be "of a kind to disturb public order." The ruling on a publication must be made within 3 days from the time it is submitted. Apart from official censorship, this system leads to a great deal of self-censorship on the part of publications.

The Tunisian press offers a wide range of publications in Arabic and French. Foreign newspapers are available. However, citing a lack of funds, all four of Tunisia's legal opposition party newspapers ceased publication after the April elections. These included those of the Communist Party (PCT), the Movement of Social Democrats (MDS), the Socialist Progressive Rally (RSP) and the Popular Unity Party (PUP). The MDS and PUP subsequently announced that they would resume publication of their newspapers, and the MDS paper El Mostaqbal has reappeared. After a brief reappearance, the independent paper Le Phare also ceased publication because of financial problems. However, Tunisia's labor federation, the General Union of Tunisian Workers (UGTT), resumed publication of its newspaper Ash Sha'ab.

The Government seized no newspapers or magazines in 1989. Distribution of the September 29 issue of the independent weekly Le Maghreb was slightly delayed, ostensibly because of problems with the printing press used by Le Maghreb. The press is owned by the ruling party. The issue appeared with a section of an article on a government meeting with An Nahda blanked out. Journalists stated that the blanked-out section listed the names of those people who had attended the meeting and that the names were deleted owing to government intervention.

Islamist and leftist materials such as books, pamphlets, and tapes are available at bookstores throughout Tunisia. Although the Mufti (official religious leader) of Tunisia condemned Salman Rushdie's novel "Satanic Verses", several independent periodicals criticized the death sentence pronounced on Rushdie by the Government of Iran.

The State controls Tunisian television, and its coverage of the Government is highly favorable. In October several opposition party leaders were able to make unprecedented appearances on television. The Italian state channel RAI Uno has been available in Tunisia for many years; in 1989 the Tunisian Government agreed to allow relayed broadcasting of the French state Channel 2.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly, but associations and political parties must apply to the Interior Ministry for legal authorization to function. Any group wishing to hold a public meeting must also make a request to the Government 3 days in advance.

The law on parties stipulates that every political party must reject violence in all forms, including fanaticism, racism, and other discrimination. No party can claim to represent a religion, race, sex, or region. No party can receive funds from a foreign party or material aid directly or indirectly from foreign countries or foreigners. All adherents to a party must have been Tunisian citizens for at least 5 years.

Having registered three new parties in 1988, the Government registered no new parties in 1989. As of the end of the year, there were seven legal parties (including the Tunisian Communist Party--PCT). Approximately 15 other parties aspired to recognition.

TUNISIA

The illegal Islamist party An Nahda, whose candidates averaged 18 percent of the vote when running as independents in the April elections, was refused legal status in June on the ostensible grounds that its leaders had criminal records. The Government did subsequently invite An Nahda to start up its own newspaper.

There is widespread belief that An Nahda receives funding from abroad, in contravention of the law on parties. Moreover, An Nahda's political agenda came sharply into question in October, when party Secretary General Abdelfattah Mourou called for the dismissal of Minister of Higher Education Mohamed Charfi on the grounds that Charfi's educational reform program is "anti-Islamic and anti-Arab." During the fall several Tunisian newspapers which had printed articles critical of Islamists reportedly received threats of physical retaliation.

Tunisia's numerous unrecognized parties and associations are in the position of breaking the law each time they meet. During the summer there was a trend toward tighter control over these groups. Khelifa Abid, Secretary General of the new Labor and Justice Party, was called before the police twice, and the entire political bureau of the Popular Unity Movement (MUP) was called in for questioning by the Interior Ministry during the summer. Several members of unrecognized opposition parties were also reported to have been roughed up, put under surveillance, threatened, and in some cases arrested by government personnel. In June newspapers reported that 40 members of An Nahda and 40 members of the more radical Islamist Liberation Party (ILP) were arrested and fined for illegal distribution of pamphlets.

Other arrests and sentencing followed. Six members of the illegal POCT were arrested in Gafsa and Gabes on charges of illegal distribution of pamphlets critical of government economic policies. Four were sentenced but subsequently pardoned. Islamists claimed that several of their number were arrested in Sfax in September. While well over 100 persons appear to have been arrested and questioned during the summer, it was not known how many were in prison at year's end.

The law governing associations is separate from the law governing parties. The Interior Ministry claimed that over 6,000 nongovernmental associations were operating legally in Tunisia. Under the law, recognized associations must also obtain permission to hold meetings. During 1989 a number of think tanks and community organizations were founded. The Association of Democratic Women, an organization previously denied legal status, was also approved.

During 1989 the main student organizations were routinely granted permission to hold large rallies and elections on campuses. Student organizers spoke freely on campuses and freely posted their views. However, security forces were conspicuously present on Tunisian campuses, including at some high schools, and there were press reports of arrests of members of the Islamist-leaning General Tunisian Student Union (UGTE) during the summer. The UGTE played a major role in instigating nationwide student strikes during the fall.

TUNISIA

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution establishes Islam as the state religion, but allows the free practice of other religions. Proselytizing for religions other than Islam is prohibited, although no specific sanctions are prescribed. The Constitution calls on all political parties to respect and defend Tunisia's Arab-Muslim identity, and the president and his parents and grandparents must be Muslim. The current Government has given Islam more prominence in public life than its predecessor did.

The Government controls the mosques. The State pays for the salaries of imams (prayer leaders). According to the 1988 Law of the Mosques, only government-appointed personnel can lead activities in the mosque, except with permission from the Prime Minister's office. The Government sponsors television talk shows in support of government religious policy. Islamists claimed that about 20 government-appointed imams were removed from office in 1989 on suspicion of promoting Islamist goals.

An order from the Prime Minister's office which forbids women to wear the "hijeb" style veil (associated with the Islamist movement) was seldom enforced during 1988 and most of 1989. In September the Higher Education Ministry issued instructions that the order should be more rigorously enforced in high schools. Enforcement of the order was among the stated causes of at least one strike by high school students in 1989. The order was later rescinded, and students are now free to wear the hijeb.

Jews comprise the largest religious minority among Tunisians, with an aging population of about 2,000. The Government assures freedom of worship for the Jewish community and provides for the community's safety. However, emigration continues even among this small group (there were over 100,000 Jews in Tunisia at independence in 1956). Despite official protection for the community, instances of civilian aggression against Jews and synagogues led to an uneasy atmosphere in 1989.

Tunisia's very small Christian community, made up largely of expatriates, freely attends church services. Under an agreement between the Vatican and the Government, several Roman Catholic religious orders remain active. The official ban on Baha'i religious meetings, imposed in 1984, is still in effect.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement in Tunisia, but all citizens must carry identity cards. Roadblocks manned by armed members of security forces (as well as by customs officials, especially near the borders with Libya and Algeria) are common in both city and country. Some Tunisians complained of being stopped arbitrarily and harassed. These roadblocks were set up ostensibly in response to the large foreign presence in Tunisia, including the headquarters of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Arab League. Islamists reported monitoring of their movements inside the country.

The withholding of passports continued to be a source of concern. The Human Rights League reported that it had filed over 100 cases involving suspended passports with the Interior

TUNISIA

Ministry and said it was continuing to receive new cases. The League noted that the Ministry was promptly and carefully reviewing the cases filed by the League. Those who continued to have trouble regaining passports included members of the 1987 coup plot, as well as others with affiliations to unrecognized political parties. The Government did renew the passport of Islamist leader Rachid Ghannouchi, who was on an extended publicity tour abroad during 1989.

There is no arbitrary restriction on emigration or repatriation. The Government estimated that 406,000 Tunisians were working overseas in 1988.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Given various continuing restrictions on political activity and distortions in the 1989 election process, the right of citizens to change their government through democratic means remains in doubt. The largest opposition party remains illegal. The Constitution provides for a parliamentary democracy with separation of executive, legislative, and judicial powers. However, the legislature has limited authority. The President appoints the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and the 23 governors. The executive is dominated at the national, regional, and local levels by the President and his party. Government and RCD mechanisms are still virtually inseparable. For instance, government and RCD offices are often in the same place.

In the eyes of many observers, the parliamentary elections in April were flawed. The Human Rights League expressed concern at the absence of almost a third of the voting-age population from electoral lists. It deplored obstacles to voter registration which it said were intended to make impossible the participation of some slates of candidates, as well as reports of abuses at the voting booths. Voters chose colored ballots from a table manned by local ruling party members. While voters could theoretically have selected all ballots and then entered the booth to vote secretly, the arrangement was thought to exert pressure on the voter to take only the red ballot of the ruling RCD. The League called for a revision of the electoral code to guarantee effective pluralist representation. In his speech on November 7 to mark the second anniversary of his accession to the presidency, Ben Ali rejected the possibility of implementing proportional representation.

Election debates were relatively unrestricted, and opposition parties were able to hold meetings, put up posters, and monitor the polls. Some opposition candidates spoke on the radio. Although the Islamist party An Nahda was denied official recognition, Islamist candidates were fielded nationwide on independent tickets, and other newly legalized opposition parties participated in the elections.

The postelection period was marred by the arrest and harassment of some opposition figures. The Government continued to deny official status to the Islamist party An Nahda despite the strong showing made in the April elections by the members of the party running on independent tickets (see also Section 2.b.).

TUNISIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Tunisia is home to several active human rights organizations, all of which are recognized by the Government. The Tunisian League of Human Rights is one of the oldest human rights organizations in the Arab world. Two prominent former members of the League serve in the current Government as Minister of Health and Minister of Higher Education.

On March 23, at President Ben Ali's instruction, the Government permitted the establishment of a new Arab Institute of Human Rights. The Institute is a collaborative effort of the Human Rights League, the Arab Organization for Human Rights, and the Union of Arab Lawyers. A Maghreb Human Rights League has also been formed in Tunis.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The 1956 Personal Status Code (PSC) establishes in most circumstances equal rights for men and women. Women have equal rights in divorce and child custody. Polygamy is forbidden. The Government encourages family planning. Women have equal access to education, are free to participate in commercial and social activities, and have full legal competency from the age of 20.

However, in practice women continue to occupy a subordinate role in society. Under the PSC, daughters receive a smaller portion of an inheritance than sons. The husband is the head of the household, and the wife owes him obedience. Parental power and authority are in the hands of the father. Moreover, custody cases involving marriages between foreign women and Tunisian men are decided in favor of the father regardless of legal decisions made in other countries.

While arranged marriages and marriages between cousins are still common, the trend seems to be toward greater opportunities for women in other areas. According to the 1984 census, 58 percent of females over the age of 10 were illiterate compared to 34.6 percent of males. However, 90 percent of girls have reportedly been enrolled in primary school since 1987 and secondary and university enrollment is currently over 40 percent female. The number of employed women is increasing at a moderate pace, and in 1989 women made up an estimated 20 percent of the work force. Women are most fully represented in medicine, journalism, and teaching.

Psychologists and doctors who have treated victims of domestic violence note that both men and women are victims. They surmise that violence in rural areas stems from difficult living conditions and is not aimed in particular against women. It is difficult to estimate the extent of violence against women since battery of women is not a public issue in Tunisia, and there do not appear to be support groups or other avenues of recourse.

Members of the small Jewish community suffer some forms of discrimination. Generally, Jews do not hold public office or serve in the Interior Ministry or security services. Some Jews who receive foreigners in their homes report having been questioned by police about the visits.

TUNISIA

There were widespread allegations of discrimination based in part on religious sympathies when a number of people the Government identified as Islamist sympathizers were removed from their civil service jobs or transferred to undesirable posts. For example, individuals were removed from positions with Customs, the Interior Ministry, the security services, and the armed forces. Some Islamist schoolteachers were also removed from their schools or posted to remote areas. Twice during August, first at the Prime Minister's office and later at the presidential palace, about 100 Islamists gathered to ask reinstatement in the civil service. Twenty-three who had lost their jobs entered the Human Rights League office on September 8 to announce a hunger strike. They said they represented a total of 350 unemployed Islamists; other observers estimated that there may be several thousand people in this category. The hunger strike was called off when the League agreed to mediate with the Government on the strikers' behalf. The Government had not answered the League's inquiries by the end of the year.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Tunisia's Constitution stipulates the right to organize a union and to strike. The roughly 20 percent of Tunisia's work force that is unionized includes most public sector workers and those in large private establishments.

In 1989 the General Union of Tunisian Workers (UGTT), whose activities were curtailed in recent years, was able to hold elections at the shop and regional level which culminated in an extraordinary congress in April 1989. The Congress brought a new, more independent leadership to power and was followed by the election of new leaders for the 50-odd confederations making up the UGTT. In September the Government returned to the UGTT assets that had been confiscated in the mid-1980's, making the UGTT less dependent on the Government. The UGTT is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

Although the UGTT was able to renew its basic structures, trade unionists in Tunisia have yet to regain other elements of their right to association. For example, regulations dating from a confrontation with the Government in 1985 that prohibit labor meetings at the workplace are still enforced. Another regulation limits the right to strike by requiring all affected member UGTT unions--not just the members in the enterprise to be struck--to approve a strike in advance. Partly as a consequence, there have been no sector-wide strikes since the mid-1980's. Many short, wildcat strikes occur, however, without government interference. The 1989 report of the ILO Committee of Experts (COE) cited this strike authorization procedure, as well as broad government authority to impose compulsory arbitration and to requisition workers during a strike, as incompatible with the right to strike protected by ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association.

The same COE report acknowledged steps taken by the Government to conform with Convention 87, including: the reinstatement of public sector workers dismissed for union activity; an amnesty for persons sentenced for offenses committed while members of a union; permitting the convening of congresses on the premises of public enterprises in connection with the 1989 extraordinary congress of the UGTT; authorizing public enterprises to deduct union dues for members of the union; and resumption of the dialog between the Government and the workers.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The Tunisian labor code prohibits the firing of workers for union activity. Workers who feel they have been fired or otherwise discriminated against for legitimate unionism can appeal to the Social Affairs Ministry. At present the Ministry is adjudicating at least 158 cases concerning workers fired for prounion activity. Most of these cases date from the confrontation between the Government and UGTT in 1985.

Tunisian workers exercise the right to bargain collectively. Most trade unions prefer to negotiate wages at the sectoral rather than shop level. Many unionists argue, however, that the absence of the automatic "check-off" (requiring all workers to pay union dues whether they are union members or not, a system which was canceled by the Government in 1983) has deprived the UGTT of a vital source of financing to help it negotiate forcefully.

Labor law and practice are uniform throughout the country. There are no free trade zones as such.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Compulsory labor is prohibited by law and is not practiced. Nevertheless, the COE report cited in Section 6.a. called on the Government to fulfill its longstanding commitment to bring laws requiring work "rehabilitation" and compulsory work on economic and social development projects into conformity with Convention 29 on Forced Labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

For manufacturing, the minimum age for employment is 15 years; for agriculture it is 13 years. Inspectors from the Social Affairs Ministry check the records of employees to verify that the employer complies with the minimum age law. Despite this law, young children often perform agricultural work in rural areas and sell food and other items in urban areas. Small enterprises in the informal sector reportedly violate the minimum age law frequently.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

Tunisia has a labor code dating from independence in 1956 that sets standards, including a 48-hour workweek and a minimum wage, for some 60 percent of the labor force working in the civil service, public sector companies, and professions such as teaching. The labor code also serves as an indirect model for the larger private sector companies. Regional labor inspectors are responsible for enforcing standards. Most firms are inspected about once a year. However, in general the Government does not enforce the minimum wage law, particularly in the nonunionized sectors of the economy. Moreover, a considerable amount of labor takes place in the informal economy. Such labor includes both part-time work in occupations covered by the labor code and activities, such as residential construction, falling outside the code's purview. Work standards in the informal sector are often below government norms.

TUNISIA

Employees covered by the minimum wage law are entitled to receive other benefits, including social security, disability and health insurance, transportation and family allowances, and paid leave. Some covered employees, however, are deprived of these benefits. The labor code requires employers to pay overtime, a night work differential, and holiday pay. In the major urban areas, a minimum wage employee with a family of four nets between $170 to $210 per month when allowances are included. In agriculture the base wage is about $3.85 per day, although this directly applies only to 37 percent of the agricultural work force and does not cover migrant agricultural workers. Supplemented by the benefits listed above, the minimum wage is adequate to provide a decent living for workers and their families. Over the past several years, however, inflation has outstripped increases in the minimum wage, thereby eroding the standard of living.

The Social Affairs Ministry has an office with responsibility for improving health and safety standards in the workplace. In many hazardous jobs--e.g., mining, petroleum engineering, and construction--the Government has established new regulations. These regulations are enforced more strictly in Tunis than in the rest of the country, where much work, especially in construction, is done in the informal sector. It is estimated that there were about 200 work-related deaths in 1989.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is a federation of seven emirates established in 1971. Each emirate retains extensive control over such important matters as economic policy (including oil), internal security, and some aspects of defense. There are no popular elections, either local or federal. Emirate rulers govern by virtue of longstanding tribal tradition. In accordance with the 1971 Constitution, the seven emirate rulers comprise a Federal Supreme Council which is the UAE's highest legislative and executive body, but which seldom meets. In practice, the legislative and executive work is delegated to the various emirates and the more active federal ministries. The Supreme Council selects a President and Vice President from its membership; each serves a 5-year term. The President in turn appoints a prime minister and a cabinet.

Some of the individual emirates maintain independent internal security organizations which are active in antinarcotics and antiterrorist activity. These organizations are under government control.

The economy is based on oil and gas production, which has made the UAE's per capita income one of the world's highest. It has a largely free market economy, but the oil enterprises of Abu Dhabi and Dubai, which account for most of the UAE's revenue, are state-owned enterprises of these two emirates. A small citizen population controls the country's economic life but depends heavily on a much larger contingent of foreigners to provide manual labor and technical skills. The UAE's four emirates with small or no petroleum resources are dependent on federal government subsidies for such essential services as health, electricity, and water.

There were no major changes in the UAE human rights picture in 1989. Principal human rights concerns continued to be abuse of prisoners and restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly and association, the right of citizens to change their government, and women's and worker rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

No political killings or other extrajudicial killings were reported.

b. Disappearance

No political disappearances were reported.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture or degrading treatment of any person, and the physical or moral abuse of an accused person. No instances of torture were reported in 1989. However, Amnesty International (AI), in its 1989 Report covering 1988, noted that several criminal suspects were reported to have been tortured, including being caned. It also reported that it had received new information about the alleged torture of criminal prisoners in previous years, including a Pakistani national beaten by police in Abu Dhabi in 1986.

In 1989 there was one instance of amputation of a hand as punishment for theft in conformance with clerical (Shari'a) law, which is still an integral part of the judicial system. There were also several criminal cases in which flogging was the prescribed punishment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arrest, search, detention, or imprisonment except in accordance with the law, and the laws of each emirate prohibit arrest or search without probable cause. By law, the police must report any arrest to a judge within 48 hours for his determination whether to charge, release, or, with sufficient police justification, allow limited further detention pending an investigation. Prolonged detention without charge is rare, although there have been instances where foreign businessmen have been detained pending settlement of a business dispute with UAE nationals. Once charged, suspects come to trial reasonably quickly. The reabsorption of the Ministry of Justice by the Ministry of Islamic Affairs in March 1989 reportedly has made the judicial system slower and less organized. There is no system of bail. In 1989 there were no reported instances of preventive detention. Consular access to imprisoned foreign nationals is permitted, although it is sometimes delayed. There were no known instances of incommunicado detention.

The Constitution prohibits the exile of citizens. Noncitizens convicted of crimes are subject to deportation.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The UAE has a dual system of clerical (Shari'a) and lay courts, each of which deals with both criminal and civil cases. The clerical courts are administered by each emirate, but the lay courts are usually part of the federal system and are answerable to the Federal Supreme Court in Abu Dhabi. However, Dubai's and two other smaller emirates' civil court systems are independent of the federal system. Each court system has a multilevel appeals process. Either the plaintiff or the nature of the case determines which court system hears a particular case. Due process rights are uniformly exercised under both clerical and civil court procedure. There is a presumption of innocence until guilt is proven.

Legal counsel is readily available and permitted to represent a defendant in both court systems. The court may appoint legal counsel if counsel agrees to provide services free; no system of state payment of public defenders exists. However, the losing party may be required to pay the winner's legal fees. The judge looks after the interests of a person not represented by counsel.

There are no jury trials. All cases, except national security cases and those deemed by the judge likely to upset public morality, are open to the public. Most judges are foreign nationals, primarily from other Arab countries. There has been no evidence in at least the past several years of rulers interfering in the judicial process. In 1989 the UAE President did, however, decide by decree that the Ministry of Islamic Affairs should reabsorb the Ministry of Justice. Commercial law is still in a rudimentary stage of development in the UAE, and this results in some confusion and accusations of bias. The criminal court system, however, is generally regarded as fair and its judgments well considered. There is no separate national security court system. The military has its own court system based on Western military judicial practice. Military tribunals try only military personnel. There are no known political prisoners in the UAE.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits entry into homes without the owner's permission, except in accordance with the law. Although the police can enter homes without a warrant and without demonstrating probable cause in advance, an officer is answerable if he abuses his authority in doing so. Anyone other than a police officer must have a court order to enter a private home. Local custom and practice place a high value on privacy, and violations of it are rare. There is no surveillance of private correspondence. Except for rare instances involving national security, no cases of arbitrary interference with privacy have been reported in recent years.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

UAE citizens are constitutionally assured freedom of speech. In practice, however, most inhabitants, especially foreign nationals, are circumspect in public discussions of sensitive political topics or in criticizing the Government. All television and radio stations are government owned and conform to reporting guidelines. Although many of the local English- and Arabic-language newspapers are privately owned, all but one receive government subsidies. The press operates under the same self-censorship arrangement as broadcast media.

Self-censorship by journalists make official censorship rare. Local newspapers are normally cautious in reporting on government policy, the ruling families, national security, religious matters, and relations with neighboring states. Several years ago, a newspaper was closed temporarily for reporting to which the Government took exception.

The censorship department of the Ministry of Information and Culture reviews all imported newspapers, periodicals, books, films, and videos, and bans items considered pornographic, violent, derogatory to Islam, favorable to Israel, unduly critical of friendly countries, or critical of the Government or the ruling families. Authorities confiscate material written in the Hebrew language and prohibit sale of Iranian newspapers and magazines. The small publishing industry is subject to government censorship in accordance with the above criteria. The unwritten but widely accepted ban on criticism of the Government also restricts academic freedom.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Organized public gatherings require a government permit. In practice, public gatherings are rare. Political organizations are prohibited. The citizen population normally confines its political discussion and debate to the numerous "assemblies" (majlises), held in private homes, which are a local tradition. There are no restrictions on the formation of private associations.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official religion. Non-Muslims are free to practice their religion, but may not publicly proselytize or distribute religious literature. By tradition and social custom, non-Muslims may worship in their own way, and several churches exist in major cities. A group of Christian churches in the capital, Abu Dhabi, were built on land which was a gift from President Zayed. Foreign clergymen are allowed to minister to expatriate congregations. No religions other than Islam may conduct religious training. All religions engage in private charitable activities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement or relocation within the country except for security areas such as defense and oil installations. Unrestricted foreign travel and emigration are permitted to citizens, except those involved in financial disputes under adjudication. Exit visas are not required. All citizens have the right of return. There are no known instances of revocation of citizenship for political reasons.

The UAE and its members individually have long accepted groups of displaced persons, such as Palestinians and Lebanese, and those attracted by economic opportunity, such as Iranians. Although lacking a formalized procedure for accepting refugees, the UAE has occasionally granted Iranians refugee status if they demonstrate that they would face persecution in Iran. Iranians, if intercepted attempting to enter the country illegally, generally are denied entry.

There were no instances of forced resettlement in the UAE in 1989.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The UAE has no formal democratic institutions, and citizens do not have the right to change their government. The bulk of executive and legislative power is in the hands of the seven emirate rulers, their families, and those individuals and families to whom they are allied by historical ties, marriage, or common interest. These emirate political leaders constitute the dominant political force at the national level, especially through their use of power in the Supreme Council of emirate rulers. Political parties are prohibited.

Although the rulers and ruling families by tradition are presumed to have the right to rule, their incumbency ultimately depends on the quality of their leadership and responsiveness to their subjects' needs. Some emirate rulers are accessible, in varying degree, to citizens who have a problem or request. The choice of a new ruler falls to the ruling family, which is supposed to choose its most capable and respected eligible member. In practice, to avoid violent succession disputes, which were common in the past, primogeniture has become the rule.

The political dominance of the ruling families is intertwined with their substantial involvement and influence in economic life. The ruling families and their close allies control and profit from petroleum production and, with important merchant families, have a major stake in the UAE's commercial life. A complex system of distribution of wealth, including through the federal and emirate governments, ensures generous subsidies and a high standard of living for UAE citizens. This in turn has helped to earn a high level of acceptability for the Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The UAE has been responsive in some cases to international criticism of its human rights situation. For example, it improved its labor laws following criticism that low-paid foreign workers were being mistreated.

In its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI noted that it had expressed concern to the UAE authorities about reports of detention without trial and possible torture or ill-treatment of detainees, of threats of forcible repatriation of Iranian nationals, and of executions, but that no responses were received from the Government.

The UAE does not permit any internal groups which would monitor human rights, and no outside human rights group visited the UAE in 1989.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Most UAE women still play a traditional family-centered role in UAE society. Traditional attitudes about women's roles and the frequency of early marriage still limit women's educational and employment opportunities. However, women's education is advancing rapidly (females routinely outscore males in many subjects at all levels), and females now outnumber males at the UAE National University. The new medical school has more women than men. Opportunities for women are growing in government service and the media, in addition to the more traditional fields of education and health.

There are no restrictions on the right of UAE women to own property or to engage in marriage contracts as equal partners. A woman's property is not commingled with that of her husband.

Although violence against women, such as wife beating and the abuse of domestic servants, is known to occur in the UAE, little is known about its extent. The Koran is considered to allow a husband to discipline his wife, a principle which some might interpret to permit discipline with force. Abuse occurring within the family is seldom mentioned because of the value attached to personal privacy in this traditional society. The Government does not acknowledge the existence of a problem. Excessive violence against women would be grounds for divorce and criminal charges, but suits brought on these charges in the UAE are believed to be rare.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Legislation which would limit the marriage of UAE citizens to foreigners is under consideration, and, even at present, only marriage to a UAE male confers citizenship on the spouse. Although many foreigners have lived in the UAE for years and have held highly responsible positions, few have been granted citizenship. The President can grant UAE citizenship for loyal and valuable service to the State.

There is no noticeable discrimination because of race or language. UAE citizens are almost all Arabs and speakers of Arabic.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

The right of workers to organize unions and to strike is neither explicitly legal or illegal under UAE law. There are no unions and no strikes. Foreign workers who might attempt to organize a union risk deportation.

The UAE has been a member of the International Labor Organization since 1972, but it has ratified neither its Convention 87 regarding Freedom of Association nor Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

There is no legal provision for the right of workers to engage in collective bargaining. For the resolution of work-related disputes, workers must rely on conciliation committees, organized by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, and to special labor courts.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

Forced or compulsory labor is illegal and not practiced.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

Labor regulations prohibit employment of youths below age 18. Since the children of UAE nationals have little incentive to work and only adult foreign workers are allowed in the country, there is virtually no child labor. There is compulsory education of children to age 12.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is no legislated minimum wage in the UAE. Work hours are restricted to 8 hours per day, 6 days per week, but this is not strictly enforced. The UAE sets health and safety standards, which are enforced by the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, municipalities, and the Civil Defense. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, which oversees such matters as worker compensation, is understaffed and underbudgeted. The Ministry of Health, on the other hand, is active and effective, and has developed a good health care system.

Foreign nationals from Pakistan, India, the Philippines, Bangladesh, and Sri Lanka continue to seek work in the UAE in large numbers because wages are far higher than in their own countries or because work is unavailable there. Foreign workers' salaries often are inadequate to meet the cost of housing and other amenities at prevailing UAE standards.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

However, most foreign workers receive some form of housing from their employer. Employers are required to pay a small sum (less than $100) for National Health Service cards for foreign workers. The latter then have access to free medical care. The UAE Government has made gifts of numerous social centers for various foreign national groups. Most foreign workers remit as much of their salaries as possible to their families in their home countries. Foreign workers earning more than the U.S. equivalent of $1,000 per month may bring their families. The vast majority of foreign workers do not qualify to bring their families. The pool of foreign workers, most of them actively recruited from abroad, meets the demand in the UAE for domestic and service workers and manual laborers.

There are many complaints that recruiters use unscrupulous tactics and entice foreign manual laborers and domestics to the UAE on the basis of false salary and benefits promises. Such cases can be appealed to the Labor Ministry and, if this does not resolve the issue, to the courts. However, many laborers are reluctant to protest or to engage in such a lengthy process because of fear of reprisals by their employers. A foreign worker must get permission from the previous employer to move to a new job with a different employer. UAE law provides for a minimum of 24 days per year of annual leave plus 10 national and religious holidays. Though not a legal requirement, many employers provide as a fringe benefit an annual round-trip airplane ticket for the employee to return home. Employers are required to pay airfare both to the UAE when the employee arrives and to his own country when he returns.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

The military and a core of senior, experienced technocrats have dominated the key sectors of government in the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR) since the 1962 revolution which overthrew the theocratic Imamate. The central Government in Sanaa continues to expand its authority to all parts of the country, but tribal leaders in isolated areas are reluctant to surrender their traditional prerogatives, such as tax collecting and mediating disputes. Tribal conflicts and blood feuds occasionally spill into the major cities, and tribesmen in rural areas often carry automatic weapons.

Colonel Ali Abdallah Salih has been President since 1978; his two immediate predecessors were assassinated within 8 months of each other. He was elected to a third 5-year term in July 1988 by the new Consultative Assembly, which has specific oversight powers including giving or withholding confidence in the Prime Minister and his Cabinet. President Salih sets government policy and relies on technocrats to administer the Government and on the military and security services to keep him in power. In 1989 the Consultative Assembly played an increasingly assertive role, questioning ministers closely on expenditures and operations of their ministries. While meeting in Aden on November 30, President Salih and Secretary General al-Bidh, representing the ruling party of the Peoples's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY), ratified a 1981 draft constitution for a unified Yemeni state. The two leaders agreed to submit the constitution to the legislative authorities of the YAR and PDRY for ratification within 6 months and then to the Yemeni people for approval in a referendum during the following 6 months.

Internal security is largely maintained by the central National Security Organization (NSO), whose agents have broad discretion, especially when national security matters are believed to be involved, to detain citizens for questioning, search their homes, and monitor their activities, telephone conversations, and correspondence.

The YAR is a poor country with 9 million people and a rudimentary physical and social infrastructure. Oil revenue in 1989 was expected to compensate partially for the drastic decline in the official remittances received from YAR nationals working abroad, a decline which began in 1983. Import controls and currency controls, imposed in 1986, remain in place. The economy is basically a free-market economy, although the Government controls a wide array of prices, especially in the cities. The small size of proven oil reserves makes rapid development, such as the Gulf countries have experienced, unlikely.

Civil liberties remain broadly restricted, with no significant change from previous years. Major human rights concerns include abuse of prisoners and detainees; arbitrary detention; lack of fair trial in security cases; restrictions on freedom of speech and press, assembly, and association; and the right of citizens to change their government. However, the Consultative Assembly's review and criticism of government policies and actions have led to increased public discussion of government policies. There is informal and some institutionalized discrimination against Yemeni citizens with a non-Yemeni parent. Tribal and traditional social customs tend to restrict women's role in the public side of society.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

There were no confirmed reports that government forces executed individuals for political reasons. In a covertly circulated pamphlet, the underground leftist opposition group, the National Democratic Front (NDF), accused the Government of having killed 250 NDF followers since 1982, including 3 members of the military, shot in Sanaa in December 1987, who were allegedly associated with the NDF. In its 1989 Report covering 1988, Amnesty International (AI) described the killing of the three as "apparently politically motivated."

b. Disappearance

Occasionally Yemenis "disappear" as a result of being detained secretly by the NSO. Most of these detainees are eventually released.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the Constitution, the National Charter, and Yemeni law proscribe physical torture, security officials reportedly resort with impunity to force or the threat of force to extract information from detainees. Most informed Yemenis believe that the NSO engages in torture on occasion. The Yemeni legal code is based on Islamic Shari'a law, which calls for such punishments as stoning for adultery; however, these penalties are rarely imposed. Flogging of convicted drunkards is occasionally administered in public. AI received reports in 1987 that some prisoners, including children, are manacled for protracted periods of time. There continue to be credible reports that in some cases prisoners' hands had been chained to their necks and ankles.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were continuing reports of arbitrary arrests. Detainees were held without charge for extended periods despite constitutional limits on the time police may hold a suspect without judicial concurrence. Persons are sometimes detained without charge while third parties negotiate the payment of tribal law fines or "blood money" by the detainee's relatives to the victim or victims' relatives. Established procedures which allow prisoners to notify relatives and lawyers are seldom observed, especially in cases of arrests by NSO officials. When foreigners are arrested, consular notification is late or nonexistent.

The Constitution prohibits expulsion of Yemenis from the country. Political dissidents have occasionally gone into self-imposed exile or accepted government positions overseas to escape possible problems at home.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are three principal court systems: Shari'a, Commercial, and State Security. The Shari'a (Islamic) courts have jurisdiction in all cases outside the domain of the other two, although there is some overlap in commercial law cases. The Shari'a courts, viewed within their traditional Islamic context, appear to be fair and impartial. If the defendant is taken to trial, he is informed of the charges against him at the conclusion of the police investigation. The judge actively questions witnesses. Attorneys are allowed to counsel their clients but are not permitted to address the court or examine witnesses. Litigants in Commercial Courts can generally expect a fair and open trial with legal counsel, although tribal ties and bribery are said to play a role in some judicial proceedings. Defendants in the Shari'a and Commercial Courts enjoy the right of appeal and generally open court sessions. The Shari'a and Commercial Courts are largely independent of the executive, but all decisions, as in the State Security courts, are subject to presidential review and confirmation.

The State Security Courts are convened by the President to try specific cases of espionage or other antigovernment activity. Rights normally afforded the accused may be suspended in security cases. The State Security Courts were not known to have convened in 1989. AI reported in 1989 that five persons were sentenced to death in 1985 and another in 1989 on charges of murder relating to alleged killings said to have taken place in clashes between the NDF and government forces before 1982. AI reported the six, all believed to be members of the NDF, returned to the YAR in response to a mid-1982 amnesty said to allow all members of the NDF to return without fear of persecution. AI also noted lack of procedural safeguards in their trial.

The number of political prisoners is difficult to estimate, but there are probably fewer than 50 long-term detainees.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

National security forces routinely search homes, monitor telephones, read personal mail, and otherwise intrude into private matters when national security is believed to be involved. Automobiles are routinely stopped and searched and the identification of the occupants demanded at intersection checkpoints throughout the country, especially at night.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Restrictions exist on free speech but are largely confined to the urban areas because the Government has only limited control in the countryside. Some Yemenis believe that they may experience difficulty if they are overheard criticizing the Government by national security agents.

The Information Ministry owns and operates the radio and television stations, as well as the major newspapers. The few privately owned (nondaily) newspapers do not voice views contrary to the Government's, nor are they permitted to criticize government policies or personalities. Complaints about government bureaucracy and the implementation of government policy (e.g., import and foreign exchange controls and social services) are permitted.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

The Government removes articles from Yemeni publications which its censors deem inappropriate. There is also considerable self-censorship. The weekly newspaper published by Muslim fundamentalists enjoys more independence than most publications, but it also refrains from direct criticism of senior government personalities.

Several foreign publications, including English language newspapers and magazines, are available in the cities, but those containing material deemed offensive are withheld from distribution. Arabic-language newspapers and magazines published outside the YAR are screened for articles on Yemeni domestic politics, and some were not permitted to reach the newsstands. In the past, the Government has suspended publishing licenses for extended periods to punish independent publishers.

Self-censorship is also practiced at Sanaa University, whose professors and senior administrators must receive NSO clearance before being hired. Most professors, including the many expatriates, do not complain about government interference in their courses or curriculum development. Student organizations independent of the Government are not permitted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although ostensibly legal, demonstrations are rare. In November 1988, there were violent demonstrations in the southern province of Taiz in response to the killing of at least one civilian following an altercation with a soldier. Also, some Yemeni interest groups such as grape farmers demonstrated before the Consultative Assembly and were received by the Assembly chairman. Because political parties are illegal, the Government's view is that there can be no antigovernment rallies or demonstrations. Some activist Muslim clergymen, however, preach politics, local and international, under the pretext of delivering a sermon after Friday prayers.

Registered organizations, such as professional groups, are allowed to invite outside speakers to lecture on their official premises so long as their speeches do not conflict with government policies.

Contact between Yemenis and foreigners is selectively monitored by the NSO. All government ministries and major organizations have NSO representatives on their staffs. Invitations and requests for appointments from diplomats to senior government officials must be sent through the Foreign Ministry, although contacts with businessmen and parliamentarians are routine. Yemeni visitors to foreign embassies are sometimes questioned by NSO gate guards. The overall effect is to discourage contact between Yemenis and foreigners, although nondiplomatic personnel--for example, officials working on aid projects--generally enjoy good access to their Yemeni colleagues.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the state religion and is professed by virtually all Yemenis. Members of the Zaydi (Shi'a) sect historically have enjoyed greater political influence than those followers of the Shafi'i (Sunni) school of jurisprudence, although this distinction is often more geographical and tribal than sectarian and is becoming blurred. The two Islamic communities coexist with little friction and have fewer doctrinal differences than do the Shi'a and Sunni communities in some neighboring countries. Islamic associations with ties to pan-Islamic organizations enjoy a degree of freedom, including the right to operate schools largely independent of the national school system. Radical Islamic revival is not a major force in the YAR, although the influential and well-organized Muslim Brotherhood campaigns for the respect of traditional Yemeni values.

Civil servants swear an oath to Allah, and Consultative Assembly members must, according to the electoral law, be "good" Muslims. In practice, the "good" Muslim rule is only applied to Yemenis, generally leftists, whom the Government wants excluded on political grounds. A willingness to swear the oath to Allah (and to the Yemeni nation and revolution) normally suffices. Although the Constitution does not explicitly refer to equal rights for non-Muslims, it does say: "The State has no right to impose distinctions in human rights due to religion or color or sex or language or natural origin or profession." Accordingly, the prison code provides for freedom of religious practice in prisons.

Almost all of the once substantial Yemeni Jewish population has emigrated to Israel, but 1,000 to 1,500 remain, mostly in rural areas in the north. There are no synagogues, but Jews are permitted to practice their religion, including religious instruction, in private homes. The Government makes a point of ensuring that no impediment to this right exists. Although religious materials are not published in Hebrew in the YAR for the small resident Jewish community, the Government has allowed foreign Jewish groups to distribute Hebrew-language religious materials and religious articles such as phylacteries and prayer shawls.

There are no indigenous Christian Yemenis. Foreign Christians, like Jews, are permitted to conduct private services, but churches are not allowed. Foreign clergy are not allowed to proselytize, but some teach or work in social services.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Many Yemenis historically have sought employment abroad. The Government does not restrict emigration, partly in recognition of the importance to the economy of foreign remittances. Procedures for obtaining passports and the necessary exit visas are sometimes onerous, especially for Yemeni men who have not completed their military service. Yemeni citizens, whether Jews or Muslims, are not allowed to travel to Israel. There are no internal travel restrictions for Yemenis, although numerous checkpoints exist on major roads. Foreigners must register and receive permission to travel outside the capital. An American tourist was detained in 1989 for traveling to areas outside the capital without permission.

As the result of an agreement in 1988 between the YAR and the PDRY to permit citizens of each country to enter the other by presenting only their national identity card, the border between the two countries is basically open to Yemenis for the first time in the history of the acrimonious YAR-PDRY relationship. Many PDRY citizens have taken advantage of this accord to visit relatives in the YAR; the traffic from north to south continues to be relatively light.

Of those southerners who fled after the 1986 coup in Aden, approximately 60,000 remain in the north. In 1989 perhaps as many as 5,000 southerners returned to the PDRY, while approximately the same number of wives and children from the south joined their male relatives in exile in the north.

There are about 1,100 Eritrean refugees from Ethiopia at a camp near the coastal town of al-Khawkhah. Several thousand more are scattered throughout the country. The Government closely monitors all political activity by the PDRY and Eritrean refugees. Many of the Palestinians who arrived from Lebanon in 1982-83 have left; the remainder live in a camp near Sanaa and are closely watched by the NSO. The movement and activity of the Palestinians is restricted. Palestinians have not assimilated into Yemeni society largely due to the conservative tribal nature of the society.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political parties are banned, and in practice citizens are unable peacefully to change the Government. There were contested seats during the 1988 Consultative Assembly elections, but candidates were not allowed openly to oppose the President or the National Charter. The President has the final word on all key decisions, appoints ministers, and chooses directly or indirectly the members of various consultative bodies. In principle, the Consultative Assembly could have accepted President Salih's resignation in July 1988 and chosen to elect someone else as President. In practice there was little, if any, likelihood that this would happen.

The Consultative Assembly, 128 of whose 159 members were elected (31 were appointed by President Salih), has the power to ratify government legislation and appointments and to give or withhold its confidence to the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. In the 18 months since it was elected, the Assembly has asserted its prerogatives by having the Government amend its basic program to restrict acceptance of foreign loans, prohibit tax increases, and specify a number of development projects. In 1989 the Assembly rejected one major loan which the Government had strongly urged be approved. Assembly members subjected the Government's proposed budget figures to intense scrutiny and questioning. The Assembly also reviewed international agreements, including Arab Cooperation Council agreements. The Consultative Assembly replaces the previous presidentially appointed Constituent Assembly.

Although the Government maintains that no political opposition groups exist in the YAR, and that everyone supports the National Charter, there are distinct groupings in the Assembly: rightists, leftists, government supporters, traditional tribesmen, technocrats, and Muslim traditionalists. Their political agendas overlap but are not identical. Campaigning in 1988 took the form of pamphlets, posters, and rallies; criticism of rival candidates was not permitted. The actual polling was orderly, and vote counting, by all accounts, was honest.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government permitted one international organization, the International Committee of the Red Cross, to investigate prison conditions in 1989. Otherwise, the Government has generally not permitted organized groups to investigate local cases of possible human rights violations. However, in its 1989 Report, covering 1988, AI noted that it had addressed appeals on behalf of political prisoners and raised other matters with the YAR Government, and that it had "received regular responses."

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

Jews usually live in relative harmony with their Muslim neighbors. While there have been reports that Yemeni Jews are unfairly treated, persecuted, and eager to emigrate to Israel, there has been no confirmation of discriminatory actions by the Government directed against Yemeni Jews, and there were no reports in 1989 of incidents involving government-inspired or condoned harassment. Violent incidents do occur periodically, however, especially in the countryside. The Government makes consistent efforts to protect the largely rural, isolated Jewish community, both at the local level and, when necessary, through the intervention of senior officials in Sanaa. Still, government control over areas where the Jews live is by no means complete, and disputes must often be resolved within the framework of the existing tribal structure. Jews in tribal areas are disadvantaged in that they cannot rely on the threat of tribal retribution to deter attacks. Jews travel freely within Yemen. A few Jews recently traveled abroad to Arab countries for medical treatment. Travelers to the YAR have been able to meet with members of the Jewish community.

A substantial number of Yemeni citizens with a non-Yemeni parent do not enjoy the full range of their constitutional rights. These people, known as muwallidin, face both institutionalized and informal discrimination. For example, Sanaa University, which is administered by the Government, advertises openings for teaching and senior administrative positions with the stipulation that both parents of applicants must be Yemeni citizens. The same is true for applicants to the YAR's military academy. The two-Yemeni parent rule is not strictly enforced at Sanaa University, however.

Discrimination against muwallidin is not universal or pervasive. Many senior government officials and at least one minister are muwallidin. There is no information that muwallidin are arbitrarily arrested or imprisoned. Although some muwallidin have their status indicated in their Yemeni passports, there are no known travel restrictions against them.

Restrictions on women are largely imposed by culture and tradition rather than law. In 1988 the Government ratified a 1981 International Labor Organization (ILO) agreement mandating equality of opportunity and treatment in the workplace for men and women. The Government publicly opposed the efforts of some conservative tribal leaders and Muslim traditionalists to prevent women from registering to vote in the July 1988 elections; government media reiterated the constitutional right of women to participate in the elections. On the other hand, five women who applied to the electoral commission for certification as candidates were pressured by the Government to withdraw their applications to appease Muslim traditionalists, and they did so.

Women now work in the midlevels of several ministries and also in banks and other businesses. Yemen's largest factory group employs women on the same pay scale as men, and women there have risen through the ranks to lower management positions. This same group, however, has a policy of only employing single or divorced women; in principle, the group would accept a written statement of nonobjection from the husband of a married woman, but reportedly none has ever been presented. Women may own property.

Societal pressures often force women to defer to the guidance of male colleagues and the general supervision of male relatives. Women seeking exit visas are frequently asked to demonstrate that male relatives pose no objections to their travel. Education for women in significant numbers began only at the end of the civil war in 1970. The literacy rate for women is approximately 2 percent, but the Government is trying to expand their educational opportunities, including at the university level where about 20 percent of the students are female. However, staffing shortages and other problems continue to hinder the development of education in general. Societal pressures, especially in the rural areas, as well as the demand for their labor, frequently limit the opportunities of women for education.

A form of female genital mutilation, clitorrectomy, is practiced in the coastal region of the YAR (the Tihama), especially among Yemenis of African origin. The extent of the practice of clitorrectomy is unknown. While some individual government health workers in the Tihama actively discourage clitorrectomy, there is no government directive or guidance against the practice. Conservative social mores prevent public discussion or government acknowledgment of this practice. Wife beating and other physical abuse of women occasionally occurs in Yemeni families, but again it is a subject rarely discussed. In cases of abuse, the woman victim usually seeks recourse to her male relatives to pressure the perpetrator to stop the abuse. The victimized woman can seek a legal remedy in court, but social traditions usually impel women and their male relatives to seek mediation to stop the abuse. If mediation or outside pressure fails, the victimized woman may return and live with her male relatives.

YAR family law is dominated by tribal customs and local traditions influenced and modified by Islamic (Shari'a) law. Polygamy is allowed under Islamic law and occasionally practiced in the YAR. The institution of dowry payments, whether the Islamic "mahr" paid by the husband to the wife upon divorce or tribal customary payments made by the groom to the bride's family or to the bride, is widespread. The amount of payments is steadily increasing in spite of government attempts to limit the amount. Divorce is common, as is remarriage.

A government-sponsored women's association exists to promote female education and civic responsibilities.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

Under the YAR labor code, a union may be set up by 100 or more workers upon application to and approval by the government authorities. The labor code prescribes a single union system with one union committee per enterprise, one union branch per locality, one general union per economic sector, and one national umbrella organization, which is the Yemeni Trade Union Confederation. Government employees and some categories of farm workers are excluded from union membership. According to the labor code, unions are prohibited from engaging in any political activity, and their financial records are subject to government oversight. Trade unions are reported to be under heavy NSO influence and have not been known to challenge the Government.

Labor-related legislation neither allows nor disallows strikes, but union-sanctioned strikes do not occur. There have been occasional wildcat strikes, but no reports of government or employer harassment of wildcat strikers or their leaders and no prosecutions.

The Yemeni Trade Union Confederation is affiliated with the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions. The YAR ratified the ILO's Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and Convention 98 on Collective Bargaining in 1976.

In 1989, as in previous years, the ILO Committee of Experts extensively criticized numerous provisions of the labor code which conflicted with the requirements of Conventions 87 and 98. However, the ILO Committee noted the Government's current efforts to amend the labor code to bring it into conformity with international conventions.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

Although the YAR labor code calls on employers to treat workers correctly, it does not contain provisions to ensure worker protection against acts of discrimination by employers, nor does it provide a legal framework for a free collective bargaining system. There is no bargaining, and there are no collective agreements in force. There is no export processing zone in the YAR.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There are no reports of forced or compulsory labor, which is forbidden by the YAR Constitution.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

There is no minimum age for employment of children, but compulsory education requirements, when enforced, would have the same effect. In general, however, these requirements are ignored. Child labor, sanctioned by family custom, is common. Labor by minors aged 12 to 14 is regulated, however, by the Labor Code.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Labor

The rights of workers are enunciated by law, but labor regulations are not strictly enforced. The Ministry of Labor, upon a formal complaint by a worker of an employer violation of the labor code, investigates the complaint and seeks restitution for the worker from the employer if the complaint is found valid. Enforcement of the labor code is more prevalent against employers of large numbers of expatriate workers and against foreign employers of Yemeni workers. Hiring often depends on family and tribal connections and there is no minimum wage. The prevailing daily wage for unskilled workers is about $15, which allows a very modest standard of living for a worker with a family. YAR legal codes prescribe a maximum 8-hour workday (6 during Ramadan), but some workshops operate 10- or 12-hour shifts without penalty.

Local production is largely based on agriculture and cottage industries. While working conditions are sometimes harsh, consistent with the prevailing subsistence economy, the Government has set general safety requirements for larger concerns and occasionally checks to see if they are being observed.

PEOPLE'S DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF YEMEN*

The People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) is a one-party state governed by the avowedly Marxist Yemeni Socialist Party (YSP). President Haidar Abu Bakr al-Attas came to power in January 1986, following the violent overthrow of President Ali Nasir Muhammad al-Hasani, who continues to live in exile in the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR). The current regime has purged the Government and YSP of Ali Nasir supporters. The efforts of the YSP to establish a Marxist-Leninist state along Soviet administrative lines have overwhelmed some traditional social and cultural values. An estimated 25 percent of the population has departed the PDRY, mostly to the YAR, since the country gained independence from Great Britain in 1967. In 1989 the ruling party debated political and economic reforms that would more clearly distinguish between party and state, allow a degree of economic incentives to employers and employees, modify the legal system, streamline administrative structures, and permit multiple political parties. While meeting in Aden on November 30, 1989, YSP Secretary General al-Bidh and YAR President Salih ratified a 1981 draft constitution for a unified Yemeni state. The two leaders agreed to submit the constitution to the PDRY and YAR legislative authorities for ratification within 6 months and then to the Yemeni people for approval in a referendum during the following 6 months.

The Ministry for State Security is charged with overseeing internal security operations. The army, regional militias, and the police play subsidiary roles, but in some areas tribal authority effectively supersedes government rules and regulations.

Approximately 40 percent of the 2.3 million inhabitants work as farmers, and their crops account for about 12 percent of the gross national product. The economy remains hampered by severe shortages of basic consumer items and commodities. The Government continues to regulate most sectors of the economy and makes it difficult for even PDRY citizens to import capital. Small shops and service industries remain privately owned and operated. In 1989 the Government allowed limited private ownership of dwellings for the first time in many years. The Government also expressed interest in attracting Western investment and technology, particularly in the oil and mineral resources sector.

The human rights situation overall remains grim, with many rights, such as freedom of speech, association, and the press, sharply curtailed. Other problem areas are abuse of prisoners and detainees, arbitrary arrest and incommunicado detention, lack of fair trial, and inability of citizens to change their government. There appeared to be some modest improvements in 1989, continuing the trend observable over the past three years. Some PDRY citizens believe that the improvement--in particular, liberalized travel measures and a somewhat freer press--is the result of internal pressure on PDRY officials to follow the liberalizing trend in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. The regime issued an amnesty for all but the top Ali Nasir supporters with the proclaimed goal of promoting national reconciliation.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing

The Ali Nasir exile movement's YAR-based newspaper and an affiliated human rights committee charged the PDRY with the politically motivated killing of several PDRY citizens, including military officers and government officials. The movement regularly accuses the PDRY of political killings, but there is no independent confirmation of these accusations.

b. Disappearance

There were continuing reports of disappearances. As in the past, some apparently were the result of tribal and factional infighting.

c. Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Amnesty International (AI) and the Arab Organization for Human Rights (AOHR) noted in their 1989 reports the deaths in custody of three persons under circumstances strongly suggesting ill-treatment had caused the deaths. The Ali Nasir exile movement and an affiliated committee frequently charge that torture is still practiced by PDRY security services. There is no independent confirmation of these charges.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Incommunicado detention and arbitrary arrests are common. A committee affiliated with the Ali Nasir exile movement identified 23 persons, including some exiles who had returned from North Yemen under a general amnesty first announced in March 1986, who were detained in 1989 without charges. There was no independent confirmation of this allegation. In its 1989 Report covering 1988, AI notes it repeatedly expressed concern about the detention without trial of suspected government opponents.

With regard to forced or compulsory labor, see Section 6.c.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Many persons are believed to have been imprisoned without trial. Legal procedures for the protection of the accused are routinely ignored or manipulated as in the case of the 1987 show trials of former President Ali Nasir and his followers. The Ali Nasir exile movement charged the PDRY Government with conducting a show trial in 1989 of 14 persons charged with treason before the same judges who convicted and sentenced to death other Ali Nasir supporters in 1987. A committee affiliated with the movement further charged the Government with conducting a show trial of four pilots of Yemda, the national airline. There was no independent confirmation of either allegation.

PEOPLE'S DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF YEMEN

- f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

National security is frequently cited as the justification for the pervasive invasion of personal privacy. PDRY security services routinely inspect mail, tap telephones, and arbitrarily search residences and businesses.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Liberties, Including:

- a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is severely restricted. The state-owned electronic media and party newspaper faithfully reflect government views and priorities. In 1989 the state-controlled press reportedly allowed more extensive debate and airing of opinions on draft party and government political and economic reforms. PDRY citizens visiting the YAR have commented that the press appears to be somewhat freer than in previous years.

- b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

No public or professional associations, except those sponsored by the State or party, are permitted to operate openly. Unauthorized gatherings are forbidden.

For a discussion of freedom of association as it applies to labor unions, see Section 6.a.

- c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution declares that Islam is the state religion and provides for freedom of religious expression. In practice, however, the Government attempts to minimize the influence of religious leaders, and some sermons for Friday prayer are reportedly provided by the Ministry of Religious Affairs. A small Christian community of Indian origin exists in Aden and is allowed to practice its religion.

- d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are some restricted areas in the PDRY, but there were said to be fewer checkpoints on major roads and near the capital in 1989 than there were in 1988. The two Yemens implemented a new accord in 1988 which permits citizens of each country to enter the other by presenting only a national identification card. In November 1989 the PDRY revoked the requirement of obtaining prior police permission for South Yemenis wishing to travel to North Yemen. For the first time in their acrimonious relationship, the border between the two countries is basically open to all Yemenis. Many PDRY citizens have taken advantage of this accord to visit relatives and shop in the YAR. Approximately 60,000 South Yemenis have fled to the YAR since the January 1986 coup. In 1989 as many as 5,000 Ali Nasir exiles may have returned to the south under the general amnesty first announced in 1986 and reiterated several times since. However, counterbalancing this movement south across the YAR/PDRY border was the movement north of approximately 5,000 wives, children, and other relatives of Ali Nasir supporters who were in exile in the YAR.

Regulations governing travel to other countries reportedly have also been liberalized. The YSP Politburo approved in November 1989 the lifting of former requirements on foreign travel such as prior police permits, family letters of invitation, exit permits, and travel bonds. Whether other requirements remain is unknown.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The PDRY has no democratic institutions, and ordinary citizens do not have the ability peacefully to change their leaders or the system of government. Political parties, other than the YSP, are banned, and the YSP dominates politics. Other organizations, such as the military and, to a lesser extent, the National Democratic Front (NDF), also play prominent roles. The NDF consists largely of northern Yemenis who waged a guerrilla insurgency against the YAR until 1982; now it is one of several principal factions competing for influence in Aden. Alliances are often based on tribal or regional affiliations; natives of Aden are largely unrepresented in the senior ranks of the YSP.

The Constitution provides for universal suffrage for those over the age of 18, but only candidates approved by the YSP may run for election. An election reform law, reportedly allowing candidates independent of the YSP, self-nominated candidates, and multiple candidates was enacted in 1989. A number of independent candidates competed with YSP candidates in local council elections conducted in November under the new law. The ruling party also announced its agreement in principle to permit multiple political parties and instructed the YSP Politburo to draft a new political parties law. Overall, politics in the PDRY are characterized by violence and coercion. Leading members of the losing faction can often expect imprisonment, exile, or death.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Although AI, AOHR, and other human rights groups attempt to monitor the situation in the PDRY, they are not permitted to enter the country to pursue individual cases. An AI delegation did visit the PDRY in 1987, however, to observe a Supreme Court trial, and the delegation met with several senior government ministers during their visit to discuss some of the cases being followed by AI. In its 1989 Report, AI noted that the authorities had provided some information on cases of detention without trial and denied knowledge of others, and failed to confirm three deaths in custody or to explain the circumstances in which they occurred.

Section 5 Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status

The PDRY is a generally homogeneous society and there are few ethnic or linguistic differences. Political factions are based largely on tribal and regional affiliations. Equality of the sexes is mandated by law.

The postindependence government introduced legislation to emancipate Yemeni women. One 1974 law, modeled after the divorce law of Tunisia, restricted polygamy by requiring the official permission of the court for a second marriage, prohibited child marriages, and provided for a considerable degree of female protection, including equal rights in divorce. Despite this law, there are still frequent cases of polygamy, child marriage, and arbitrary divorce, especially in the more traditional, rural areas.

Violence against women, including wife beating, doubtless occurs, but there is no information available on its extent.

Section 6 Worker Rights

a. The Right of Association

There are no independent trade or labor organizations. The General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU), the PDRY's only labor association, is under close YSP control. The GFTU is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions and with the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions. The PDRY has ratified Convention 98 on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining and the ILO's two forced labor conventions, but not Convention 87 on Freedom of Association. It has been cited by the ILO as not having complied with its obligation to supply reports on ratified conventions in recent years. No information is available on the right to strike.

b. The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively

The State, through the YSP-controlled unions, purports to represent the rights of workers. There is no collective bargaining, and there are no nongovernmental bodies which address labor grievances. A special export processing zone has been established at Maalla Wharf in the port of Aden. Few PDRY exports have been processed through this zone, however, since January 1986.

c. Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor

There are no reports of forced or compulsory labor.

d. Minimum Age for Employment of Children

The labor code prohibits the employment of children (defined as between 7 and 12 years of age) and young persons (between 12 and 16 years of age). However, apprentice employment of young persons 14 years and older is permitted. Child labor is common but is more prevalent in rural areas than in cities, where children must compete with adults for scarce jobs. Child labor in rural areas is often in the context of work on family, cooperative, or state farms.

e. Acceptable Conditions of Work

There is some legislation regulating conditions of labor, but there is no mechanism for effective enforcement. Labor legislation is uniform throughout the PDRY but labor practice is not. For example, child labor is common in many rural areas, but not in Aden. Many, perhaps most, PDRY workers are farmers; the majority of these work in state-controlled collectives or associations, while the others, in more isolated rural areas, enjoy a greater degree of independence. The labor code stipulates a 42 hour workweek. Information on whether the labor code provides for a minimum wage is not available. The prevailing daily wage for unskilled labor is about $10.

APPENDIXES

APPENDIX 'A

Notes on Preparation of the Reports

The annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices are based upon all information available to the United States Government. Sources include American officials, officials of foreign governments, private citizens, victims of human rights abuse, congressional studies, intelligence information, press reports, international organizations, and nongovernmental organizations concerned with human rights. We are particularly appreciative of, and make reference in most reports to, the role of nongovernmental human rights organizations, ranging from groups in a single country to major organizations that concern themselves with human rights matters in larger geographic regions or over the entire world. While much of the information we use is already public, information on particular abuses frequently cannot be attributed, for obvious reasons, to specific sources.

The reports by law must be submitted to Congress by January 31. To comply, United States diplomatic missions are given guidance in September for submission of draft reports during October and November; contributions are received from appropriate offices in the Department of State; and a final draft is prepared under the coordination of the Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs. Because of the preparation time required, it is possible that developments in the latter part of the year may not be fully reflected; moreover, reports from some of the nongovernmental organizations are for periods ending well before the end of the year. We make every effort to include reference to major events or significant changes in trends.

We have attempted to make these country reports as comprehensive as space will allow, while taking care to make them objective and as uniform as possible in both scope and quality of coverage. We have given particular attention to attaining a high standard of consistency despite the multiplicity of sources and the obvious problems related to varying degrees of access to information, structural differences in political and social systems, and trends in world opinion regarding human rights practices in specific countries. There is a conceptual difficulty in applying a single standard of evaluation to societies with differing cultural and legal traditions. There is also a problem of perspective in discussing countries that face differing political realities, which must be taken into account in describing the human rights environment. Rather than viewing a country in isolation, these reports take as their point of departure the world as it is and then seek to apply a consistent approach in assessing each country's human rights situation. While we have tried to make each report self-contained by including enough background information to place the human rights situation in context, readers who need to delve more deeply may wish to consult other sources, including previous country reports.

To improve the uniformity of the reports, the introductory section of each report contains a brief setting, indicating how the country is governed and providing the context for examining the country's human rights performance. A description of the political framework and a discussion of the security and law enforcement situation are followed by an economic background statement. The setting concludes with an overview of human rights developments in the year under review, mentioning specific areas (e.g., torture, freedom of speech and press) in which abuses occurred.

The heading of section 1.a. has been changed this year to "Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing" (emphasis added) in order to take into account killings which may not be "political" in a partisan sense but still constitute a human rights violation (e.g., a situation in which police, whether acting as vigilantes or under official direction, deliberately kill suspected criminals.)

In response to growing concern over violations of the rights of noncombatants resulting from internal armed conflict, we have included an optional section 1.g. entitled "Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts." This section is intended to facilitate discussion of certain human rights abuses that may occur in time of armed conflict, but which do not fit readily into any of the other sections of the format. Inclusion of this section in the report on a specific country does not imply a U.S. position on whether the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the Law of War, their 1977 Protocols, or any other particular legal standards may apply.

In a third change in this year's report, responding to concern expressed by the Congress, we discuss in section 5 (Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status) the extent to which violence against women occurs and is condoned by governments. Aside from the above-noted changes, the format for the reports follows that of last year.

The following notes on specific categories of the report are not meant to be comprehensive descriptions of each category but to provide definitions of key terms as used in the reports and to explain the organization of material within the format:

Political and Other Extrajudicial Killing--Includes killings in which there is evidence of government instigation without due process of law, or of political motivation by government or by opposition groups; also covers extrajudicial killings (e.g., deliberate and illegal use of lethal force by the police against criminal suspects); excludes combat deaths and killings by common criminals, if the likelihood of political motivation can be ruled out.

Disappearance--Covers unresolved cases in which political motivation appears likely and in which the victims have not been found or perpetrators have not been identified; cases eventually classed as political killings are covered in the above category, those eventually identified as arrest or detention are covered under "Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile."

Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment--Torture is here defined as an extremely severe form of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, committed by or at the instigation of government forces or opposition groups, with specific intent to cause extremely severe pain or suffering, whether mental or physical. Discussion concentrates on actual practices, not on whether they fit any precise definition.

Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile--Covers cases in which detainees, including political detainees, are held in official custody without charges or, if charged, are denied a public preliminary judicial hearing within a reasonable period.

Denial of Fair Public Trial--Discusses whether a trial held was both fair and public; failure to hold any trial is noted in the category above; includes discussion of "political prisoners" (political detainees are covered above), defined as those imprisoned for essentially political beliefs or nonviolent acts of dissent or expression, regardless of the actual charge.

Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence--Discusses the "passive" right of the individual to noninterference by the State; includes the right to receive foreign publications, for example, while the right to publish is discussed under "Freedom of Speech and Press"; includes the right to be free from coercive population control measures, including coerced abortion and involuntary sterilization, but does not include cultural or traditional practices, such as female genital mutilation, which are addressed in Section 5 of the report.

Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts--Includes indiscriminate, nonselective killings arising from excessive use of force, e.g., by police in putting down demonstrations (deliberate, targeted killing would be discussed in Section 1.a.). Also includes abuses against civilian noncombatants. This subsection is included only where applicable.

Freedom of Speech and Press--Includes academic freedom.

Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association--Includes the ability of trade associations, professional bodies, and similar groups to maintain relations or affiliate with recognized international bodies in their fields. The right of labor to associate and to organize and bargain collectively is discussed under "Worker Rights" (see Appendix B).

Freedom of Religion--Includes the freedom to publish religious documents in foreign languages; addresses the treatment of foreign clergy; addresses whether religious belief affects membership in a ruling party or a career in government.

Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation--Includes discussion of forced resettlement; "refugees" may refer to persons displaced by civil strife or natural disaster as well as persons who are "refugees" within the meaning of the Refugee Act of 1980, i.e., persons with a "well-founded fear of persecution" in their country of origin or, if stateless, of habitual residence, on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.

Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government--Discusses the extent to which citizens have freedom of political choice and can change the laws and officials that govern them; assesses whether elections are meaningful.

Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights--Includes a discussion of domestic and foreign human rights organizations that follow human rights developments in the country and the government's response to them.

Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Language, or Social Status--Discusses discrimination against women, racial and ethnic minorities, and other groups not discussed in other sections of the report, particularly discrimination instigated or condoned by the government. This includes discrimination in employment, housing, education, or restricted access to other economic, social, or cultural opportunities. (Killing, arbitrary detention, or restriction of voting rights or free speech applied for ethnic or religious reasons, for example, would be discussed under the appropriate preceding sections.) Also includes discussion of government tolerance of violence or other abuse against women, e.g., "dowry deaths," wife beating, and female genital mutilation (circumcision).

Worker Rights -- See Appendix B.

APPENDIX B

Reporting on Worker Rights

The Generalized System of Preferences Renewal Act of 1984 requires reporting on worker rights in GSP beneficiary countries. It states that internationally recognized worker rights include "(A) the right of association; (B) the right to organize and bargain collectively; (C) a prohibition on the use of any form of forced or compulsory labor; (D) a minimum age for the employment of children; and (E) acceptable conditions of work with respect to minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health." All five aspects of worker rights are discussed in a final section under the heading "Worker Rights." The discussion of worker rights considers not only laws and regulations but also their practical implementation, taking into account the following additional guidelines:

A. "The right of association" has been defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO) to include the right of workers and employers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization; to draw up their own constitutions and rules, elect their representatives, and formulate their programs; to join in confederations and affiliate with international organizations; and to be protected against dissolution or suspension by administrative authority.

The right of association includes the right of workers to strike. While strikes may be restricted in essential services (i.e., those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety, or health of a significant portion of the population) and in the public sector, these restrictions must be offset by adequate guarantees to safeguard the interests of the workers concerned (e.g., machinery for mediation and arbitration; due process; and the right to judicial review of all legal actions). Reporting on restrictions affecting the ability of workers to strike generally includes information on any procedures that may exist for safeguarding workers' interests.

B. "The right to organize and bargain collectively" includes the right of workers to be represented in negotiating the prevention and settlement of disputes with employers; the right to protection against interference; and the right to protection against acts of antiunion discrimination. Governments should promote machinery for voluntary negotiations between employers and workers and their organizations. Reporting on the right to organize and bargain collectively includes descriptions of the extent to which collective bargaining takes place and the extent to which unions, both in law and practice, are effectively protected against antiunion discrimination.

C. "Forced or compulsory labor" is defined as work or service exacted from any person under the menace of penalty and for which the person has not volunteered. "Work or service" does not apply to cases in which obligations are imposed to undergo education or training. "Menace of penalty" includes loss of rights or privileges as well as penal sanctions. The ILO has exempted the following from its definition of forced labor: compulsory military service, normal civic obligations, certain forms of prison labor, emergencies, and minor communal services. Forced labor should not be used as a means of (1) mobilizing and using labor for purposes of economic development; (2) racial, social, national, or religious discrimination; (3) political coercion or education, or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social, or economic system; (4) labor discipline; or (5) as a punishment for having participated in strikes. Constitutional provisions concerning the obligation of citizens to work do not violate this right so long as they do not take the form of legal obligations enforced by sanctions and are consistent with the principle of "freely chosen employment."

D. "Minimum age for employment of children" concerns the effective abolition of child labor by raising the minimum age for employment to a level consistent with the fullest physical and mental development of young people. In addition, young people should not be employed in hazardous conditions or at night.

E. "Acceptable conditions of work" refers to the establishment and maintenance of machinery, adapted to national conditions, that provides for minimum working standards, i.e., wages that provide a decent living for the workers and their families; working hours that do not exceed 48 hours per week, with a full 24-hour rest day; a specified annual paid holiday; and minimum conditions for the protection of the safety and health of workers. Differences in levels of economic development are taken into account in the formulation of internationally recognized labor standards. For example, many ILO standards concerning working conditions permit flexibility in their scope and coverage. They may also permit countries a wide choice in their implementation, including progressive implementation, by enabling countries to accept a standard in part or subject to specified exceptions. Countries are expected to take steps over time to achieve the higher levels specified in such standards. It should be understood, however, that this flexibility applies only to internationally recognized standards concerning working conditions. No flexibility is permitted concerning the acceptance of the basic principles contained in human rights standards, i.e., freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, forced labor, and discrimination.
